The Rev. Mr. HARRINGTON rose to second the resolution, and said that in doing so he felt it his first duty to express the pleasure and admiration with which he had heard the noble speech of the noble lord who had just sat down—(cheers)—and who had so long stood forward in the cause of their civil rights and religious interests—(cheers)—He (Mr. H.) should feel ashamed of himself as a man, and disgraced as minister of religion, if he did not return thanks to the noble lord in the chair, and if he did not acknowledge that he felt pride and gratification at seeing so great a portion of the flower and chivalry of the Catholic aristocracy, so many of his own confrères, and such a vast number of Catholics assembled together to express their deep feeling and keen sense of the injury which had been done to their principles, and through those principles, it might almost be said, to their persons. (Hear.) There had been a time, he said, when, "Hope told a flattering tale" to the ears of the Catholics—when they looked forward eagerly, anxiously, to the passing of the Emancipation Act. That measure was heralded in by all that was resplendent in talent, all that was lucid in reason and oratory; it was adorned by the rich eloquence of a Grattan, it was urged by the master mind of a Plunket. Long had the Catholics been sitting in darkness and sorrow, but in the hope that the day-star would at length dawn which should see them free and walking in the clear light and air of the British constitution. They were like the countryman seated by the river side, waiting for the waters to flow away and the channel to be dry ere he could pass to the other side; and it had been even said to them that the waters would indeed flow past and the channel be dry before Catholics should obtain the end for which they awaited. At last, however, the day came, the wand was stretched forth, the waters of the penal code passed away, and they were landed in safety on the other side, upon the shore of liberty. That to the Catholics was a day of gratitude and jubilee, and they felt that the principle being admitted, they were eligible to all offices, save one or two, in the State of which they were members. They waited and saw the gradual development of the principle into practice. The House of Lords was thrown open, and a portion of the British aristocracy walked in, an honour and an ornament to the order to which they belonged. The House of Commons was also thrown open; but the fact could not be doubted that there was one man who, with powerful arm, broke open the portals of that house, which had been closed against those of his creed for long years, and that man was Daniel O'Connell. (Tremendous cheering, in the midst of which some one called for "Three cheers for Daniel O'Connell" which were most heartily given.) It gave the general body of the Catholics great pleasure to see those of their religion enter the House of Lords and Commons, to see them even admitted to be privy councillors and sheriffs of cities. The Catholics were trusted, and they acted with honour and integrity in the situations in which they were placed. It was, then, with feelings of pride that Catholics watched the progress of emancipation. But how stood the matter at present with regard to the exclusion of Catholics from juries? It was true their noble chairman might enter the House of Lords, but he could not serve as a jurymen. Another Catholic might enter the House of Commons, but must not serve as a jurymen. (Great laughter.) A third might serve in the exalted and honourable capacity of a privy councillor, but he must not sit as a jurymen. (Cheers, and laughter.) Would it not be asked, have been a great pleasure to have found a Catholic upon the jury now sitting in Dublin, if only that he might have been able to describe the impression made upon him by Mr. Attorney-General Smith—"Hear" and laughter)—when he was teaching the rising lawyers how trial by jury was to be set aside, and trial by battle substituted—(laughter and cheering)—when he was

"Teaching the young (counsel) how to shoot"

(Renewed laughter and plaudits.) Now, it had lately been thought necessary for the safety and good government of Ireland that a bill for the registration of arms should be passed, and he (Mr. Harrington) thought it would not have been altogether out of place to have inquired of the Court whether Mr. Smith's pistols were registered. (Cheers and laughter.) But, leaving these points, he would say that the Catholics deeply felt, as indeed they ought to feel, that a great injustice had been done to them by their exclusion from the jury; and they felt it the more, because they thought upon those by whom the great charter of English liberties were secured—the bold barons of Runnymede, men of strong loyalty, but strong determination—men with pride in their port and defiance in their eyes—who wrung Magna Charta from the hands of John. In that charter one of the chief bulwarks of English liberty was the provision that no man should be injured in person or property, unless by Judgment of twelve peers. Should we be unmindful of the great example set by those brave barons? No. He would say, let us stand by that, which they had bequeathed to us—Trial by Jury. (Hear, hear.) He asked, would it not have been wrong on the part of the English Catholics at this crisis, when Ireland and Scotland had spoken out to stand by tamely and hear their principles maligned? (Hear, hear.) It was said that they were not worthy to be believed on their oaths. If that were true, why put a Catholic in the witness-box? (Hear.) Why present to him an oath, if he was not to be believed when he had sworn? They had met that day to express the deep feeling they entertained of the injury done to the Catholic body by their exclusion from the jury; and had they not a right to do so? Were they not men moved by the same feelings, actuated by the same motives as others: and were they to sit down tamely under such disgrace? (Cries of "No, no,") No! they owed to themselves—they owed it to their fellow-citizens and to their Protestant brethren, to speak out like men, and say that the accusation was unjust. (Loud cheers, in the midst of which the reverend gentleman sat down.)

The resolution was then put by the noble Chairman, and carried, amidst the most enthusiastic cheering.

The Hon. C. LANGDALE was then called upon to move the second resolution. He said: Ladies and gentlemen, I am afraid that my noble friend in the chair has said rather too truly, that I am not a stranger to you at your meetings, and I am only afraid that my voice may grate in your ears. (Cheers, and vehement cries of "No, no.") A resolution, my lord, has been put into my hands, and I shall premise the few observations I may have to make upon that resolution, by endeavouring, in the first place, to prevent even the possibility of being misunderstood. Gentlemen, you have been told by our noble Chairman that this meeting is, as it ought to be, strictly limited to the special object for which the requisitionists have called us here to-day; and in alluding to the just complaint we have to make as to the exclusion of Catholic jurymen, I trust that nothing which may drop from me may be considered as throwing, or intended to carry, the slightest reflection whatsoever upon those gentlemen who may now be sitting as jurors in the city of Dublin, ("Hear, hear," and cheers.) I know nothing whatsoever of those gentlemen, of their politics or of their principles. This one thing only I do know—that they are not Roman Catholics; and could I for one moment bring myself to suppose that on that account they would not as fairly, and honestly, and conscientiously discharge their duty as I should myself, or as would any other Catholic under similar circumstances, I should myself be guilty of that very injustice of which I now accuse others. (Cheers.) What is the subject of complaint which has brought us together this day? That question will, perhaps, be best answered by reading the resolution I hold in my hands, and which I shall have the honour to move. The honourable gentleman then read the resolution as follows:—"That the officers of the Crown, in striking off every Catholic from the panel in a trial pending in the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland, have raised even in the court of justice itself, a well-grounded suspicion of a violation of this principal of the Emancipation Act, and have thereby insulted our religion, and endangered our right by an implied imputation on the integrity of our oaths." (The reading of the resolution was followed by the continued cheers of the meeting.) That is the charge we bring against the officers of the Crown in regard to the trials now pending in Dublin. I now propose all meetings of this kind that the subject in hand should be understood in all its bearings, to explain to every one present the exact mode in which the insult of which we complain took place. The list from which the jury is selected in Dublin consists of from 700 to 800 names of person possessing certain requisite qualifications. But I must, in the first place, here refer to that which has been already alluded to, namely, that it is somewhat extraordinary—that it bears upon the face of it, grave ground for suspicion, that some unfairness was practised in the very preliminary steps, or process in the formation of the list. (Loud and continued cheering.) I am justified in so saying, because it was openly declared by one of her Majesty's Judges, from the bench itself, that there were grounds of great suspicion attending that transaction. (Renewed cheers.) And I must say, when we see what subsequently took place, to strengthen as it were the foundation of that suspicion, that there is cause for that assertion, and for our complaint. It so happened that a paper, containing from sixty to seventy names, was mislaid or withdrawn. ("Hear, hear," and "Oh, oh.") Among these sixty or seventy names, it also so happened that there were thirty-five Catholics. (Hear, hear.) However, without charging, which distinctly I do not, the Attorney-General for Ireland or the officers of the Crown with being party or parties to the mistake or withdrawal—call it what you please—I do say that in some quarter or another, it has been declared by one of her Majesty's Judges on the bench, that there are great grounds for suspicion. Purged, then, as this list was of these thirty-five Catholics, the next step is to select forty-eight names from the list, which, I believe, are chosen by ballot. Out of these forty-eight names, each party, the prosecutor and the traversers, strike off twenty-four. From the remaining twenty-four the jury consist, as you know, of twelve men, chosen to try the issue. What is the course taken in this case by the prosecuting party? Out of these forty-eight names eleven were Catholics. One by one, as the turn came for the solicitor for the Crown to strike out a name, he chose to strike out the name of a Catholic, until every Catholic was out of the panel. (Groans, and cries of "Shame.") Now arrives the question—Why was this done? I know it has been subsequently—mark "subsequently"—rumoured that these Catholics were Repealers, and because they had a strong political bias, they were struck off. Let us sift this allegation thoroughly, for it is a most material point. (Hear, hear.) I say the act itself was of great importance. Upon the face of it, it was an insult to seven eighths of the population of Ireland. (Cheers.) Was it not desirable, was it not the bounden duty of the officers of the Crown, to avoid, if possible, any imputation of that kind? (Cheers.) Would they not have avoided it if it were possible for them to do so? Would they not have assigned some cause other than that of Catholicity, if they were prepared at the time—mark, at that time—to do so? There can be no doubt if another reason had existed it would have been assigned. But what was the cause at that time? The solicitor was challenged as he struck names, with striking it off because it belonged to a Catholic. What would have been the course of the officer of the Crown under those circumstances, eager and anxious as he ought to have been, for the preservation of quiet and the reputation for justice of his proceedings? If he was striking off the name of persons simply because of their political conduct, would he not have directly said so when challenged? When he struck off the name A B or C D and the opposite solicitor objected that the name was so struck off because its owner was a Catholic, would not the Crown solicitor instantly have replied, "No, you are mistaken? it is not so, he struck off the name of this man, not because he is a Catholic, but because he is a Repealer." (Loud and continued cheering.) If the solicitor for the Crown had been then—mark, again, "then"—if he had been then prepared with this excuse, would he not have advanced it—would he have allowed himself to be, as he was, in open court, in the face of day, challenged with striking off names of those persons merely and solely because they were Catholics? (Hear, hear.) I say that this excuse about Repealers comes too late. (Tremendous cheering.) It was when all Ireland was in a blaze that it at last occurred to them that some such paltry excuse might serve their turn. (Cheers.) But how stands the fact? Simply that those persons were not all Repealers. (Hear, hear.) When I signed the requisition for this meeting, I determined to ascertain the truth, as far as lay in my power, and accordingly I wrote to Dublin, to an individual most likely to be able to give me authentic information, and I will state to you the particulars I received in reply. My correspondent states, with respect to these eleven jurors, that "it is certainly not true that all of them were Repealers. Some of them were, but none of them ever took an active part in the Repeal agitation, nor did any one of them act as a Repealer, except, perhaps, by contributing his shilling or his pound. There are three whose names are not upon the books at all." (Cheers.) Now, I ask you whether, before the Crown solicitor struck off those names, it was not his bounden duty to ascertain if the parties were or were not Repealers. Upon a trial of this importance—a trial, I might almost say, upon which the fate of the empire might be supposed to depend—it was most material, if possible, to have only one Catholic left upon the jury. Would it not, indeed, have changed the whole character of the proceedings? The hon. gentleman here proceeded to read a further extract from the letter of his Irish correspondent, to the effect, that of three persons whose names had been struck off two had never expressed any opinions favourable to Repeal, or had attended any meetings, and one of them entertained opinions adverse to Repeal. (Loud cheers.) What was the reason, then, that these men were struck off? Because they were Roman Catholics—(great cheering.)—and it is in vain to endeavour to get over this view of the course pursued. The insult was to them as Catholics, and it is impossible but that all Catholics, be they where they may, must feel it as an insult offered to themselves. (Loud cheers.) What then, is the course we were bound to follow? I know it has been said, and so much was expressed to myself, not indeed by a Catholie, but a Protestant friend, "Why should you meddle with this affair? These people are Irish Catholics. ("Hear, hear," and cries of "Oh, oh.") It is an Irish proceeding altogether, and you English have nothing to do with it." I cannot take that view of the case. There was, it is true, a difference of opinion among Catholics upon the real matter of fact, whether these persons were struck off the list because they were Catholics, but who must feel the same indignation that I do. (Renewed cheers.) But, forsooth, they were Catholics in Ireland. ("Hear, hear," and laughter.) I should like to know whether Catholics in England thought they had nothing to do with Catholics in Ireland some years ago—"Hear, hear," and cheering)—when we in common with them were suffering under a penal code of laws and exclusion from our political rights. I should like to know where would be our political rights now, and in what state our religion would now be in England if it had not been for the Catholics in Ireland. (Greet cheering, and three cheers for O'Connell.) I wish I could bring myself to believe that it was purely to a sense of justice in England we are indebted for our freedom from the trammels which then bound us. (Cheers.) But I have, unfortunately, the declaration of the minister of the day that no such grounds as these existed, but that it was absolute necessity—that it was the strong voice of millions—that it was, above all things, although not expressed or openly acknowledged, to the voice of those millions who were guided and tutored especially by one individual—which forced the Government to grant Catholic Emancipation. (Cheering.) I hope and trust, then, that every Catholic who believes that those eleven jurymen were struck off the list because they were Catholics, does feel and resent it as an injury and an insult offered to himself. (Reiterated plaudits.) What is the amount of this injury? In what position does it place the Catholics? Let me ask you what is the real disqualification for sitting as a jurymen? Why a conviction for felony. (Hear, hear.) Yes, a convicted felon, as one unworthy of that trust, is rendered incapable of sitting as a juror. What is the natural deduction? That we Catholics are no more worthy of credence on our oaths than is a convicted felon? What! and are we tamely to sit down and submit to an imputation of this kind? (Loud cries of "No.") I rejoice that the Catholics of England, at the meeting of this day, will express sentiments of a different description. This is, believe me, an affair of no small moment. It is not a mere whisper among a few persons. So far as the press can carry the news of these trials, so far also the news of this insult to the name of Catholic will reach. The press has, in many instances, considered this matter in its true light, and has not hesitated to charge against the Catholics that which those in power are perhaps afraid openly to charge. One of the morning papers, of great circulation, the Morning Herald—(groans, and "Oh!"), justifies the conduct of the Government, and said they were right. (Shame, shame.) And why? Because the writer in the Herald says that had a single Catholic been called upon the jury, that Catholic would have immediately received notice from his spiritual superior that he was bound to acquit the traversers. (Derisive cheers.) That is no slight imputation; the paper containing it is handed from table to table, from house to house, and it happens that a great number of people are apt to believe what a newspaper tells them. They take assertions upon credit, and they say, "Oh, it must be so, I saw it in print"—(hear and laughter)—and thus they will argue "who can believe the Roman Catholics?" Why, if such imputations as these upon us be true, then I can say we are totally unfit for any state of society. Then not only ought the penal code to be re-enacted against us; but we ought to be driven altogether from the society of man. (Cheers.) Whom do we charge with this insult offered to the Catholic body? Is it the poor Crown solicitor who struck off those names? (Cries of "No, no.") No such thing. On the contrary, I feel pity and compassion for the individual who was obliged to adopt such a course of conduct, in obedience to the orders of those above him. I arraign, then, his superior—the legal adviser of the Crown, the Attorney-General for Ireland. (Groans.) But do I stop here? No; he also is responsible; and to whom? To the Government that appoints him. (Cheers.) I say it was the bounden duty of the Government, if they do not patronise and back up the conduct of the Attorney-General, at once to have repudiated it. They who profess to have the peace of the empire at heart—(Cries of "Oh, oh!")—who desire to support the dignity of the Crown, who complain of the state of agitation in which Ireland is or was, they are to blame for placing such an individual in such a station; for they had no right to expect any other course of conduct would have been pursued by the Attorney-General. He was acting in pursuance of an opinion he had expressed at a large meeting of the Orangemen of the North, that Catholic members of Parliament violated their oaths. But whether the Government knew this or not, they are responsible for the conduct of the Attorney-General, responsible for the outrage and insult offered to one third part of the population of Great Britain and Ireland—for that proportion do the Catholics bear—and I do trust they will be called in another place to a most rigid account for the conduct they have thought fit to pursue. The honourable gentleman concluded by moving the resolution and resumed his seat amidst prolonged cheering.

The Rev. Mr. SISK, in seconding the resolution, said, that after the able manner in which the subject upon which they were met together had been handled, he felt a difficulty in addressing them; not but he felt the deepest anxiety upon that subject. (Hear, hear.) It was their duty to protest in the protest in the most solemn manner against the way in which things had been carried on in a neighbouring country. The last had not been the only case in which Catholics had been thrown out of the panel of a jury. The last was the case of Mr. Barrett, not a Roman Catholic, but a Protestant, who had been tried, and all the Catholics had been struck out of the jury list by her Majesty's present Attorney-General for Ireland. (Hear, hear.) There was, therefore, strong ground for saying that on the present occasion a most glaring and grievous injustice had been perpetrated. The circumstance they had that day met to complain of was part of a series of acts of the grossest oppression. Were not all present familiar with the subject of packed Orange juries? Was there not a case in the county Monaghan some time ago of a person tried by three successive juries? (Hear, hear.) Was a man in England ever tried before three juries? (No.) Why, then, should these things happen in Ireland? Should there be one law for England and another law for Ireland? Englishmen were in the habit of looking upon Irishmen as a degraded race. The rev. gentleman here drew a contrast between the relative numbers of Englishmen and Irishmen holding offices under the Crown, stating that out of 224 members of the Queen's household only four were Irishmen; and the general proportion in all offices of trust was as twenty Englishmen to one Irishman. Were they to be content with such a state of things as this? All had become familiar with the manner in which the clergy of Ireland had been run down; they had been stigmatised as "surpliced ruffians." But that was only a single instance of the manner in which respectable, intelligent, and hard-working clergy of Ireland were defamed and insulted. The plain fact was, that Ireland did not exist on a fair, just and equal footing with this country. It was professed so to be; but it was mere imagining—a theory that was not carried into practice. Things existed in Ireland that were unheard of in England! Would any one in England see policemen enter into the very courts of justice, before the judges, with their bayonets on, and wearing their side-arms? Why, in this country, even soldiers were not permitted to wear their side-arms, while in Ireland the very policemen carried them into the presence of the judges themselves. Then let them observe the tone of exaggeration which prevailed in this country upon everything concerning Ireland. If a murder took place in Tipperary, the whole empire directly rang from one end to the other with an outcry, and Ireland was represented as full of bloodshed and insurrection. He contended that Ireland possessed a population superior to that of his country in morality and intelligence, and that if Mr. O'Connell agitated, he was justified in so doing, because the principle of the British constitution was discussion. Throughout forty years O'Connell had laboured for his country, and was this to be the termination? Could any of them look on calmly and contemplate the bare possibility of his being incarcerated in a dungeon?—"No, no," and immense cheering—and yet if the forms of law should be such that such an issue should take place, which all would deplore and pray it might never occur, his conduct ought to be that which he (Mr. O'Connell) himself wished it to be—namely, peace, order, and submission to the laws of whatever country they might be; but one example might be shown—that those who were of noble sentiments were disposed to follow advice and admonition he gave. (Cheers.) Would he be compared with him? They read of the overthrow of kingdoms by force of arms, and the establishment of empires by bloodshed, and every species of crime; yet in the course of little less than half a century, the penal laws under which the Catholics were degraded had been swept off, and here they were assembled in the centre of the metropolis, where nineteenth-twentieths of the inhabitants were of a different persuasion to themselves, quietly and openly expressing their sentiments without let or molestation of any kind. (Cheers.) When such men as Lord Brougham and Sir James Graham—(groans)—arraigned the Catholics in distinct terms on their not keeping their oath, he wished some one had required the oath taken by Privy Councillors to be read, in which they swore that they would not do anything to weaken the established religion, and had then immediately referred to the act, by which no less than ten Protestant bishoprics in Ireland were annihilated. The noble Lord (Lord Stourton) who had addressed the meeting with so much dignity and eloquence, having on one occasion been compelled to listen to a long speech from Dr. Philpotts, Bishop of Exeter—(Hisses)—imputing a disregard of their oaths, got up, and in one sentence completely put him down. (Cheers.) The noble lord asked, "If Catholics were not bound by their oaths, when they had for three hundred years foregone their privileges, and even their civil rights, rather than take an oath which was against their conscience." (Cheers.) The Duke of Wellington rose and complimented the noble lord upon his reply. (Cheers.) He congratulated the English Catholics in having come forward to evince their sympathy for their brethren in Ireland. (Cheers.) The injuries done to the Catholics of Ireland were injuries done to the Catholics of England. (Hear, hear.) There were Irishmen, and the descendants of Irishmen, among themselves. He was one of them. (Cheers.) Each of them had stored up in their memory a story of the effects of the penal laws upon their own immediate ancestors; and each of them could tell a tale of sorrow and of woe which Protestant ascendancy had wrought upon Ireland. But the day was gone by for either Protestant or Catholic ascendancy; and the only principle that was now recognised was perfect equality for all her Majesty's subjects. (Loud cheers.) He would say, in the eloquent language of Mr. Sheil, that he never would see the day when a Protestant would be put upon his trial, before four Catholic judges and twelve Catholic jurors, politically prejudiced against him, and under a prosecution conducted by officers of the Crown, who all should be Catholics. (Cheers.) The rev. gentleman concluded amidst the loudest applause, by seconding the resolution, which, like the former, was carried by acclamation.

Mr. P. HOWARD, M.P., for Carlisle, who was introduced by the noble chairman amidst much cheering, which he received with very remarkable modesty and emotion, came forward to move the next resolution. He said that he had had the honour of being entrusted with the third resolution, and he was sure when he told them it conveyed determination to address the Crown, it would be believed that no light or trivial ground had justified that step. (Cheers.) The Catholics of England, who under the most trying circumstances had been noted for the moderation—the intrepid moderation of their conduct—would not have approached the throne, unless they conceived that their civil rights were threatened, and the integrity of their tenets and religious faith slighted. (Cheers.) They had the great palladium of English liberty threatened by the exclusion of every Catholic from the jury list. They had seen the efficiency of the institution of trial by jury, which was associated with the revered name of Alfred, put in peril. If such were the course and conduct adopted in the metropolis of Ireland, which was an integral part of the United Kingdom, and within the view of Great Britain, might they not expect that such an example would be speedily followed in the dependencies of the British Crown, where public opinion is much weakened, and where a great part of the population were Catholics? Did it not, then, behove them to protest against this example and precedent which it was sought to establish? (Cheers.) During the long winter of persecution the English and Scotch Catholics had been distinguished by their unshaken loyalty; and he thought they might now come forward with dignity to protest against the injustice that was sought to be inflicted on their fellow-subjects and co-religionists in the sister country. (Cheers.) The resolution and the address which he had the honour to propose were these:—"That the following address, founded on these resolutions, be circulated for signatures, and presented to her most gracious Majesty, at an early period by the noble chairman, and such other Catholic noblemen and gentlemen as may please to attend:—

"We, your Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, professing the Roman Catholic religion, strongly impressed with the importance of the principle sanctioned and established on the passing of the Emancipation Act, that our religion should no longer be a bar to the full and free enjoyment of those civil rights and privileges, of which we had so long been deprived under unjust and erroneous imputations on its tenets, cannot but view with extreme jealousy the late act of the legal advisers of your Majesty's Government in the jury list. We, therefore, humbly presume, in presenting this our loyal address to your Majesty, to protest against this their act being construed into a precedent for infringing on those rights and privileges, which we consider ourselves equally entitled to and qualified to enjoy with any other class of your Majesty's subjects."

That was the address which he trusted would receive the signature not only of every Catholic peer, but of every Catholic member of Parliament, and of every member, even the humblest of the Catholic community, and he trusted that it was worded with equal duty and reverence to the Crown, and regard to the principles of the British constitution. (Cheers.)

The CHAIRMAN introduced, in flattering terms, as a second to the motion.

Mr. CHARLES EYTON, who was received with loud cheering, and said that he felt deeply conscious how much he stood in need of the kind introduction of his noble friend, because he was aware that he did not possess the qualifications, either of the reverend gentleman, or of the hon. member for Carlisle, who had last addressed the meeting. If there ever arrived the time when he should be called upon to enter upon the momentous topic which agitates this empire from its centre to the extremities, he would be ready to declare his opinions, freely, plainly, and manfully, whether they might prove popular or not. (Cheers.) He might differ upon that subject from some of those whom he had the honour to address, but they were all agreed in their devotion to the principle that no civil disqualification should attend upon religious opinions; and this he was ever ready to advocate, not only for Catholics but for Dissenters, and for those of the Jewish persuasion. (Cheers.) He had been told by a friend, that in attaching his name to the requisition he was interfering with the administration of justice. (Laughter.) Now, he believed in his conscience that he stood at this meeting to-day solely because the administration of justice had already been interfered with. (Cheers.) He did not deny that the officers of the Crown in Ireland had a legal right to strike off the names of the Catholics from the jury list. Undoubtedly they had the legal right to do so; but law was not always justice. (Cheers.) And they had the authority of one of the greatest lawyers of antiquity, greater than the Attorney-General for Ireland—(Laughter.)—that extremum jus was often extremum injuria. Extreme justice was often attended with great injustice; and this was perfectly true in the present case. There was considerable irregularity respecting the last page containing the jury list. That alone would have been sufficient to have tainted all these proceedings, and gave the idea that substantial justice had not been done in this case. Caesar's wife should not only be virtuous, but should be above all suspicion. So justice should not only be fairly administered, but it should be even above suspicion. (Cheers.) With regard to the other point—the striking off the names of all the Catholics—he really believed that they were struck off as Catholics. There was a great principle at stake, not merely affecting Catholics. To-day the question affected Roman Catholics alone. But the day might come—and might not be distant, when it would embrace also the Presbyterians of Scotland. (Hear, hear.) The day might afterwards come when it would be extended to the Protestant Dissenters of England. (Hear, hear.) He trusted that, under all circumstances, the Catholics of England would be determined opponents of the application of the principle in the case of others as in their own. (Cheers.) He felt the greatest pleasure in giving his support to the motion of the hon. gentleman who had preceded him. (Applause.)

The noble CHAIRMAN then read the resolution and the address, which were carried, of course, unanimously, and amidst long-continued and most vehement applause.

Mr. P. HOWARD, M.P., moved that Lord Camoys should vacate the chair, and that it should be taken by Lord Stourton.

The motion was agreed to, and Lord Stourton took the chair, when—

Sir EDWARD NAVASTON moved the thanks of the meeting to his noble friend, Lord Camoys, for his dignified, zealous, and amiable conduct on that occasion, and on all others where the civil and religious interests could be promoted by his able services. (Cheers.)

Mr. P. MAXWELL seconded the motion, which was carried amidst enthusiastic cheering.

Lord CAMOYS briefly returned thanks, and to remind the meeting that copies of the dress were in the room for the signature of those present.

There were loud calls for Mr. W. J. O'Connell, who, however, declined addressing the meeting.

His lordship and the other noblemen and gentlemen then retired from the platform, amidst a swell shout of applause, which, after their departure, was followed by one of the loudest, earliest, and long-sustained round of cheers for O'Connell we ever heard.

The meeting then separated, at half-past three o'clock.

To the Editor of the Madras Examiner.

DEAR SIR,—The fifth quarterly tea festival of Father Mathew's Total Abstinence Society at Secunderabad was held at their rooms on the evening of Easter Tuesday. The room was as usual tastefully decorated, and reflects great credit on the managers; at one end was erected a green lower ornamented with flowers under which sat the President and Vice-President, the Rev. Messrs. J. and C. Murphy and their guests, and on the other a wreath of evergreens, in the centre of which conspicuously appeared the coat of arms of H. M.'s 4th King's Own Regt. The table was profusely supplied with excellent tea, coffee, ginger-beer, fruit and confectionary. The splendid and of the 38th Regt. afforded their invaluable assistance, for which the society feels deeply indebted to the kindness and liberality of Major Coll commanding the above Regt. and its excellent officers. The party sat down at 7 o'clock P.M. and immediately after the toasts of the evening were alternately proposed in appropriate speeches by the President and Vice-President and received with rounds of Hurrahs. The toasts were Her Majesty Queen Victoria, Prince Albert and the Royal family, Father Mathew, the Teetotallers of Secunderabad. The Gentlemen who avoured us with their company, (on the part of whom Doctor Riddell responded in an eloquent and humorous speech which was cheered for some time after he sat down;) and the officers commanding the 4th Regt. and Artillery. By one of the members of the Society the health of the President and Vice President, the Rev. Mr. Egan our late Vice-President, and the Rev. Mr. were proposed and received with heartfelt cheers. The Rev. D. Murphy replied on the part of Mr. Egan and himself and the Rev. C. Murphy on the part of Mr. Doyle and himself. Teetotallers were permitted to be present each one wore his medal suspended by a satin ribbon, a novelty on this occasion, one that added considerable effect to the respectable appearance of the members. Music and musics enlivened the evenings entertainment and every thing was carried on with the best good humour and regularity. All separated about 12 o'clock in the highest spirits with assurance of returning to the next party with an increase of numbers, and that total abstinence means for making the soldier's happy.

Egan.)

Your's faithfully

ST. AGATHA.

(See her life by Butler.)

"OH, MARY, CONCEIVED WITHOUT SIN, PRAY FOR US WHO HAVE RECOURSE TO THEE."

The giddy crowd rushed eagerly on,
To hear the judge on his judgment throne;
Each eye was fixed on a figure frail,
Of steadfast mien and of beauty pale.
She stood alone, in the midst of her foes,
And her cheek was white as the whitest rose,
And the earnest eyes she raised to heaven,
A ray of its light to them was given.
The judge had spoken—the knife was near,
But Agatha showed no signs of fear;
And a glory fell on her high pale brow,
As the blood gushed forth from her neck of snow.
A murmur ran thro' the shrinking crowd,
For nature spoke in each heart aloud;
But the martyr raised her head to speak,
A sudden flush on her tender cheek.
"And art thou, oh tyrant! all dead to shame?
And hast thou forgotten thy mother's name?
And that breast from whence ye nourishment drew,
That for thee no thought but of love e'er knew?
In mine thou'st insulted thy mother's breast,
Thou hast torn the bosom that gave thee rest;
Yes! gashed with thy sacrilegious knife
In me, the being that gave thee life!
I've a spouse undying, who knows my heart,
Who knows I have chosen the virgin's part;
That from me no infant may ever claim
Or a mother's love, or a mother's name.
And never your bloodiest threats can move
My soul from the choice of its early love,
Nor your fetters shackle my spirit's flight,
To Christ, who awaits it in realms of light."
She ceased; but strange joy was in her eyes,
And her awful form appeared to rise;
She clasp'd her hands, and a holy light
Was round her then, like a raiment bright.
"O Thou!" she added, "Who hast my vows,
The virgin's hope, and the virgin's Spouse!
Recall me hence to thy vision blest,
My soul is fainting with thee to rest."
Then slowly she sank to the blood-stained earth,
Like a lily plucked in its spring-time birth;
But her soul impatient hath winged its way
To the Spouse she bought with her blood that day.

M. C. A.

Catholic Magazine, Feb. 1844.

DEPTFORD MISSION.—CONSCIENCE MONEY.
—TO THE REV. W. MARSHALL.—Dear and Rev. Sir,—In pursuance of your direction, I have handed the sums, as prescribed by you, to the legitimate owners, 11. 1s. to Mr. L. Prendergast; 7s. to W. Hennelly; 7s. to J. Burke, publican; for which they return you their most grateful acknowledgment. What can tend more to proclaim the sanctity of our holy religion, and the divinity of the institution of the sacrament of Penance, than those edifying instances of restitution? Believe me to be, rev. dear Sir, faithfully and truly yours JOHN MORRIS P.P.

BENGAL

CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

No. 20.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, MAY 18, 1844.

[VOL. VI.]

A BRIEF STATEMENT of the principles regarding CHURCH GOVERNMENT, held by Congregationalists or INDEPENDENTS. Compiled by JAMES HILL, Union Chapel. Calcutta, 1832.

This is a small octavo volume of 206 pages in which all the arguments of Congregationalists or Independents against Church Establishments, and particularly against the Church of England, are very forcibly stated. We suspect it must have made a great impression on the members of the Church of England in Calcutta, as it appears to have continued to this day unanswered; and we believe the arguments by which Mr. Smith, who was once a minister of the Church of England, silenced the Rev. Mr. Quartley, who is still one of the ministers of that Church, are all developed in its pages. We confess we never read an attack on the Church of England, so powerful, so well sustained and so skilfully managed. It is a complete controversial armoury, from which the Dissenter may draw arrows to infinity to pierce the disproportioned, bloated corpse of the Anglican Establishment.

● Why has not this Book been answered by some of the well-paid parsons of the Church of England in Bengal? They know best themselves, but if they can answer it, we think they ought. Perhaps the best reason, that they could assign, is, that it is much pleasanter to live on the fat of a rich Establishment than to defend a corrupt and contradictory system from an assailant who can give the best possible reasons for his dissent, though he has no good foundation for his faith; unless indeed we admit the Protestant principle, that dissent is faith.

The Rev. Charles Quartley made a pompous display, a few months ago, in a pamphlet in defence of the Church of England against secession and dissent; but he died soft under a spirited rejoinder from Mr. Smith of the Free Church of Scotland. Mr.

Quartley thought he was bound to reply to an anonymous pamphlet which laid bare the weakness, inconsistencies and corruptions of the Church of England, lest weak or ignorant minds should be unsettled by it, and yet he will not answer Mr. Smith's pamphlet which is not anonymous, and is infinitely more calculated to unsettle the minds of Church of England Protestants, and send them into the ranks of dissent.

Mr. Quartley challenged some Dissenter to come forward under his proper name, and stand before him to sustain the anonymous writer's attack on the Church of England; and lo, no sooner does Mr. Smith make his appearance from behind the curtain, than Mr. Quartley turns his back, leaving his opponent a clear stage and all the favour of the astonished spectators.

"It may be," said the Rev. Mr. Quartley, "that my strictures may be made the subject of anonymous observations, or of notice in the ephemeral publications of the day. And lest any should suppose that my refraining from reply, proceeds from inability to produce sound arguments and answers, I take this opportunity of observing, that my rule is never to discuss religious subjects in the columns of a Newspaper, and never to regard anonymous writers of whom I do not know that they have some reputation to sustain."

We leave the public to judge of the sincerity of this declaration. Mr. Quartley actually undertook to reply to an anonymous writer, of whose reputation he knew nothing, because he imagined he could answer him; but when Mr. Smith signed his name to a defence of the anonymous writer's views, and published that defence, not in a Newspaper, but in a pamphlet every way as respectable as Mr. Quartley's own pamphlet, Mr. Quartley, unsupported by his rule, has declined a reply.

The truth is, the Church of England cannot defend herself against the arguments of Dissenters, except by the arguments which our Holy Church successfully employs alike against every species of doctrinal innovation in faith; and this, of course, would involve the advocate of Anglicanism in manifest contradictions and inconsistencies, of which the Dissenter would not be slow to avail himself. A few extracts from the volume now before us, and whose title is at the head of this article, will convince every candid Protestant of the truth of what we have just stated.

THE DISSENTERS DIFFER FROM THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND ABOUT FUNDAMENTALS.

Mr. Hill observes (p. 9. Introduction.) "Enough has been given to show, that if Dissenters separate from such a Church, it is not without cause, it is not about points which are unessential."

THE INCONSISTENCY OF CHURCH OF ENGLAND-MEN IN COMPLAINING OF CATHOLIC CEREMONIES.

P. 14.—"If one thing be necessary, in the view of a member of the Church of England, to render the worship of God more instructive by emblem, or more impressive for effect, another of a more gorgeous kind may be equally necessary in the view of a Catholic. I think the Members of the Church of England who support the power claimed by their articles to decree rites and ceremonies, can consistently bring no other charge against the Church of Rome, in reference to this matter, than that of carrying her liberty to a greater length, and indulging in a more splendid and ceremonial taste."

THE DOUBLE WEIGHTS AND MEASURES OF CHURCH OF ENGLAND DIVINES.

P. 106.—"It may here be observed, too, as not irrelevant to the subject under review, that the principle for which we (the Dissenters) have been contending, is essential as a ground of justification for the Reformers, themselves; and is the basis no less of Protestantism than of Dissent. The arguments by which Churchmen in general defend establishments are such as might, with far more propriety, and much less inconsistency, be used by the Advocates of Popery than by Protestants; and it is worthy of remark, that, in several most memorable instances, they have, by being carried out to their full and legitimate consequences, made proselytes to that system."
"On the other hand when the advocates of establishments have opposed Popery, it has been by arguments of the very same order as those with which Dissenters justify their separation from the Church of England."

Mr. Hill very clearly proves what he states in this extract, from the writings of two famous Advocates of the Church of England, viz. Hooker and Barrow; and every sincere member of that Church would do well to consider attentively this obvious inconsistency to which, surely, the able defenders of a good cause need not have recourse. No enlightened Christian can compare the arguments of Protestant Churchmen with those of Protestant Dissenters, without being convinced, that consistency and common sense would oblige him to be a Catholic, if he could divest himself of all considerations of a carnal or worldly nature.

ARCHBISHOP OF GOA.

We think we cannot better show the unfairness of the Editorial comments of the Bombay Gentleman's Gazette, or better explain the state of the Question in dispute between the Archbishop of Goa and the Vicar Apostolic of Bombay, than by the publication of the letter of the Right Rev. Dr. Fennelly which has just appeared in the Madras Examiner.

It is impossible to read the constant and earnest appeals made in Bombay by the Goanese party to the British Government for its interference in a purely ecclesiastical question, without being convinced, that they distrust their cause if tried before a legitimate tribunal.

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

A Catholic Lady, through His Grace the Archbishop,	200
A Friend to the Orphans through, N. C. Biale, Esq.	30
Mrs. N. C. Biale,	16

THROUGH MR. N. O'BRIEN.

A Thurles Man,	4
James Fagan,	4
Charles P. Hackett,	8
Thomas Beckett,	1
Henry Thornton,	6
M. S.,	3
Samuel Pike,	1
B. N. Mc'Cannah,	5
H. Mercado,	5

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

A Catholic Lady, for the Archbishop's private use, but which His Grace has put to the account of the above Church, .. 200

BOITACONNAH SCHOOL.

THROUGH MR. N. O'BRIEN.
C. Fordyce,	5

ON TRUE COMPUNCTION OF HEART.

1. Weep with me, all ye my friends, and behold my grief, for it is very great. Observe my wound, for it is exceeding deep!

Wherefore do I weep?—and I answer that it is for this: That I am cast out from the face of the God of Heaven, and from the light of His countenance. I sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, and I look not upon the light of Heaven.

What joy can there then be for me,—for me, the wretched one who went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and fell amongst most relentless robbers, who stripped me of the robe of immortality, and having wounded me went away, leaving me half dead. (St. Luke x. 30.)

"The keepers that go about the city found me. They strick me, and wounded me; the keepers of the walls took away my veil from me." (Cant. v. 7.)

"I adjure you, O daughters of Jerusalem, if you find my beloved, that you tell him that I languish" (Id. ii. 8) with sorrow.

Send unto him, saying, "Lord, behold Lazarus, whom thou lovest, is sick." (John xi. 3.) "Lord, my servant lieth at home sick of the palsy, and is grievously tormented." (St. Matt. viii. 6.) I have laboured under mine infirmity now these many years, "I have been lame from my mother's womb" (Acts iii. 2.); for I have been bowed down under the guilt and heavy chain of original sin.

2. I am the son of Adam, the prevaricator, and the child of death, "wholly born in sins." (St. John xi. 34.) My entrance into life was wretched, as my departure shall be full of terror; and whither to fly I know not.

"If I ascend into Heaven, Thou art there" (Psalm cxxxvii. 8), who sparest not sinners. "And if I descend into hell, there also art Thou present" (Psalm ibid.), to punish the prevaricators.

Where shall I hide me from the face of Thy wrath, for in my life I have sinned against Thee exceedingly.

I looked up unto Heaven, and God said, "Cast away the wicked, that they may not look upon the glory of God."

And I looked back again into the abyss, and a fearful voice sounded in mine ears: "Bind his hands and feet, and cast him into the exterior darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth" (St. Matt. xxii. 13;) thence I became troubled the more, and I began to fear, and to be exceeding sorrowful; and all my bones were changed within me, by reason of the wrath of the indignation of the Lord. "Fear and trembling came upon me, and darkness covered me;" and I said, "Who then can be saved?" (St. Matt. xix. 25) for "If Thou wilt mark iniquities, O Lord; Lord, who shall stand it." (Psalm cxxxix 3.) "Holy and terrible is Thy name." (Psalm cx. 9.)

3. But now keep thou silence, O my soul, for I have heard a voice of comfort speaking unto those that are in sadness and mourning; saying, Write "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted" (St. Matt. v. 5;) and again, "Do penance, for the kingdom of Heaven is at hand." (St. Matt. iii. 2)

It is the voice of the Lord, comforting his servants; it is the voice of the Lord, saying, "Be converted, ye children of men, and live."

"Be converted unto me, and I will be converted unto you. Come to me, all you that labour or are burdened, and I will refresh you," (St. Matt. xi. 28.)

And the prophet, coming to meet those that mourn, saith, "The Lord is nigh unto them that are of a contrite heart" (Psalm xxxiii. 19;) and of himself he speaks in the plenitude of consolation; "The Lord hath heard, and hath had mercy upon me: the Lord became my helper" (Psalm xxix. 11), because He will not despise the prayer of the poor.

See how there is yet room for mercy; the gate is not yet shut. Therefore by penance all may be yet restored; both the evil that thou hast done, and the good thou hast omitted to do. Wherefore be not now overfearful, "For the Son of Man is come to seek, and to save that which was lost" (St. Luke xix. 10;) and again, "I am not come to call the just, but sinners." (St. Matt. ix. 13.)

4. Arise then, O my soul, into a good hope, for the Lord hath spoken it. Thy life drew near unto hell, and thou wast delivered over unto death, but the Lord hath had compassion upon thee, and His thought towards thee is turned unto mercy.

Thou hast feared exceedingly, and hast thought that thou couldst hide thyself from the face of the wrath of God, like father Adam, when he sinned (Gen. iii.) but this is a vain thought. Thou hast meditated flight into another land; as Jonas did, when he fled from the face of the Lord into a ship (Jonas ii.) but here also thou hast laboured in vain; for neither by hiding nor by flight shalt thou escape from the hand of God.

Return, then, to the heavenly region by another way, which God makes known unto thee, that thou mayst walk herein. Do PENANCE! this is the way. The best counsel, and the most powerful help, are given to thee from Heaven. The counsel is this: That thou shouldst worthily repent, and wash thy sins in tears, and be reconciled unto God; that so thou mayst have peace with God.

"Thy help is in the name of the Lord, who made Heaven and earth." (Psalm cxxiii. 8.) Who, when He was so great, vouchsafed to pay every debt for thee: "For He hath delivered His soul unto death, and was reputed with the wicked; and He hath borne the sins of many, and hath prayed for the transgressors (Isai. liii. 12;) and so by His death hath snatched thee from eternal death, and brought thee help by His Cross.

5. This also St. Paul hath delivered unto the faithful, when he said: "He hath blotted out the hand-writing of the decree that was against us: And he hath taken the same out of the way, fastening it to the Cross; forgiving you all your offences, that you may be quickened together with Him." (Col. ii. 14.)—Hence also, in another place, the same apostle saith: "A faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into this world to save sinners." (1 Tim. i. 15.)

See what consolation, and how great a hope, has God left for sinners: but it is for those that do penance,—it is for those that are converted.

Remember then, O my soul, the words of this his saint, in which he hath given unto thee so good a hope. And now, O Lord, prostrate before Thee in prayer, I cry out unto Thee with all my heart, saying:

6. Oh! Lord God, holy FATHER! "I have sinned against Heaven, and before Thee; I am not worthy to be called Thy son: make me as one of Thy hired servants." (St. Luke xx. 18.)

If thou cast me forth from Thy presence, Thou wouldst do so justly: yet Thou wilt rather have mercy, and receive me, who am not worthy of the least of Thy blessings.

Wherefore, trusting in this Thy mercy, I fall down at Thy feet, and, bathed in tears, I adore and devoutly kiss Thy footsteps, entreating Thee with a humble and contrite heart.

Look upon me, O merciful God, upon me who am as a fly, and a dead dog; and be propitious unto me, as Thou wert once unto the most blessed Mary Magdalene, who though once a sinner, speedily obtained pardon, when she cast herself at Thy feet.

"Extend Thy mercy unto them that know Thee." (Psalm xxxv. 11.) Stretch forth Thy right hand unto Thy wandering servant; and let Thy most merciful eyes look upon the contrition of my heart. And be not angry, O Lord, for ever against the malignity of Thy servant, but remember the multitude of Thy tender mercies from the beginning; and be Thou reconciled this day unto Thy servant.

Hear, O Lord, this the only prayer which Thy servant can pour forth, on bended knees, before Thine omnipotence, adoring upon earth the countenance of Thy glory: for I have done unwisely, and foolish exceedingly; so oftentimes offending against Thy clemency, so seldom fearing the throne of Thy kingdom.

Take away, I beseech Thee, from Thy servant every sin, and blot not my name out of the book of life; but vouchsafe to enrol me among the number of Thine elect, that I may be found to the praise and glory of Thy holy name.—AMEN!

7. Oh! how great is Thy mercy and goodness, O Lord; which, that Thou mightest the more abundantly shew forth, hast been pleased to free from death, man who was worthy of death! Moreover, Thou hast watchfully taken care to recall Thy wandering and flying servants, by Thy most loving voice; and hast sent Thy faithful servants and friends, at the hour of supper, to "tell them that were invited that all things are ready; Come ye to the marriage." (St. Matt. xxii. 4.) Thou mightest, in the order of Thy justice, have sent Thy messengers of vengeance after those enemies, who would not have Thee to rule over them, and to put those murderers to death; for they deserved either to be cast into prison, until they should pay the last farthing, or to be cut off with those who are in hell.

But yet Thou hast not exercised Thy powers, but hast shewn forth all Thy mercy and meek forbearance; patiently enduring all for a time, that so Thy beloved might be set free, and "flee from before the bow" (Psalm lix. 6;) that is, that they might prevent the dreadful judgment, by a worthy conversion.

For if Thou hadst not been pleased to stretch forth Thy hand unto the wicked, and to all who have sinned against Thee, many had been lost, who are now Thy friends, and are in the greatest favour before Thee!

(To be continued.)

THE OBSERVANCE OF SUNDAY.

(Concluded from page 258.)

Throughout all the countries of Europe, museums, libraries, and other public institutions are open to the people on Sundays,—an arrangement, as it appears to us, replete with judiciousness, and consideration for the poorer and operative classes of society, who are thus enabled to gratify a wholesome curiosity, and improve their stock of useful knowledge, on the only day of rest of which their lives of toil leave them the enjoyment. In England, it has been more than once debated in parliament, whether it were not expedient to allow public access to the British Museum on Sundays. The lingering prejudices of the country oppose themselves, as yet, to such an innovation. The best argument urged against its adoption was, we believe, Sir Robert Peel's remark, that the numerous functionaries of the museum would be thereby deprived of their weekly holiday; which might, perhaps, be met by asking how such difficulties are overcome on the Continent, by urging the fact, that as the museum is not open every week-day, its servants are already in the enjoyment of periodical days of leisure, and by suggesting that a trifling increase of salary, and rules of rotation as to time and turn of attendance,—so framed as not to include hours devoted to divine worship,—would readily enough secure the services of the actual, or of extra officers of the establishment; and thus the moral pleasures of the million would not be postponed for the personal comfort of the score or two.

The most remarkable, to our mind, of all the puritanical prejudices which still lurk in England and Scotland, and which are quite peculiar to those countries, is that which still pretty extensively prevails among numbers of religious Protestants relatively to the supposed impropriety of music on Sundays.

That concords of sweet sounds, forming perhaps quite the most ethereal species of enjoyment which coarse human nature is susceptible of deriving here below, should be considered as tending to desecrate a day of holy jubilation, appears to us an anomaly neither to be explained nor accounted for.

A great distinction is attempted to be drawn between sacred and profane music; but is there any magic in a combination of notes? By mere change of time, Handel's Dead March in "Saul" could as easily be turned into a waltz, as the liveliest air into a solemn chaunt. The upholders of he sinfulness of melody on Sunday virtually maintain, that upon one day of the week it is only lawful to make use of four out of the five senses. Otherwise, if to gaze that day on a fine prospect, inhale the fragrance of a rose, handle a ripe peach, and then eat it, be justifiable delectations, why should not listening to a symphony be equally so? From this reductio ad absurdum there seems to us no very obvious means of escape.

Now, to us music appears the very fittest medium of communication between man and his Creator. We have always entertained an opinion, that no slight portion of that exquisite felicity which awaits the elect in the beatific realms of a future world, may be derived from the appreciation and thrilling enjoyment of glorious and everlasting harmonies. If, however, the Puritans of earth should happen to be right in denouncing the indulgence of musical art on the Lord's day, it would then seem to follow, that if there be times and seasons in heaven when God should be especially praised and glorified, it is at such time that the harps of the elders will be hushed, and the voices of angelic choirs be mute!—Catholic Magazine, Feb. 1844.

ARCHBISHOP OF GOA

To the Editor of the Bombay Gentleman's Gazette.

SIR,—There were, some time back, a great many communications and letters, most valuable and clever no doubt in the estimation of those who penned them, appeared in your columns concerning the rights of the Archbishop of Goa.

It was bragged and boasted that a high dignitary, of the Catholic Church, a British subject, at Bombay, had acknowledged the confirmation of the new Archbishop in all the rights and privileges of his Predecessors, by the Holy See, as, it was said, was evident from the Bulls of the Prelate.

Thanks to the Enlightenment of our sister Presidency, we have the new Archbishop's Bulls published in the Madras Catholic Expositor of this month, and those swaddling Goanese of Bombay, who pray every Sunday for the Queen of Portugal as their Queen, and who (because some of their Grandfathers, before either Brahmuns or Dhers as the case may be, became Catholics and took the names of their Godfathers and Godmothers which are Portuguese in sound) think that their religion cannot be orthodox unless it comes through the Infidel Court of Portugal, will now see that the Pontiff neither gives the new Prelate the Title of Primate, nor refers to his church in any other way than as connected with the East Indies, subject to the Queen of Portugal. "Unica Indiarum orientium Regina Portugalie Subjectarum Metropolitan." "The privileges of which Church have not been derogated from." This is most strictly true; the present Archbishop has been presented by the Queen of Portugal, just as the first Bishop of Goa was; he has, as far as his church is concerned, the same privileges as his Predecessors, but as to other churches in the British dominions, which have already, by the Bull "Multa Præclare," been reduced to simple Missionary Provinces, from the rank of Dioceses which they had heretofore, he has no more right or privilege in connection with them than the Brahminical High Gooroo. The Pope tells him, as Dr. Fennelly specially notes, to raise up a spirit of piety, in the State of Goa, and this he lays forcibly on his conscience, a hint the good Bishop observes, that he had nothing to do with in any other place.

Mr. Editor, the Catholics of England and Ireland acknowledge the Pope as the head of their Church. We are most jealous of any attempt on the part of Government to interfere in any way with our connection with Rome or with the affairs of our church. Do you then think it likely, in British territory, we will be content to receive our Religion, second-hand through the Queen of Portugal, or any other Foreign Prince. What right have these Ignorant antiquated Indo-Goanese to make me and the Catholic British and Native subjects of India pray for the Queen of Portugal as our Princess? What right of their dirty shuffling tricksters to tell me that no Bull of the Pope is of any avail to me, a British subject, in British India, unless it comes through the hands of her fat little Faithless or Faithful (as her Ministers chose to make her) Queen of Portugal?

These absurd claims have been given up years ago, in every other quarter. It is a disgrace to Bombay that they should still exist there.

If England were a Catholic Power, would it be allowed for a day, to have a Foreign Power publicly proclaimed in the Churches of our territories, as "our Queen," without calling down the greatest displeasure, even a prosecution. The only instances where it is ever allowed in Catholic countries, is in the private Chapels of Ambassadors of Foreign Courts. It is, there can be no doubt, a very gross insult to us and to our Government to have the Queen of Portugal publicly prayed as "our Queen" "Reginam Nostram," in the Chapels of the several congregations of Bombay and elsewhere saved by the Goanese Priests.

It is really melancholy to think how degraded these antiquated persons are in their ideas in matters of primary importance in our Holy Religion. In Britain we are taught to consider the Pope positively as the visible Head of Church, in the very place of St Peter the fisherman. Every measure that may remove us in the slightest degree from his immediate influence over us (always be it remembered in spirituals alone) we look on as most injurious. Should any restrictions be laid on us in this matter we would feel ourselves cast into fetters as slaves, and never be easy till they were removed.

Here are these animals with dirty bodies and nasal names actually fighting for this very political slavery in matters of Religion, which has been removed from them, as if, instead of being a curse, it were an honor.

The secret of the whole, I will tell you—there are some thousands of Priests in Goa—they carried on a very thriving trade heretofore in the various Missions of Hindostan: they made money, but unmade religion, often, and the Missions were, therefore, most wisely placed under independent Bishops, who feed their flocks. The Goa Priests cannot therefore forgive them.

And this sticking up for the advantages of having the little fat Queen's little fat foot on the neck of the Venerable Father of the Faithful in matters connected with British territory is only mooted by them in spite and disgust at losing the means of making or establishing a rich house and property for themselves and their descendants in their native village in the Goa territory. The quantity of money that used to be brought home by Priests from Foreign Missions to Goa is incredible, and a person has only to visit Goa (not however Punjim alone) to satisfy himself of the truth of this assertion, in the Palaces and toddy trees belonging to families of Priests in Margaum and Sashtee.

I am Sir,

Yours obediently,
AN HUMBLE PAPIST.

16th April, 1844.

NOTE.—There is a notorious principle, which used to create great confusion and disorders in Europe, but which has latterly sunk very much into the shade there. It appears however to have extended itself to India, and it is now misleading many here. It is called "odium theologicum," or "the hatred of theologians against their adversaries." The preceding letter affords a sample of it, and in order to understand its purport we made inquiries from some intelligent Goa Roman Catholics, and shall give their reply.

"The Humble Papist has reversed matters, for instead of maintaining the laws of the Catholic Religion, as laid down by the Canons and Discipline of the Catholic Church, and giving the Archbishop his rights in the same manner as they were held by the former Prelates, he wishes to make the Pope absolute Sovereign in India, as he is in Rome. The Archbishops of Goa who formerly exercised the jurisdiction secured to them by treaty in Bombay, have not surrendered it to the Pope or to the Hon'ble Company; if they have surrendered the jurisdiction, where is the deed of cession to the Italians?"

"But the Pope, who has lost much of his revenues in Europe, has turned now to the East, to draw some advantages hence; and the Missionary Bishops are his tools. As for the little fat foot of the Queen of Portugal, it is better to kiss it than the shrivelled toe of an old man of 80 years. There was little chance of that Queen's placing her foot on an Emperor's neck to mount on horse-back, as the Popes formerly did. As for praying for the Queen of Portugal, the Goa Priests had every right to do so for their lawful sovereign, but they never called her Queen of Bombay. The Italians in Bombay and their adherents acted differently, if they prayed for themselves and for 'no Queen at all.' ... As to the Money being collected in Goa, even if it were true, which might be doubted, for general poverty prevailed there, it would be far better than sending it to Rome. As for the Italians who were in Bombay making slaves, their communicating with the People was absurd, for they spoke no language intelligible to the Natives. Their Portuguese was barbarous, and they knew no language of the country. It would therefore be useful to have the Roman Catholic Clergy, who attempted to rule the Christians, examined as to their proficiency in the Native languages. The British Government did not see its own interests when it allowed the Pope the liberty of abolishing dioceses in India, in order to establish missions in their room" &c. &c. &c.

So much for the "odium theologicum" in India. We are tired of such disputes, and like many others we wish to see peace and tranquillity established; yet we fear it cannot be while the Portuguese Government is claiming old rights on the one hand and the Papal Court wishes to extend its influence on the other.—It is a disgrace to the British Government to delay in having these disputes settled. How can it be expected that Christian civilization will prosper in the East, where the descendants of the first Christians are, from being the victims of such wretched policy, sunk into the lowest state of degradation?—Ed. B. G. G.

PASTORAL OF THE VICAR APOSTOLIC OF BOMBAY.

"We D. Fré Luis de Santa Theresa, by the Grace of God and of the Holy Apostolic See, Bishop of Calamina, Attendant on the Pontifical Throne and Vicar Apostolic of the Empire of the Grand Mogul, Idalxa, Golconda, Bombay, Salsette &c. &c. &c.

"We are obliged to inform our subjects of the last Instructions of the Supreme Pontiff, which we have received through the Cardinal Prefect of the Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide, in order that they may know the exact state of the Churches which his Holiness has joined to our Vicariate, and which follow still the jurisdiction of the Archbishop of Goa.

"We could not have any doubts on the subject in consequence of the numerous orders, which our Antecessor of Happy Memory as well as We have received in this matter.

"Having received information that the new Archbishop of Goa was confirmed by His Holiness, and that he was on the point of arriving in Bombay, we addressed these words to the most Excellent Cardinal Prefect on the 1st of December last—"It is said that while passing through Bombay the New Archbishop will perform his visitation of all the Churches of these parts, before he will go to Goa. The Dissidents or refractors are getting their Churches ready, and they state that he will confer the Sacraments of Confirmation and of Holy Orders."

"To this the most Excellent Cardinal Prefect replied to us in a letter dated 13th February, 1844, which we received by the last Steamer that arrived here on the 8th instant, in the following words—

"I can assure your most Illustrious Lordship, that His Holiness did not confer on the said Prelate any jurisdiction whatever over the places dependent on the Vicars Apostolic, and expressly in his Epistolary Brief recommended to him to abstain from any act whatever of authority in them, from which your most Illustrious Lordship cannot entertain any doubt that those Dissidents will be disappointed in their expectations." By which it is evident that his Excellency the present Archbishop of Goa, had not received any authority whatever over those Churches which his Holiness has already joined to our Apostolic Vicariate.

"We cannot avoid communicating to you what we did in this respect, immediately on the arrival in Bombay of his Excellency the Archbishop. Seeing that he unhesitatingly exercised jurisdiction in those Churches, we sent to him those documents which the Sacred Congregation at different epochs had sent to our Antecessor and to Us, viz., the Bull "Multa Præclare," by which his Holiness derogated the right of Patronage of the Queen of Portugal in these countries subject in temporal matters to British Dominion;—the Decree which begins "Cum Sacra Congregatione," which confirms the said Brief;—the Monitory, which orders all Catholics to obey the respective Apostolic Vicars;—a copy of a letter, in which the Sacred Congregation makes us acquainted of the Revd. Padre Antonio Mariano Suares' having requested many extraordinary faculties from the Supreme Pontiff on naming himself Vicar General in Bombay, Salsette &c.; of the Prelate of Goa, when the reply was given to him, that the sole authority recognized by the Holy See in these Islands of Bombay, Salsette &c. was that of the Apostolic Vicar, whom he was ordered to obey.—We, moreover, sent him a copy of a letter from the same Sacred Congregation, dated 12th August, 1843, which informs the Apostolic Vicars, that the said most Excellent Lord Archbishop had promised the Charge d'Affaires of His Holiness in Lisbon to observe the admitted Pontifical Briefs, and not to extend his jurisdiction over the countries entrusted to the Vicars Apostolic. All those Documents were accompanied by a letter from us, in which We stated that all this might make known our situation. He, the most Excellent Archbishop, returned to us an evasive answer, in which he protested that he would not obey any order from the Supreme Pontiff, if it did not come by the channel of the Queen, as the Bulls of his Confirmation and Consecration as Archbishop of Goa had come; and this answer was accompanied with copies of his Bulls. Those Bulls if well considered ought to convince the said most Excellent Lord that he had no authority over those Churches, for the tenor of them proves solely that he is Archbishop of Goa and not of these Churches.

"We were disposed to protest against all these Acts of Jurisdiction, which He went about exercising without scruple, and we had prepared the draught of the Protest, but We did not send it to him for some reasons.

"It was assuredly a grief to our hearts to see this Prelate, who had solemnly, at his Consecration, sworn fidelity and obedience to, at one moment cast aside all the wise determinations relative to these Churches, of the Supreme Pontiff, by administering Confirmation to persons, many of whom were not previously prepared for the worthy reception of the Sacrament; and to behold him, with an infringement of the Canons, consecrate the Holy Oils at an unusual time and without urgent necessity, and this in a Church which is neither a Cathedral nor a Metropolitan;—to see him also ordain a Sub-deacon who had been suspended by our Antecessor (having been advised on the subject by Us) without giving us any information, and thus subjecting himself to the Ecclesiastical censures.

"On this occasion We were obliged to endure many insults given directly and indirectly to the Holy Apostolic See, and to Us also, who, as Vicar Apostolic represent in this Island, the person of the Supreme Pontiff.

"We, with the most anxious wishes hoped to have a private conference and fraternal conversation with Him, as He had promised Us; in which we might be able to explain to him our just regret, and the evil which he was doing to Souls;—but we were disappointed.

"You, my Brethren in Jesus Christ, know the efforts which we made for the purpose of having the wishes of the Supreme Pontiff carried into full effect. We flattered ourselves to see with time all those Churches obedient to him, but now with these examples of the most excellent Lord Archbishop of Goa, We cannot but apprehend greater evils; but that which appears impossible to man, may be possible to God. We pray to the Father of Lights that He will enlighten this Prelate, as well as the disobedient, so that they may obey all the orders of the Head of the Church, and be thus one flock under the care of one shepherd.

"We exhort you to remain firm, as you always have been, in defending our authority, which is that of the Supreme Pontiff, in order to preserve in you the distinctive character of sons of God and of the Holy Catholic, Apostolic, Roman Church, which shall always be to us a source of our spiritual consolation.

"We ordain that this Pastoral be published on Sunday next the 23th instant, in all the Churches subject to our Jurisdiction.

"Given at the Ermida de Nossa Senhora do Carmo, 26th April, 1844.

(Signed) "F. LUIS MARIA de S. TERESA, Bishop and Vicar Apostolic."

A True Copy.

(Signed) "F. Augustin Maria de Jesus."

CATHOLIC CATHEDRAL, MADRAS,
20th April, 1844.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have received from the Right Rev. Dr. Cajetano Antonio, Vicar Apostolic of Ceylon, an Extract from a letter to his address from the Cardinal Prefect de Prop. Fide, written at Rome 22nd January last, together with translations of the same into three different languages and printed at the Catholic Press of Colombo.

As this extract is of great importance to the well-being of Catholicity in India, I beg you will kindly give it a place in your next issue, together with the English translation of the same.

By the publication of this short but pithy extract, the authenticity of those calumnious letters which were lately published by Don Texeira, under the name of the Archbishop of Goa, against the Vicars Apostolic of India, is divested of all its importance, and rendered a question of mere idle curiosity. Whether those schismatical publications were fabricated by the Don or produced by the pen of the Archbishop of Goa, it is now certain that His Grace the Archbishop of Goa possesses not a single atom of legitimate authority directly or indirectly over those districts, which have been placed by the Holy Father under the jurisdiction of the Vicars Apostolic of India. The Cardinal Perfect of the sacred congregation de Prop. Fide has officially declared this; and the declaration has been conveyed to us through a prelate, who is a natural subject of the Queen of Portugal,—one, whose national prejudices are cast in the same mould as those of Don Texeira and the Archbishop of Goa,—one whose loyalty to the Portuguese crown is not less than theirs, but who has learned to give to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's and to God the things that are God's. This illustrious Bishop and the Priests under his jurisdiction in the island of Ceylon—all subjects of the Portuguese crown,—have had the honesty and the manliness to declare, in opposition to the rest of their brethren and kindred, that the spiritual government of the Church ought not to be controlled by the rulers of the state, and that the Portuguese Crown had no right to obstruct the Sovereign Pontiff in the exercise of functions purely spiritual for the advancement of religion in India. This is the triumph of faith over the feelings of private interest as well as the imagined claims of national glory. If the clergy of Ceylon had not been influenced by strong feelings of religion, worthy of the golden and by-gone times of Portugal, they would perhaps on this day, instead of standing forward the champions of the independence of the Church, be the hired tools of political intrigue—watching an opportunity, which never will return, of re-establishing Portuguese supremacy in India.

Whether or not it be true, as it is reported, that the Bulls of His Grace Joseph Maria de Silva Torres are identically the same, word for word, as the Bulls of his predecessor Emanuel de Sancto Gualdino, who was translated from Macao in the year of our Lord 1803, the identity of form can furnish no argument in favour of the primatial authority of the Archbishop against Cardinal Fanson's express declaration. If the Bulls of the present Archbishop be the same, word, as those of his predecessor, the will rather prove, that this is not the first time, when the pompous title "Primate of the Orient" was withheld by the Holy See from an Archbishop of Goa. If the present Archbishop of Goa or his predecessor have usurped a title, which the Holy See has withheld, we have abundance of authority for stating that it is not the first time, when Portuguese Dignitaries in India have been guilty of usurping powers which they did not possess.

It is more than one hundred and seventy years ago, since Deputies of the Holy See were ill treated by the tribunal of the Goa inquisition and its officials. They had the presumption to call upon a venerable Bishop—a Vicar Apostolic—over whom they had no jurisdiction—to produce his diplomas. Upon his refusal to do so, as being solely dependant on the Holy See, and responsible for his conduct only to the tribunal of His Holiness, they declared him a rebel to the holy (!) inquisition and a person of suspicious orthodoxy, and they posted him up as such on the doors of the Churches, with a prohibition to the people against holding intercourse with him or his Missionaries.

About the same time another official of the Goa inquisition seized upon a Missionary Apostolic, who was labouring at Camboya, and sent him a prisoner to Macao under an accusation of heresy. The Commissary of the holy (!!) inquisition kept the poor Missionary a prisoner five months at Macao until an opportunity offered of sending him to Goa, whither another Missionary Apostolic under a like charge had been sent not long before.

Clement X. at that time sat in the chair of St. Peter, and his paternal heart was afflicted with great grief, when information was brought to Rome of the unjust and unauthorised proceedings of the inquisition of Goa against the Missionaries, to the great prejudice of religion and especially of the faithful, who, by being deprived of their pastors, were exposed defenceless to the incursions of Satan and to the secret intrigues of the infernal spirits. His Holiness without loss of time despatched a Pontifical Brief to Goa bearing date the 10th of Nov. 1672, reminding the zealous Inquisitors that it was their duty to remove impediments which might be an obstruction to the integrity and propagation of the faith, and not to throw obstacles in the way,—reminding them also that they had no jurisdiction in those regions which are not subject to the temporal dominion of the King of Portugal,—(the words in the original are, "in iis regionibus, quæ temporali regis Portugallicæ dominio non subsunt")—and forbidding them, under pain of the displeasure of the Holy See, to assume any authority under any pretext, colour or privilege over Vicars Apostolic or their Missionaries, whether already sent or to be sent hereafter to China, Cochinchina, Tonchin, Siam, Camboja and other places in the East Indies, unless such places be subject to the temporal dominion of the King of Portugal. His Holiness wrote another letter on the same day to the Archbishop of Goa who was an Augustinian Friar and was promoted to the episcopal dignity the preceding year after the See of Goa had been vacant 20 years. This prudent Friar, after he was invested with the Pallium, entered into all the petty feelings of national jealousy, by which the Indo-Portuguese were then actuated, at the introduction of French Missionaries into India. He was the first to pronounce the Bulls of the Vicars Apostolic subreptitious, and the orthodox theologians of Goa keep up the same cant to this day. The St. Thomé Schismatics pronounce them also obreptitious, that, by the multiplication of obscure and unintelligible terms, they may persuade their duped followers that they are in the right. I will not stop here to reduce those terms to a definite theological meaning. Suffice it to say that those big words subreptitious and obreptitious are intended to convey, that, the Bulls of the Vicars Apostolic, and particularly the famous one Multa Præclare,—were obtained by reports of the Indian Mission furnished to the Holy See, which were either absolutely false, or if grammatically true were, nevertheless, calculated to make a false impression on the mind of His Holiness by the suppression of important explanatory facts. According to the rules of Goa logic, if those bulls were to pay their respects at the Court of Lisbon on their way to India, all would be right, but because they are issued from the Propaganda, therefore they are subreptitious and obreptitious,—therefore they are fraudulently obtained—therefore the Holy Father is imposed upon.

When the intercourse between India and Europe was less frequent than happily it is at present, these impudent and unfounded assertions might pass off for sound reasoning with the simple and unwary. But in the present improved and daily increasing communication, when every ship returning to Europe conveys some ecclesiastic, who is bound for Rome, when the eternal city is not less accessible to the Indian Missions than it is to many of the Missions of Europe, when it is become fashionable for Indian congregations to write petitions and letters of congratulation to the Pope, the superannuated cant of fraud, where there is no possibility of concealment, ought in common decency to be discontinued. Moreover the eighteen Cardinals, who have charge of the concerns of the Propaganda, are not without their respective correspondents Lay and Clerical in India. They have their private and confidential as well as their official sources of information. They cannot therefore be deceived; nor can we imagine without having made considerable proficiency in Pyrrhonism, that so many members of the Pope's council, with their eyes open and the eyes of Christendom upon them, could conspire to impose on His Holiness, or even if they attempted to do so, could succeed.

After Clement X. had despatched from Rome his Apostolic admonitions of the 10th of Nov. 1673, fresh news reached Rome from India, which made His Holiness believe that a mere declaration of their duty was not enough to bring the Goa clergy into acquiescence. They venerated the bones of St. Francis Xavier, but his spirit had abandoned them. Accordingly a formal decree was drawn up, bearing date 22nd December of the same year, exempting the Missionaries and Vicars Apostolic from all subordination to the Archbishop or Inquisition of Goa, anything whatever to the contrary notwithstanding, excepting as before those regions, in which the King of Portugal had temporal dominion. Copies of this decree were sent to the Vicars Apostolic, to the Archbishop of Goa and to the Inquisitors. This decree was followed up by another which was executed the day following at St. Mary Majors. Pope Clement was determined to break down the obstinacy of the Portuguese, and he adopted on this occasion the summary method of an excommunication against any person who would thenceforward require Missionaries, Lay or Clerical, Secular or Regular, to pass through Goa or Portugal on their way to India or other Eastern Missions. That privilege was granted by Clement VIII. to the Portuguese Crown, but was afterwards revoked, because it proved prejudicial to religion, by Paul V. and Urban VIII. I will not now stop to detail the grounds which were stated for the revocation of that privilege, nor to relate what ulterior measures this zealous Pope was compelled to adopt for the protection of Missionaries in the East against the vexatious proceedings of refractory Goanese ecclesiastics. It will be sufficient to remark, that tenderness of conscience appears to have been as little known to the Indo-Portuguese in those times, as it is to their Brethren of the present day, and that they were then as little terrified by the thunders of the Vatican as are now the leaders of the schism in St. Thomé.

About twenty years after Innocent XII. found it necessary to confirm the decree of Clement X. and to threaten with suspension the Archbishop of Goa and two of his suffragans—those of Macao and Malacca—if they persisted in molesting the Vicars Apostolic of Siam, Cochinchina, Sciampa, Combogia and other Missionaries in the adjacent countries. This decree bears date at St. Mary Majors, 22nd Oct. 1696.

There is no cause so bad that some specious argument may not be advanced in its support. The defence then set up against the censures and admonitions of His Holiness are the same as in the present day, namely that subjects of Portugal ought not to obey the voice of the Pope unless it be conveyed to them from the Consistory through the Portuguese government, as if the Supreme Pastor is not to be heard speaking through whatever medium, or as if the malice of a profligate court could have power to stifle his pastoral injunction. There is no one but sees that this principle is schismatical, in as much as it places the secular authority between Christ's mystical body and its visible head upon earth.

From the constant and uniform declarations of the Holy See during the last two hundred years, it is clear, whatever may have been thought to the contrary at Lisbon or at Goa, that at Rome it was never contemplated to give any authority or jurisdiction whatever to the Archbishop of Goa or his suffragans outside those regions which were politically subject to the Portuguese Crown. This is an undeniable but important fact. It sets a complete extinguisher on the argument, which the present Archbishop of Goa is said to have drawn in favour of his reported pretensions, from the identity of His Bulls with those of His Predecessor. Supposing his Bulls to be the same, the question will arise whether or not in the interim the Portuguese Territory has been contracted in its local dimensions. If so, the local extent of his jurisdiction must likewise be contracted, as would also that of his predecessor, if he had been alive in such an event. I do not mean that a political catastrophe could deprive a Bishop of the jurisdiction once imparted to him without the positive interference of the Pope. But I say the Pope in such an event would have a canonical right to interfere, when it was declared so repeatedly that Indo-Portuguese Bishops were only to have jurisdiction in Indo-Portuguese territory.

That the policy which prevailed in the Court of Rome regarding Portuguese India upwards of 200 years has not been altered in favor of the present Archbishop Joseph, his Bulls of institution beautifully demonstrate. The Church of Goa is therein described as the only Metropolitan church of the East Indies which are subject to Her Most Faithful Majesty Maria II. Queen of Portugal and Algarves. And it is over this church, so described, that Joseph Da Silva Torres is to be constituted Archbishop. Therefore no more than his predecessors is he to have jurisdiction outside the territory politically subject to the Queen of Portugal.

These things seriously considered, Archbishop Joseph pretending to jurisdiction in British territory appears to me to place himself in precisely a similar position as Donna Maria de Gloria would place herself if she were to demand from the British minister the evacuation of India. With what a smile of intermingled surprise and disdain would Sir Robert Peel receive such a mad proposal. If the Archbishop be invested with the same titles as his predecessors—not excluding even the usurped title "Primate of the Orient," is not Maria de Gloria also invested with the same titles as her predecessors had enjoyed, before the Kingdom of Portugal was shorn of its extensive colonies and Indian possessions? If a new presidency were to be erected on the Malabar coast, to consist of some eight or ten collectorates, which now form part of the Presidency of Madras, the next Governor of Madras would receive his appointment from the same authority as his predecessors—in the same form and tenor as his predecessors—would retain also the same title, and be installed in the same manner, and yet he would not have authority over the same extent of territory as his predecessors. In like manner the Archbishop has not jurisdiction over the same extent of territory as his predecessors, even though his Bulls be given in the same form, without the suppression of any of his titles, because previous to his appointment the suffragan sees of Goa, viz.—Cochin, Cranganore, Malacca and Meliapore, being in British territory, were parcelled out to Vicars Apostolic. Macao alone was spared, because it still remained under the dominion of Portugal.

I do not expect that these remarks, nor the important extract which has given occasion to them, will have the effect of restoring to tranquillity those hereditary enemies of the Holy See, whom the spirit of irreligion and insubordination has restless so long. But I trust that every good man who fears the Lord and wishes to belong to mystical body of Christ, will use all his influence by word and example to withdraw his friends and acquaintances from the verge of the precipice, upon which they have hitherto stood by their adherence to schism.

I have the honor to be,

My Dear Sir,

Yours very sincerely,

✱ J. FENNELLY.

THE IRISH QUESTION OF QUESTIONS.

The Catholic priesthood, it is alleged, is too much identified with the people, overactive, over zealous, having no connexion with the State, no place in society, no wealth to expend in pleasurable pursuits; so circumstanced, it does its duty for the reason given for the growth of trees, because it has nothing else to do; hence its flocks are inconveniently attached to it, and bound to it by ties which excite the jealousy of Government, which sees itself possessed of but a secondary authority. This, it is admitted, is not a desirable state of things; and what is the remedy proposed by those who most seriously lament the evil? Why, to pay the clergy. Pay is the cure for activity—pay is the cure for zeal—pay is the cure for popularity. To take from the priesthood the love, the influence, the authority it possesses, the State must take it into pay. The stipend is the sure sedative, the quieting draught.

If Protestant members had been bound by oath to do all in their power to impair and injure the Catholic Church by law not established, they certainly would, long ere this, in accordance with the views we have stated, have voted a large grant of money for the support of the priests. Nay, we are far from sure that conscience would not in such case have compelled them to throw the doors of the House of Lords open to the Catholic Bishops.

Catholic members, on the other hand, if they were disposed to violate their oaths, would propose to double the revenues of the sinecure Establishment in Ireland.

And yet men will blow hot and cold in the same breath, and one moment recommend the payment of the Catholic priests as the sure way of diminishing their influence, and the next resist the reduction of the Established Church as a blow to the Protestant religion.

When they want to abate the activity and zeal of a priesthood, they see clearly enough that pay is the way to do it; but recommend retrenchment in the opposite case of a body that has been so well provided for as to have lost its spheres for activity and zeal, and you are charged with the design of ruining the religion.

Has the Catholic religion been ruined by its poverty? Has the Protestant religion in Ireland been served by its wealth? The examples are before us in the thronged chapel and the empty church—in the poor priest who lives for his flock and the sleek parson who lives for himself.

"If," says Bentham, "you would have your establishments useless, two principles will suffice superfluity of pay and liberty of negligence." These two principles have worked with such success in great part of Ireland that the church is without congregations, and therefore all superfluity; and seeing how this has been brought to pass, its friends are very anxious to give the other priesthood some of the poison of mammon to settle their popularity.

If the religious usps of the Establishment were really at heart with its champions, they should, seeing how ill the endowments have promoted the object, be prepared to hand them over to the Catholics, and to give Protestantism its turn of that dependence which has made the pastors of the other flock so successful in their vocations. But the Establishment in Ireland is maintained for another purpose, as the sign of subjugation, and where it is useless, its uselessness makes it perform this office more strikingly and insolently. The empty church provokes the question, What is it here for? How did it come here? Why does it remain? Why is it amongst us? What is it to us or we to it? When Gesler studied insult in tyranny, he stuck his hat on a pole and required homage to it. The sinecure Irish Church is Gesler's hat on the pole in every parish—the momento of tyranny, the thing having no use, no office, but to affront. The edifice which should be devoted to the propagation of peace and good-will amongst men, has, by the most curious perversion in the history of oppression, been made the yoke, the monument of oppression past, and the sign that its spirit lives unmitigated, and lasts so long as that great landmark of domination and strife is upheld. For this the distraction of the empire is to be suffered, the danger of revolt dared, the certainty of the heavy cost of guarding against it incurred, and a weakness exhibited to invite foreign aggression, or at least presumption on our intestine divisions.

How well, said Mr. Sheil in his speech, as strong in argument, as pointed in wit, and rich in eloquence—that true, rapid, and fervid eloquence the scourge of which is earnestness—

“But, after all, the great question is the question of the two Churches in Ireland (hear, hear)—a church with a congregation and without a revenue, and a church with a revenue and without a congregation. (Loud cries of ‘Hear, hear.’) If you want pull down one, will you build up the other? If you want pull down one, consider how far you will erect the other. You have given us no light on the subject. There you are silent. You have no right to be silent on such a question as that. The subject must have been the theme of your constant meditation. It was proposed by the noble lord the member for South Lancashire in 1825, and the right Hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Home Department had supported that proposition, to bring in a Bill authorizing a provision to be made or the support of the Catholic priests. That proposition had been supported by men who were in favour of the maintenance of the Catholic faith. If that is your intention, why don't you tell us? Will you grant support to the Catholic clergy? Will you at length build Catholic churches? Will you augment Maynooth? You keep back the truth from us. What are your intentions upon that most momentous of all questions? And what course do you mean to take with respect to the established church? We are told, you won't touch the established church. Why? An hon. gentleman, the Recorder of the city of Dublin, says it must not be touched, because it is founded on Christian truth. May I be permitted to ask on which bank of the Tweed, the north or the south, Christian Protestant truth is to be found? On the north bank of the Tweed Christian Protestant truth is Calvinistic; it is Armenian on the south. On the north bank the hon. member for Perth is its representative; on the south the hon. member for Oxford. (Cheers.) On the north bank it is habited in a black surplice, and a white band; and on the south, in a white surplice, and is mitred and crossiered. On the north it is redolent of Geneva, and on the south it bears a strong family likeness to that celebrated Babylonish lady (laughter) to whom, under the auspices of Dr. Pusey, its filial affection is beginning to return. (Loud cheering.) On which side of the Tweed, I ask the Lord Advocate—on which side of the Tweed is the truth? Or perhaps the right Hon'ble Bart. (Sir J. Graham.) as he is a borderer, may tell me? (Cheers and laughter.) If I shall be disposed to recant the errors which have now lasted for 1,800 years, on which side of the Tweed, when in search of the truth, shall I discover it? (Cheers.) But at all events, whichever is true, your Protestant church in Ireland is not very successful in its propagation: for while my religion, indigenous to the Irish mind, has struck its roots firmly, and has extended its leafy branches with vigour around, your religion, which you preserve in a magnificent conservatory, pines like a sickly exotic, while you endeavour to impart freshness and vitality to it. (Cheers.)”

We cannot attempt to follow the course of the monster debate, and can only refer to the speech of Mr. Macaulay, taking a lofty and luminous view of a great question. What is very remarkable in it, is that the reach of thought is so wide, and that with it the eloquent speaker comes to close quarters with his opponents with so much adroitness and success. He stoops from his soar with easy power and unerring aim to strike down his quarry.

Amongst the many excellent speeches that have been delivered, we hail that of Sir T. Wilde as supplying what was most wanting, a judgment on the conduct of the State Trials from a legal authority.

Unprofessional men have hesitated to give full expression to their opinion on these proceedings, apprehending that many things that struck their minds as flagrantly partial and unjust, might have some technical apology: but Sir Thomas Wilde, one of the soundest lawyers and the expertest craftsmen in his profession, clears up all such doubts, and lays bare the indefensible character of the whole proceedings.

Lord Stanley's unlucky question, “Have we strained any law?” has been answered by Sir Thomas Wilde, who in a most spirited and masterly speech, has exposed the unfairness of the late trials, almost in every part of the proceedings, from the framing of the indictment to the delivery of the Judge's charge.

“The greatest mischief had been done to the proper administration of justice by applying the law of different parties, making some liable for articles they had never read, and others (the editors) for speeches they had never heard, and thus the act of one was made to bear against another, in order to convict both of conspiracy. . . . That indictment, then, had gone beyond the limits of the law, and had excited, justly, discontent and dissatisfaction. (Cheers.) It was a most dangerous precedent, and the application of law to the facts of the case was perfectly wrong.”

Sir Thomas Wilde showed that the Chief Justice, the Judge “on the other side,” had avoided any reference to the passages produced in the defence of Mr. O'Connell, qualifying detached violent expressions adduced in evidence against him, and had also omitted to instruct the Jury.

“As to the boundaries of legitimate agitation, or to enable them to distinguish between the seditious language charged, and that right of discussion which ought never to be too narrowly watched.”

He characterised the summing up of the Chief Justice as—“Deficient in all that belonged properly to the office of a judge, and abundant with all that belonged more properly to a counsel."

As to the striking of the Jury, Sir Thomas Wilde thus tore to pieces the hypocritical pretence of Lord Stanley, that it was solely to give an advantage to the defendants that Government had a special jury instead of a common one.

"He (Sir Thomas Wilde) was never more astounded in his life than when he heard the right hon. baronet the Secretary for the Home Department, state that the choice of a special jury, instead of a common jury, to try the defendants, was an act of mercy to them. (Hear hear.) He had mentioned this assertion to many persons, but all laughed in his face when he did so. (Hear, and a laugh.) The right hon. baronet said, 'We tried by a special jury, because, had we tried by a common jury, we might have put by as we pleased.' (Hear.) Why, they could not have put by as they pleased. They knew well that if there had been a jury panel of 72, and John Thomas was called and the counsel for the Crown said, 'Stand by John Thomas' they knew well that that course could not be continued. How long would they have gone on in that course? 'You dared not do it!' continued the hon. and learned gentleman. 'It was because you dared not do it, that you had a special jury.' (Hear, hear.) You could strike off your jury twelve special jurors in a closed room but the common jury must have been chosen in open court. (Hear.) You could not have avoided having Roman Catholics on your jury had you had a common jury. You, the underlings, have expressly and designedly sent Mr. O'Connell to the jury to which he was sent, for the purpose of having him convicted."

The Irish Attorney-General (half the attorney, and half the general officer, half pettifogger, and half man of war) averred that he would have dared to challenge all the panel, and stated that Mr. Sheil had set aside some large number of Protestants on a trial, producing the false impression that Mr. Sheil had contrived to exclude Protestants from the jury box, the truth being as the latter gentleman showed in reply, that he must exclude some Protestants to get a jury fairly composed both of Catholics and Protestants in nearly equal numbers. This is a specimen of the fairness of the Irish Attorney's representations. The suppression of the truth was in this instance the same thing in effect as the assertion of falsehood.

As to the accident to the lists by which the names of 27 Catholics were omitted, and the chance of a fair trial for the defendants proportionately diminished, Sir Thomas Wilde justly argued that it was base and infamous on the part of the Government to avail itself of an undue advantage so obtained, "they who profit by a fraud when once perpetrated being as bad as those who committed it."

Lord Stanley, whose ideas are as remarkable for their intrinsic meanness as his style is for its vigour and imposingness—his thoughts being like those poor figures which owe all to their dressing, and whose showy points are all false—he defended what Sir Thomas Wilde so justly reprobated, on the old equivocation of the thieves in the fable, one of whom protested he had not taken the leg of mutton which he had hid under his cloak, while his comroque, with equal truth, averred that he had it not in his possession, he stolen it and passed it to the other.

For the verdict, Sir Thomas Wilde emphatically declared.

O'Connell, I avow, and state with the utmost has had no fair trial.'

The law (and who better knows the law?) had, he averred, been wrested, and so used "all that a bad and profligate minister would want to destroy the liberty of the subject might be done by the law of the land."

He indignantly met the complaint of Lord Stanley, that it is indecent in lawyers to impugn the conduct of Judges.

"Pray, sir, what is the first duty of this House? To watch the administration of justice in this country. (Cheers.) You have—whether you have in form or not I do not know—but you had a committee of justice constantly. (Hear, hear.) What for I say, sir, with all respect to the noble lord, that the special duty of this House is to watch over the conduct of the judges. But why were lawyers to be excluded from giving an opinion? Because they were supposed to know something about it? It was strong language towards a member of that House, in the discharge of his public duty, to charge him with indecency for remarking upon the conduct of a Judge. Were they to set up the prosecution as a vindication of the law? and was every man's mouth to be stopped from showing that it was a profanation of the law?"

Sir Thomas Wilde has pointed out the dangerous fallacy by which meetings, the purposes and effects of which can only be moral, are confounded with those threatening or committing violence. Men, as he says, cannot send their opinions to meetings without their bodies; and if they assemble in great masses, it is pretended that the bodies are not there to present opinions, but to intimidate by a display of force.

"Apprehension of personal danger was a legitimate ground for interference. He appealed to the right hon. baronet opposite, on what ground had he passed the Catholic Emancipation Bill? How could they get the expression of public opinion? Could people send their opinions and leave their bodies at home? Overawing the Legislature was an apprehension of physical force to be applied to overawing the Legislature; the apprehension of a distant rebellion was not an overawing of the Legislature; and meeting of great numbers of people was not an overawing of the Legislature. An opinion had been expressed, to which he paid no respect whatever, that mere numbers made a meeting illegal. It might as well be said that a meeting of people at races, or at a coronation was illegal. It was numbers, combined with other circumstances calculated, to excite alarm in the public mind, which constituted illegality. The public safety required that meetings of this kind should be illegal. But let them look at these public meetings. What great alteration in any public grievance had been obtained except by agitation? Did a Government ever alter any thing except the people complained of it? To that extent a Government ought to be conservative."

As Sir T. Wilde showed, for example, Lord George Gordon's followers attempted to overawe the House of Commons by the menace of violence. This offence is very broadly distinguishable from assemblages to induce the Legislature to adopt certain measures by the demonstration of the force of opinion in favour of them.

Who has forgotten the time when the bigotry of the country made a parade of its numerical strength on Penenden Heath to deter the Legislature from removing the Catholic disabilities? But no proclamation was issued against the monster meeting, and no voice was raised to prosecute. It was looked upon as a fair mode of agitation, though exerted in a bad cause.

But see in what a dilemma of helplessness a Government would hold the people, if the doctrine that the magnitude of a meeting rendered it illegal were tenable. How often have we heard Ministers treating the opinions expressed at meetings with contempt, on the ground of the scantiness of the assemblage: "they were but a few hundreds or a few score."

If meetings are small, they are looked upon as despicable; if large, they are denounced as illegal. Ministers thus have them either way, and stamp them in the one case with insignificance, in the other with criminality.

And if magnitude makes a meeting illegal, by what rule is a man to know whether he may go or whether he should refrain from attending a meeting. If the occasion be one which he feels very strongly, he must consider that many others may feel it very strongly too, and that in such case, by the general concurrence of opinion, so many may be moved to attend as to render the meeting so large as to be illegal. He is then to stay away; but as each would think in the same way, the result would be that all would stay away; and it would come to this, that upon a subject on which there was a very strong consent and concurrence of opinion no meeting could be held, because of the common apprehension that it must exceed legal size!

Meetings, then, instead of being signs of the strength of opinion, would be signs of its weakness only; for those meetings only could be safely attended which proposed objects or held opinions in which it was known that few participated.

The offence of attending a large meeting is the only one which does not depend on the offender. John has committed the offence of attending a monster meeting, because James and Thomas have come to it also.

Let us suppose that a meeting is within the bounds of legal size, whatever they be, and that its numbers are increasing, at what point should well-disposed people take to their heels and fly, seeing that it is outgrowing the law?

When and how is one man to know that others are making what was before innocent an offence, by the act of bringing up their bodies? At what point in addition does the criminality begin, and how is a man to use his arithmetic so as to save him from the arithmetic of judge-made law, which detects an offence in numbers beyond a point as yet undefined? Carrying out the doctrine to its extreme, if the whole nation could meet, the guilt would be brought to its highest pitch.—Examiner, Feb. 24.

MISCELLANEA.

EXETER.—Right Rev. Dr. Wilson, the Catholic Bishop of Hobart Town, passed through this city, on Tuesday, for Plymouth, to sail for his destination.—Western Times.

MOUNT ST. BERNARD.—The community are still successfully as faithfully served by Brother Macarius, whose mind is loaded with a sense of obligation to Mr. Nicholas Power, a worthy son of the ancient faith, and Mr. Thornton, of Brighton, a Protestant, who gave the Trappist hospitable entertainment and a liberal donation.

A Protestant lady, also, whose name Macarius does not feel at liberty to mention, gave him a generous gift. He thanks the Catholic nobility, gentry, and the venerable clergy, for their strenuous efforts on behalf of this monastery, and for their personal kindness to himself. The pilgrim is about to assume another character. He has obtained the sanction of his Rev. Father Bernard to lead a hermit's life, in a cell constructed after a design by Mr. Pugin, and he is now preparing to retire to his holy solitude.

GREAT TEMPERANCE MEETING IN DUBLIN.—On Monday evening last one of the most numerous meetings held in Dublin for a considerable time, took place in Classon's large rooms, Lower Abbey-street. Shortly after half-past seven o'clock, on the motion of Mr. Haughton, the Very Rev. Dr. Spratt was called to the chair, amidst the loud cheers of the assembly. When the applause subsided, the very reverend chairman made a long and moving appeal upon the glorious effects of Temperance, and upon the importance of all, who had not previously taken the pledge, coming forward on that occasion to join the great and just cause. He entered into a minute account of the progress of Temperance, and concluded by stating that the great object of that meeting was to rally the friends of Teetotalism, and to administer the pledge to many who were anxious to take it for their own benefit and the example of others. Mr. Haughton delivered a simple, but most instructive, lecture on the advantages of Temperance, and read several very interesting extracts upon the subject. Mr. Webb followed, and spoke in very effective terms on the great movement, and gave some interesting accounts of the hydropathic system, or water cure. Counsellor Maguire, from Cork, delivered a truly eloquent speech upon the mighty cause. He quoted the great apostle on the progress which it continues to make, and, among other facts, stated that out of a population of 114,000 in Cork, 64,000 had already taken the pledge. Mr. T. Reynolds, Marshal of Dublin, followed in energetic terms. Mr. Hayes, of Kingstown, who, with his whole house, have taken the pledge, next warmly addressed the meeting. Mr. Coyne, Mr. Griffen, and other gentlemen also spoke, and after the band had played several delightful airs, nearly 200 received the pledge from the very reverend chairman. The meeting has produced a very great effect, and the next one is anxiously desired. The attendance was not only most numerous, but most respectable. Several men of considerable talent and influence were present, and the ladies graced the assembly on the occasion.

The Very Rev. T. Mathew has been administering the Temperance pledge to thousands during the last few days in Waterford, where the zealous bishop, Right Rev. Dr. Foran, with his clergy, and the Brothers of the Christian Schools, have been warmly promoting his apostolical work.—Tablet Feb. 10.

VERDUN.—M. Le Tournour, Bishop of Verdun died of apoplexy on the 26th. He was found in his room seated in his arm-chair, holding a newspaper in his hand, and his glasses lying on the ground. He was 63 years of age.—Ibid.

THE CROSS.

"But God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord, Jesus Christ." Gal. VI. 14.

"I glory in the cross of Christ," the Christian's honest pride,
Though fools the sacred symbol spurn, and scoffing tongues deride;
For thee my blest Redeemer hung in direful agony,
In cruel pains "endured the cross," for mankind and for me.

"I glory in the cross of Christ," the Church's sacred sign,
By which she consecrates to God each offering at her shrine:
Her sealing pledge to hallow them, and make them pure and clean,
Invoking in Christ's name that power, which works in us unseen.

And who that on his infant brow hath had that token set,
And felt the cooling stream of life, can to "life's end" forget
The "solemn vow and promise made," full manfully to fight,
Under the banner of the cross, in "armour of the light."

Ayl as around the sacred font the lambs of Christ are seen,
Gazing with silent wonder there, and solemn awe, I ween,
How stirs the heart with holy thought, that once to us was given,
That healing tide, and sealing pledge, which mark'd us out for heaven.

Deep on each never-dying soul be graved that sacred sign,
Illumined by that hallowed ray, the spirit's light divine;
And fast as Time's swift pinions sweep all earthly joys away,
Be this still there, and waxing bright to everlasting day.

"I glory in the cross of Christ," our fathers loved it well,
And bore it in their daily paths, a sin-averting spell;
In peril's fiercest, darkest hour, to it they firmly clung,
The symbol of that faith in him who on its arms once hung.

And let us not esteem them fools whose every holy thought
Found language in the sacred cross, on which our souls were bought;
For they by its mute eloquence their grateful hopes express'd;
Perchance as fervent as desires in living lan-

It nerved the hearts of martyr'd saints, when racked with torments dire—
When plunged in persecution's font they were baptized with fire,—
And, as the gnawing flames roll'd on it met their dying eye,
As they who trod the furnace, and the Son of God was nigh.

In all the winding paths of life, the cross revealed the ray,
In death with Gospel light it shone, all darkness changed to day;
And need we tell what rapture filled the fast departing soul
As lifted by a Hand she heard His fiery billows roll?

Pressed to the pale and quivering lip, most precious to her ear,
Its whisper full of peace and hope, which bade her banish fear;—
"Look unto me and be ye saved," see here the Saviour's blood,
Which smooths before thy trembling feet this dark and angry flood.

And when in some Cathedral old, whose silent cloister's spread
A holy atmosphere around the mansions of the dead—
They laid them to repose awhile—the sculptured cross confess'd,
How glorious was the hope by which they "entered into rest."

And let my slumber in the grave be watched by that blest sign,
Which with an angel's eloquence will tell my hope divine;
That "on the resurrection morn—to everlasting day
This sleeping dust shall rise in Christ's," "the Life, the Truth, the way."

"I glory in the cross of Christ," and fain would I behold, Stretched o'er each sacred roof its arms, framed of the solid gold,
And pointing out each hour to men—clear drawn upon the sky,
That truth the living fail to teach, "Christ for thy soul did die."

God grant that youth and age may yield all reverence to the cross,
And for its glorious doctrines count all "earthly things but loss:"
In joy, in wo, in life, in death, hold fast the sacred sign:
Symbol of that great sacrifice, our Saviour Christ divine.

OXFORD.

(The Churchman.)

THE
BENGAL
CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

No. 21.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, MAY 25, 1844.

[Vol. VI.]

WHAT IS POPERY?

Having in a former issue portrayed the characters of the first Reformers, the motives by which they were influenced, and the effect which their new doctrines had on the morals of the people, we will now direct the attention of our readers to a new subject, one which we trust will prove highly interesting. It is what Protestants call a "new thing," a thing unheard of until the 7th century "Popery!" Now so far from the claims of the Bishops of Rome being unheard of until the 7th century, they were acknowledged and exercised from the first ages of the primitive church. In the 2nd century, St. Irenæus speaks of the church of Rome as "the greatest, most ancient, and most universally known, &c. to which every church is bound to conform, by reason of its superior authority." In the same century Pope Victor gave no slight indication of his supremacy, by threatening, as head of the church, to excommunicate the Bishops of Asia if they did not conform to the practice of the western churches, in the celebration of Easter and other moveable feasts. No sooner was St. Peter dead, than the church of Corinth appealed to his successor, Pope Clement, to settle certain disputes. Did space permit it, we might introduce the opinions of Protestant writers in favour of our doctrine, and, amongst others Melancthon, who was driven by the excesses of the Reformation to confess that the Roman Pontiff should be above all Bishops. And, again, Grotius, a man no less celebrated, positively asserted that Protestants "will never see peace or union until they join those who adhere to the Roman See." But why should we multiply historical facts in reply to mere assertions? We will therefore content ourselves with giving the following extract from the Phoenix, which, in addition to what we have already advanced will be sufficient to show the endless contradictions and futile arguments resorted to, by those who impugn the doctrines of our Holy Church,—a Church whose antiquity, universality and unanimity place her far above the varying fashions of the world, and the religious novelties of the present day. The following is the extract: "What is Popery? A newly, established organ of the "soi disant" conservatives, (conservatives of pains and penalties?) The Edinburgh Standard asserts that the Phoenix has been established "avowedly for the purpose of upholding and promoting Popery." With respect to the term Popery we beg leave to state, that it is not to be found either in the Phoenix, or in the circulars which preceded its publication. So much for the accuracy of the Standard. We will not quarrel with terms, but we deny most emphatically the charge of Popery, if by it be understood that dark spirit of ecclesiastical pride and ambition which rebels against the law of the land, and tears the hand of the patron that feeds it. That spirit of wild proselytism, per fas et nefas, which pours whole deluges of Tracts and Bibles on every shore,—indifferent whether they fall on the palace or in the gutter—whether they be written in language which excites faith or contempt. We strenuously reject Popery, if it mean that evangelical zeal which would escort its ministers with trains of artillery, and compel attendance by volleys of grape. We abhor, we reject Popery, if it revile the Lady of England as Jezebel, if it denounce her as deserving of dethronement, if it single out the object of her hallowed affections as the butt of its ribaldry. We loathe, we detest, we spurn Popery, if it wring the last miserable penny from the starving peasant, and take the tenth blood-stained sheaf from the widow and the orphan—if it leave the father of a family to rot in jail for a debt of five shillings and sixpence. If, indeed, such be Popery; if it loathe the reign of youth and innocence, and sigh after the dominion of a hoary tyrant, then, O Lord, deliver us from Popery! But if by Popery be meant that doctrine handed in dying, by the Pope and Apostle Peter to Linus, and so to his successors, through every link of the chain of ages—then, indeed, we admire it. If by the term be understood that faith which triumphed over the Cæsars, which confounded the sophists, which softened the barbarians, which freed the slave, which ransomed the captive, which enlightened the ignorant, refined philosophy, and civilized the world—then, indeed, are we in love with Popery. If it be that spirit which instructs childhood in truth and virtue—which restrains the fiery passions of youth, and guides to heavenly crowns the ambition of manhood—which makes old age avaricious of virtues—which guides the footsteps of life, and watches by the bed of death—then, indeed, we embrace Popery. In this sense we see in it the centre of attraction of all noble natures, the prototype of every generous feeling, the beginning and end of all truly great actions. It gave its spirit to martyrdom, it gives its heroism to self denial—its zeal to charity—its aspiration to art. In its rays genius sprung to life—under its hand, the Madonnas of Raphael rose in their humility to thrones of cloud, and Murillo's martyrs smiled in dying. Its sweet and awful voice grew sensible to the tones of Allegri, in the strains of Mozart; Pergolesi and Zingarelli were echoes of this spirit's song. At its command, the temple of Peace, crowned with the Pantheon, rose in majesty, under the name of St. Peter's, and Moses of Michael Angelo, full of the glories of Sinai, lives for ever, like the stone tables of the law, enshrined in the splendour of Jehovah. Yet there are wonders greater than these. We have seen palaces in foreign lands, which, in our simplicity, we took for the residences of kings; they were only the abode of beggars. In these magic words all seemed reversed; the poor, the wretched, crushed by fortune, and an asylum and rest. Waited on in midst of every comfort, by the young, the noble, the beautiful, they seemed to bless the storms that had driven them to such a happy port, and amidst the calm, succeeding so many tempests, soothed and yet weaned from life, it seemed as if it were to them the portal of Paradise, and a pleasure to die. Ah Catholicity! thou great Magician! so courageous, so preserving, so firm yet gentle so avaricious of souls, and prodigal of self-sacrifice, so learned and wise, so ancient yet novel, so splendid and heroic, overflowing with mercy and the charities of life; Lord of all things by an universal abnegation.—Ah, can it be that thou art nothing more than a damnable idolatry? Art thou not beside thyself, to attempt conquering the world to vice, by the practice of every virtue? The Edinburgh Standard states truly, that Divine Service was performed in St. Mary's Church, Broughton Street, on the Queen's nuptial day, for the purpose of imploring the blessing of heaven on her Majesty's marriage. The conservative organ then goes on,—“Who ever heard before the blessing of heaven being implored by the Church of Rome on a sovereign whom that Church regards as a damnable heretic?” In the first place the Church of Rome does not consider the Queen, or any other person who conscientiously follows the worship in which they were brought up, as damnable heretics; on the contrary that Church reckons all such as in her pale, and among the number of her children. The Church considers none as “Damnable Heretics,” but such as wilfully pervert the known truth. But we do not accuse the Standard of any such intention. It gives too manifest proofs of enormous ignorance and stupidity, to be supposed capable of any artifice. Does the writer not know, that, not to speak of the Catholics of early times who prayed for the Cæsars who slaughtered them, does he not know that prayers are offered up every Sunday in the year, in every Catholic Church, in every country whose Government is uncatholic? In Great Britain, in the United States of America, in Russia and Prussia, whose Sovereigns persecute those who pray for them; in Baden, where three quarters of the people are Catholics. Does he not know that the Catholic Belgians freely elected a Protestant King? What profound ignorance not to be aware that every Sunday, after Mass, prayers are said for Her Majesty in St. Mary's, Broughton Street, as they were for King William and King George, as they have been in every time,—as More and Campion prayed on the scaffold for Henry and Elizabeth? How can a man be so stupid as to suppose that men who invoke blessings even on their persecutors, must be in a plot, because they pray for their benefactors? But what can be expected from one ignorant of what is publicly and habitually done under his own observation for years together; and finding it out at last, runs about crying, what a discovery! “Depend upon it” exclaims he,

with a sagacious shake of the head, "there is more in it than meets the eye." We believe there is. Your genuine thorough-bred bigot is utterly incapable of appreciating the motives which actuate Catholics; youth and innocence, burdened with duties so immense, that any mere mortal, unsustained by Heaven, must needs sink under them, excite no feeling in his breast, but furious rage. He cannot conceive how circumstances so touching, uniting with the sense of duty to the Sovereign whom God has appointed, and with emotions of loyalty to our Sovereign Lady, he cannot conceive how such feelings should cause a whole population spontaneously to fall upon their knees and invoke the blessings of Heaven on so sacred a head. There is, indeed, some hidden mystery which such a man cannot comprehend, but to hearts through which warm blood flows it is only human nature. The Standard states that a "plot of ground, of about five acres, has been purchased near Inverleith Place upon which is to be erected a Roman Catholic College." Did it not strike so acute a writer, that this purchase of a plot of ground is clear evidence of a Popish Plot? The coincidence is most remarkable; we were not aware that such was the case till the Standard informed us. But it is usual for his party to know our thoughts better than we do ourselves. We thank him for the information; it gives us sincere pleasure. But it is stated as if it were cause of complaint and regret. We are utterly ignorant of the circumstances mentioned by the Standard. But suppose it true? What then? Many years ago there were two Catholic Colleges in Scotland, Lismore and Aghorties, neither of which now exist. However, there is one at Blairs. Is this the progress of Popery? Dwindling down from two to one? "Oh! but they are making a lodgment in modern Athens." The hostility to Catholics is undecaying, but the point of attack ever changing. Once it was the ignorance of Catholics and their opposition to knowledge. Their schools were plundered, their colleges destroyed, their teachers proscribed, and then they were accused of ignorance;—but, spite of all obstacles, the children of light, like a plant shut up in a dark place, never rested till they had reached the pleasant beams of day. Now the attack is changed; they are making a lodgment at modern Athens;—What! is it a crime for the poor benighted Papists to approach this fountain of light. We did not imagine before that there existed any instance of bigotry parallel to that of the Jews, who would not allow the Samaritans to join in their worship, or to light their torches at the lamp of Sion. But there is nothing alone in the universe; nothing can live without society, and it seems that every folly must have its brother. But, after all, what are you afraid of? Surely it would be an act of sheer stupidity in the "Romanists," to establish a place of superstitious, antiquated education, in the midst of enlightened, philosophical, Protestant Edinburgh. Such alarms betray a want of confidence in the result of the contact; nor can that faith in your superior light be very strong, which is afraid of your Presbyterian sun being eclipsed by a Roman candle. The Standard seems to consider it a personal reproach, and is accordingly much ashamed that the Phoenix has made its appearance. We beg the conscientious Journal to set its mind at rest. We fully acquit it of all blame on the subject. We are fully convinced that we should never have had leave to appear in print, could it have prevented it. Nay more, that it would have caused the audacious publication to be burned by the hangman of Edinburgh Cross. This was the good old plan, and they "brenned" not only new books, but old women, not to speak of quartering recusants. But it is a curious fact, that, somehow or other, the Phoenix, Truth, always sprung from ashes, more beautiful than ever. But "trève de plaisanterie," we are at a loss to understand why every sect should have their organ, without offences: every party without blame, and when the Catholics bring up the rear, there is great outcry—for being lost, perchance?—Oh no! but for moving at all. The Record, the Watchman, the Scottish Guardian, the Witness all represent sentiments of their constituents, but the Standard is ashamed that the Phoenix should be suffered to exist. All these things, say the Standard, are "significant signs of the times." We are delighted to hear it. In the present state of society, there are enormous evils admitted by all; but the remedy is understood by none. Growing want and increasing demoralization go hand in hand, reacting on each other, as mutual cause and effect. Compulsory relief and penal statutes, but augment and envenom the disease. There is no remedy but a moral one. Obedience is the only cure for insubordination, charity for poverty; and these are only to be found in the bosom of the Catholic Church. Therefore, as patriots, it gives us sincere pleasure to be assured by so unwilling a witness, that Catholicity is flourishing in the Metropolis of Scotland."

CONVERSION OF THE NATIVES.

Within the last month, several Natives who reside in villages about fifteen or twenty miles distant from Calcutta journeyed two or three times to town, to the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, to send a Priest to instruct them and a large number of their fellow-villagers in the Catholic faith, and administer baptism to them and their children.

By the Archbishop's directions two or three of the most intelligent were selected for Catechists, and arrangements made to qualify them for the discharge of the duties of that office. The Rev. Mr. Veralli has already twice visited these poor people, and on one of these occasions he had the happiness to baptize twenty-three children. It need scarcely be added, that, like most ryots in India, these villagers are in a state of the greatest poverty. Yet, notwithstanding, many of them offered to contribute something monthly, to defray the expences of the Mission to be established among them. It would be unfeeling in the extreme to accept of this generous offer from persons whose poverty is so great that they should rather receive alms from others, than be allowed to take anything from their present miserable means of subsistence. The great joy which every Catholic will experience at the prospect of adding several families to the one fold of the one Shepherd will impel each person not only to come forward, and contribute individually to the accomplishment of so great a good, but also to interest himself with his benevolent friends and acquaintances, to obtain their co-operation in the same holy cause. To carry on the new Mission, now under consideration, with success, a Chapel, Schools, and an apartment for the Priest to reside in, whenever he visits that station, are indispensably necessary. To provide these accommodations, even on the cheapest scale, one thousand or one thousand two hundred rupees will be required. A moderate monthly subscription of about forty or fifty rupees would suffice to pay the expences attendant on the chapel, schools, catechists, and the journey of the priest to and from the station. We trust, that before long, we shall see a Priest stationed permanently in the district, as we are confident, that the constant presence of a good, efficient and disinterested Clergyman would do much towards the improvement of the Catholic and the conversion of the Pagan Natives there. We rejoice that this appeal is made at the present auspicious and holy season of Pentecost, when we celebrate with gratitude the anniversary of the first promulgation of the Gospel, and the conversion of the first fruits of the Jews and Gentiles to the saving faith of Christ. To assist in the holy undertaking we have described, a collection will be made to-morrow, Whit-Sunday, in each of the Catholic Churches in Calcutta. The Archbishop, we understand, will preach on the subject at the Cathedral, and we are sure that the excellent Clergymen who officiate in the other Churches, will profit also of the solemn and joyous festivity of the descent of the Holy Ghost, to enkindle in the hearts of their hearers a generous emulation to co-operate in enlightening those who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death.

CHITTAGONG MISSION.

A letter has been just received from the Rev. Father Barbè, in which he gives a very cheerful account of the state of religion in Chittagong. It is with great joy that we mention that during the last Lent one hundred and seventy-three persons approached the Holy Sacrament of Penance, and one hundred and seventeen, the Holy Communion. He likewise baptized by the waters of regeneration one Mussulman, one Mug woman and had four persons under instructions, preparing to embrace the Holy Catholic Faith.

IMPORTANT CATHOLIC INTELLIGENCE.

The privileges of the Church of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, Durrumtollah.

We have much pleasure in publishing, for the information of our Catholic readers in Calcutta, the following documents relative to the privileges and indulgences granted by our Holy Father, the Pope, at the discretion of the Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, to the prayer of Madam Pascoa Barretto DeSouza, the pious foundress of the Church of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, Durrumtollah.

The first prayer is for a perpetual daily altar to be erected to the most Sacred Heart of Jesus in the aforesaid Church.

The second, for a plenary indulgence for all those who will comply with the necessary conditions in that Church, on all the solemn festivals of the most holy Virgin Mary.

The third, for the privilege of celebrating the feast of the Sacred Heart, each year, on the Sunday within the Octave.

MOST HOLY FATHER.

PASCOA BARRETTO DESOUSA, widow of Thomas DeSouza, a Portuguese, foundress of a magnificent Catholic church in Calcutta (East Indies), dedicated to the Most Sacred Heart of Jesus, on which foundation she has expended from her own property, Two Hundred and Fifty Thousand crowns, including the parochial house and the consecrated ground for the gratuitous interment of departed Catholics, and also an endowment of Fifteen Thousand livres sterling, that is to say, Seventy five Thousand crowns, with which she has provided the aforesaid church, and this for the greater glory and honor of God, and through the love which she, in common with her family, consisting of three sons, always entertained towards the Holy, Roman, Catholic, and Apostolic Church, to which also her ancestors were ever most attached, and to the service and propagation of which they always devoted everywhere very considerable sums, as is well known to the Sacred Congregation De Propaganda Fide, humbly prostrates to kiss the feet of your Holiness, beseechs your Holiness to be graciously pleased to grant her the perpetual daily altar which she has erected and dedicated to the most Sacred Heart of Jesus in the aforesaid her church, That, &c.

From an Audience of His Holiness, held on the 13th Nov. 1842.

Our most holy Father Gregory the XVI. by Divine Providence, Pope, I the undersigned, secretary of the Sacred Congregation De Propaganda Fide, putting the motion, having weighed the circumstances set forth above, graciously remits the prayer for the aforesaid favor to the most Reverend Lord, the Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, with all convenient and necessary faculties to grant the same, provided however that the conditions contained in the Rescript in answer to the Petition concerning Patronage, be observed as to the previous acknowledgement of the Jurisdiction and authority of the Vicar Apostolic on the part of the Petitioner, and for all future time, on the part of her successors, the Patrons of that Church.

Given at Rome from the House of the Sacred Congregation, on the day and year as above, gratuitously, without any payment whatever, under any title.

J. Archbishop of Edessa.

We, Patrick Joseph, Archbishop of Edessa and Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, in virtue of the authority granted to us in the preceding Rescript, and chiefly, because, the Church of the Sacred Heart is now legitimately subject to our authority as his Holiness requires, grant that a perpetual daily altar, with all the usual privileges, may be permanently erected in the forementioned Church of the most Sacred Heart of Jesus.

PATRICK JOSEPH, Archbishop of Edessa,
Vicar Apostolic of Bengal.

F. STORCK, Miss Ap.

Pro-Secretary of the most Illustrious and most Reverend, the Archbishop of Edessa and Vicar Apostolic of Bengal.

Given at the Cathedral House the 9th day of May, 1844.

MOST HOLY FATHER.

Pascoa Barretto DeSouza, widow, &c.
* * * * *
begs your Holiness graciously to vouchsafe to grant to the aforesaid her church a plenary Indulgence on all the solemn festivals of the most holy Mary. That, &c.

From an Audience held on the 13th November, 1842.

Our most Holy Father, Gregory the XVI, &c. &c. * * * * *

We, Patrick Joseph, Archbishop of Edessa,
* * * * * in virtue of the authority given us by the preceding Rescript, and principally because, according to the condition prescribed by His Holiness, the Church of the Sacred Heart, founded by Madam DeSouza, is now legitimately subject to our authority, grant a plenary Indulgence to all the faithful who shall fulfil the prescribed obligations of Sacramental Confession and Communion and perform the other good works ordinarily prescribed, provided they perform those things which are required in the Church of the most Sacred Heart in Durrumtollah, on all the solemn festivals of the most holy Virgin Mary.

PATRICK JOSEPH,

Archbishop of Edessa & V. A. of Bengal.
F. STORCK, Miss Ap.

Pro-Secretary &c. * * * * *

Given at the Cathedral House on the 9th day of May, 1844.

The Tenor of the third prayer for permission to celebrate the feast of the Sacred Heart on the Sunday within the Octave, and the conditions on which it is granted, are the same as in the two preceding, and we do not therefore think it necessary to give them. We take this opportunity of announcing that the Feast of the Sacred Heart will be celebrated in Durrumtollah on the Sunday within the Octave.

HER MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY.

Yesterday, being the anniversary of Her Majesty's Birth-day, the psalm "Exaudiat" and the prayer Quæsumus (for the Queen) were sung, by order of His Grace, the Archbishop of Edessa, Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, in the Cathedral, St. Thomas's Church, and the Church of the Sacred Heart, Durrumtollah.

FOR THE BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

THROUGH MR. N. O'BRIEN.

J. Brown,	4
J. Houghleston,	4
G. Barlow,	2
R. Ball,	3
J. E. Rumpf,	2
E. McDougal,	2
R. Shireore,	2
J. H. Anderson,	4
G. R. Taylor,	5
H. Watson,	5
D. Biggs,	5
B. Sapte,	5
G. Plowden,	16
G. H. Poole,	5
R. W. Bouverie,	5

THE IRISH QUESTION.

MR. MACAULEY'S SPEECH IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MR. MACAULEY supported the motion of the noble lord because of the state of Ireland and because he considered the Government responsible at least for her present difficulties. That country, Sir, in extent about one-fourth of the United Kingdom, in population certainly more than one-fourth—(hear, hear)—superior, probably, in internal fruitfulness to any area of equal size in Europe; possessed of a position which holds out the greatest facilities for commerce, at least equal to any other country of the same extent in the world—(hear, hear)—an inexhaustible nursery of the finest soldiers, a country beyond all doubt of far higher consequence to the prosperity and greatness of this empire than all its far-distant dependencies, were they multiplied four or five times over—(hear, hear)—superior to Canada added to the West Indies, and these both conjoined with our possessions at the Cape and in Australasia, and with all the wide dominions of the Moguls, what is the state to which you have reduced it? How is it you govern it? (Hear, hear.) Not by love but by fear; not as you govern Great Britain, but as you are governing Scinde—(cheers)—not by the confidence of the people in the laws and their attachment to the constitution, but by means of armed men and entrenched camps. (Cheers repeated.) Undoubtedly this is a fact which, if we knew nothing more, would fully justify the House of Commons in going into a grave inquiry to find why these things are so. That these things are so is undoubtedly to be ascribed, as I said, partly to remote causes independent of any which have a bearing on the parties of the present day. The hon. member for Shrewsbury might have gone back further than the Puritans, or even the Reformation for the primary cause of Ireland's evils; that cause was the manner in which that country became annexed to the English Crown. [It was a conquest, and one of a peculiar kind. The English colonists adopted the new doctrines as they had been embraced in England; the Aborigines remained true to the ancient faith, alone among all the nations of the north of Europe. Then a new line of demarcation was added; theological antipathies were introduced among the existing differences, and renewed the dying animosity of race. And in this manner the feud has descended to our own times. In this manner it happened, throughout the whole of that century, that our slavery and their freedom meant one and the same thing, and that the very events, dates, and names which in the mind of an Englishman were associated with everything that tended to the glory and prosperity of his country, were associated in that of an Irishman with all that had worked the ruin and degradation of his.] Take the name of William III., the memory of the battle of the Boyne, I never recollect being so forcibly struck with anything as with a circumstance which occurred on a day I have every reason to remember with gratitude and pride—the day when I had the honour of being declared member for Leeds. While I was chaired, I observed that all the windows were filled with orange ribbons, and the streets crowded with persons wearing orange favours; all these were in favour of Catholic Emancipation, and animated with the strongest feeling to contend for equality of rights being granted to their Catholic fellow-subjects. I could not help observing, that the orange ribbon seemed rather incongruous. “Not at all,” was the answer; “under an orange flag the Whigs of Yorkshire have always banded together. An Orange flag was carried before Sir, George Saville, one of the first persons who stood here on the basis of equal rights for all.” The very chair, in which I sat, it was added, was the chair in which Lord Milton had been carried, when he gained the victory in the great cause of religious liberty against Lord Harewood. Now, what effect would this have produced in Limerick. (Hear, hear) It would have been at once considered as a mark of triumph over the Catholic party, agreeing with every point in the history of these two nations. (Hear, hear.) [Then arose contentions, and they were put down or punished, by Cromwell with extirpation, by William III. by reducing the Irish to a state of helotism. Then came rustic tyrants and rustic banditti. The Judges of the land treated the priests of the people worse than beggars. A century after Jacobinism was strongly allied to Catholicism, as affording a hope of liberty. A third struggle against Protestant ascendancy was put down, and it became the duty of the men at the head of affairs to consider what measures should be adopted to put an end to the hostility of Ireland.] Little as I revered the memory of Mr. Pitt, I must confess that comparing the plan he formed with the policy of Cromwell and William, he deserves praise for great wisdom and humanity. The Union of Ireland with Great Britain was part of his plan, an excellent and essential part of it, but still only one half. It never ought to be forgotten that his plan was one much wider in extent than he was allowed to carry into effect. He wished to unite not only the kingdoms, but the hearts and affections of the nations. For that object the Catholic disabilities were to be removed, the Catholic clergy were to be placed in an honourable, comfortable, and independent position, and Catholic education was to be conducted on a liberal scale. His views and opinions agreed with, and were, I have no doubt, taken from those of a man of an un-

Understanding even more enlarged and capacious. If that system had been carried into effect, I believe that the union with Ireland would now have been as secure, as far out of the reach of agitation, as the union with Scotland. (Cheers.) The name of the Union would then have been associated in the minds of the great body of Irish people with the removal of most cruel wrong and disability. Unhappily, however, the Union alone, of all those measures of Mr. Pitt, was carried, and the Irish Catholics found that they had only the name of former independence, that which to them however little its intrinsic worth, was of value and pride, and that they had obtained no compensation on the side of civil and religious liberty. (Cheers.) The Union would then have been associated in their minds, not with penal codes and religious disabilities, but with emancipation and justice. Nevertheless, it was not even then too late. It was not too late in 1813—(hear)—it was not too late in 1821; it was not too late even in 1825. (Great cheering.) If some men who were then, as they are now, high in the service of the Crown, would have made up their minds to say then, that which they were forced to say—(renewed cheers)—four years later, then the benefits and the tendency of the policy of Mr. Pitt would still have become apparent. The apparatus of agitation was not then organised, the Government was under no coercion; that which was afterwards given in 1829 might have been given with honour and advantage, and might, most probably would, have secured the gratitude of the Irish Catholic people. But in 1839 concession was made, and largely made—made, too, without conditions, which Mr. Pitt would undoubtedly have imposed—but still made reluctantly—(cheers)—and with obvious dislike—made confessedly from the dread of civil war. (Cheers.) Was this conciliation calculated to inspire the minds of the Irish Catholics with gratitude and content? Was it not rather of a tendency to inspire the minds of those Irish Catholics with a feeling and opinion to be most deeply lamented? and with the evil effects of this we are at this day contending. Would these men forget that they had been coming before the English Parliament for twenty-seven years as suppliants, representing, pleading the justice of their cause—urging the rights of conscience and the civil liberty of the subject—pointing to foregone solemn pledges, to the promise of Mr. Pitt, even to the promise of George IV., when Prince of Wales—but in vain? Could they forget how the most profound thinkers, the most eloquent orators, had waked and toiled in their cause in the English Parliament—but in vain? (Cheers.) Mr. Pitt endeavoured to fulfil his pledge, and he found his reward, for he was driven from office. (Hear, hear.) Afterwards Lord Grenville and Lord Grey endeavoured to do—less indeed than Mr. Pitt proposed, but some portion of that which Mr. Pitt proposed to carry into effect, and they in turn were unable to carry out their design. (Cheers.) Then came Canning; he took part with the Catholics, and he was rewarded too, for he was worried and hunted unto death. (Loud and continued cheers.) And when he, one of the most distinguished ornaments of Parliament and of the Catholic cause, was laid in his grave, when the Catholics began to look to themselves for aid, to display that formidable array of force, just keeping within the limits of the law, which afterwards produced such memorable consequences, and led to a result which the noblest advocates had been unable to achieve. Then, within two years after that great man was carried to his resting-place in Westminster Abbey, everything he could have done—nay, more than he could have done,—was effected. (Cheers.) Was it possible, then, that from that moment there should not have been an opinion deeply rooted in the minds of the whole Catholic population of Ireland, that from England, or, at all events, from that powerful party which governed England, nothing was to be got by reason or by justice, but everything by fear? (Cheers.) However, the concession was made at last, it deserved gratitude, and it obtained none. (Cheers.) The organisation of agitation was complete. The leaders of the people had tasted the pleasures of power and distinction; the people themselves had grown accustomed to excitement. Grievances enough remained behind to serve the purposes of agitation, and the people were imbued with a sense that nothing was to be got by pleading, and justice would only be awarded to power. * * * If I understand the state of Ireland, it is one of disposition to disease, but not absolute paroxysm. Ireland is always combustible, but not always on fire. (Cheers.) [The medicine of the one administration was unpalatable. That of the other kept off the disease. During the Whig administration war was threatened; and in 1840, had a foreign enemy landed on the shore of Munster, he would have met as warm a reception as on the coast of Kent. This was because the Whigs showed good will to Ireland.] And I cannot help thinking that if that administration had been as strong in parliamentary support as the present, if they had been able to carry into full effect measures for extending to Ireland the benefits of the British constitution, that in one generation, by such administration and legislation, the Union would have been as secure as trial by jury. (Cheers.) But this was not to be. During six years an opposition, powerful in numbers, formidable in ability, selected the administration of Ireland as the object of their fiercest, deadliest attacks. Those Lord-Lieutenants who were most popular in Ireland were assailed as no others had ever been assailed; and assailed, too, for those very efforts of their administration which were the chiefest causes of the conciliation of the Irish people. Every legislative act, without exception, introduced by that Government, and which became popular in Ireland, was either rejected altogether or mutilated. (Cheers.) A few Catholic gentlemen, men of eminent ability and stainless character, were placed in situations which I can only say were below their talents and desert. (Cheers.) Those appointments were hailed with great satisfaction by their countrymen. And no wonder! For a hundred and fifty years of proscription the powers, eloquence as great as that of my right hon. friend the member for Dungarvan, and of other ornaments of the House, withered in utter obscurity under penal and disabling laws. For a century and a half of proscription, during which no Irish Catholic (as we understood the right honorable gentleman, who was frequently rendered inaudible by the cheers which anticipated the conclusion of his sentences) attained to those honours in the State to which his talents and character might have entitled him to aspire, had the Catholics not been excluded from power. At last a Catholic was sworn in of her Majesty's Privy Council; a Catholic took his seat at the board of the Treasury; and another appeared at the Board of Admiralty. (Cheers.) Instantly all the underlings of the great Tory party raised a yell of rage—(prolonged and rapacious cheering)—a greater than which was surely never heard, even from the rioting "No Popery" mob of Lord George Gordon. The leaders of that party, indeed, even at that time, seldom joined in that cry—although, perhaps, I could mention one and even two prominent instances to the contrary—but the leaders of the party were accused of listening to it, and of enjoying it; of encouraging it, and of benefitting by it. (Great cheering.) It was not necessary they should do more. Still there were some public expressions used which sanctioned that outcry. "Aliens!" That was one phrase used. (Great cheering.) "Minions of Popery" was the term employed in another quarter. Then although the Catholic priesthood are regarded with the deepest reverence and love by their flocks—and, from all I have heard, I believe they deserve that reverence—we must all remember with what scurrilous epithets, with what foul and rancorous abuse they were assailed. (Hear, hear.) They were called a "demon priesthood," and "surpliced ruffians." They were stigmatised as "priests of Baal," and as "those false prophets whom Jezebel keeps at her table." (Renewed cheers.) Not content with throwing these obstacles in the way of the Executive Government, and mutilating every measure brought in for the benefit of Ireland, the opposition of that day assumed an offensive attitude, and determined on bringing in a measure of their own for the disadvantage of Ireland (as we understood the right honorable gentleman). They brought in a measure called a bill for the registration, which they now themselves admit was an act for disfranchisement. (Loud cheers.) I desire to take my description of that measure from no lips but their own, and what they would not then admit they admit most fully now. (Cheers.) We said, if you impose a much more stringent mode of registration you disfranchise the great body of the Irish voters. You denied it then, you admit it now. Am I to believe that you did not know all this as well in 1840 as you do now? (Cheers.) Has one fact been told now that was unknown then? Has a single argument been brought forward now that was not then urged, and urged twenty, thirty, forty times on the floor of this House? But their explanation is, that the responsibility of office rests upon them now—(great cheering)—that is, that you use your privilege of ruining your country only when you are in opposition. (Reiterated cheering.) In place they are. It was very fit that such service as this should have its reward. It has had its reward. Several causes concurred to place them in the situation they now fill; but I believe the principal cause to have been the discontent which they excited in England against the Irish policy of the late Government. (Renewed cheers.) I believe that to have been the principal cause—that it was a principal cause will not be denied. But in the eagerness for the contest they called up a spirit more easily evoked than laid—the spirit of religious intolerance. (Cheers.) That spirit placed them in power. And it was pleasant, indeed, to hear the sermons of the Rev. Hugh M'Neil—(cheers)—to hear their cause represented by the high Churchmen, the low Churchmen, and the Dissenters, in the cause of the Gospel, struggling against a furious Liberalism which made no distinction between religious truth and religious falsehood. It was pleasant to hear all this: but when they came into power they found they had to govern in this island and in Ireland about eight millions of Catholics, who had been constantly, by themselves or their followers, insulted and defamed. (Loud cheers.) What was the necessary result? I give them the fullest credit for not wishing to do the country the smallest harm—that was not necessary for the overthrow of their political opponents; and I give them credit for all the declarations they have lately made as to their desire to appoint Catholics to place in office. I believe in their sincerity, when they say they would wish to find a Conservative Catholic lawyer at the Irish bar to elevate to the bench. Nothing, no doubt, would delight them more than to find a Catholic Conservative gentleman of good talent for business, and ability of speaking, to assist them in the business of Government. I believe all this; but what I want to know is this—why are all the Catholics in the empire their enemies? (Tremendous cheers.) Was it ever heard of before? (Cheers.) Here are eight millions of people of all sorts of professions, all sorts of characters, of all rank ranging from the Hereditary Earl Marshal, the heir of the Howards, Mowbrays, and the Fitzallans, down to the poorest peasant—and was such a thing ever heard of as that all these should be ranged against the Government? Is there anything in Catholic theology of a tendency to ally itself with Whig doctrines? On the contrary its tenets have been quoted as having an opposite tendency, and without going into questions of theology, it has been thought that of all forms of Christianity, Catholicism is that which attaches most importance to antiquity, which rests upon immemorial usage; and it would, therefore, appear that there would be a tendency among Roman Catholics to Conservatism. * * * As far as respects all favour of the Crown, the great measure of emancipation is utterly annihilated. Of all the boons that were supposed to have been conferred by the Act passed in 1829, the Catholics of Ireland have, as far as I conceive, obtained only one, and that is, admission to Parliament; and they would not have possessed even that, if the Government had been able to pass their Irish Registration Bill. (Cheers.) All that followed was calculated to wound the national and religious spirit of the people. The acts assumed a hundred forms—some of a deeper and some of a lighter character; but the result of all was a gross misgovernment acting on a strong national sensibility. You refused to admit the Roman Catholics to a fair participation of the benefits of the constitution. Turn where you will, look at any department you may —at every office, great or small—there the Roman Catholic considers, and not without reason, that he finds an enemy. Was it not natural that such a people in such situation, should seek to set up a strong dominion of their own? (Cheers.) They remember—and it would be strange if they did not—what they had extorted from you in 1829 and will they not demand a similar concession, and make a like trial to consummate their work in 1843. ? These are your difficulties, and they are of your own making. (Loud cheers.) Eminent men sometimes have brought themselves into difficulties, and shown themselves to be great statesmen by the manner in which they have extricated themselves. First, with regard to legislation—What have you done? All is comprised in An arms Bill—(loud cheers.)—not a measure of conciliation not avowed by a measure of coercion—a measure which, as far as I could judge, satisfied neither side of the House. (Cheers.) We called out for a boon on our side—your friends called out for more vigorous measures. This being the fruit of the legislative measures of last session, we will consider what has been done with respect to the measures which have been taken in the interval. * * The noble lord the Secretary of State for the Colonies had said that it could be proved that the Government had done everything that was in its power to prevent the meeting at Clontarf. That I deny. It has been stated by the Government itself, that it was only on the morning of Friday that the resolution to issue a proclamation was formed, and that that resolution could not be known in Dublin until Saturday, because of the deliberations which were required. It was an absurdity, and quite idle, to say that any deliberation of the character described was required. Was that a composition which required this deliberation? (Hear, hear.) What! You were weighing of words and sentences, when you should be weighing the lives of the Queen's subjects. (Loud cheers.) No rational person would venture to say that if there had been in the minds of the rulers of Ireland a proper sense of the urgency of the occasion, a proclamation would not have issued on the Saturday morning, by which the hazard of the loss of many lives might have been avoided. (Cheers.) And by whose agency was that evil warded off? By the interposition of the chief you have prosecuted. Fortune stood your friend, and he stood your friend, and it was by his exertion mainly that, in all probability, a scene as terrible as that which occurred at Manchester was prevented. (Cheers.) But I will pass by that, and come now to the prosecution. The charge I make against this prosecution is one and simple. The one main charge I bring against the Government is this, that they seemed not to consider the nature of such a prosecution; that they regarded it as proceeding in a suit of mem and tuum, in a qui tam action for the recovery of penalties. (Cheers.) They considered nothing but this—whether they could get together such evidence as to facts, and such opinions as to law, as would entitle them to a verdict and a judgment. Now, my opinion is, that both the verdict and judgment in a great political case are the very smallest part to be considered. (Loud cheers.) What the Government has to ask itself, when instituting a great public prosecution, is, will our moderation and justice stand the test of public opinion? What will be the effect produced on the public mind by our proceedings? (Loud cheers.) Of course, the law must be strictly observed, but that is only one of the conditions of a public prosecution. To make it wise in the Government to adopt, in a matter of state, a prosecution, it is necessary that its conduct should be such, not only that it could not be questioned, but that prejudice itself could not cavil at it. (Cheers.) You were instituting a prosecution against an individual, but I feel considerable delicacy in speaking upon this subject. My belief is that, as regards the end that he has lately been pursuing, it is not only mischievous but wholly unattainable. I regard with deep disapprobation the means pursued to obtain that end; and in saying this, I wish to speak with the respect that is due to eminence—to misfortune. I must say, too, in the spirit of truth, that the position which Mr. O'Connell holds in the eyes of his fellow-countrymen, is a position such as no popular leader in the whole history of mankind ever occupied. (Loud cheers.) You are mistaken if you imagine that the interest with which he is regarded is confined only to this island. Go where you will upon the Continent, dine at any table d'hôte, tread upon any steam-boat, enter any conveyance, from the moment your speech betrays you an Englishman, the very first question asked—whether by the merchants or manufacturers in the towns in the heart of France, or by the peasants, or by the class who are like our yeomen in this country—is, what has become of Mr. O'Connell? (Cheers. and cries of "Oh, oh.") Let those who deny this assertion take the trouble, to turn over the French journals. (Cheers.) It is a most unfortunate—it is a most unhappy fact—but it is impossible to dispute—that there is throughout the Continent, a feeling respecting the connection between England and Ireland not very much unlike that which exists with respect to the connexion between Russia and Poland. I do not approve of this feeling, but it is natural it should be so. Without adverting to the immense jealousy which the great power of England produces, I may remind the House that the Irish agitation has on the Continent two aspects, which enlist the sympathies in common of Royalists and Democrats. As a popular movement, it is looked upon with favour by the Extreme Left in France, or the Democratic party; while, by its involving the cause of Catholicism, it obtains to itself the countenance of the Extreme Right, and those who espouse the cause of the Pretender: and in this manner it has probably created a union of support on the Continent of Europe stronger than any other question of our domestic politics was ever known to possess. (Cheers.) I do not, it is unnecessary to say, urge this for the purpose of frightening the English Government; but I do say, that on this question, it is of the greatest importance that the proceedings which the Government have taken should be beyond impeachment, and that they should have obtained a victory in such a way that that victory should not be to them a greater disaster than a defeat. Has that been the result? (Cheers.) [Here the right hon. gentleman entered into the question of the jury, but for his view the reader may be referred to the speech of Sir T. Wilde on the following evening.] But you got a jury, and then you had a charge. I do not call it an "unprecedented" charge, because I can recall to mind many precedents strictly in point in the State trials of the seventeenth century. (Loud cheers.) With this jury and with this charge you have obtained a verdict and what are you the better for it? Has it tended to settle the question? Has it tended to settle the minds of the people of Ireland? you say Ireland is quiet. No doubt it will be quiet while the people place faith in that eminent man who is their leader. No doubt they will avoid doing anything to place him in a more dangerous position; but your difficulty will begin when the law has finished its work. (Cheers.) And by what means do you intend to prevent a very serious and strong outbreak of popular feeling? Is it possible that a man who has possessed himself so boundlessly of the feelings of the Irish people is all at once to lose his popularity, because he has become a martyr? I am as much attached to the Union as any honorable gentleman, and as much opposed to the demand made for its Repeal, but I cannot, in my conscience, say that Mr. O'Connell has had fair play. (Loud cheers.) If the right honorable gentleman opposite cannot say it, if he says that what has occurred has "prejudiced the administration of justice," if nothing more favourable can be said of it, than that there is suspicion of unfairness—if persons of influence and station are deeply convinced that great unfairness has been practised, what must the people of Ireland, who are devoted to Mr. O'Connell, think of it—the people who think that what I conceive to be most unjustifiable speeches he ever uttered are perfectly justifiable? What are we to expect—that the magic and power of his name will not remain when you have shut him up? (Cheers.) True; you will not have his personal presence so often exhibited; and which, as you yourselves admit, has been so often exerted to prevent violence. And now for your future measures. [The executive measures were more barracks and bayonets—the legislative measures either undefined or destructive of the character of those who proposed them.] I must say that, even from honorable gentlemen on the other side of the House, I have heard some declarations that have delighted me, but from Ministers we have heard nothing but this—that the Established Church is there, and that there it must be. (Cheers.) As to the speech of the noble lord, when I hear such a defence of the establishment from a man of his eminence, what inference can I draw but that nothing better can be said for it? (Hear, hear.) What is the noble lord's argument? That in 1757 and 1792, and, I believe, some other years, when Roman Catholics were seeking the removal of penal laws and disabilities, they did not complain of the Established Church as a grievance. Is it not, let me ask, perfectly notorious that such is the ordinary progress of all questions? When men are at a distance from their desired object—when they perhaps, see little hope of ever attaining it, they do not go the full length even of their just demands; but after the men who sought less have been thirty years in their graves, and circumstances have entirely changed, their successors may have a right to take up a different position. Of this I can give the noble lord a pretty clear instance, derived from his own practice. Does not everybody know that during the discussions on the slave trade, all who spoke disclaimed in the most earnest manner any desire for the emancipation of the slaves; nay, emancipation was not then so much as thought of, and the speeches of Lord Grenville, Mr. Pitt, Lord Hawke, and of my honoured and revered friend—of whom I can never speak without respect and regard—Mr. Wilberforce, were directed against the slave trade, and not in favour of emancipation. In 1797, when the Duke of Northumberland proposed to bring in a bill for the abolition of slavery, Mr. Wilberforce expressly said that the victory he wished to gain was over the slave trade, and not over slavery. Did the same reason operate with the noble lord when, not long since, he brought in his bill to abolish slavery? (Much cheering.) When he had pointed out with so much eloquence the horrible evils of the whole system, suppose any man had got up and said that in 1792 Mr. Pitt only wished to abolish the slave trade, would that have been considered an answer to the noble lord, who was anxious by his bill to emancipate the slaves? (Hear, hear.) Thus the noble lord's argument is confuted by his own practice. (Cheers.) Then as to the Act of Union, it seems that the 5th article sticks in the noble lord's throat: that must on no account be altered. But does not the fourth article of the same act fix the number of members who should sit in this House? (Hear, hear.) Yet the fourth article has notoriously been abrogated, and who brought in the bill to abrogate it, but the noble lord? (Cheers from all sides.) Next comes the question of the Catholic oath; and here, were the noble lord present, I might be disposed to say something more severe than I will utter in his absence. I will, therefore, confine myself to the strict bearings of the case, and putting the argument of the noble lord to the utmost, it only amounts to this, that when certain questions are discussed, the Roman Catholic members ought to walk out of the House before it was put to vote. Does the noble lord mean to say, that when only the orthodox Protestants are left in the House, no question of the kind must be discussed, and that the 640 who are not Roman Catholics are not qualified to debate and decide upon any question of reform. If his argument go to that length all I can say is, that it is the strangest thing in the world. (Hear, hear.) I do hope that the right honourable baronet at the head of the Government will deal with the question of the Irish Church in a large manner—a manner worthy his high position and deserved eminence. (Hear, hear.) I do hope that he, at least, will not come down with a scrap of Hansard in one hand, and a bit of an old journal in the other, and tell us what was claimed in 1787 or 1792. (Cheers, and laughter.) I do hope that he will grapple with the subject like a great statesman, and not palter with it like a puny politician. (Hear, hear.) Let him consider these questions:—Is the institution a wise one or a bad one? What are the ends for which an Established Church exists in Ireland? Does the Established Church in Ireland accomplish those ends? Can a Church which has no hold in the hearts of the great body of the people be otherwise than useless, or worse than useless? Has the Irish Protestant Church any hold in the hearts of the great body of the people? (Hear, hear, hear.) Has it, during the two centuries and a half that it has existed in Ireland, made any vast conquests of conversion or proselytism? (Cheers.) Has it been what the Churches of England and Scotland have been called, with no small justice, the poor man's church? (Hear, hear.) Has it nursed the great body of the people in virtue, consoled them in affliction, or drawn down upon itself the respect and reverence of the nation and the State? (Cheers.) To be able to answer these questions in the affirmative is the true and rational defence of the Church of Ireland, not by making quotations from forgotten speeches, or producing passages from mouldy petitions presented in the time of George the Second, and ever since laid by with Legislative lumber. (Cheers.) Do not let us again be told that many years ago all the Roman Catholics asked was the removal of certain penal laws; why, in 1757 no Roman Catholic would have gone even the length of requiring admission into Parliament. They did not then carry their demands for justice half the length of what they have since obtained. I think I have now said enough to justify the vote I shall give in favour of the motion of the noble lord. (Hear, hear.) I think that the evils we deplore have been brought upon Ireland by a false and pernicious policy. I think that the mode in which it is proposed to deal with those evils will tend not to lessen, but to aggravate them. While the present system is pursued in Ireland it is impossible that she can be peaceable; and until Ireland is peaceable, the British empire cannot enjoy her full power and proper dignity. The accordance of all classes is necessary to her strength, and her dignity is identical with her security. In every negotiation, whether with France on the right of search, or with America on the boundary, while Ireland continues discontented that fact will be uppermost in the minds of the diplomatists on both sides; and while it restrains and cripples the one, it will embolden and invigorate the other. (Cheers.) Such must be the necessary and inevitable consequence. This is indeed a great and splendid, a mighty empire, well provided with means of annoyance, and with weapons of defence. She can do many things which are far beyond the power of any other nation in the world; she dictated peace to China; she governs Australasia, and she rules Caffraria. Should occasion again arise she could sweep from the surface of the ocean the commerce of the world, and as formerly, blockade the ports, and spread her triumphant flag from the Baltic to the Adriatic. She is able to maintain her Indian empire against every threatened hostility, whether by land or sea; but amidst all this vast mass of power there is one vulnerable point—one spot unguarded, and that spot nearest to her heart—(cheers)—a spot at which forty-five years ago, a deadly, happily not a fatal blow was aimed. The Government and Parliament, each in its sphere, is deeply responsible for the continuance of such a lamentable state of things; and, for my part of that responsibility, I intend to clear myself by the vote I shall give in favour of the motion of my noble friend, and I trust that I shall find with me so large and respectable a body of members of this House as shall satisfy the Irish Catholics that they still have friends in England, and that they need not yet relinquish all hope of protection from the wisdom and justice of an Imperial Parliament. (Continued cheers from all parts of the House.)—Tablet, Feb. 24.

THE PROTESTANT CLERGY

The Clergy, we regret to say, have figured in the Law Courts to a disgraceful degree during the past month. In another column we record two cases of sad depravity among the reverend class—one of which discloses the dissolute life led by the nephew of a Prelate, and the other betraying a spirit of brutal cruelty, which we might have expected from a savage, but cannot sufficiently condemn in one of so sacred a calling. We reluctantly refer the reader to the details of these shameful exposures, and to the comments contained in our Parliamentary columns, where it will be seen that the subject was brought before the House of Lords.—Monthly Times, April.

CLERICAL DEPRAVITY.—At Northampton Assizes, on the 7th of March, Nathalie Miard, a lady-like and vivacious Frenchwoman, was tried on a charge of having demanded, on delivering certain letters to the Reverend Herbert Charles Marsh, 10,000 francs—£400. Mr. Marsh, rector of Barnack, near Stamford, is nearly thirty-six years of age, unmarried, and is son of the late Bishop of Peterborough. Placed in the witness-box, he himself narrated his connexion with the prisoner. He became acquainted with her at a notorious house which he sometimes frequented in London; and the acquaintance was subsequently renewed in Paris, and continued with uncertain intervals; during which, under various pretences, she wrung considerable sums of money from him, ranging from £10 to £300. Mr. Marsh specified several sums paid, to the amount of more than £1,000, besides £32 to be allowed during the life of a child—for she represented him as the father of one child, who died, and but for a fall, he would, according to her, have been the father of a second. When his payments ceased, from exhaustion of means, she sent letters threatening exposure, and followed him into the country. In these letters she alluded to "Clarisse"—the attachée, said Mr. Marsh, to a French theatre, with whom he was acquainted eight years ago; and she also mentions a Miss St. Clair, to whom he admitted having offered £5, which was returned to him. Mademoiselle Miard's last demand was 30,000 francs, to open a maison de jeu. Jaques Mutzig, a house-porter from Paris, Augustus Gougenheim, an interpreter, and William John Joseph Kemp, interpreter, deposed to conversations in which the girl said that she would make Mr. Marsh, "a rich man and a clergyman," give her money. For the defence, the prisoner's counsel contended that there was at least a probable cause for her demands, which deprived them of the character of felonious extortion. The Judge left it to the Jury to say whether or not there was such cause; and they returned a verdict of "Not guilty," at which there was applause in court. A second and similar indictment was suffered to drop. A third, for conspiring to extort money, was not pressed, on Miard's entering into her own recognizances to appear when called upon for trial and to keep the peace.

THE CLERGY AGAIN.—At Aylesbury Assizes, on the 9th of March, the Reverend John Day, Rector of Howridge, was tried under an indictment for, having maliciously and feloniously wounded seven sheep, the property of William Weedon, in July last. Mr. Day lodged in the house of his tenant, Mr. Oenister; and adjoining to the land occupied by the tenant, was Mr. Weedon's pasture. The sheep strayed on to Glenister's land, and Mr. Day told Mr. Weedon that he had impounded them. The other replied that that was all nonsense; for if the sheep had strayed, it was over Mr. Day's fence, and therefore it must have been his own fault. The Rector exclaimed, "Then I'll go and prosecute the sheep." He accordingly went to a stable where he had "impounded" the sheep, hamstringed them with his own hand, stabbed them about six inches deep in the flank, and drove them to their own pasture. Mr. Weedon, coming by, accused the Rector of having cut the sheep. He denied it, telling the prosecutor that he was a liar! Afterwards he offered to pay £2 in compensation. The defence was, that the Rector thought he had a right to kill or wound the animals trespassing; which negatived all notion of malice, and entitled him to an acquittal. Accordingly, the Jury acquitted him; and he was discharged, with an admonition from Lord Abinger, who desired him "to profit by the grace and the mercy which had been shown to him, in acquiring a knowledge of the laws of his country and the rights of his neighbour."—Monthly Times.

CAISTOR,—SUICIDE OF A CLERGYMAN.

(From the Morning Chronicle March 2.)

On Sunday morning last, about 8 o'clock, the inhabitants of Caistor were thrown into the greatest consternation by the discovery that the Rev. Geo. Watson, the respected vicar of the parish, and rector of the adjoining village of Rothwell, had committed suicide, under peculiarly distressing circumstances. Mr. Watson was a gentleman of a very refined mind and so extremely sensitive to even the appearance of injury or disrespect, as to exhibit, when under excitement or in trouble, strong marks of mental aberration. Some months ago, his morbid sensibilities led him to write a letter, in consequence of some fancied slight, to the wife of one of his parishioners at Rothwell, which letter was made the subject of a complaint to the Bishop, and led to the issuing of a commission of inquiry under the Church Discipline Act. On Friday last that commission was executed, and the offence reported—not on the innocence or culpability of Mr. Watson, for of that they were not the Judges—but merely that there was a prima facie case for investigation; adding to their return, however, the fact that Mr. Watson appeared to be labouring under great eccentricities and infirmity of mind. This cloud over a reputation which had hitherto been unsullied was too much for Mr. Watson to bear. On the following day (Saturday) his previous distress had settled into despondency, and he expressed fears that the affair would (to use his own expression) "get the better of him." These fears were soon to be realised. The unfortunate gentleman about seven o'clock on Sunday morning arose from his bed, and in his dressing gown and slippers went into his sitting room, where he appears to have loaded a gun and discharged its contents into his mouth. His skull was dreadfully shattered; and he was about eight o'clock, quite dead. An inquest was held on the body, and on the evidence adduced, the jury gave a unanimous verdict that the deceased had destroyed himself while labouring under mental derangement. Mr. Watson was forty-four years of age. He was presented to the vicarage of Caistor by the Rev. W. F. (now Dr.) Hook, Prebendary of Caistor, in 1833; and to the rectory of Rothwell, by the Earl of Yarborough, in 1835. He was a gentleman whose urbanity and kindness of disposition endeared him to his parishioners, and his melancholy end will be long deplored by all who knew him. A general gloom pervades the town and neighbourhood, and the whole of the shops in Caistor were partially closed for some days this week as a mark of respect to the deceased.—Stamford Mercury.

THE REVEREND MR. MARSH AND HIS DIOCESAN.

On the 11th March, Lord LILFORD called the Bishop of Peterborough's attention to some remarks in the Times, sharply animadverting on the Bishop for not having taken severe notice of the conduct of the Reverend Herbert Marsh, who figured at Northampton Assizes [vide page 291] as the unsuccessful prosecutor of a young Frenchwoman for extorting money from him, under threat of exposing immoralities, which he did not deny.

The Bishop of PETERBOROUGH said that he had heard none of the charges against Mr. Marsh until September last; and when he had, there was no remedy. The great difficulty was, not that he was unwilling to proceed, but that now there was no remedy in the power of the Bishop but by a proceeding under the Church Discipline Act; that Act was not applicable to such offences committed longer ago than two years, and this crime had been committed four years ago; therefore his hands were tied. Of course, criminal conduct had taken place, but it was said to have been at Paris; and there was another clause in the Church Discipline Bill which gave power to the Bishop to take notice of crimes committed only in his own diocese; there again he was excluded. He could have no wish to screen the gentleman. If he had selfish objects in view, of course he should have taken advantage of the conduct of this rector; for the living was in his own patronage, and he could have found many excellent persons who would have been thankful for it, even if he had not put a friend into it, to serve his own interests. He was not to blame, but the law of the land. He had no authority to interfere; but he said to the friends of the person, "Do not allow him to take any duty in the diocese till he hears from me again." Mr. Marsh had been prevented from doing the duty in the church, which was performed by his curate.—Monthly Times.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.

On the 12th March, Lord MONTAGLE, moving for certain papers, drew attention to the state of the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth. Before the College was founded, in 1795, Parliament prohibited the education of Roman Catholics in Ireland, both lay and clerical. Foreign countries not inattentive to the advantages thus held out to them, provided ecclesiastical education for nearly five hundred Roman Catholic Irish. But upon the whole, foreign education could not be relied upon as a means of enabling the Roman Catholic priesthood to confer the greatest benefit upon the Irish people. There are about 500 students; 250 supported by Parliament; with an annual vote of £9,000 a year. The utmost sum allowed for the education of a priest for a year is £23 a year, including commons, fuel, and candles; and even that sum is at times divided between two persons. Nothing would more conciliate quiet and peaceably-disposed persons in Ireland than an increase of the grant. There are no fellowships connected with the College, but the best students might be endowed for three years with small sums of £10 to £50, as rewards for desert and literary merit. What he argued for was, that men who are enlightened must make the better priests.

The Duke of WELLINGTON wished that Lord Montagle had delayed his motion, as he had not had time to peruse the voluminous documents on the subject. Undoubtedly, Government must take the whole matter into consideration; but he was not authorised to say that there would be any alteration of the grant.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE remarked, that delay in settling this question had been the besetting sin of all Governments; and he contended that the college should either be destroyed, which few would venture to propose, or rendered thoroughly official.

The motion was agreed to.—Ibid.

IRISH CHURCH.

On the 18th March, Earl FITZWILLIAM presented a petition from Glasgow, praying for redress of Irish grievances, and especially for abolition of the Established Church. In that part of the prayer he could not agree; for in place of abolishing the Church, he would render it more efficient to administer religious comforts to that part of the community to which it was adapted. But the British Legislature had committed a great offence in having proscribed the Roman Catholic priesthood, and having withheld from the great body of the people any recognised means of religious worship. He would not centralise the funds of the Established Church, or make the priesthood stipendiary dependants on the state; but he would preserve the parochial system, and placing the two sects upon an equality, divide the ecclesiastical property between them.

The Duke of WELLINGTON remarked that the petition attacked the very foundation of the Reformation in this country, involving the repeal of laws upon which it rested. He warned the House against assenting to any such doctrines. "There is not an individual in this country, be his religious opinions what they may, be his position what it may, who is not interested in the maintenance of the Reformation. Not only our whole system of religion, but our whole system of religious toleration, in which so many people in this country are interested, depends upon the laws on which the Reformation has been founded." He entreated the House not to infringe the compact entered into with the Irish Parliament.

The Bishop of EXETER thanked Lord Fitzwilliam for eliciting the Duke of Wellington's admirable remarks. He denounced the spoliation advised by Lord Fitzwilliam; and observed, that if the Church were robbed, Lord Fitzwilliam, a noble earl, and a noble marquis near him, must be made to disgorge the enormous proportion of confiscated property which they held in Ireland.—(Loud laughter from Earl Fitzwilliam.)

The petition was laid upon the table.—Ibid.

MISCELLANEA.

Charles Mathew, Esq., brother of the Apostle of Temperance, has received the appointment of Provincial Auditor under the Poor-law Commissioners. The salary of the office is £500 per annum.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.

"The right hon. gentleman (the Home Secretary) spoke of a compact alliance which, he says, has been made with Mr. O'Connell, and wishes me joy of it (Hear Sir, I am perfectly aware of the effect that was produced during the existence of the late government, by the constant reiteration of Mr. O'Connell being the director of the proceedings and the disposer of the patronage of that government, and how much injury was produced by that entirely unfounded slander. (Cheers.) Although I may suffer—although the statement of the right hon. gentleman of a compact alliance between Mr. O'Connell and myself has no foundation—yet, Sir, I will never shrink, if I see Mr. O'Connell or some one who has done less for the country to which he belongs—some one who is in a more humble situation in life than Mr. O'Connell—yet, whatever obloquy it may expose me to, I will never shrink from declaring that which I think, when it is my opinion that person has not had a fair trial.—(Loud cheers.) No obloquy which the right honorable gentleman may cast upon me—no obloquy which the right honorable gentleman's party can cast upon me, will deter me from doing my duty (Cheers)—nor from stating that which is my belief—nor what is my sense of the right honorable gentleman's proceedings with respect to that trial. My belief is, that if the same offence had been committed in this country supposing the Attorney General here had pursued a somewhat similar course to that adopted in Ireland—my opinion, I say, is, that there would have been a different charge from the Judge (Cheers), and a different verdict from the jury. (Long-continued cheering.) That, Sir, is my opinion, and I say that be the persons brought to trial who they may, never will I cease to endeavour to obtain for the people of Ireland the full enjoyment of all those rights and all those privileges of which the people of England are so justly proud. (Loud Cheers.)—(Globe, March 2.)

The following days of the week are set apart for public worship in different nations:—Sunday, or the Lord's Day, by the Christians; Monday by the Grecians; Tuesday by the Persians; Wednesday by the Assyrians; Thursday by the Egyptians; Friday by the Turks; and Saturday by the Jews—(Sydney Morning Chronicle.)

ADVICE TO MARRIED LADIES.—With a wife her husband's faults should be sacred! A woman forgets what is due to herself when she condescends to that refuge of weakness—a female confidente! A woman's bosom should be the tomb of her husband's failings, and his character far more valuable in her estimation than his life. If this be not the case, she pollutes her marriage vow.—Mrs. S. C. Hall.

A great sensation has been created among the Anti-National Education party. It appears that the Premier himself has addressed a letter to the Irish Executive, in which he distinctly declares that no future patronage is to be bestowed on clergymen of the Established Church in Ireland who, not only are not inimical to the system of national education, but who will not undertake to place all the schools in the parishes or dioceses in which they may be promoted under the immediate management of the board. And it is further added, that Sir Robert intimates an intention of appointing English clergymen to the benefices or bishoprics as either may become vacant, should the clergy of Ireland continue contumacious.—In connexion with the foregoing, the report is again revived, that Earl De Grey has expressed his anxiety to retire from the Irish Viceroyalty.—(London Mail.)

On Sunday, St. Patrick's Day, an imposing ceremony was performed at the Roman Catholic chapel in Virginia Street, Rathfiffe Highway; a large number of persons assembling to witness "the investiture of a candidate for the order of the Holy Guild of St. Joseph and St. Mary with the insignia of membership," Mr. O'Connell was the candidate. He arrived in his carriage about half-past three o'clock, and dined with the officiating priests; after which he entered the chapel. He was received by about three hundred and fifty members of the guild; the men dressed in green cloaks, the ladies in green cloaks with white veils. After various religious ceremonies, and an address by Father Moore, Chaplain to the Guild, Mr. O'Connell was invested in a green cloak and cap of Genoa velvet, and a gold cross. Mr. O'Connell was then conducted in procession to the Philanthropic Hall, at Shadwell; where an address was presented to him. In reply, he gave assurance of the fidelity of the Irish people to the Roman Catholic faith, to which, he said, England was fast returning.—Ibid.

A sensation has been produced in Oxford by letters received among the Tractarians from the information that Scott Murray, Esq., of Christ Church, has just conformed in his capital to the Roman faith.—Ibid.

LINES,

SUGGESTED BY THE VISIT OF THE MOST REVEREND ARCHBISHOP POLDING TO THE LUNATIC ASYLUM,
NEW SOUTH WALES, 11TH SEPTEMBER, 1843.

He came!—the prototype of Him whose cross
He bears—"the broken heart to heal;" to soothe
The lunatic, and guide his hopes to Heaven.
Benign in features, dignified in mien,
In manners simple, but elegant; of speech most eloquent,
Winning all hearts to his; persuasion dwelling
On his lips: "Glory to God on high, and on earth Peace and good-will towards men"—his tenets these.

Oh! may the Almighty bless his purpose high!
Fit instrument of power omnipotent,
To lead benighted man to truth eternal;
And to love divine. Regardless he of toil,
Fatigue, hunger, or thirst, or want of rest,
From day to year, doth journey onward, messenger
Of peace, the tidings of salvation to proclaim;
Erecting temples to the living God amidst
This wilderness, and in its "thousand isles."
See where those holy Matrons * on him wait
To do his biddings; sacrificing ease,
And spurning all the luxuries of life
To tend the sick—the penitent to cheer—
Reclaim the wicked—and the good confirm
In every virtuous purpose. Ah! what
Are all the pleasures of a "fashionable life"
In contrast with th' angelic joys of charity
And Christian love? See how they stand around
Yon bed of death, though pestilence await them
On the threshold of that lowly dwelling Of the poor! Still they onward "press into the prize
Of their high calling," secure in HIM who Shields them from the noisome air. What! although
"A thousand fall beside them, nigh unto them
It shall not come," Oh! blessed of your sex,
"And favoured amongst women!" May your pious zeal
Reap its reward celestial; for earth has nothing
Worthy of ye but the good man's benison.
Pursue your works of charity and love
Until the Saints in Heaven claim you as theirs,
And crown you, with your Prelate, unto everlasting joys!

G.

—(Australasian Chronicle.)

* The Sisters of Charity.

THE
BENGAL
CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

No. 22.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JUNE 1, 1844.

[VOL. VI.

THE PRINCIPLES REGARDING CHURCH GOVERNMENT, HELD BY CONGREGATIONALISTS, OR INDEPENDENTS. COMPILED BY JAMES HILL, Union Chapel, Calcutta, 1832.

When we last directed attention to the deadly attack on the Church of England, by Mr. Hill we were unable to make even a passing allusion to the copious Appendix which he has affixed to his compilation, and which is, beyond doubt, the most interesting portion of the volume.

The appendix, we may say, entirely consists of extracts from the writings of Church of England Clergymen, which certainly bear strong testimony against the purity and orthodoxy of that Church, and ought to induce every Member of that communion to consider well the origin, birth, and date of the Anglican Church as by Law established. Every Anglican Protestant ought to ask himself, what has he gained by leaving the Catholic Church of all ages and nations, if the Church of England be now as corrupt and erroneous as she is represented by Protestants themselves, and some of them her own ministers, Evangelical and Puseyite? Let him ask himself, when will there be an end to reformation of Creeds and Systems in the Church, which should have but one faith, as it has but one Lord, the Father of all, and but one Baptism; and while he sees that one Faith in the Catholic Church alone, and a thousand opposite and contradictory Systems of belief struggling for the mastery in every Sect separated from her; let him ask himself, why he is not a Catholic, and why he should prefer to be tossed to and fro by every wind of doctrine among the Dissenters, if he should join them, rather than return to the arc of peace, like the clean bird, to give and receive consolation. If any Catholic writer were to accuse the Church of England as she is accused in the appendix now before us, by the Rev. Robert Cox, Rev.

John Riland, Rev. John Acaster, and Rev. D. Nihill, all clergymen of that communion, the Protestants of Calcutta would say, that the charges proceeded from Sectarian bile, or an unscrupulous disposition to blacken the fair name of a rival Faith, or some other unworthy cause or motive; but when Clergymen of their own faith are the accusers, how can they put aside their testimony, and how can they relieve themselves from the obligation to reflect and decide consistently. It should be remembered, too, that these Anglican Clergymen are not Puseyites, but what are called Evangelicals, and are favorites with the Dissenters,

The Thirty-nine Articles.

Mr. Riland, after eulogising the confession of the Church of Scotland, and declaring it to be greatly superior to the formulary of the Church of England, observes,—“That the formulary of the latter has blemishes which sadly mar its beauty; and in some instances have proved extremely embarrassing to the persons who have most favourably interpreted apparent, if not indisputable, contradictions. The Church would gain abundantly by the Articles being recast in a more accurate mould.” He then proceeds to a review of the Articles seriatim: the first should be “substituted” by something else; the second might be “reconstructed;” the third is a “redundancy, an excrescence, a deformity without the shadow of apology for its introduction: it is, in fact, a kind of ecclesiastical anachronism.” The fifth is “included in the Athanasian creed;” the sixth ought to have been the first; the eighth is “quite superfluous as it now stands;” the nineteenth “partakes of the confusion and inconsistency which, in the regions of controversy, would appear to be inseparably connected with the subject it professes to define, and cannot be reconciled, either with the twenty-sixth or with the definition in the Homily.” “Here, then, we have a choice of difficulties; either to harmonize discords, or to obey an uncertain sound." The twentieth "bears a near resemblance to what is called the vicious circle of the Latin Church." The twenty-second "is a singular example of laxity and of uselessness, and is not merely objectionable from its unaccountable slovenliness of structure, but, from its laxity of doctrine." Whether the several articles on the two Sacraments are perfectly consistent with the Sacramental offices and rubrics, is a discussion too extensive for our immediate purpose. They certainly have afforded ample occasion for debate among Churchmen." The thirty-sixth article "is entirely superfluous." The next "cannot well be designated an article of religion, and belongs rather to acts of Parliament." The thirty-eighth illustrates the evil of singling out a transient and wide error, as matter of grave *an*madversion, when many permanent, and pernicious, and popular delusions are passed over."—(p. 187 to 204.)

The Homilies, in connexion with the Articles.

They are sanctioned by the articles as containing good and wholesome doctrine. "Yet they are at variance with the principles of the British constitution; and if they do not unchurch our own Protestant hierarchy, by declaring that the channel through which our orders were conveyed was no Church at all, it is difficult to say what words mean, and in cases of doubt, by what dictionary they are to be interpreted."

"The question is, do the clergy give their full assent and consent to the Homilies? And if not, what do they give? It is too serious an inquiry to be resolved by a loose and equivocal reply."—(p. 206—6.)

State Services.

"The services for the fifth of November, the thirtieth of January, and twenty-ninth of May, furnish revolting examples, and such as need not be particularized. They are an illegitimate scion of the liturgy, and have long since lapsed into desuetude; or, if used, have been read by all men of reflection, with feelings of disgust, grief, and shame."

General Summary and Review of the Prayer Book.

"What do we gain by the party-spirit of the preface to the liturgy; the ill-selection of proper lessons, epistles, and gospels; the retention of legendary names and allusions in the Calendar; the lection of the Apocalypse, and the omission of the Apocalypse; the mention of feasts and fasts, never observed; the repetition of the Paternoster, Kyrie Elieeson, and Gloria Patri; the wearisome length of the services; the redundancy and re-assumption in the state prayers; the unsatisfactoriness of the three creeds; the disputable character of the baptismal and the burial offices; the incompleteness and dubious construction of the catechism, and of the order of confirmation; the inapplicable nature, and absolution, of the visitation of the sick, the imperfection of the communion service; the discordance between the Prayer Book and Bible translation of the Psalms, the contumelious and offensive language of the state services; added to all these sources of weakness, similar causes of inefficiency in the Articles and Homilies?"—(p. 209.)

On Subscription to the Articles.

"This reflection awakens the painful remembrance, that never have the arts of evasion, sophistry, palliation, and management, been more notoriously developed, than in attempts to explain away the strictness of subscription to the Liturgy, Articles, and Homilies."—(p. 266.)

The latitudenarianism of the Clergy.

"Which of the Bishops, or which of the examining Chaplains, conducts his examination according to the directions here contained (in the Canon); I do most solemnly declare that I was never asked one single question about the Thirty-nine Articles. I have questioned others at different times and from different dioceses, and they have distinctly stated the same, excepting in one or two instances some ensnaring questions about the 17th Article." (Acaster p. 43.)

Secondly. Their incompetency. "With regard to learning, a very slender portion of divinity, engrafted on what may be termed a liberal education, will suffice for admission into holy orders. Indeed the modicum of Theology is so slight, that a very short interval after a young gentleman has graduated at the University, is found sufficient for its attainment. The great majority of English clergymen do, in reality, never submit to so much literary labour as is necessary to the composition of their own sermons; and if another test were wanting to prove the small degree of learning required, it might be found in the notorious fact, that where persons are somewhat below par in point of intellect or exertion, it is frequently considered by their parents a reason for assigning them to the Church." (Nihill, p. 33.)

"Generally, I may say almost universally, the special gifts and ability of the candidate to be a preacher is never once inquired into, but is entirely taken upon trust." (Acaster, p. 46.)

Thirdly. Their worldly-mindedness. "The clergy in general are too griping and covetous, many of them devote tenfold more time to temporal than to spiritual concerns; their love of money begets an indifference to their religious duties. Will such a flimsy pretence blind the people to the covetousness and wickedness of those who seize and grasp two or three of the best and richest preferments which the Church affords?" (Lord Mount Cashel.)

Fourthly. Their immorality. "In many instances the clergy of the established Church lead improper, immoral, and dissolute lives; so that, besides pocketing the money of the people, they want by their own bad example to make them worse than they were before." (Lord Mount Cashel.)

"The Bishops, I really think, would be more in character, if they were employed in rebuking and chastising some of their idle, drunken and worthless clergy, than in restraining the zealous efforts of the well-disposed and active to promote the real benefit of their people's souls." (Acaster, p. 87.)

10. The present state of the Church as to discipline.

First. It has not the power to exercise it.

"Much of the power supposed to be invested in our spiritual rulers, being either suspended or restrained by bad laws enacted in bad times, and I fear also for bad ends, I conceive it to be very difficult to accomplish, in every instance, either their own intentions for the general good of the Church, or the purposes which her founders originally designed." (Acaster, p. 30.)

Secondly. The state of her discipline as it respects the Clergy.

"There has been in every age, a great and fearful laxity in this respect. Had not this been the case, the Church would never have groined under such a swarm of inefficient and worthless creatures, as Hooker quaintly observes; and who, besides endangering the souls of millions, have brought the priestly office into much contempt, and tended, more than anything else, to alienate the minds of men from the ecclesiastical establishment of the land." (Acaster, p. 31.)

Observe the state of discipline among the Members of the Church.

"It is impossible to vindicate our Church, from the charge of unreprieved scandal in the lives of many of the clergy: the consequences to the religious interests of the people are most appalling. Multitudes are left to perish in dead formality, multitudes in neglected profligacy, and unless a great amendment be speedily enforced, we may justly anticipate some angry visitation of Providence." (Nihill, p. 39.)

"The body of the people present a picture of unrestrained demoralization. Every man doeth what is right in his own eyes. Fornication, adultery, perjury, theft, blasphemy, sabbath-breaking, and other offences, however atrocious in the sight of God, however scandalous to the Church, may, so far as her discipline is concerned, be committed with perfect impunity. If you desire any practical exhibition of the communion of saints, you must seek it elsewhere than in the congregations of the Establishment. I know not how others may feel this neglect of discipline, but I confess, I never read the warnings addressed to the seven Churches of Asia by 'Him who hath the two-edged sword,' without trembling for our own candlestick." (Nihill, p. 58--60.)

Thirdly. Difference of religious opinions among the Clergy, and the errors that are held by them.

"To this, (the neglect of a proper examination of the candidates for the ministry,) more than to any other thing must be ascribed that great difference of opinion which exists among her ministers, on some of the most important doctrines of religion, dangerous to the souls of men, and inimical to the peace and stability of the Church." (Acaster, p. 44.)

"I am aware that there are, at this present moment, two parties within the Church, who maintain and inculcate doctrines, on many important and essential points, the very opposite to each other." (Acaster, p. 61.)*

* No one can for a moment doubt that the Church of England comprehends within her pale, persons holding the widest possible variety of religious opinions; Socinians, Arians, Armenians (from Patagianism to the modified Armenism of Tillotson), Baxterians, Calvinists of all grades, Moderns, Milenarians, believers in the unconsciousness of the soul from death till the resurrection, followers of Mr. Irving on the subject of the peccability of Christ's human nature, &c. &c.—Hill.

The progress of Dissent and fall of the Church of England.

"The political danger arising from the character of Parliament would be less, if the country at large were pervaded by a strong feeling of attachment to the national communion. But it is a lamentable fact, that the affection of the people for the establishment has gradually declined, and is at present deplorably lukewarm." (Nihill, p. 4.)

"The mass of the population are attached rather by their habits than by their convictions to the national communion, and he must be a stranger in England who does not perceive that those habits are daily losing ground." (Nihill, p. 9.)

"We see zeal for religion, unconnected with the national establishment, and see jealousy for the establishment too often unconnected with religion." (Nihill, 103.) "Full half the population of the country, it is calculated, have already left the Church, and joined the ranks of dissent. Of the principles, conduct, and character of more than half the remainder, it is not required to give an opinion; but this I will say, that should they dissent in the same proportion as the rest have done within the last thirty years, it requires no superior foresight to predict, without pretending to a prophet, that thirty years from hence the religious establishment of the country will be totally forsaken, if not completely overthrown." (Acaster, p. 21.)

"I fear the fact is beyond dispute, that amongst the intelligent of the lower and middle classes, the cause of dissent is rapidly advancing." (Nihill, p. 23.)

"On all sides, the church is exposed to contempt, reproach, and danger. She has lost the respect, esteem, and confidence of millions who, had things been otherwise, would never have left her pale. The consequence is, she is so rapidly on the decline, that without a speedy, I had almost said an unlooked for change for the better, she will certainly fall." (Acaster, p. 138.)

The churches of Rome and of England.

"I do not enter into the scandalous practices of non-residence and pluralities, which are sheltered by so many volumes of law among us; whereas the Church of Rome, whence we had these and many other abuses, has freed herself from this, under which we still labour to our great and just reproach: this is so shameful a profanation of holy things, that it ought to be treated with detestation and horror. How long, how long, shall this be the public disgrace of our Church, which, for aught I know, is the only Church in the world that tolerates it." (Bishop Burnet.)

THE BENGAL HURKARU.

Our cotemporary of the Hurkaru has deemed it necessary to read us a lesson for our having published "in goodly array" the reports of the misconduct of the Protestant Clergy. In order to show that he is unbiassed and not at all actuated by any prejudice of his own, he should have also looked on the other side to view the "goodly array" of falsehoods against the Catholics so perseveringly disseminated by one or two of his cotemporaries in this country ; and to which we have been sorry to observe the Hurkaru has himself of late given an occasional assistance in their propagation. When the story about "Maria Monk," the falsehood of which the Calcutta and Eastern Star so generously exposed, was prominently brought forward, and published, too, in the shape of a pamphlet for its better circulation,—did the Hurkaru raise his voice against the publication?—Oh no—our cotemporary did not at all think it advisable to cry down the attempt to blacken Catholicism. When lately there was a question about the burial of a child in which a member of the Catholic Clergy was accused of something tantamount to a want of Christian charity, the Hurkaru in his zeal introduced the subject editorially, but when the thing was refuted, our cotemporary did not think it advisable to say aught in contradiction of his false version. He may say that it was enough that he allowed the refutation to appear, but yet we ask, was he justified in giving an editorial prominence to the subject without being assured of its truth?—He whose temper is soured at the bare mention of the ill-doings of the Protestant Clergy, should be himself careful how he propagates what may eventually be proved to be not true in regard to the Catholic Clergy.—Why does not the Hurkaru condemn the Christian Advocate for his continual calumny against the Catholics? The reason is obvious. When lately a Mr. Smythe published a something said to be a Poem, interspersed with copious plagiarisms from Byron and Moore, did the Hurkaru condemn the work for the base ideas and revolting slanders it contained against Catholic Institutions?—And we put it to the conscience of our cotemporary to say whether, if a similar book were published against any Protestant Institution, he would not be the first to cry it down as a gross scandal.—In all that has appeared in our last issue about the depravity of the Protestant Clergy, there has been nothing based upon mere imagination or known to be the offspring of morbid or fanatical prejudices, but every item has been taken from bigoted Protestant journals, the public records of Protestant Courts of Justice, and the record of the British Parliament.

THE FEAST OF PENTECOST.

Last Sunday the Feast of Pentecost was celebrated with great solemnity in all the Catholic Churches under the jurisdiction of the Archbishop in this city.

At the Cathedral, His Grace Dr. Carew, at the conclusion of a most edifying Sermon made a strong appeal on behalf of a Mission which was about to be established among the Natives who had sent representatives to His Grace to come and help them and among whom the work of conversion had already begun.

At the Church of the Sacred Heart the Very Revd. Dr. Kennedy delivered a suitable discourse and High Mass was celebrated by the Vicar, the Revd. M. Veralli.

At St. Thomas' Church High Mass was performed by the Revd. Mr. Johnson, assisted by the Revd. Messrs. Cuvelier and Ruby. The Mass sung was Mozart's No. XII. and the Choir was brilliant and effective, having had the assistance of the Italian Professors, recently arrived, joined by the well known talents of several Amateurs and of Messrs. Valadares, Castello and Pereira.

There were a great number of communicants in each of the Churches.

• PROGRESS OF PUSEYISM.

The Hurkaru of last Tuesday, in noticing the accounts from England of the progress of Puseyism brought by the last mail, states some interesting facts, which we cannot do better than extract for the edification of our readers:—

Not influenced by the example of several parishes to which we formerly referred—Ilford, Ware, Shoreditch and Fulmouth—where the people have forsaken the Parish Church in disgust at the new ceremonies that have been introduced, the Ministers of the Church, in other places, have proceeded to startle many more congregations. Thus in Bognor, they appear to have nearly emptied the Parish Church, by their extravagancies. * * * * We find that in one of the Puseyite newspapers, (and they are many, headed by the Times and Morning Post) there is a list given of Churches in London, in which there is now daily service. A correspondent writing to that paper on the subject says, "In the list of Churches where the daily service is offered, you have omitted Christ Church, Broadway, Westminster. It may be acceptable to your readers to know that the zealous Priest, who serves the altar in that most beautiful Church, recites the matins and vesper services at the canonical hours of nine and six." And in a letter of an eminent clergyman, the Revd. W. Caius Wilson, there is an account of a visit he paid to two chapels in London. He says in speaking of the first, "I was there nearly half an hour before the time. I could not help being struck with the prominent and imposing aspect of the communion table. Its elevation, the large cross in basso relievo, the gorgeous display of candlesticks, and embossed books, and sacramental service. * * * The curate, Mr. Richards, came in early, and after staying a few minutes in the vestry, went into a pew in front of the communion table. He was engaged in private prayer, on his knees, for ten or fifteen minutes, during which, he more than once lifted up his head from his hands, and looked earnestly for a minute or two towards the table, and then renewed his devotions. I saw others do the same. Of course I cannot positively say what was the fact, but certainly the impression was fully made on my mind, that the cross was gazed upon as a help to devotion. I know, alas! too well how the private use of the crucifix is increasing among the Tractarians." In the second chapel he saw things which bore "a distressing Popish aspect."

The spirit of all this is pretty evident from an address to the Society for promoting Christian Knowledge, signed by the Dean of Litchfield, who is a brother of Lord Morpeth, but apparently a different sort of man, and by several other clergymen of influence, in which address the Society is called upon to publish the works of the old divines, which they now issue in an unmutilated form—that is, with all the passages which prudence had induced wiser men to expunge; and an index to the state of feeling which is thus displayed, may also be readily gathered from a letter of the Dean of Hereford to the Revd. John Venn. It appears that a lady of ancient family in the neighbourhood of Hereford had been converted to Romanism, and that considerable excitement was the consequence. Mr. Venn, who is one of the clergymen of the place, then challenged the Roman Catholic priest to a public discussion. The Dean of Hereford, though he does not appear to have had any jurisdiction over Mr. Venn, could not let this pass; and, therefore, he addressed a letter to Mr. Venn remonstrating with him on unseemly altercations with the "Sister Church," and telling him that he was not sufficiently prepared for such a controversy by previous acquaintance with the principles of his own Church—Mr. Venn in fact not being a Puseyite.

THE BENGAL MISSION.

From a letter from Noakolly we learn that the Revd. Mr. Zubibarne, at a place called Mordepore, heard the confession of three women who had not seen a priest for forty years. In the same place that truly apostolic Priest baptized two adults, and at Secbpore eight Mussulmen. In February and March last, he baptized twenty-four Protestant Mussulmen and Heathens in Backergunge. At Noakolly the Reverend Gentleman has bought land for the erection of a Priest's house, a Church and a School.

At Calcutta, in the last week, a Protestant Lady and her child were received into the Catholic Church.—The Husband assisted at the solemn ceremony, and gave hopes that he would soon follow the good example of his wife.

A very promising youth, not baptized as yet, belonging to one of the villages in which the Rev. Mr. Veralli lately baptized twenty-three persons, has entered St. Joseph's Orphanage, in order to be prepared for baptism.

A respectable Master and Mistress, after having been duly prepared for the religious and literary duties of their Office at the Catholic Schools at Serampore and Chander-nagore, are about to proceed to Backergunge, where, at the expense of R. J. Loughman, Esq., Civil Judge of the station, Male and Female schools are to be established by them.

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

We are informed on good authority, His Holiness, on the Petition of His Grace, Dr. Carew, has graciously conceded to St. Thomas' Church, Chowringhee, all the Indulgences usually established in Churches erected by the Society of Jesus; and further, His Holiness has authorised the Vicar Apostolic to establish in the same church all the pious Sodalties usually established in churches of the Society of Jesus, and to confer on them all the spiritual graces and privileges which such Sodalties ordinarily enjoy.

CONFIRMATION.

The Sacrament of Confirmation is to be administered by His Grace the Archbishop in the following Churches:

At the Cathedral on Sunday, the 9th proximo.

At the Church of the Sacred Heart, Durruntollah, on Sunday, the 16th proximo.

At St. Thomas' Church on Sunday, the 23d proximo.

AGRA MISSION.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—It affords me great pleasure to acquaint you of the establishment of the Confraternity of the Blessed Rosary amongst us. The following is a brief outline of the institution, and the obligations it imposes.

Every fifteen individuals form a separate Rosette, each of whom has daily to pray a single mystery which is decided by drawing lots on the first occasion and is changed monthly by rotation. Each member receives a picture representing the subject of the meditation of the mystery assigned to him, which is exchanged for another at a monthly meeting of all the members, who on that occasion approach the Sacraments of Penance and the Holy Eucharist, and assist at the performance of a grand mass.

Three companies or Rosettes have already been formed, and out of a small congregation of about a hundred individuals, 48 monthly communicants have been thus secured—you may from hence perceive the great benefit that has been conferred upon the Catholics of Agra, and the good that will arise from the religious emulation that has been thus created.

And all this is to be attributed to the unceasing efforts of the Right Rev. Dr. Carli, the worthy Coadjutor of our venerated and absent Prelate. Dr. Carli's affable manners and his uniform kindness towards every member of his flock, has already secured to him their best wishes and sincere attachment, and I only discharge a deep debt of gratitude by taking this opportunity of bearing testimony to his worth, his piety, and his zeal for the cause of religion.

The first Rosette is formed chiefly of Native Christians—of the second, the Rev. Cuffarel is the President, and Mr. I. J. Corcoran, an exemplary and truly pious Catholic, is the Secretary and Treasurer—of the next, Dr. Carli is himself the President, and Mr. J. P. Adels, a convert to our holy faith, whose conduct since his abjuration has amply proved the sincerity of his motives, is the Secretary and Treasurer.

Your's Obediently,
J.

Agra, May 15th, 1844.

Original Poetry,

LAND OF MY BIRTH.

Land of my birth! beneath a foreign sky,
I mourn, an exile, from my home and thee,
And wish that I had wings of wind to fly,
Where all is love, and all are dear to me.

Wearied by sorrow, in life's early prime,
I wish to be in mine own Isle at rest;
I long to hear again the soothing chime,
Which lulls to sleep the over-laden breast.

Fatigued I wander in a foreign land,
Chilled is my heart by disappointment's blast,
But still it turns to my own green Isle,
Where in 'early youth my lot was cast.

Sadly I think of my own native shore,
For I hear its dear language despised,
And I tremble with fear I shall never view more,
The home I so fondly prized.

But I hope that my sorrowful heart will repose,
Where the bones of my ancestors sleep;
And I hope that some loved hand my eyelids will close,
And for me Erin's children may weep.

Land of my birth! O'Connell's green Isle,
I perhaps may return to you yet;
But a foe and a stranger's cold cruel smile,
Shall not induce me to forget.

A POOR EXILE.

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

J. St. Pourcain, Esq. through Rev. Mr. Boulogne, a thanksgiving offering after recovery from sickness,	44
W. G. through Mrs. Doctor McClelland, ..	10
Mrs. Sweetman, Longtown House, Ireland, through the Archbishop,	100
Sergt. Hamilton,	10

FUND FOR THE CONVERSION OF THE NATIVES.

P. Bonnaud, Esq. thro' Jas. Rostan, Jr. ..	100
James Rostan,	20
Jas. Rostan, Jr.	16
W. B. Rostan,	10
N. C. Biale,	10
From a friend thro' Ms. Gray,	100
St. John's College Chapel,	20

FESTIVALS.

Saturday, June 1,—Fast, Quatuor Tense, Of the Oct. sem.
Sunday, 2,—S. S. Trinity d. 1 cl. com. 1st Sunday p. Pent. and S. S. M. M.
Monday, 3,—S. Gregory VII. P. C. d. (25 ult.)
Tuesday, 4,—S. Francis, Carac c. d.
Wednesday, 5,—S. Philip Neri, c. d. (26th ult.)
Thursday, 6,—Corpus Christi, d. 1 cl. c. oct.
Friday, 7,—Within Oct. sem.
Saturday, 8,—do. do.
Sunday, 9,—2nd P. Pent. Sunday within Oct. sem. com. S. M. M.
Monday, 10,—Within Oct. sem.
Tuesday, 11,—Barnabas Ap. d. Maj. com. &c.
Wednesday, 12,—S. S. John and Facundo C. d. com. Oct. & S. S.
Thursday, 13,—Octave of Corpus Christi d.
Friday, 14,—Sacred Heart of Jesus, d. Maj.
Saturday, 15,—S. Augustine Ap. of England, d. (26th ult.) E. S. com. &c.
Sunday, 16,—3rd p. Pent, S. John F. Regis, C. d. com. Dom.
Monday, 17,—S. Norbert E. C. d. (6th Inst.)
Tuesday, 18,—S. Antony of Padua, C. d. (13th Inst.) com. S. S.
Wednesday, 19,—S. Juliana Falconieri V, d. com. S. S.
Thursday, 20,—S. Basil M. E. C. D. d. (14th Inst.) com. S.
Friday, 21,—Aloysius Gouz. C. d.
Saturday, 22,—S. S. Neri and Achilleus M. M. Sem. (12 ult.) com. vigil. & S. S.
Sunday, 23,—IV. P. Pent. of it, sem.
Monday, 24,—S. John Bapt. d. et. C. Oct.
Tuesday, 25,—S. Guilielmus Ab. d. com. Oct.
Wednesday, 26,—S. S. John & Paul M. M. d. com. Oct.
Thursday, 27,—S. Mary Magdalene of Pazzi V. sem. com. Oct. (27th ult.)
Friday, 28,—S. Leo. P. C. sem. com. Oct. & vigil
Saturday, 29,—S. S. Peter and Paul, App. d. 1 cl. C. Oct.
Sunday, 30,—V. P. Pent, com. S. Paul, Ap com. Dom. & Oct. S. John.

THE POPE AND THE SULTAN.*

"An Hour of Equity is worth Seventy Years of Prayer."—KORAN.

We have seen that the connexion of the Church with the State, as existing in Russia, tended to strengthen the hands of that Government for aggressive purposes, while that connexion as existing at Constantinople and Rome, tended not only to strengthen the hands of the Government for defensive purposes, but also constrained them in some measure, to set their faces against injustice, by whomever practised, and against whomever attempted. We have asserted it to be the fact, that Russia alone pursued plans of convulsion, (for the aggressions of France against Africa, of England in Asia, of Prussia in Germany, and of Austria in Italy, and on the neighbouring provinces of Turkey, are parts of Russia's design, and are the means to its execution,) and that among the Potentates of Europe, the Pope and the Sultan had stood aloof, and erect, and resisting where all others kneeled and served—alone defied the power of the Russian Government, or denounced its crimes.

Let us now glance at past and contemporary events, to see if this statement is borne out.

Poland is as yet the greatest and noblest of the slaughtered victims of Russia. Next in the course of events and of importance, is Serbia. In destroying Poland, Russia met with no resistance from her compeers, and received the direct co-operation of Austria and Prussia, and the assistance of England. In destroying Serbia, Russia had to encounter no resistance from her compeers, but has had the active co-operation successively of Austria and England. The first of these States has, however, found protection in the Pope; the second did find a patron in the Sultan. The Pope has been considered the enemy of Liberalism, and the Sultan the enemy of Christianity. The interest that has been excited in favour of Poland has been chiefly through Liberalism. The interest sought hitherto to be excited in favour of Serbia, through Christianity. It is the Mussulman power that protects the Christian state of Serbia; it is the Pope that laments over Republican Poland! In the defence of a Christian province, the Pope has singly dared the vengeance of Russia, backed by the subserviency of Europe. In the cause of Poland, the existence of which Europe had guaranteed and betrayed, the Pope alone amongst Sovereigns, has stood forward to wither with his denunciation, its mighty and relentless destroyer.

But if Poland in her misfortune has had none other to countenance and to pity, it is her own fault. In the wreck of her fortunes, she mistook her way—she turned her Pilgrim-step westward to heartless Europe, instead of eastward to the generous hospitality that was prepared to succour, if it could not defend. In 1831 the Turks exclaimed:—"The Poles have mistaken their way now, as they mistook their time before. They ought to have risen during our war, instead of using their swords against us. They ought to have turned to us their faces and, not their backs when they were beaten."*

Here there is substantiated the identity of the interests and character, which we have signalled between those two systems, standing apparently so opposed to each other.

But the interest of Turkey in Poland is not confined to these times. In the course of long negotiations, wars, and adjustments, especially from the year 1768, down to the final surrender of Poland, it was not only Russia's partners, (Prussia and Austria,) that were engaged in this murder of a Nation; but also Sweden, Denmark, France, England and Spain. In various degrees and for various objects, they were all parties to, and instruments in, the effecting of the destruction of Poland, and the concurrent destruction by Russia, of the independence of the Cossacks and Tartars, and has occupation of the Crimea. Several of the states intervened, not indeed, for the purpose of assisting Russia, but, on the contrary, of resisting her, but drawn once into this field of diplomatic entanglement, the result was, as it ever has been, when Russia has had to do with Europeans. In so far as Turkey was the object of dismemberment in these negotiations, the Sultan was no party, and the only other Sovereign of Europe not a party to them was the Pope. The only Sovereign that protested against the partition of Poland was Selim III.

At a time when the desire of change has taken possession of the mind, and has become the rule of the other Governments, and the cabinets of Europe, (Russia excepted,) in both those states there has endured respect for Tradition. In either of those cabinets, the dogma which rules every other cabinet (Russia excepted) "EXPEDIENCY," would justify no act, and explain no measure. The Roman Cardinal in dealing with a matter of worldly policy, will adjust his sentences in such a manner as to connect the decision, for or against, with the commands or the interests of Religion, and the member of the Divan, will employ a similar mode of speech, for the like purpose; and the words "it is just," or "it is unjust," will be sufficient exposition of the grounds of a measure of state policy.†

In both those Governments there are habits of official routine,—a professor of a University or a writer of a journal, or leader of a faction, does not come to hold the office of Secretary of State, or even a subordinate office in one of the Chancelleries, but would be considered a dangerous and obnoxious person. There is placed over each of these Governments a chief, who is master; that chief can be swayed by no contentious motives of aspiring men, or by no party objects of disputing factions. As Sovereign, he is interested in the honor and well-

* What was the conduct of the infatuated Poles?—to form a Bandit Legion against Algiers! and these men, who have no thought of justice, dare to speak of freedom!

† "Not in the Mahomedan only, but in all the Asiatic system, Law has always been held to be a part of Religion."

Thompson's translation of 'The Akhlak-I-Nasiri, p 121, note.

* See Portfolio, Vol. I.

being of the state, and as possessing the power and attributes of a Sovereign, he commands the officers of state. Secretaries of State appointed by factious means do not command the rightful and acknowledged master.

Further, in those two states, and this is the first consideration, intercourse between nation and nation is considered as a solemn, legal, religious act. The Vatican has not forgotten the tremendous power belonging to diplomacy. Though it no longer employs them, it preserves the Tradition of their importance, and now becoming assailed, it may re-apply to them its re-awakened energies. Hitherto, however, it has been cut off from communion in this worst source of national corruption, which for a century has been gradually rising over every emience of Europe, and smothering it in mire. The Turkish Government has likewise kept aloof from this contamination. It has had no permanent diplomatic body, it recognises no representative character in diplomatic agents, though it treats them honourably as the chiefs of communities of guests established on its soil; and though gradually falling into the practices of Europe, it is but recently that ambassadors have been accredited to foreign courts.* Turkey has, moreover, been taught a holy abhorrence of diplomatic conclaves and protocols.†

The Pope may in the same way be said to be without diplomatic agents, nuncios at the courts where they reside, being, to a certain degree, excluded from all care in the mere gossip which is the diplomacy of the states of Europe, (Russia excepted). In England the Pope has no representative, nor is there a British Mission to his Court.‡ The Emperor of Russia has, indeed, an envoy at Rome, but he will not suffer an envoy of the Pope at St. Petersburg.§

We find then this difference of character in the Governments of Constantinople and of Rome, with the rest of Europe,—they look to Religion in their public acts, and they have held back from the pollution of diplomatic intercourse, consequently, they have not been drawn into co-operation with Russia, which alone suffices to take from any state its strength and honesty, respect for others rights as its own.||

* The object of their appointment—for originally they were only to England and to France—was to show that Turkey was not under the dependence of Russia as Europe supposed. But there was none in Europe who could read this act.

† A Turkish ambassador in London, in 1837, when the intelligence of the revolt in Canada came home, being asked one day what he was musing upon, replied, "I am thinking how London will rise the morning it is protocolized."

‡ The late administration of England sought the consent of the Pope to the establishment of a political resident at the Court of Rome, but the Pope made it a condition that no Roman Catholic should be sent in that capacity, the then ministers for foreign affairs no longer pressed the point!

§ In order that the Pope may not be possessed of official information of the acts of the Russian Government against Catholics.

|| It is curious in tracing during the last fifty years, the alliances of Russia with England and France in the East, to observe the instantaneous rising into importance of the Nation which was in opposition to them, and the sinking into degradation the one which was in alliance with her.

Now let us consider what relationship exists between the policy of England, and the stand made by the Pope conjointly with the Sultan. First, we have to ascertain what England is; but there appears to be two Englands,—the England represented in our immutable duties and interests, the England represented in our recent acts, and than these two images, nothing can be more dissimilar and contradictory. England in her actual state and Government, is exactly the reverse of all that which we have described in the Governments of Rome and Constantinople.—No sense of Religion controlling national acts; no abhorrence of association with acts such as those of Russia; no shame at co-operation with our own enemy; no sense of illegality in diplomatic dabbings; no stability of men or system, no study to qualify for diplomatic office; no Sovereign to require accounts from servants whom he can dismiss and punish; no religious Tribunal whose power controls, or whose sanction is requisite; no public disinclination to any act that a Government may perform, or attention to any change in its policy which it may adopt. An extra-constitutional authority, not the Sovereign, and not the Parliament, but an accidental club, and a changeable one, wields the whole power, amenable to no Tribunal, controllable by no Law. No man can obtain from them knowledge of their intention, though their intentions constitute the acts of England. No man can call them to account for what they do, though the power of England is given to do it. No man can punish them for any crime, though they profess to exist as a cabinet by Law, to use constituted and constitutional instruments for lawful purposes. This is England, and, yet surely it cannot be England! This is what England does, but it is the reverse of what she ought to do. Nevertheless, there has been a constant assent given sometimes formally, sometimes informally, sometimes in a positive declaration, sometimes inferentially, that England's true interest and real object is to resist Russia, and that the principal means for doing so lies in maintaining the independence of the Ottoman Empire; and the ground upon which the important external acts of England have been suffered or sanctioned, has been this. To take a recent example, the treaty of the 15th July, 1840, which effected a rupture with France, and incurred for England the risk of a European war, was accepted by this nation on this very ground of maintaining the Ottoman Empire. The gravest of dangers that Europe could run, and the most important of friendships and alliances that England could possess, were the one willingly incurred, and the other sternly ruptured, upon the sole ground that this was necessary to maintain the Ottoman Empire.*

The necessity of maintaining an Empire only

* However falsely this ground was put forward, it was honestly accepted by the nation. The treaty is in words, for the maintenance of the integrity, and the independence of the Ottoman Empire; but it is like the treaty effected for Poland in 1793, dictated by Russia herself for its destruction. This alters nothing in the recognition of England to herself, that her first of objects for which everything should be sacrificed, is the maintenance of the integrity of the Ottoman Empire.

depends upon the danger to which it is subjected, and if that necessity is great, it is because that danger is menacing. The only danger to the Ottoman Empire is from Russia, and the only injury which the fall of the Ottoman Empire could in any way occasion to England, would be from the accession of power which Russia would thereby derive. To support Turkey, therefore, means to resist Russia.

But it is this same Russia that tramples upon Poland; it is Russia that breaks down Serbia, a portion of the Ottoman Empire. The protestations, therefore, of the Pope, and the endeavours of the Sultan are directed to support those very interests, and to advance those very ends which even England avows to herself as the very basis of her policy. To the strangeness of the spectacle presented by the union of the Pope and the Sultan, further strangeness is added in this, that it is the avowed interest of England, though abandoned by her, that they have undertaken to protect. What then can be more opposed than these two Englands; the one the duty of the State,—the other, the guilt of its Ministers?

The Pope and the Sultan are allies of that first England,—and that second England, alas! the living one, is therefore their enemy.

And this is not the first occasion in which the Pope and the Sultan have found themselves upon the same line, acting in opposition to all the cabinets of the continent, and in favour of England.

When Napoleon conceived the design of destroying England by extinguishing her trade, and crippling her resources, so that she should be unable to cope with him in arms, he brought upon this land the severest trial to which it ever has been subjugated, and a peril from which we barely escaped. He was enabled to do so by obtaining the concurrence of the Governments of Europe, to measures respecting our trade. But those measures so adopted were in each case a violation of internal and municipal Laws. In these states, the sense of integrity, and respect for Law and for themselves, were too feeble and evanescent, either in the nation or in its Government, to comprehend or resist this usurpation. France made her Laws conform to the political objects of her master; Austria surrendered her internal Laws to the will of a foreign despot; Prussia did the same; the small states of Germany did the same,—they might not have been able to resist, but they did not even protest they did not understand. So did Spain; and thus did Europe present one vast spectacle of base subservience to a master, of betrayal of tradition and rights, and of hostility against England. In the European community, one only of its members resisted this usurpation,—one solitary voice was raised in reprobation,—one prince resisted,—and one voice denounced the measures commanded by the master of Europe, and adopted in servile obedience by its united strength. This daring act did not proceed from a powerful monarch, nor even from a weak one, who felt strong in the alliance and the protection of England. It was that of the Pope! Powerless to resist, and hopeless of succour, still he refused to suffer the decrees of Berlin, and of Milan, to be enacted in his own states; and, as guardian of the public rights of Christendom, he declared alike contrary to justice and religion—the injuring of a people who had not given us cause,—and such mode of injury even in a just war*.

Rather than join in such an act, and though he stood forward against United Catholic Europe, in protection of, though not in alliance with heretical Albion, he dared single-handed the wrath of Napoleon, and not only risked but sacrificed his all, his Capital was occupied by French troops, and he himself was made prisoner.†

The Pope did not stand alone in this magnanimous sacrifice. The Sultan in like manner refused acquiescence in the Milan and Berlin decrees; and had he to expose the grounds of his decision, he in like manner would have exclaimed, that such means of injuring an enemy, and such interference with the Laws of a state, were as much at variance with Religion in the eyes of the Mussulman, as they were in those of the Pope.‡

* This is the judgment that formerly would have been formed by our ancestors, of decrees affecting unjustly the property of every citizen, as were those of Berlin and Milan, and in this manner, would they still be judged of in the East. A century and a half ago, or perhaps at a more recent period, the other cabinets and people of Europe, would have dealt with this matter in like manner and resisted it equally as the Sultan and the Pope. While this position was taken by these two Potentates, so important for the benefit of England, no man of England understood what they were doing, or why! He looked upon the Milan and Berlin decrees as a Commercial question, or Political question;—he saw no connexion between them and the integrity of men, the justice of a state, or the religion of a people.

† “Having thus established the continental system, Buonaparte used every endeavour to make all the continental powers accede to it. Prussia and Russia adhered to it, after the peace of Tilsit. Denmark soon entered into this French system; Spain, acceded to it, (January 8, 1808); Austria, (February 18, 1808); and Sweden, (January 6, 1810); so that, for some years, the continent of Europe had no other medium of communication with England than by way of Constantinople. There was one Prince in Christendom, who refused his accession to the continental system, and that was Pius VII. The Sovereign Pontiff declared, that all alliances which prohibited intercourse with a nation from whom they had suffered no grievance was contrary to Religion. In order to punish his Holiness for this resistance, General Miollis had orders to occupy Rome, (February 2, 1808). This was the commencement of a series of aggressions and attacks by which Bonaparte vainly hoped to bend that great personage. To gratify his resentment he stripped the States of the Church, by a decree issued at St. Cloud, (April 2,) of the provinces of Urbino, Ancona, Macerata, and Camerino, which were annexed to the kingdom of Italy.”—Koch's Revolutions of Europe.

‡ Mr Sullivan, in explaining before a committee of the House of Commons the doctrines of Eastern Legislators, in respect to taxes upon commerce, uses these words. “To take price and produce as the basis of taxation, and then to introduce Laws by which prices are altered, is to assail private property and to violate public faith.”

The Mussulmans do not hold, after war is proclaimed, the members of the opposing state are individually responsible in their property. They war the Government alone, and therefore foreign merchandize and property is not captured. In the last Russian war they released several merchants that fell into their hands. In obedience to the suggestions of some European adventurer or ambassador, an excise was attempted upon

Nor had the Sultan more reason than the Pope to be attached to the cause of England. Whatever cause of animosity the Pope might have had against England, because of England's conduct to him, must have been in a still greater degree produced in the mind of the Sultan. England was from 1807 to 1809, at war with the Porte; French influence was in the earlier period predominant at Constantinople; an English squadron had forced the Dardanelles, and had been on the point of bombarding the capital for the purpose of compelling the Porte to surrender to Russia, their mortal foe, Wallachia and Moldavia,—at the same time we had sent an expedition to attack Alexandria. We had failed in both cases. If there could be a union of feelings of abhorrence, contempt, and exasperation,* it must have been those of the Turks against England. Nevertheless did the Sultan scorn the decrees of Berlin and of Milan, kept his ports open to English Merchandise, and, despite all the means used by France, left them open for the passage of English goods into the heart of Europe. In the hour of her peril England found support in both these States, not from any alliances formed with them, not from any sympathies existing between them and her, but because they had preserved the habits of ancient times that have disappeared from the rest of Europe, and that integrity of character, which nowhere else is to be found. She was then engaged in a war, which was, of course, the cause of Religion, because that of Justice. Neither of these Potentates was moved by passing caprice or sympathy, but by a fixed and determined maxim in his own breast as in that of his people;—a maxim which, as it has disappeared amongst us, can be no more rendered comprehensible to the people of Europe, than the Patriotism of a Roman Scævola, or the thoughts of a British Alfred.

Within the last few years the fanatic hatred of England against Mussulmans has been greatly diminished; and they themselves can have no recollection of what it was. We are ready now to recognize in the Mussulman gentlemanlike deportment, integrity of conduct, majesty of national representation, benignity of disposition;—we who lately sought their expulsion from Europe as a barbarous power, are ready to recognize that they have rendered to us the most important services, and that their existence is the first of objects that England has to desire. But if we may rejoice in this triumph over past prejudices† we have still much to do before we can hope to bring the community of recognized interests into concert of political action.

Tobacco. The Turks were indignant, they did not even cry out as our forefathers,

"We'll fill the air with our repeated cries

Of Liberty, and Property, and no EXCISE:"

but they said it was a disgrace and a shame, and they would rather give up smoking. The attempted Law was thus abandoned.

* Let the Englishman who has not yet known remorse, peruse the documents signed "Howick," (the present Lord Grey) in reference to the attack of Constantinople, in 1817. He will find them in the published "State Papers" for that year.

† The change of opinion has nevertheless been frightfully used—we have joined Russia to PROTECT THEM!

With respect to the Pope, the first steps of such a progress have yet to be made, the full rancour of fanaticism is directed against him, and in his weakness and in his powerlessness, he dares not even appeal to England against Russia, to obtain the fulfilment of those very rights which England has guaranteed. Wherever he has stood opposed to Russia, he has found the hand of England wounding him in the dark, and making him feel that to oppose Russia is not to obtain the support of England, but to ensure her hostility. Another Government has now, however, come into power in this land, one whose intelligence is not directed to wound the Pope or to serve Russia, but whose ignorance and prejudices present handles as suited to her grasp as the corruption of their predecessor. It is not given to them to comprehend the enormous service which the Pope might render to them in their internal Government of England, if they, as an English Government, could separate themselves from the enemy of England, and taking their stand upon the treaty of 1815, require that Justice should be done to the Pope in Poland and by Russia.

An eminent foreign statesman said of England once, "She has fallen into the habit of mistaking friends for foes, and she has acquired the faculty of converting the former into the latter." May the consequences which she has already brought upon herself by this habit, and the deplorable results of this faculty work a cure!

But seeing that the religious enemy of the Court of Rome, is also the political enemy of all States—let the Pope, unassisted and undisarmed, employ the talents of his own servants in the management of affairs, as formerly was done by the Sovereigns of Europe and by the Popes, and he will soon have obedient followers; they will all rush in, when the way is opened, and all be ready, when their service is not required.

We conclude: the Caliph of the Mussulmans is the only crowned head that protested against the partition of Poland; the Pope is the only crowned head that has protested against its destruction. Wherever it comes to be a matter of right and Law, to be injured or to be maintained, the Pope and the Sultan are found the sole Potentates of Europe, feeling what is right, and daring to assert it. If the fact is of no use, if the example of no encouragement, the contrast, perchance, may humble and may shame.—Portfolio, No. VI.

PROGRESS OF TEMPERANCE.

The Temperance movement progresses steadily throughout the provinces; indeed it would seem the Dublin Corporation have lost their wits on this subject, as it has lately been seriously proposed that they should appoint a Lecturer on Temperance, with a salary of £200 per annum! That Father Mathew has been the real benefactor of Ireland, no one who recollects what the town population of the country was ten years back, can have any doubt: not only the men but the dress of the people has materially improved, and on the late anniversary of St. Patrick's day in Dublin, there were but three charges for drunkenness in the Police Courts. The following statement showing the gradual decrease of crime ever since the Temperance movement is proof positive, if further were required, of the success of Father Mathew's exertions:

In 1839 there were brought to trial 26,392 persons

" 1840 23,833 "

" 1841 20,790 "

Showing a decrease of 22 per cent. in the space of three years, while the convictions for murder were as follows:

In 1839 convictions 286 persons

" 1840 159 "

" 1841 120 "

Showing a diminution of more than a half in the number of convictions in the same space of three years. Surely a people who have proved that they possess the rarest of virtues, self-denial, are worthy of equal rights, and impartial government. In fact owing to the spread of Temperance principles, the old English plan of government will daily become a subject of greater difficulty: the besotted slaves of a former period are now reasoning and emancipated freemen, and it needs no gift of prophecy to foretell that in these days what will not stand the test of argument and examination must speedily be numbered among the things that have been.—Dublin Correspondent of the Calcutta Star.

PRINCIPLES OF THE REFORMATION— ARCHDEACON OF MEATH.

It will be seen in the Parliamentary Debates, that the Duke of Wellington, in reply to a question from Lord Fitzwilliam in regard to the Irish Church, made the usual appeal to the bigotry and intolerance of the English people, to the effect that seven millions of Roman Catholics must continue to support the Church of eight hundred thousand Protestants (vide Census); and this he termed "the Principles of the Reformation." Being quite at a loss to discover the principle involved in this monstrous iniquity, sure am I that such an Establishment cannot long continue in its present state: before many months this question will assume a shape it has never yet worn, and will be forced upon the consideration of the Legislature by the call of the Irish people. Here is a sample of a "good old Irish Pluralist" one of the olden time, in the shape of an advertisement of the goods and effects of an Archdeacon of Meath, lately deceased, in which "44 hunters," "4 stallions" "a pack of hounds," a cellar of "capital wine," and a long et cetera of luxuries is put forth in the Journals of the day, late the property of Dr. Lacy, who had more live stock in his stables than there were Protestants in his diocese: but the Duke has said, such are the "Principles of the Reformation" and we must "bide our time."
—Ibid.

MORE CONVERSIONS.

Letters have reached Oxford from Rome, announcing the conversion to Popery of Charles R. Scott Murray, Esq., M. P. for Buckinghamshire. This is another of Mr. Newman's victims. He was at Rome two years ago, in the company of Mr. Douglas, a member of the same college (Christ Church), and hearing a report that Mr. Newman and Dr. Pusey were to be expelled from the Church of England, made up his mind, together with his companion, to join the Church of Rome. Mr. Douglas did so, but Mr. Murray was compelled to return home to his parliamentary duties, and postponed his resolution.—From the Standard.

CONVERSION OF SCOTT MURRAY, Esq., M. P. FOR BUCKS, TO THE ROMAN CATHOLIC FAITH.—OXFORD, March 15.—A sensation has been produced in the University by letters received among the Tractarians from Rome, with information that Scott Murray, Esq., B. A. of Christ Church, has just conformed in that capital to the Romish faith. It is anticipated that the honourable gentleman, who has sat in Parliament for Bucks since the commencement of the present Parliament, will forthwith vacate his seat for that county. Mr. Murray belonged to the Young-England party, but had paired off till after the Easter recess. His vote is of course suspended until he has taken the oaths prescribed for Roman Catholic members. This conversion is stated in the University to be the eighteenth from among Mr. Newman's disciples which has taken place since the year 1841. Other conversions are spoken of.—Globe. [Among these, rumour mentions a nobleman and some persons of distinction.—ED. TABLET.]

CLERICAL HEARTLESSNESS.

(From the Spectator, April 6.)

An inquest on a suicide, which commenced on Monday, led to some strange disclosures respecting a clergyman. The suicide was Charlotte Griffin, aged thirty-four, servant to Mr. George Scratchley, a surgeon of Fleet Street; and the inquest was held before Mr. Payne, at Anderson's Hotel. Mr. Scratchley had suspected Griffin of theft, and had given her notice to quit his service on Monday last. Mr. Charles Scratchley, who described himself as a tutor in a private family at Peckham, and a "minister of the Church," [a year ago he was curate of a chapel in Queen Square, Bloomsbury,] deposed that he slept in the surgery at the back of his brother's shop on Saturday. In the middle of the night, Griffin came into the surgery, and asked him to intercede with his brother, who had threatened to prosecute her. He told her that if she would confess that she had robbed her master, he would see what he could do for her. She said that she had taken poison, but, thinking that to be an idle threat, and believing her to be intoxicated, he persuaded her to return to bed. In about a quarter of an hour, she came down stairs again, and turned on the gas in the shop. He looked through the surgery-window, and saw her in the act of swallowing laudanum from a bottle. He wrested it from her, and ample medical assistance was at once rendered; but she died early on Sunday morning. He found several pawnbroker's duplicates in her breast. Mr. Watson, a juror, interrogated Mr. Charles Scratchley—

"Did you hear her make a charge against some person?"—"No."

"Did you not hear her say that some person had been the cause of all her trouble?"—"Yes."

"Against whom did she make that charge?"—"Oh! against me."

"Did she charge you with having seduced her?"—"No: I think not. I believe the words were that I had ruined her."

Mr. Watson here said that he lived next door to Mr. George Scratchley, and that his wife had overheard Griffin say that Mr. Charles Scratchley had seduced her. The Coroner questioned the gentleman as to that fact. The witness said—"I deny the charges. My impression is—(checking himself)—no, Sir, I wish to say nothing." Mrs. Watson was called; and she deposed that she heard a woman crying, very bitterly in the surgery. The partition between the rooms was very thin, and she heard the deceased say. "You have seduced me; you have brought me to this." Some one replied, "You are a liar;" and deceased said, "I am no liar—God and you know I am not, you alone have brought me to it." Mr. George Scratchley was also examined as to the pilfering of Griffin. He said that he had taken her into his service at his brother's recommendation. On which Mr. Charles Scratchley explained, that his recommendation rested on his knowledge of Griffin's family; but, he added, he did not know what she was before she entered his brother's family. The inquiry was adjourned to Thursday.

On that day there were still more unexpected disclosures. Mr. Charles Scratchley was aided by Mr. Moxon, a barrister: who said he was prepared to prove that his client had not seduced the woman. Mr. Lewis Day, a surgeon, in giving some medical evidence, said that the deceased was not pregnant at the time of her death. Rebecca Griffin, Charlotte's sister, who is in service at Canterbury, was called, and gave a history of her sister's case, partly drawn from her by Mr. Moxon, partly by the Coroner. In 1832, Charlotte had a child by a gentleman to whom she was to be married; and that child is still living. In 1835, she became acquainted with Mr. Charles Scratchley; whom she accompanied to France, and there they lived together as man and wife. In 1836, she wrote to her family that she was actually married to Mr. Scratchley; and the deception was not discovered till 1838, when that gentleman determined to enter the Church, and found it necessary to break off the connexion. A provision, however, (what was not stated,) was made for her by Mr. Scratchley's father, who acknowledges her excellent conduct towards his son; but the separation had a very prejudicial influence on her mind, and seemed at times to affect her senses. The charge against her honesty was not to be believed. She always acknowledged that Mr. Charles Scratchley had behaved with the greatest kindness to her. The Coroner here remarked, that he had a letter stating the very reverse; and afterwards, in summing up, he observed that the language which Mr. Scratchley acknowledged, when he told her to confess that she had robbed her master, was not what might have been expected from any man situated as he was. The jury returned this verdict:—

"We find that the deceased, Charlotte Griffin, committed suicide while in a state of temporary insanity, induced by the cruel and heartless conduct of Mr. Charles James Scratchley, B. A.; and we are compelled to express our strong disapprobation of the flippant and unfeeling manner in which that gentleman's evidence was given on the night of Monday last."

A VISIT TO THE ARMENIANS,—LORD BYRON.

VENICE, April, 1836.

"Will Signore visit the Armenians this morning?" said my cicerone, as I settled myself down on the velvet cushion of the gondola. Armenian was a word associated in my memory with the "Ghost Seer" of Schiller. It was a masked Armenian that dogged the ill-fated Prince through the Piazza of St. Mark's, and through the gambling houses of Venice. I seemed to hear his sepulchral voice mysteriously announcing, 'at nine o'clock he died.' "Is it far?" asked I.

A short way only from the Lido," was the reply. The gondola left the stairs of the White Lion, and sailing by the Foscari Palace, soon left the Grand Canal, and rapidly approached the island of St. Lazarus.

It was a calm, clear, sweet morning. The little island surrounded by a brick wall, above which were visible clusters of irregular buildings, themselves surrounded by gardens and orange trees, now arose before us, all silent as death, and to me clothed in not a little mystery. We disembarked at some step, leading up to a gate. A bell was rung, and instantly a person appeared, inviting us, with a smile, to walk in, and begged that we would excuse him a moment while he ran to give notice of our arrival to his superior. We were interrupted in our momentary examination of the little court in which we stood, by the approach of a venerable man, blackly arrayed like a monk, with a bunch of keys dangling from the girdle around him, a sable beard hanging down over his breast, his countenance pale, his eyes intensely black, his forehead expansive, his mouth rather intellectual, and his voice thorough-bred, clear, and vivacious.

"Bless me," said he, taking each of us by the hand: "Bless me," and it was the first English which I had heard at Venice; "you are Englishmen. I am very happy to have a visit from you," and then he laughed heartily. "Many of your countrymen come to visit us; yes, yes, they wish to see where Lord Byron studied and wrote, and to see me, his instructor in Armenian;"—and then he very faintly tried to conceal a little chuckle of innocent vanity. "We have had here Lord D., pray do you know him?—and the Duke of P.—and Sir John R. I hope you are acquainted with them. They are noblemen indeed. Bless me, I am glad to have this attention from you; and now, if you please, we will walk a little about the Convent."

The excellent man's good nature took captive our friendship immediately. He seemed to receive us at once into his inmost confidence. He told us what he was formerly, what he now is, and what he soon expected to be. He gave us a brief history of the Convent, of its founder, of its objects, and its present condition. He told us much about Byron; how ungovernable was his temper, how unhappy he seemed to be, and who were some of his tastes and habits while residing in this vicinity. Nothing was concealed which could gratify our curiosity, and I need hardly add that two agreeable hours swiftly swept away like so many moments. The mystery about the Armenian's name totally vanished. I was among plain-spoken, benevolent, open-hearted men; learned and pious Armenians, here apparently isolated from all the world, yet preserving pure their language, their customs, and their literature, and associated together for the accomplishment of many noble, scientific, and religious ends.

The Convent is about one hundred and twenty years old. It owes its existence to the enthusiastic and benevolent zeal of an Armenian by the name of Mechitar. This man was born in 1676. In his youth he manifested very strong intellectual powers, and so unremitting and intense was their application, that before the age of twenty, he had made himself a complete master of all the theology, and philosophy and literature of Armenia. But to these high active powers of mind, were joined some noble qualities of heart. Looking abroad over his country, he perceived that the glory, for which in past times it had been distinguished, existed no more. Violent religious convulsions, originating mainly in difference of opinion with respect to the divinity of Christ, had shattered the fabric of its social and political prosperity. Suddenly, and as if heaven inspired, he was penetrated with a wish to do something for the regeneration of that country. His education had been chiefly religious. Its object was to prepare him for the service of the church. His experience of the monastic institutions established in Armenia, was unfavourable to them. They were not on a sufficient broad, and enterprising scale. "I will found a religious order myself," said he. "The object of that order shall be, to spread knowledge, spiritual, scientific and literary, throughout my nation." This was solitary thought, born in the solitary meditations of his cell. He had no money, no public friends, no public feeling aroused and tending towards the point before him. He had only a benevolent and comprehensive mind, vast intellectual acquisitions, and a zeal which nothing could quench. I need not record how often his labors at proselytism were baffled; how few of even the most enlightened among his countrymen were able, or willing, to embrace his large design; how in the year 1800, he arrived at Constantinople with but three disciples, which city some suspicious enemies soon compelled him to leave; how, with a small accession to his numbers; he then established himself in the Morea, thence, after a few years, compelled to take flight, in consequence of a war between the Turks and the Venetians; how he laid before the Senate of this latter people a plan of his enterprise, and therefrom solicited protection and aid. Venice, jealous of societies existing within the city, gave to him in 17 this little island of St. Lazarus; an island rich in the twelfth century contained a hospital for lepers and which, until lately, had long served as an asylum for the poor. Here now, out of funds bestowed by wealthy Armenian merchants, these walls were erected. The few men, whom kindred zeal had united to Mechitar, commenced their labors. Their system of operations was established—a system under which young men of talents were to be educated for Missionaries into Armenia; under which, not only were suitable works in foreign languages to be translated into the Armenian, but likewise original works on science, philosophy and religion to be composed, and all to be distributed among their unprovided countrymen. Their founder died in 1749. The Society continued to pursue its worthy labors. At this time, its condition is flourishing. It numbers in its little circle fifty devoted minds. It has translated many works into the Armenian from foreign languages:—the Iliad of Homer, the works of Cicero, the Telemachus of Fenelon, and among those from the English, I noticed a beautiful edition of Paradise Lost, and another of Young's Night Thoughts. It has given birth to an admirable dictionary in the Armenian tongue, and to a very comprehensive history of the nation. Among its other original productions, are a Universal Biography, and a complete Treatise of Mathematics. Even Father Aucher, who was now waiting upon us through the cloisters, had well-translated portions of the text of Eusebius, enriching them with copious illustrative notes, and at this time, he is engaged upon a kind of Conversation Lexicon, which will help to supply a desideratum in Armenian Literature.

We had now made the circuit of the cells, and arrived at the dining hall. Over its door is written in Armenian—"Silence should be preserved while the Scriptures are read." The members of the society were at their simple repast, and during that time they speak nothing, listening to one of their order, who reads a chapter from the bible. I have never seen a finer collection of heads,—of intellectual and benevolent countenances, than were those before me. I looked upon them with a feeling quite different from that with which I had so often regarded the monks that crowded many Italian monasteries.* Before me were men of action, not of idleness; men inspired with noble and comprehensive wishes, not narrowed down to the narrow cells in which they lived. After dinner, they enjoy, by their strictly followed regulations, two hours of recreation, which they generally spend in walking among the gardens, conversing with each other, or the boys under their charge. Seven hours are given to sleep, seven to actual intellectual labor, and what remain after that employed in bodily exercise, is given to God.

We now visited the printing office. The press is very finely constructed, and from it have proceeded pages of great beauty and delicacy. I purchased a little gilt volume, containing, in twenty-four different languages, the prayers of Nersis, an Armenian Patriarch.

From the printing office, we passed to the studies of Father Aucher, who, I may here say, is Secretary of the Society. It realized all that I had ever conceived of the study of an orientalist. It is small, and its walls are quite concealed by books and manuscripts. Many of these were in wire-protected cases, in binding most strange, and type quite incomprehensible. Here were some translations from the Greek, whose originals were lost. We were likewise shown several works in Sanscrit, in the Chinese character, and in other symbols that looked more outlandish than either. Father Aucher seemed to be delighted at handling them, translated a little for our edification, and then put them under lock and key again. He now pointed to a quaintly fashioned chair, standing by a window that looked out upon the quiet waters, and desired each of us to favor him by inserting our names in a book which lay on an adjacent table for that purpose. After this ceremony, he in a little triumph turned to the name of Byron, written by his own hand, under the date of Nov. 27th, 1816. He related to us, that on the first arrival of the poet at the Convent, quite unaware of his title he addressed him no otherwise than as Mr. Byron. The nobleman asked him if he had a dictionary of English proper names, and if so to look out for the word Byron. The hint of the Lord was not misunderstood, and no further occasion for offence was given.

*The writer's prejudices are here apparent.

THE CHURCH AND THE STAGE.

(From the Calcutta Star.)

You will see in the Times of the 3rd of March an account of the trial of a country actor for bigamy. I point your attention to the circumstance because it will afford a rare opportunity for the sanctimonious in your part of the world to descant upon the profligacy of actors in general. They are a terribly dissolute race it must be confessed, and to add to their shocking depravity they practice hypocrisy upon so large a scale, that for all that appears in the records of detected crime, they are scarcely ever guilty of an offence against the laws! There is not a known instance of a hanged or transported actor! On the contrary, we are continually told of their honesty and propriety of conduct, and it is by no means rare to see them contributing from their alleged small gains to the succour and comfort of distressed brethren. The rascals—how well they cloak their villainies! Not so, very many Clergymen who adorn the Church of England. They, if we may judge by the papers—are open and undisguised in their vicious courses, they continually appear before the public as guilty of some iniquity, for the sole purpose, I suppose, of showing the liability of human nature to err, and of enjoining the lay children of their flock to take heed lest they fall. How wholesome and instructive a lesson, for example, has just been conveyed by the Reverend Mr. Marsh, a rector and a prebendary, the nephew of the Bishop of Peterborough, who proclaims his debaucheries by a foolish prosecution of a French courtesan—by the Rev. Mr. Sewell who has been proceeded against for drunkenness, intemperance, scandal &c.—by the Rev. Mr. Day, who stabs sheep in the thigh to punish their trespasses, and not long since, how beautifully Mr. Thomas illustrated the prudence of second nights by a breach of promise of marriage! The Rev. John Jones of Cradley in Worcestershire, has recently been inhibited from performing the duties of the Church because a commissary returned appointed by the Bishop of the diocese has found the Rev. gentleman guilty of adultery; but as the Padre assumed the fictitious name of George Hallen, I forbear to cite his little peccadilloes as intended for the public benefit.—London Correspondence of the Madras Athenæum, May 16.
"We said 12

MISCELLENEA.

SWEDEN.—PROTESTANT PERSECUTION.—(Extract from a private letter, dated Stockholm 23d Feb.)—In 1841, a painter, and citizen of Stockholm, Sieur Joel Oscar Nillson, openly embraced the Catholic faith, depending on the 16th section of the Swedish constitution, which accords liberty of conscience. Conceiving himself so much the more secure of his right to renounce Lutheranism, as in the diet of the year 1809, wherein that constitution was discussed and adopted, there were certain orators desirous of maintaining the first section of the constitution of the year 1772, which absolutely prohibited the Swedes from quitting the confession of Augsburg; but, in spite of this opposition, full liberty of conscience was conceded in the 16th section of the new (that is, the existing) constitution. The Sieur Nillson has been compelled to appear several times before the Lutheran Consistory, which employed menaces and promises to make him apostatise from the Catholic faith, but the courageous confessor constantly answered that the Swedes have liberty of conscience, that the Lutheran Confession of Faith, as it is written in the Confessio Fidei of the Lutheran Council of Upsal, of the year 1593, and the lesser catechism of Luther, page 16 of the Fahlun edition of 1840, confesses en, helig, allmännelig kyrka, a church one, holy and universal; that he saw that the Swedish Church did not extend beyond the frontiers of the kingdom, and could not by consequence be called or considered universal at all, as is the Catholic Apostolic Church of Rome, Yesterday, Feb. 22, Nillson was condemned by the Hofrätt (Court tribunal) to the confiscation of his property, to the loss of his hereditary rights and to banishment; according to the first chapter and second section of the Kyrkislag (church law) of the year 1686. The judges would not permit him the assistance of counsel for his defence. I leave to you, my dear friend, and to Mr. O'Connell, to comment on these facts. The excellent agitator will see that the Swedes also know how to pass between the laws on either side, without touching either of them, as I hope the defender of the Catholics of Ireland will always do. The Turks lately cut off an Armenian's head for having abandoned Islamism, and the Swedish Journals described the fact as an action revolting to humanity; but Protestant fanaticism so blinds them, that they cannot perceive that to confiscate a man's goods, and to banish him, is to condemn him to die of hunger, for he knows no language but Swedish, and will be unable in a foreign country to ask charity for his Catholic wife and children.—Tablet.

REPEAL.—The petitions for a Repeal of the Union now "lying on the table" of the House of Commons are 237 in number, with 452,198 signatures.—Tablet.

THE
BENGAL
CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one Spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

or sound

re-conco

[No. 23.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JUNE 8,

[VOL. VI.]

MONASTERIES IN THE MIDDLE AGES.

It must be acknowledged that monasteries have been productive of many public advantages in every age. The no less remarkable universal hospitality which has ever been exercised to travellers when inns and places of public entertainment were less common than they are at present. Wherever any of these religious houses were established the neighbouring poor were sure to find wherewith to supply the cravings of nature and the naked wherewith to be clad. Their schools were always open for the education of the poor, and their hospitals for the reception of the sick. That these were not the only advantages which were actually derived from the establishment of religious houses, whether they be considered in a moral or political light, will appear from the following extract taken from the Philadelphian Catholic Herald:—

"The German Convents of the middle ages were the asylums of literature and of the arts. In those times the Monks were the only representatives of intelligence; in the cloister you would find painting, sculpture, poetry, and archæology. Look at those magnificent edifices,—those churches, chapels, houses of prayer, which they erected; the monasteries, the abbeys, the priories, which they founded and endowed; the bridges which they flung across the rivers; the asylums and hospitals which they opened for the sick and infirm;—the gymnasia and academies which they instituted. It was there that civilization found a refuge and it not been for the cloisters, Europe would have grown old, and, probably, have perished, in barbarism. Each cenobite had his allotted labour. Some like the Carthusians, cultivated the land, cleared the forest, fertilized the barren soil, stayed the torrent, taught their own, and transmitted to succeeding generations, the principles of irrigation, of grafting, and of agriculture. Others, like the Benedictines, were employed in decyphering and transmitting ancient charters, and thus preserving the titles of our municipal liberties;—or in commenting on, and translating, the Greek and Latin authors; while simple scribes coloured, with almost an angel's patience, in adorning with vermilion and azure, the hymns and proses of the church. In the 16th century there were Italian cloisters, which were veritable studies of painting, architecture, and statuary. When prayer was over, the monk went to work,—some with the chisel; others with the compass or pencil. Italy is rich in the monuments of this monastic glory. At Florence, the great attraction of the Pitti Gallery, is the Saint Mark of Fra Bartolomeo. Fra Loconde was called into France to construct the finest bridges of the capital.

"A convent of the middle ages might be truly likened to a bee-hive. While some were engaged in carving the wood, which in their hands assumed all forms, and often like the sculptured marble, seemed to acquire animation, others were employed in discovering the treasures concealed in ancient manuscripts. Some had the starry firmament to contemplate and admire; while to others of their brethren was assigned a world probably still more difficult to explore—the human heart. Asia Minor was filled with monasteries, where Monks were occupied day and night, in transcribing the poets and orators of ancient Greece and Italy. There were more than one hundred and fifty of these Sanctuaries of Science in Calabria.

and in the neighbourhood of Naples. Look at that promontory which advances from Macedonia unto the Egean sea; it is Mount Athos; and never will any human institution render to civilization the services it has received from that single house of prayer. Sixty-three palaces and country villas of French kings are enumerated, in which monks were occupied in reproducing the royal charters. The church employed a numerous band of scribes, all consecrated to God, and occupied in transcribing sacred and profane manuscripts in the hall of the Scriptorium. It was an African monk, Eutholius, that introduced it of Nov. 27th another monk invented the unaw the first

"Occam, Scott, Durand, wise ever decried by moderns, were remarkable men in their generation; they assisted in improving the human mind, and prepared the way for the great discoveries of the sixteenth century. Luther was not always unjust to the scholastics: he asserted the claims of one of them, Peter Lombard, to the esteem and gratitude of the human race.

"The cloisters have other claims on our gratitude. It was in the retirement of the Convent that the quarrels, so frequent in Germany between the nobles and their vassals, were often terminated; and we must do the Monks the justice to say, that the oppressed always found in them eloquent advocates. If, unfortunately, their voice was not always heard,—if the prince, sometimes appealed to the sword, then the cell of the Monk became the Asylum where the vanquished party found protection, consolation, and support; and where he remained until a reconciliation was effected between him and his Lord. How often did the conqueror come to the cloister to expiate his triumph and his crimes, in sackcloth and tears! Let us not forget that the Convent was the holy ark, where, during the general shipwreck of literature the Sacred writings were deposited and protected from the hands of the barbarians. The first versions of the Scriptures into German, were the works of the Monks; Otfried of Wissemburg versified the New Testament, and the Psalms in the tenth century. Raban Maurus, and Walfrid translated all the Scripture into German. For the biblical translations of Augsburg and of Nuremberg of the 15th century, we are indebted to those religious, to those Monks whom the reformers treated so rudely, and of whom one of them said:—"When we want to represent the devil, we take a Monk." And yet it was these poor devils of Monks that gave to the German world, Hutten, Melancthon, Luther, Erasmus, Agricola, and pleiads of literati in the 16th century!"

THE BENGAL HURKARU.

The Hurkaru has attempted a reply to our article respecting the misconduct of the Protestant Clergy, but our liberal contemporary, the Calcutta Star, whose remarks will be found among our selections, has saved us the trouble of noticing it fully. We would however ask the Hurkaru to establish the sweeping charge he has made against Catholics in general, in saying that "their (the Romanists) endeavours all aim at concealment. If they can keep up the delusion, if they can make it appear to the vulgar eye that the Romanist Priesthood are the priest of the pure, they seem to be pretty well satisfied." How does our contemporary know this? Whence has he derived the information that Catholics aim at concealment and delusion? If he fail to prove these charges, shall we not be justified in ranking him among the calumniators of the Catholic Priesthood and the Catholic Religion?

CONVERSIONS.

Within the last week, in the Bengal Vicariate, a Protestant Lady, the wife of a Catholic gentleman, was received into the Catholic Communion and baptized conditionally.

The widow of a Sergeant of H. M. 44th Regiment was also admitted during the last week into the Catholic Communion and baptized conditionally.

A Caffre woman is now under instruction, and will soon be prepared for baptism.

A few weeks ago a young lady of the Lutheran persuasion, when on her death-bed, was, at her earnest desire, reconciled to the Catholic Church, and received very edifyingly the last Sacraments.

LETTER NO. XI.

FROM A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA TO HIS PROTESTANT FRIENDS IN EUROPE.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—I may observe, in the way of a preamble to this letter, and as an illustration of my last, that if, for instance, the Church of England gets dissenting ministers to join her communion, and many are tempted—she deems it a triumph. The late ministers of the Gospel, alias lay preachers, are now ordained true ministers of the Church, be they of what denomination they may,—(saving a 'Romish' priest, and whose ordination is graciously looked upon as valid,) this infers they were accounted to have been in error before, mere lay usurpers, and whose ministrations, as the Friend of India lately told us, the Church of England continues to regard as inefficacious for salvation. If, however, a minister of the Church of England becomes a Presbyterian he will never, while he so remains, be made a Bishop, should he wish to continue in the ministry, but will have instead to 'sneer' "that he shall sincerely, really, and constantly, through the grace of God, without respect of persons, endeavour the extirpation of prelacy, that is, Church-government by Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, and all other ecclesiastical officers depending on that hierarchy,"* because he now believes all this is contrary to Scripture in the Church of Christ as it is in Scotland, consequently unscriptural, an 'evil' and a sin, but in lieu thereof, he will have now to 'vow,' according to the Scotch ordination, "that the Presbyterian government and discipline of this Church (of Scotland) are founded upon the word of God, and agreeable thereto." On the other hand, if a Kirk minister turns Episcopalian, he may now,—oh! what a transformation and transmigration he goes through,—be consecrated a Bishop, ah! an Archbishop; as a Bishop he may now confer the holy ordinance of confirmation, "lay his hands upon the head of every one severally," and call down the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost, viz. the spirit of wisdom, of understanding, of counsel, of ghostly or spiritual strength, of knowledge, of true godliness, and the spirit of God, fear; and as Bishop or Priest, he may read the 'Commination' office at the beginning of Lent, and while he 'curses' his neighbours keep Lent too; he may now, and what he before considered might 'prove a gross abuse, and hurtful to the living,' perform the funeral service over the dead with Gospel in hand; he may now not only consecrate Churches, burial grounds, &c. but observe the 'Festival days of Saints departed,' and which he looked upon before as 'a superstitious and Papistical rite.'* He may now not only at the 'Visitation of the sick,' move the sick person to "make a special confession of his sins, after which confession, he, the priest shall absolve him after this sort: Our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath left power to his Church to absolve all sinners, who truly repent and believe in him, of his great mercy forgive thee thine offences. And by his authority committed to me, I absolve thee from all thy sins." He may now, I say, not only absolve a sinner in this fashion, but he may also read the liturgy of the Church of England, as enjoined by law, and her 'Divine service,' and perform all the 'ceremonies' as sanctioned by the 'service Book,' and which, as therein described, he now believes, "pertain to the great advancement of godliness—to edification, to a decent order and godly discipline, to stir up the mind of man to the remembrance of his duty to God, and to his honour and glory, and not contrary to the word of God, or sound doctrine," though he shortly before 'vowed' in his 'Directory for the public worship of God,' that all such liturgy, ceremonies, and doctrines, proved on offence to many of the godly—were unprofitable and burdensome ceremonies—occasioned much mischief, disquieting the conscience of many godly ministers and people, as depriving them of the ordinances of God, and by means thereof, kept from the Lord's table, to the endangering of many thousand souls; that prelates, and their faction, have laboured to raise the estimation of it to such a height, as if there were no other way of worship of God amongst us, but only the service book; the reading of Common Prayer, made no better than an idol by many, by their lip-labour; it (the liturgy,) hath been made a matter of strife and contention in the Church. Upon these, and many the like weighty considerations in reference to the whole book in general, and because of divers particulars contained in it, we have, after frequent calling upon the name of God, and after much consultation, not with flesh and blood, but with his holy word, resolved to lay aside the former liturgy, with its many rites and ceremonies." Oh! Private judgment! private judgment!! for I must here address myself to you, see what a ridiculous creature you make of man! how you puff him, how you blind him; how you change him at your will, until he positively believes it is not you—the essence of that very flesh and blood, his own individual reason that guides him, but the Spirit of God. Yes, private judgment; you would usurp in the mind of man, and in the Christian world, the place of the 'holy one,' and would fain make your votaries to believe, that the latter can sanction contradiction in Church government, and justify error in doctrine. What sort of a spirit art thou then, when you thus, as already observed, make the late Episcopalian believe that his former belief and way of worship are contrary to Scripture in the Church of Christ as it is in Scotland, and in turn make the late Presbyterian believe that his former belief and way of worship are contrary to

* Splemn League and Covenant, Art. I. and II.

Scripture in the Church of Christ as it is in England? So in like manner you make the Calvinist or any other Protestant believe, if he enters into the Lutheran Fold, in the 'real presence,' a belief he counted before as most iniquitous, as you will also cause him to reject in that Church as not canonical scripture, the Epistle to the Hebrews, those of St. James and St. Jude, and the Revelation of St. John, while you get the Presbyterian for one to declare in his 'confession of faith' these books to have been written, "by inspiration of God, to be a rule of faith and life," because you are now pleased to insinuate this is agreeable to Scripture in the Church of Christ as it is in Germany; so do you teach the demure Quaker to become a Churchman, and now to believe that he must be baptized and receive the Lord's Supper, or otherwise that Church tells him he runs a risk of his salvation, but if you hand the Churchman over to the 'Friend' you now get him to renounce these 'holy sacraments,' those pomps and papistical ceremonies, because you say this is not now in conformity to Scripture in the Church of Christ as she is to be found in some corner of England or America; thus you make man believe that what is holy Scripture in one country, is unholy Scripture in another. And what, let me ask you, do you teach the Unitarian, the Baptist, the Ranter, Socinian, and your other numerous disciples? I, then, boldly challenge you to tell me what thou art, thou busy, changeling spirit? I deny it, that thou art of heaven, I fearlessly place the salvation of my soul upon this assertion, that the author of contrary doctrines, and of enmity and dissension is not 'the Prince of Peace,' but facts as vivid as the lightning which breaks from yonder dark cloud, tells me that thou art a spirit of Disunion and Devastation, for as I have seen that at times rend the strong fabric to its foundation, and shiver the stately tree, and lay its branches low, so have I marked you, with a still more fatal effect, fending off branches of the Church of Christ; yes, reason itself teaches me, and Scripture clearly points out that 'Paraclete,' which is to guide us in all truth, is not enshrined in man's private judgment; it is folly, it is infatuation to believe it; man only enslaves himself; he yields his faculties to the phantom of his own mind, and I give you, my friends, your disunions and dissensions as a demonstration. Would, then, my dear friends, that these my humble words would but, like a dagger, enter your hearts, so that this truth was at the point of it; instead of killing, it would cure you of all that corroding matter which is so fatal to your soul's vitality; and were this so I might stop here; but alas! I fear me that your minds are so encrusted over, that I must go on in the fervent hope, that something I may say, or something I may produce, may, like light, break through the darkness, until at last truth drives out error. To go on, however, with your 'variations' I find them thus represented by a Protestant writer lately in India, when he says, "The Right Rev. Dr. Wilson of Calcutta preaches genuine Christianity as understood by the Protestant Church of England," another might say, "The Rev. Dr. Duff of Calcutta preaches genuine Christianity as understood by the Protestant Free Church of Scotland;" a third "preaches genuine Christianity, as understood by the Protestant Lutheran Church of Germany;" a fourth "preaches genuine Christianity, as understood by the Protestant Baptist Church of America;" thus every Protestant sect 'preaches genuine Christianity' of its own. This is in the same sort of spirit with a late article in the Quarterly Review relative to the 'Church of the Vaudois,' or Waldenses, when after the reviewer first lamenting how that Church, "has lost in the escape its episcopal character, and its share in the ancient liturgies of the Church; we deplore these losses most deeply," he then rejoices that in its 'escape from the tyranny of the Church of Rome' it carried off or stole away with it the, what he says, "we will not call it the right (how true) but the duty of private judgment," leaving the lawn sleeves of Bishops, with their 'share of blessings to be picked up by what the reviewer describes as, "the Protestantism which is enshrined in the united Church of England and Ireland, as established in these realms is our Protestantism." What a dear fondling, "our Protestantism!" So the Vaudois Church has its own Protestantism, or Christianity; so again, "the Protestantism" which is enshrined in the now two disunited Churches of Scotland is, as the Northerners would say 'our Protestantism,' or as the gallant Highland Soldiers of H. M. 72d Regt. significantly observed recently in England, when they were marched to an Episcopalian Church, and refused to enter, "this is not our ain place of worship." In this way, every Protestant denomination enshrines its own Protestantism; even the honest 'Society of Friends' talk of theirs, when in their Epistle at one of their late yearly meetings in London, they tell the world, that it was, "by paying £10,800 to all ecclesiastical demands" of the New Church, that they "could expect to flourish or even to exist as a distinct religious body," I have not yet chanced to meet with the declaration of the 'Latter-day-saints' as to their Protestantism, though of course they are as much of a Church as the 'Vaudois.' We Catholics of the united Church, not of England, Ireland, Scotland, or of some solitary valley in Sardinia, but of the whole world, may laugh when we see you thus caricatured off by yourselves, but we shudder with a holy horror when we read of your calling each other, independently and indiscriminately, or what perhaps is still more shocking, collectively, 'Christ's kingdom, or house,' 'Christ's Headship,' and about which the Church of Scotland is now at drawn daggers. In this way, Christ's kingdom in Scotland, or as the Scottish parliament of 1567 in its 6th Act defines it, "the foresaid Kirk to be the only true and holy Kirk of Jesus Christ within this realme," is vastly different to what it is in England, or as a pamphleteer of the day at Calcutta writes of these times, "there were two very different reformations in the two countries," so every nation, every petty state, may, in the words of the above named act, "declarit, the foresaid Kirk, to be the only true and holy Kirk of Jesus Christ within this realme." The Church of England could not be a 'true and holy Kirk of Christ' if it went to Scotland, nor that of Scotland in England, nor that of England in Germany; man's law must 'declarit' them so. By this Protestant rule, Christ may have fifty, ay, hundreds of independent spiritual kingdoms in Protestantism, with different governments, different disciplines, and different doctrines. 'The Prince of Peace' in one kingdom finds he is opposed to himself in another! He, even he, the omnipotent God, cannot unite his members!! Monstrous, wicked infatuation! horrible, dreadful blasphemy, which your disunion, and 'agreement to disagree' inculcate and propound. It cannot be that it was to these to whom Christ held out this promise, "When he, the Spirit of Truth, is come, he will teach you all truth!" No, but does not St. Jude describe them rightly, as, "These are they, who separate themselves, sensual men, having not the spirit?" Undoubtedly, "These are they." But perhaps you will ask me to demonstrate this definition by still more pointed and practical illustrations than the preceding ones, though I think it may be allowed these are homely enough, as being borne out by facts. I must however defer the production of further evidence to another letter.

Yours faithfully,

C. A. C.

ANTIQUITY OF THE CATHOLIC FAITH

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

DEAR SIR.—In Blackwood's Magazine for March last, there is a review on three very well written volumes by Major Harris who, under the orders of the Bombay Government conducted a Mission to Sahela Salasse, the King of Shoa, in Southern Abyssinia. This undertaking was commenced in April, 1841, and the object of the embassy having been accomplished, the world has been benefited, not only by the prospect of those commercial advantages to secure which the Mission had been undertaken, but also by the publication of three most useful and interesting volumes on the manners, customs, civil and religious institutions of a large and flourishing nation, inhabiting the hitherto scarcely known regions of Central Africa.

But it is not only in a temporal point of view that the advantages of this newly established intercourse with the children of Ham, ought to be viewed. It has its advantages as regards the eternal welfare of mankind and the advancement of the glory of Him who has often and often made the political and other movements of nations and of individuals subservient to the ends of his eternal councils. The following quotations from the review of Major Harris's work will not, I am sure, fail to interest your readers.

"The hereditary provinces at this day subject to the king of Shoa, are comprised in a rectangular domain of 150 by 90 miles; an area traversed by five systems of mountains, of which the culminating point divides the basin of the Nile from that of the Hawash. The Christian population of Shoa and Efat are estimated at a million, and the Moslem and Pagan population at a million and a half. The Royal revenues are said to amount to 80 or 90,000 German crowns, arising chiefly from import duties in slaves, merchandize and salt. As the annual expenses of the state do not exceed 10,000 dollars, it is presumed that the king during his thirty years reign, has amassed much treasure, which is regularly deposited under ground."

"The practical religion of the Abyssinian Christians is of the very lowest degree of formality. Fasts, penances and excommunications, form the chief discipline; but the penitent can always provide a substitute for the two former, and the latter is always to be averted by money. Spiritual offences, however, are rare, for murder and sacrilege alone give umbrage to the easy conscience of the natives of Shoa: abstinence and largesses of money are equivalent to wiping away every sin. Their creed advises the invocation of saints, confession to the priest, and faith in charms, and amulets. Prayers for the dead, and absolution are indispensable; and as a more summary mode of relieving the burdens of the flesh, it is pronounced that all sins are forgiven from the moment that the kiss of the pilgrim is imprinted on the stones of Jerusalem and that even kissing the hand of a priest, purifies the body from all sin."

"The Abyssinians are said by Ludolf, to be the greatest fasters in the world. The Wednesdays and Fridays are fasts; the forty days before Easter are rigidly observed as a fast; and from Thursday preceding Easter till the Sunday, no morsel of meat is to enter the lips, and the prohibition against drink is equally rigorous. St. Michael and the Virgin Mary are venerated in the highest degree; St. Michael as the leader of the host of heaven, and the latter as the chief of All the Saints; and Queen of Heaven and earth, and both as the great intercessors of mankind.

"The march [of troops] was peculiar and even pompous in its kind, it was extraordinary to see it preceded by a copy of the Holy scriptures, under a canopy of scarlet cloth and borne on a mule, but, it must be owned, accompanied by the "Ark of the Cathedral of St. Michael," which works miracles, and is regarded as a pledge of victory."

"On the return of the expedition, the king made a kind of triumphal entry into his capital. His costume was splendidly savage. A Lion's skin over his shoulders richly ornamented and half concealing beneath its folds an embroidered green mantle of Indian manufacture, on his right shoulder were three chains of gold, as emblems of the Holy Trinity, and the fresh plucked bough of asparagus, which denoted his recent exploit, rose from the centre of an embossed coronet of silver on his brow."

Whatever may be the phrasology in which the foregoing account of the religion of Abyssinia is given, it is clear that these people believe in the mystery of the holy Trinity; that they observe fasts, on Wednesdays and Fridays, and during the forty days of Lent, keeping the three last days of the Holy Week with particular solemnity; that they pray for the dead, and therefore believe in a Purgatory; that they practice auricular confession to the Priest, and hold absolution to be indispensable; that the blessed Virgin Mary is venerated by them as the chief of all the Saints and the Queen of Heaven and earth; and that they maintain that the Saints in heaven intercede for mankind, and consequently that their intercession is to be prayed for. It is true these people have a variety of other doctrines and practices which are not countenanced by the Catholic Church, such for instance as the use of charms, &c. but several of the points of belief and practice enumerated above are so essentially Catholic, and so decidedly anti-Protestant, that no one who is not determined to shut his ears against truth, will for a moment doubt that the religion of this ancient and secluded nation is and has been, at least in the points noted above, the same as that of the Catholic Church.

The ancient history of these people is little known; but it is certain that their conversion to Christianity was effected in the earliest ages of the Christian era.

Recent writers of respectability inform the Abyssinians are most bigotedly attached to their ancient faith and practices, and that repeated attempts on the part of the Popes and Jesuits, to reconcile them to the Catholic Church have failed. We are told by them that among these people "circumcision is practised, that boys marry at fourteen years of age and girls sometimes so early as ten; and that polygamy is allowed, and marriage itself is generally held to be a mere civil institution, the priests merely assisting at the ceremony. There is indeed (say they) a holier kind at which they assist, when the parties take the communion, and this is reckoned to be indispensable, a very sufficient reason why, in a country where licentiousness is on the increase, the common mode of coming together, which allows of very easy separation, is now universally preferred."

No doubt a people of such lax morals would be exceedingly reluctant to conform to the severe and uncompromising morality of the Catholic Church. We are accordingly informed, on the same Protestant authority, that the attempts of the Popes were not only unsuccessful, but also that their agents "were ordered to leave the kingdom, and delaying their departure, were either executed or sold as slaves, and the Roman Catholics throughout Abyssinia, were commanded, on pain of death, to renounce their religion."

It is not likely that a people so situated—so bigoted in favor of their peculiar practices, and so hostile and opposed to the Catholic Church, would notwithstanding be persuaded by Missionaries sent by the Pope, to reject their ancient practices and adopt in their stead the unpleasant observance of fasts, and the humiliating practice of auricular confession to Priests, prayers for the dead, invocation of Saints, veneration for the Blessed Virgin and other practices so revolting to flesh and blood. Whence then, I ask, did this ancient nation, secluded for years from intercourse with modern Europe, receive these peculiarly Romish—these decidedly anti-Protestant doctrines? Were these doctrines miraculously revealed to them from heaven, or did they receive them when they first received the Christian faith on their conversion? If the latter alternative, which cannot be denied, be admitted, then these Popish doctrines and practices are as old as Christianity itself, then they are not, as misrepresented by our separated brethren, innovations of, what they choose to call, the dark ages which preceded the sixteenth century, the age of their revolt, and, as their distinctive appellation implies, their protest against the faith of their fore-fathers.

How wonderful are the councils of God, how unsearchable his ways! From the con-

C.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

I am rejoiced to inform you, Sir, that since the commencement of this year there have

VERITAS.

Rt. Rev. G. C. Carli, D. D. Bishop,	..	100 0
Rev. Father Francis, Cath. Chaplain,	..	300 0
Monsr. L'Abbe Caffarell, Priest,	}	50 0
Missionary Apostolic,
Rev. Father Lewis, Missy. Apostolic,	..	50 0
The Ladies of St. Mary's Convent,	..	100 0
Sergt. Major Foster, 35th Light Infy.	... 8	0 0
Mrs. McPhee, Agra Fort,	5 0
Wm. Greenway,	10 0
Bazar Sergt. P. Smith, Agra,	20 0
Mrs. Lyons,	5 0
J. P. Lyons,	8 0
J. Flood,	8 0
W. C. Phillips,	8 0
Conductor Treston,	8 0
John Cuddy,	2 0
John Heffernan,	2 0
T. D. Cray,	2 0
P. Casey,	1 0
Mrs. D'Cruze,	2 0
G. Baptist,	5 0
Sergt. Jas. McDermott, Agra Fort,	5 0
Sergt. W. O'Connor, ditto,	3 0
Thos. J. Saunders,	10 0
H. P. Gaumiss,	2 0
Charles Berry,	10 0
John Teyen,	10 0
G. Hayes, Barrack Sergeant, Agra,	5 0
S. Smith, W. Smith, and S. Smith,	14 0
R. P. Stowell,	5 0
C. Company,		32 0
D. " "		45 8
H. " "		29 4
E. " "		25 0
Gr. " Protestants		32 0
Do. " "		9 0
R. " . . .		26 0
F. " "		47 8
B. " "		23 0
L. " "		33 0
Canteen Fund,		200 0
Artillery 1st and 2d Cos. 3d Battn.	49 0
A Friend,	1 0
D. Boswell,	5 0
A Friend,	1 0
A Friend,	2 0
A Friend,	2 0
Dwarkanauth Tagore, Esq.	50 0
John Rebello,	12 0
C. Murphy,	10 0
Artillery 2d Co. 1st Battn.	40 0
Rev. Father Felix of Gwalior,	30 0
Serjeant Shannon, C. Sergt. Agra,	2 0
Ensign Halliday, 56th N. I.	50 0

Men of H. M. 31st Regiment, through } 22 8
Private P. Macken,	45 0
Major Straubenzie and Lady,	5 0
Lieutenant Finley,	5 0
Lieutenant Colls,	5 0
Ensign Gaynor,	5 0
Ensign Bray,	5 0
Lieutenant Atkinson,	5 0
Lieutenant Hamilton,	5 0
Lieutenant Haultain,	5 0
Ensign Newport,	5 0
Lieutenant E. Hardinge,	5 0
Captain Herbert,	10 0
Captain Stokes,	5 0
Captain Campbell,	5 0
Dr. Stewart,	5 0
Lieutenant and Adjutant Munro,	5 0
Captain Fraser,	5 0
Captain Wood,	5 0
Lieutenant W. Hardinge,	5 0
Lieutenant Gray,	5 0
Lieutenant Colville,	5 0
Lieutenant Flynn,	20 0
Lieutenant Currie,	5 0
Captain Durnsford, Pay Master,	10 0
Major Bray,	10 0
Dr. James,	10 0
Lieutenant Harvey,	5 0
Ensign Scarran,	5 0
Captain E. F. Day, Artillery,	50 0
2d Troop, 3d Batin. Horse Artillery,	20 4
Sub-Conductor Corcoran,	10 0
Conductor Rielly,	10 0
Mrs. Frances Rielly,	5 0
Master Rielly,	3 0
Miss Rielly,	2 0
Mrs. Ryan,	5 0
Edward Fitzgerald,	2 0
Mr. Poley, Band Master,	2 0
Quarter Master Sergeant Dunne,	5 0
Sub-Conductor A. Burrows,	4 0
B. A. Piaggio,	2 0
A Friend,	2 0
A Friend,	2 0
Sub-Conductor Ryan, Loodianah,	20 0
Rev. Father Marcellinus, Catholic }	300 0
Chaplain of Ghazee pore,
Sergeant Hughes, Agra Fort,	3 0
Mrs. Hughes, ditto,	3 0
Mr. Flemming, ditto,	2 0
Conductor Lisbey,	10 0
Mr. Michael,	4 0
Captain Harris 70th N. I. with a con- dition that a mass be performed for the late Mrs. Harris,	50 0
A Thanksgiving offering from Bazar Sergeant P. Smyth, for the recovery of Mrs. Smyth,	25 0

Her Majesty's 39th Regt.

NATIVE MISSION AT COWCOLLY.

Collections at the Catholic Cathedral..	55	12	0
Collections at St. Thomas' Church,....	62	6	6
Do. at St. Xavier's College.....	25	0	0

FESTIVALS.

June 24,—St. John Baptist, d. with octave.
2nd orat. for the Most Rev. the Archbishop,
V. A. B. this being the anniversary of His Grace's Consecration.

Selections.

THE BENGAL HURKARU AND THE BLACK SHEEP.

The Clergy have been attaining bad eminence lately, or rather some black sheep have been bringing discredit on the Cloth. The last Mail has given particulars of some four or five cases in which Reverend Divines have misbehaved themselves exceedingly. It would appear that the Catholic Herald, having done what every other paper has done, given publicity to these affairs, has awakened the virtuous indignation of the Hurkaru, who exclaims, why don't you look at home! as if that took off a shadow of guilt from the Reverend culprits. The Herald retorts that the Hurkaru has not shown itself particularly nice about justice to Roman Catholics, and we must avow we think he has not. He must have known that the revival of the Maria Monk obscenities, as lying as they were gross, was for the express purpose of injuring a Catholic Institution here, and the Priesthood generally; and as it is now flung in his face, he could see that without being disgusted at its beastliness or shocked at its iniquity. The Hurkaru says he was not called on to take part in a matter discussed ad nauseam nine or ten years ago. We think he was. He must have known that the tendency of the work was to vilify the Romish Priesthood, and when it was republished here, with very considerable parade, it was a subject that could not be with justice overlooked. At any rate, if he is offended that the Herald should publish what every body knows to be true, he may allow the Herald to reproach him with having inserted letters in defence of what had been proved to be false. The Hurkaru makes out but a sorry case in the following, either of accusation or defence:—

"But whatever may be our offences, we conceive that they have nothing to do with the question at issue. We have asked our contemporary how it happens, that though he is so eager to record the crimes committed by Protestant Clergymen, he never records those committed by Catholic Priests. We have attempted to answer this question ourselves, by suggesting that Romanism is somewhat more anxious to look well than to do well. When Protestant Clergymen go astray, it is not left to the enemies of the Protestant faith to publish and to comment upon their offences. By every Protestant journal in the Kingdom are these enormities held up to popular execration. And why? Because exposure is looked upon as a means of amendment and purification. Whilst the Romanist covers over the filth, the Protestant lays it bare. It is his object to cleanse and not to con-

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

Mr. Simeon, the amount of a decade's subscription from January to Decem- ber, 1844; in advance.....	15	0
Mr. J. Piaggio and Associates.....	5	0
A Convert from Hindooism, through the very Rev. Dr. Kennedy.....	1	0
Sergt. Haslem and Associates, of Dum- Dum, through the Rev. Mr. Mascarenhas.	9	10

ceal. But this does not appear to be the policy of the Romanists. Their endeavours all aim at concealment. If they can keep up the delusion—if they can make it appear to the vulgar eye that the Romanist Priesthood are the purest of the pure, they seem to be pretty well satisfied. At all events there are no public exposures. Public scandal is sedulously avoided."

To take this by steps. The Hurkaru should at least have shown that the Herald had refused to record crimes committed by Catholic Priests. There may have been instances, but here they are assumed. Why did not the Hurkaru put his finger on some horrible delinquent of the obnoxious persuasion, whose scoundrelisms had been made known by the Press through the length and breadth of the land and passed over by the Herald. This is a case of reprint: the affairs have not been sought for and found in the history of private profligacy; they are before the world in the Newspapers. Surely the Herald is not called upon to find out some worthless ministers of its own Church and gratuitously drag them into light. What public infamies has it sought to screen? This is really the question; because Protestant prints, too, with any regard for religion, would rather be blind to, than advertize conduct in its professors calculated to bring it into contempt. Our papers rarely allude to clerical criminals until they are convicted. The Hurkaru shows no little dread of dealing with the subject. He appears to us as if he would rather jump round it, taking the chance of making an effective poke, than go in and grapple with it like a man. Having asked a question which is based on an assumption, he suggests an answer,—"Romanism is more anxious to look well than do well." Shallow! The willingness to forego example and conceal error is no evidence of an indifference to virtue; the boast about examples by Protestant journals being for the sake of amending and purifying the body is arrant stuff; they are used just as a report would be of a giant, or a dwarf, or a fire, or a flood—as news—and valuable in proportion as the details are gross and exciting: if the truth is really to be told they are used as a triumph more than anything else over an Establishment, which as an Establishment is most unpopular. As to the latter passage of the above quotation; we have been told it is better to assume a virtue than openly to outrage morality, and supposing every syllable the Hurkaru says on the subject of studied concealment to be true, he only brings it to this, that if not truly religious the Romish Priesthood have at least a respect for decency from which others might take an example.—Calcutta Star, June. 4.

CONVERSION OF MR. MURRAY.

We have noticed an article in a contemporary on the conversion of Mr. Scott Murray. It may not be uninteresting to a portion of our readers to be made acquainted with more particulars relating to the circumstance.

About two years ago Mr. Scott Murray and his friend, Mr. Douglas, were at Rome, and of course went frequently to see the pomp of the Catholic Service in St. Peter's the Cathedral of the Christian World. "Christ's mighty shrine above his Martyr's tomb." On one of these occasions Mr. Scott Murray, to get rid of the encumbrance of his umbrella, placed it in one of the vacant confessionals, and when the service was over, found it was locked, and his umbrella, of course, not forthcoming. On enquiring of one of the Sacristans, he learned that the good old clergyman to whom the confessional belonged, had, as usual, taken the key to his convent with him and would not return to his confessional till the following morning, when if Mr. Murray sent his servant or left his address, the umbrella should be forwarded to him. It so happened that Mr. Murray was to leave Rome for England that evening or early the next morning, to attend his duties in Parliament and requested his friend Mr. Douglas to look after the umbrella. Accordingly, following the instructions of the Sacristan, he directed his steps towards the convent and having reached it, enquired for the Padre Confessore, in whose confessional the umbrella lay a prisoner. The padre received him most kindly, handed him the key of the confessional, and sent two of the younger religious to accompany him to St. Peter's to release the prisoner, and thus the umbrella found its home.

Mr. Douglas was so charmed with the urbanity, piety and superior information of the venerable religious that he begged to be allowed to repeat his visits. His enlightened conversation soon cleared away all his religious doubts and prejudices, and showed him in a full evidence the truth of the Catholic Religion, which, after due preparation, he cordially embraced, and after some time returned to England. Mr. Scott Murray was surprised to find his friend thus become, from conviction, a sincere Catholic; this led him to examine, more fully, into our Catholic doctrines, and the result on his enlightened and impartial mind, was a full conviction of their truth, and as he and his mother and sister proposed to spend this winter in the South of Europe and to visit Rome, he requested a letter of introduction from his friend Mr. Douglas to the good religious above mentioned, as also to one of the canons of St. Peter's, and then proceeded on his tour through Italy, Sicily and Malta. He remained but a short time in Malta at the Princess Royal Hotel, and returned again through Sicily, to the eternal City previous to Lent. Arrived there, he lost no time in becoming acquainted with the worthy clergyman, engine of his friend's conversion, followed up his religious researches, and having perfectly satisfied his mind on every ground, was received, a few weeks ago, into the bosom of the Catholic Church by his Eminence the Cardinal Fransoni. It may be satisfactory to know that this distinguished ornament of our Senate who was returned on high Tory interest as one of our County Members, is now in his 25th year, with a noble fortune of about £20,000 a year, and this gives an additional proof of the remark in the Protestant "British Critic" that the Catholic system in this country (England) is just now beginning, after a long interval of torpor, to lay hold, both of the most gifted minds and the most energetic spirits of the times." The religion which the great Sir Thomas More believed must ever command the respect, and claim the attention of every honest, enlightened Englishman.—(Communicated.)—Malta Times, March 20.

STATE OF THE ANGLICAN CHURCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TABLET.

DEAR SIR,—I send you the following important passage, extracted from the last volume of Mr. Newman's Sermons, lately published. It contains admissions calculated to stagger the most resolute Churchman, and to convince him that the system to which he adheres is now, at least, whatever it may have been, in a most deplorable state. How Mr. Newman, who so boldly and plainly speaks out the truth, can yet cling to a Church that almost disowns him as one of her children, we cannot imagine. We entertain great regard and esteem towards him; we believe him to be the most sincere of his party—if we may be allowed the expression, but yet we are utterly at a loss to reconcile his strong language against the Anglican Church, with his present position in it. Error is indeed always inconsistent; but to behold a man of such a truly Catholic mind as Mr. Newman—groaning under his bondage, and yet apparently embracing the chains that bind him—is afflicting and deplorable. Believing, therefore, that he is in error, though he may know it not, earnestly do we pray that his mind may be enlightened, and that “in all things” (to use his own words) “he may know God's will, and at all times be ready to fulfil it.”

The following is the passage I allude to,—“Alas! I cannot deny that the outward rites of the Church are partly gone from us, and partly going; and a most fearful judgment it is. Behold... the stars of Heaven and the constellations thereof shall not give their light; the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine. I will cause the sun to go down at noon, and I will darken the earth in the clear day; and I will turn your feasts into mourning, and all your songs into lamentation. All the bright light of heaven will I make dark over them, and set darkness upon the land, saith the Lord God.” This in good measure has fallen upon us. The Church of God is under eclipse among us. Where is our unity, for which Christ prayed? Where our charity, which he enjoined? Where the faith once delivered, when each has his own doctrine? Where our visibility, which was to be a light to the world? Where that awful worship, which struck fear into every soul? And what is the consequence? “We grope for the wall like the blind, and we grope as if we had no eyes; we stumble at noon-day as in the night; we are in desolate places as dead men.” And as the Jews, shortly before their rejection, had two dark tokens—the one, a bitter contempt for the whole world; and the other, multiplied divisions and furious quarrels at home; so we English, as if some abomination of desolation were coming on us also, scorn almost all Christianity but our own. And yet we have not one but a hundred gospels among ourselves, and each of them with its own hot defenders; till our very rite and symbol is discord; and we wrangle and denounce, and call it life; but peace we know not, nor faith, nor love! And this being so, what a temptation it is to those who read and understand the word of God; who perceive what it enjoins, and promises, and also feel keenly ~~what we are~~—what a temptation it is to many ~~such to be impatient under this visitation!~~ Who, indeed, is there at all, who lets himself dwell upon the thoughts of it, but must at times be deeply troubled at it? And who can be startled, not I, if a person here and there, painfully sensitive of this fearful eclipse of the Sun of Truth, and hoping, if that be possible, to find something better elsewhere, and either not having cherished, or neglected to look for those truer tokens of Christ's presence in the Church, which are personal to himself, leaves us for some other communion? Alas! and we instead of being led to reflect on our own share in the act, instead of dwelling on our own sin, are eloquent about his; instead of confessing our own most un-Christian divisions, can but cry out against his dividing from us; instead of repenting of our own profaneness which has shocked him, protest against his superstition; instead of calling to mind the lying and slandering, the false witness, the rejoicing in evil, the ungenerousness and unfairness which abound among us, our low standard of duty and scanty measures of holiness, our love of the world, and our dislike of the Cross; instead of acknowledging that our brother has left us because we have left God; that we have lost him because we have lost our claim to keep him; we, forsooth, think we ‘do well to be angry’ and can but enlarge on his impatience, or obstinacy, or wilfulness, or insatiation! or, if we are alarmed, as well as indignant, we dream of foes and traitors among us, when the foe and the traitor is within us; and we look any where but there; and we wonder, to be sure, that we cannot find what it implies so much address to conceal; and we are restless till we have traced the guilt somewhere, to any one but ourselves; like the prophet beating his ass because she saw, what from him was hidden, the angel with a drawn sword: “Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye, and then thou shalt see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye.” “Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel.” For me, with these convictions, never will I shrink, through God's help, at fitting times, and in any place, from warning my brethren of that so great sin of the day their disregard of the grievous judgments under which we lie. If it was promised to the Church that she should be “the pillar and ground of truth;” that “her teachers should not be removed into a corner any more.” but that her “ears should hear a voice behind her saying, “This is the way, walk ye in it;” and if, to us in this country, she is not such as this, surely we have forfeited something, surely we are under a judgment; and if we are under a judgment, how inexpressibly it must offend Almighty God, that we do not “humble ourselves under His mighty hand!” This being so, it is a very light thing indeed for one, whose eyes are in a measure opened to see it, to find himself opposed for speaking plainly about it; and even though opposed, it must be more difficult for him to keep silence, than to speak.” (Pp. 378–392.)

Sincerely do we sympathise with Mr. Newman in his present difficult position, surrounded as he is by many enemies, eager either to silence him altogether; or, when he speaks out against existing evils in the Church, ready to pour their uncharitable attacks upon him. Still we must say that Mr. Newman lays himself open to them in a great measure. And how? Because the acknowledgment he makes, "that his church is under eclipse, and that its outward rites are partly gone," must surely convince him, that such a church cannot be the Church which was ever to be guided by the Spirit of Truth. Our Saviour promised always to be with His Church. Now, Mr. Newman's admissions almost imply that our Saviour has deserted the Anglican Church. Can it therefore be the true Church? And yet, Mr. Newman remains in such a Church, that is in such a state! Here is the seeming inconsistency of the Oxford men, and hence do they expose themselves to many rebukes—which to them may appear undeserved. To vindicate themselves they advance many plausible reasons, the unsoundness of which has been often discussed. But we leave them and their cause in the hands of God. His grace alone can enlighten their mind, can dispel their ignorance and prejudice, and remove all worldly impediments. And that the Great Mover of hearts may speedily do so, if it shall so please Him, is the earnest prayer of your sincere well-wisher,

A PRIEST.

THE MONK'S LITTLE ALPHABET, IN THE SCHOOL OF CHRIST.

(From the Original of B. THOMAS A KEMPIS.)

THE DISCIPLE. Show me, O Lord, thy ways, and teach me thy paths, I beseech thee; teach me, O my God, the ways of a good life, that I may walk therein to the salvation of my soul.

LESSON I.

AIM at being unknown, and counted as nothing; for this is more salutary and profitable to thee, than to be praised by men.

LESSON II.

BE kind to all, both good and evil, and be burthensome to no one.

LESSON III.

CONTAIN thy heart from wandering; thy mouth from idle conversation, and keep all thy other senses under the restraint of discipline.

LESSON IV.

DESIRE solitude and silence; and thou shalt find rest and a good conscience; for where there is a crowd, there is often great noise and much distraction of heart.

LESSON V.

ELECT poverty and simplicity as thy bosom friends; be content with few things, and give not way to murmuring.

LESSON VI.

FLY from men, and the tumult of this world; for thou canst not well be with God and with men; with eternal things, and such as pass away.

LESSON VII.

GIVE thanks to God, both with heart and mouth, continually; whatsoever may happen; in trouble or in sorrow; for God, in His Holy Providence, dispenseth all things in this world, with a true and certain judgment.

LESSON VIII.

HUMBLE thyself in all things, and beneath all; and thou shalt have thanks from all. Thou shalt thus be pleasing both to God and man: and the devil will flee away from thee, the more quickly, because of the virtue of humility, which is also opposite to himself.

LESSON IX.

IN every good work let thine intention be pure; that so thou mayest please God, who seeth the heart, and loveth the just and the pure.

LESSON X.

CALENDAR as thy most dear friends and patrons, those that oppress thee and speak evil against thee: for if thou art wise and consider it a right, thou shalt acquire great gain thereby: for these do thee good, who stand against thee wickedly.

LESSON XI.

LABOUR and sorrow, sighs and tears, obtain possession of the kingdom of God: but pleasures and honours lose Paradise.

LESSON XII.

MIGHTY is that gift of God, that induces one to be poor in this world for Christ's sake, to take the lowest place. It is great pride to seek a higher step. The devil is ever persuading men to aim higher; to long after honours; to fly from despite; to the end that they may fall backwards into his power, when they have attained a brief lordship over the poor. But do thou hold the least gift as a great one; and so thou shalt be worthy to receive such as are greater.

LESSON XIII.

NEVER despise any one; hurt no one; weep with the afflicted; help the needy; and never magnify thyself.

LESSON XIV.

ORDER all thy time profitably as in the sight of, and for God: for nothing is so precious as time, wherein thou mayest merit the kingdom of God for ever. Be gentle, kind, and affable to all, in simplicity of heart: Refer all good to God's praise, and do nothing without counsel and deliberation.

LESSON XV.

PLEASING, or displeasing to God, in all things let this be thy first inquiry: and neither for fear nor love do anything against thy conscience. In doubtful matters have recourse to Holy Scripture, and obedience to thy Superior;—and trust not overmuch in thyself; learn to be silent rather than to speak; desire to be taught, rather than to teach; for it is safer to lie hid, than to appear before men.

LESSON XVI.

QUESTION not about the affairs of others which concern thee not; neither busy thyself therein, that thou mayest be always in peace. He that goeth with his community, yet liveth apart, shall be loved, and come the sooner to a good end. He that doeth in season what he ought to do, shall meet with greater joy hereafter.

LESSON XVII.

RETURN to the interior of thy heart, and shut the doors of thy lips. Check in the beginning all wandering abroad after various worldly desires, which come from the instigation of the devil. Wicked things, when listened to, hurt; fair things, tempt; bad words disturb the soul. Withdraw then from the angry man, from the unlearned, from the dissolute, and dwell in silence with God.

LESSON XVIII.

SOBER be thou in thy food; modest in thy clothing; fore-thoughtful in thy words; honest in thy conduct; stout-hearted in adversity; humble in prosperity; grateful for all benefits; cheerful under despoite; patient in sorrow; and discreet in all thine actions.

LESSON XIX.

TREMBLE lest thou offend God, by the least negligence or defect; be not puffed up in prosperity; neither be cast down in adversity. The fear of God will keep thee back from sin; teach thee to be solicitous after all good works, so that thou mayest become very good. Commit thy soul entirely to God, and what is now burthensome, shall speedily become light. Thy peace lieth in much patience, and all tribulation is light, when borne for the sake of eternal life.

LESSON XX.

VALUE not, but sell all thy goods for God, and He will give thee a better comfort, even His grace coming down on thee in an hour. No one is richer, or more free than he that has given himself and all to God, that he might purchase CHRIST, by loving Him who redeemed the world from the Cross.

LESSON XXI.

XRIST must be thy light; thy reading; thy meditation, thy conversation. Let Him be all thy desire; thy gain; thy whole hope, and thy reward. If thou seekest anything but God only, thou wilt suffer loss. Thou wilt labour, but find no rest.

LESSON XXII.

YOUTHFUL Cleric, and venerable Monk, the work of both is to sing hymns and psalms, wherein with them the choirs of angels rejoice, praising God continually in the kingdom of heaven. To serve the flesh, is the death of the soul; the food of worms; the nest of devils; the life of beasts; the cherisher of disease; the corruption of bodies; the défilement of morals; the loss of good; the brealer of many ills and woes. To serve God is the beatitude of the soul; the health of the body; the prudence of the spirit, and life. He singeth sweet hymns to God, who, in his affliction, ever praiseth God. The beginning and end of every good Religious is, to love God in his heart, to praise HIM with his mouth; and to edify his brother by his example.

LESSON XXIII.

ZACHEUS, Brother Zachæus, come down from the heights of secular knowledge; come and learn in the school of God, the way of humility; meekness, and patience; by which thou mayest, by CHRIST's teaching, securely attain unto the glory of Eternal Beatitude. AMEN!

THE CONCLUSION.

Write, young Monk, this Alphabet in thy heart; as in a living book: every day look at thy table, and accustom thyself betimes to good usages: the words are few, but they contain many mysteries, and works to make thee perfect; even such works as adorn the outward, and quiet the inward man. Wherein is shown that the life of a good Monk is begun in contempt and self-denial; and going on in the same till it be made perfect in the contemplation of God.

THE BENEDICTION.

Blessed is that disciple who followeth CHRIST by the rough way: giving up to HIM both his own will and his own disinclination; who daily carries his cross for CHRIST's sake; that he may have great glory with HIM, and life everlasting. AMEN!

END OF THE MONK'S LITTLE ALPHABET.

CREDULITY AND SUPERSTITION.

Recently, at Paisley estate, a number of the Myalists were engaged in catching the shadow, as they allege, of a person. It would appear that a man named Tom Hill was, in the beginning of this year's crop, head-stillerman on the estate, but during crop the overseer discharged him, and supplied his place with one Sam Henry, formerly a stillerman under him; this led to the impression that Sam Henry had taken Tom Hill's shadow from him "to turn his eye," and so make him stupid, that the former might secure the situation. A Mrs. Plummer (one of the Myalists on the estate,) wanting to show some of her supernatural powers, said she could show them where the shadow was, but it was essential first to procure what they call an "amber" (a yellow bead.) Accordingly, she went out one night, and remained until between twelve and one o'clock, when, on returning home she missed a handkerchief which she had tied about her neck; she then went back, sought for and found it with something knotted up in it, which, on opening, she found to contain "two ambers." Strange to say, the "ambers" were white; nevertheless, the white ambers had the effect of leading Mrs. Plummer to a cotton-tree, in a pasture, near some land given to Tom Hill as a provision ground in slave time, and showed her his shadow or its resemblance in a "Blinkie" [fire fly]; she then ordered that Tom Hill should be dressed in white, which was accordingly done. He was then brought out to the cotton-tree, dressed in a white shirt, white trousers, a white kerchief bound about his head, and a white overall (his wife's night-gown), and then the angels and archangels began to pull his shadow, first, by singing "Obeah kill all my family, oh!" "Bredor Doman point the way to Father Abraham—we will go," &c. &c. Getting tired, however, of singing, dancing, and finding that the shadow would not be coaxed to come down by that means, they made circles with chalk on the tree, like the outer circle of a target, and then the shadow came down the tree three times, to about six feet from the ground, but every time they attempted to catch it it went up again. They then got about a dozen eggs, and threw several of them against the tree, but all to no purpose, until Mrs. Plummer said that the reason the shadow would not come down was, because Tom Hill was too anxious to see it. Immediately on hearing this, a man named James Kindness broke one of the eggs, and daubed

Tom's eyes with the yolk, and, when he was blindfolded in that way, they pretended that they had got hold of the shadow, which they put into a small coffin made for the purpose and nailed it down; they then killed a white fowl near the tree as a remunerative offering for the shadow, which they went to bury, singing at short intervals—

We beah once, we beah no more,
Sing Glory, Hallelujah,
We beah once, we beah no more,
Sing Glory, Hallelujah.

[Britannia, Jan. 28.]

DANIEL O'CONNELL.

The State Trials are now concluded. The jury-packing-and-challenge-sending-Attorney-General for Ireland has done his masters' bidding, and gained their object. An Orange jury have convicted; and what is the result? In Ireland Repeal has become not merely a civil but a religious question. The Act for Catholic Emancipation is deemed to have been practically annulled. If England a ferment has arisen for the threatened right of liberty of discussion. O'Connell is the most popular man in the United Kingdom, and to all it is evident that were he put in prison he would be more victorious than ever. His own manly defence before the jury, devoid as it was of all meretricious ornament, was perhaps the most successful effort of his public life. If not convincing as an argument for Repeal, and it is the best that has yet been pleaded, it has produced a profound impression on the minds of Englishmen and Scotchmen in his favour. Students of human nature, and of the peculiarities of character, see and say that for this man to have entertained purposes of violence and insurrection is a moral impossibility—a contradiction of his very nature—a supposition irreconcilable not merely with his life but with his idiosyncrasy. What is Mr. O'Connell in politics? Why he is the discoverer of the might of constitutional and peaceful agitation. This is his idea. This is the birth of his genius. This is the core of the man. This is Daniel O'Connell. Subduing opinion by opinion, and organising large bodies of men as moral missionaries of their convictions. This is his strength. This makes him a Samson. Let a particle of physical force mingle with this moral power and his strength goes out of him, and he becomes like other men. No wonder though he spurned the approaches of physical force Chartists, and revolutionary Americans and Frenchmen. By the order of his Holiness the Pope, the prayers of the sanctuaries of his religion ascend daily to Heaven for this man. Something approaching adoration characterises the feelings of his countrymen towards him; and all these testimonies to him, whether from him who sits on the chair of St. Peter, or in the heart of the humblest peasant who is proud that he was born in the Liberator's county, proceed from the deep conviction that he is a man of peace and not a man of blood. In spite of national and religious prejudices against him, all men who have any clearness of sight or candour of heart, are beginning to perceive that in his inmost soul Daniel O'Connell loves Ireland. A man of peace and a man of patriotism strong in a disinterested career, devoted to his religion and his race, in spite of faults of taste and temper, men see in him a touch of the heroic—whether when the young barrister labours for unnoticed years to turn apathy into enthusiasm for Catholic Emancipation, or whether grown the great and powerful representative of a nation, he declines the highest honours of his profession, that he may still labour to make every Irishman the equal of every Englishman.—Westminster Review.

THE CATHOLIC BAR.

(From the Nation.)

Sir James Graham, in the course of the debate, disparaged the Catholic bar of Ireland, because Protestants and ~~Tories~~ were employed for the defence of the traversers in the late State trials. We are puzzled to determine whether this was a blunder or a fraud. Is he ignorant of the history of a mere Irish body, or does he "make the worse appear the better reason," as part of his official duty? Heaven (and we suppose "the gentleman on the other side,") know; but a grosser misrepresentation was never made even in Parliament.

The success of the Catholic bar has been a miracle. It has actually no parallel in history. They took fortune by assault, and carried her gallantly. Look at the facts:—

Fifty years ago, Catholics were not admissible to the profession of the law. They obtained the restitution of that right in 1793—and any inquiry into their success must date from this period.

And when the profession was thrown open to them, how were they prepared to avail themselves of it? They were fresh from enduring penal laws for a century—laws which prohibited education and the acquirement of property—the two main essentials to success. A limited number had procured, on the Continent or by stealth, a liberal education; but only a small section of these had an income that would justify them in attempting so slow and hazardous a profession.

This was their condition fifty years ago, when, for the first time from the Revolution, a single Catholic could become a barrister. And the first adventurers found it no easy road to success. The attorneys were unfriendly from political prejudices; the judges (too dignified for such motives) from others more ethereal; and for full forty of the fifty years that have since elapsed, the Government bitterly hostile or coldly indifferent. Yet, with all these disadvantages, what have they done?

They have produced five times as many distinguished men as the rest of the bar, in proportion to their numbers. A glance at the men who have attained eminence will demonstrate this. Within a few years they have had Sir Michael O'Loughlen, confessedly the best Judge that ever sat on the Irish Bench.

Chief Baron Woulfe, whose reputation in the House of Commons was higher than any Irish Minister's since Plunket.

Richard Sheil, whom it is sufficient to name.

Justice Ball, an unequalled equity lawyer.

The late Attorney-General for the Whigs, Mr. Pigot; and last, but, we believe, not least, Daniel O'Connell.

We pass over a multitude of men who have distinguished themselves highly, as unnecessary to our illustration, and taking these six only, where will Sir James Graham find twenty-four men to equal them who have flourished since their admission to the bar? The Catholic barristers are less than one-fourth of the whole number; and when O'Connell and Sheil were called they were probably less than one-eighth; but, taking them at the former proportion, who were the four and twenty men of their ability and reputation among their contemporaries?

We do not know them.

In addition to this Sir James Graham is wholly mistaken in supposing that the defence was conducted by Protestant Conservative barristers. They were selected to address the jury as most likely to influence them, for obvious reasons; but many of the most important details were conducted by O'Hagan, O'Loughlen and Close—the Catholic juniors. If this end had not been in view, it is notorious that one of them—Mr. O'Hagan—would have performed that duty as effectively as any of the able advocates in the case, judging by his matchless speech on a former State prosecution.

These sectarian comparisons are always disagreeable, and seldom useful; but we cannot permit England to make a commodity of her own injustice, by charging us with deficiencies which she has created, and others that do not exist.

THE PUSEYITES, ANGLICANS, &c.

A YAWN IN THE ESTABLISHMENT.—There is a report in circulation that a large body of "the Evangelical clergy" are about to secede from the Established Church and to set up a distinct communion on the principles of Episcopacy. Is there any truth in such a rumour? It is certain that the following advertisement appeared in the Record of Monday last:—"It being in contemplation to form an Episcopal church, separate from the State, with a revised Liturgy, those who are favourable to this object are earnestly requested to communicate by letter," &c.—John Bull.

GIFTS.—The Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol has given a donation of two thousand pounds towards the erection of churches in his diocese, for the especial benefit of the poor. Bishop Philpotts hath given a few thousand hard words to the people of Plymouth to promote the same noble object; and at Truro, he announced his intention to give the tenth of a mining estate which he had got "by a chance he little foresaw," out of the hands of the lessees who held it—the "chance" being the decision of the Court of Chancery. It is more noble to give out of the regular income, than to share windfalls with Heaven, after this fashion.—Western Times.

IGNORANCE AND THE LORD'S PRAYER.—The following is an extract from the diary of the Rev. J. Clay, B.A., Chaplain of the House of Correction in this town, contained in the eighth Report of the Inspectors of Prisons for the Northern and Eastern District. Mr. Clay uses it as evidence to show that the great mass of our convict population are entirely uneducated and uninstructed in the elements of religious truth:—"One of the women under sentence of transportation, named B., requested a few days ago that I would 'christen' her. She said she believed she had not been baptised, unless it was by the midwife who attended her mother. In the course of the conversation which followed, this poor woman's ignorance of the most elementary religious truths was painfully evident. She appeared to know that she was responsible for her conduct—that 'Christ died for us all'—yet she did not know that he was 'our Saviour.' She appears to be actuated by proper motives in making this request, and very solemnly declares her intention of leading a better life in future. To-day I had another interview with her. She had forgotten the name of our Saviour. I requested her to repeat the Lord's Prayer, which she said she had frequently used. She began in these words—'Our father, church in Heaven, I'll be wed i'thy name.' I could scarcely believe that these were the expressions she uttered, but the matron's quicker ears caught them, and the poor woman repeated them more slowly and distinctly when desired to do so."—Preston Chronicle.

IRISH BISHOPS.—On adding together the sums sworn to in the probates of the wills of eleven Irish bishops, the total amount left was found to be in round numbers one million eight hundred thousand pounds. In all Ireland there are not more than four hundred thousand episcopal Protestants, so that these bishops were paid alone at the rate of nearly five pounds per head for every man, woman, and child under their "episcopal care," exclusive of the money they spent upon themselves and families, and exclusive of the pay of all the inferior church clergy. No wonder the Roman Catholics of Ireland look with indignation upon such a state of affairs. If these revenues had been in the hands of their real and legal owners the Catholic bishops, twelve hundred thousand pounds of this money, at least, would have been expended on the poor of Ireland, and on building churches, schools, and colleges.—Tyne Mercury.

ON THE EFFICACY OF THE NAME OF JESUS.

(From the Catholic Magazine.)

JESUS! Redeemer of the world,
Thy praise shall pierce the sky,
Thy glorious banner is unfur'd
Triumphantly on high.

Thy mercies how shall we recount,
For time would fail to tell
Thy wondrous love, the rich amount,
Beyond our notes to swell.

When on the bed of sickness prest,
With pain and anguish sore,
How was the NAME of JESUS, blest,
All powerful to restore.

Then let us prize this precious NAME
Beyond remedial aid,
JESUS! who raised the dead the same,
Hath pain and sickness stayed.

To FATHER, SON, and SPIRIT still,
United praise be given,
By those who strive to do His will
On earth as 'tis in heaven.

M. S.

Feast of the HOLY NAME OF JESUS.

THE

BENGAL

CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

No. 24.]

CALCUTTA : SATURDAY, JUNE 15, 1844.

[VOL. VI.

POOR CHRISTIANS AT GWALIOR.

We earnestly invite the attention of our readers to the letter of Captain Graham, of the Engineers, which appears in this day's Herald. The Catholic Community owe a great debt of gratitude to that excellent gentleman, for the prompt and efficient course he has pursued, in order to obtain immediate relief for the numerous Christians who have been reduced to the utmost destitution by the late proceedings at Gwalior. We trust, that, unwilling as Government unfortunately shows itself, to extend any charitable aid to its Catholic subjects, yet, that it will not overlook the sufferings of so many hundred persons, especially as these, unintentionally, it is true, on the part of Government, have resulted from the late political changes at Gwalior. As Catholics, we cannot abstain from expressing our delight at the truly edifying and admirable conduct of the Rev. F. Felix. He has indeed shown himself a true Shepherd, and not a hireling in the sanctuary. Neither can we refrain from offering the tribute of our most respectful gratitude to the noble minded and truly liberal Protestant gentleman, who, Captain Graham informs us, acted so faithfully the part of the good Samaritan towards his destitute brethren. We rejoice to learn that a Committee has been already organized by the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic of Bengal to collect subscriptions for the poor Christians at Gwalior. From the well known benevolence and energy of the gentlemen who compose that Committee, we are sanguine in anticipating the most gratifying success of their exertions. The Archbishop has also addressed a Circular, which we subjoin, to each of the Clergy of the Bengal Vicariate, calling on them to co-operate in their respective districts with the Committee in soliciting alms; to relieve the extreme want of the Christians at Gwalior.

CIRCULAR TO THE CLERGY OF THE BENGAL VICARIATE.

REV. DEAR SIR,

I beg to call your attention to the letter of Captain Graham, to be published in the Bengal Catholic Herald of the 15th instant. You will perceive, by reading over that letter, that by occasion of the late political changes at Gwalior, between three and four hundred Christians are reduced to the utmost destitution. Their deplorable condition has so much affected the benevolent heart of a Protestant Gentleman, who holds an important office at Gwalior, that he has most charitably interposed in their favor, and has caused Captain Graham to co-operate with him in their relief. No one can feel more sensibly than I do, how painful it is to be obliged to appeal weekly to the charity of the Faithful, to succour the various wants which I am compelled to submit to their notice. But what is to be done? Can I look on supinely, when so many of their brethren stand in need of spiritual and temporal relief? Can the Shepherd remain unmoved, whilst the flock is perishing? No, it is the command of St. Paul to Timothy to be instant in season and out of season, and in virtue of this sacred injunction, I hesitate not to lay before my affectionate and generous people all the wants that afflict their Brethren, not only in Bengal, but also in the other neighbouring regions, where Catholicity has been introduced. Within the last few months, out of our poverty, we have ministered to the relief of our brethren in China, in Singapore, and in the Cape of Good Hope. Who, amongst the Faithful of Bengal can say, that he is now the poorer, because of the succour he has administered to his suffering Brethren in the Churches above enumerated; on the contrary, is it not the glorious truth, for which we all owe an unspeakable debt of gratitude to God, that from the very moment in which we began to show charity to our distressed brethren, from that instant, God began, on his part, to shower down in abundance his choicest blessings on the Mission of Bengal, to multiply the number of believers, and to raise up in that which was hitherto a wilderness, seminaries for the preservation and multiplication of the seed of Abraham, of the children of the Church. In the true spirit, then, of Catholic Christianity, let us, for the present, forget all our own numerous and most pressing necessities, in order that we may relieve our suffering brethren. I do not expect, from the poverty of my flock, large contributions; my great anxiety is, that in your district every Catholic should evince, by his alms, however trifling in amount, his charity for the faithful who now implore his assistance. This happy combination it is, that will draw down the Divine blessing upon us, because it will show, that like the first Christians, we have but one mind and one heart, and that, in accordance with the precept of our divine Saviour, we love, not in word or in tongue, but in deed and in truth. With earnest prayer that God may pour down his choicest blessings on you and on your flock,

I remain, Rev. Dear Sir,

Your affectionate

Chief Pastor, in Jesus Christ,

✠ P. J. CAREW,

Archbishop of Edessa,

Vicar Apostolic of Bengal.

MOST REVEREND FATHER,—I feel that I need no apology for addressing your Grace on the following occasion, for though the care of the poor of Gwalior more nearly concerns us of the Upper Provinces, yet we are almost all so poor, and the distress is of such magnitude, that no sufficient relief is possible without soliciting the aid of the charitable at large. Your Lordship may have seen by the public journals that consequent on the British interference at Gwalior, many Christians in the army of the Maharajah were thrown out of employ, and that they are now without the means of earning a subsistence. A letter has just reached me from a kind benevolent Protestant friend at Gwalior, attached to the new contingent, whose charity knows no distinction of sects, and whose philanthropy led him to make enquiry into the number and actual condition of those unfortunates, and refer to me for advice and assistance. He states that there are 89 heads of families and 38 widows, comprising with their families 308 souls, thus bereft of the means of support; and he assures me that they are all in an utter state of destitution and many of them actually starving; that the resident priest, the Rev. Fr. Felix, has extended his last means in administering to their wants, and that, without aid from other quarters, the poor creatures must inevitably perish! My esteemed friend sends me a list of the sufferers' names, "drawn up", he says, "at my request by Padre Felix, who is naturally most anxious that these poor ones of his flock should be preserved from want and misery, which must soon assuredly be their portion, unless we, their more fortunate brethren, take up their cause and contribute what we can afford to their relief, and it would be a scandal to the Christian religion, if so many of its poor professors are left to starve in the midst of plenty." There is an opinion abroad that a distinct promise of provision for these discharged Catholics was given to Lord Ellenborough previous to his leaving Gwalior; but I fear this cannot have been the case, for hitherto nothing has been done, and only a few days ago a peremptory order was given by the Maharajah that they should decamp the country forthwith, though this was disowned on the representation to Sir Richmond Shakespear. The poor creatures have hitherto been buoyed up with the expectation of Government provision; but this will no longer avail, and nothing but immediate aid from the charitable can save them from begging and starvation. Efforts are making for this end; but in the mean time I feel that these unfortunate poor, being Catholics, have an especial claim on those who are of the same "Household," and that we should be emulous to come forward to the utmost of our power by the laudable fact of a Protestant having so zealously befriended them regarding them as Brethren in Christ, and brought their lamentable state to our notice. May I then solicit your Grace, to take the above under your powerful advocacy, recommending the deplorable case to your Lordship's various Churches. I am aware of the many heavy calls upon the charitable community of Bengal, but there are few so urgent and indispensable as this. Any sums will be thankfully received by the Rev. Fr. Felix of Gwalior, to whom I would beg to suggest they should be remitted as collected, as the smallest donations are immediately called for. I hope your Grace will not deem it presumptuous my appealing to you on this sad emergency. Soliciting your Lordship's blessing and remembrance of myself and family at the altar, I remain, with the highest esteem,

Your Lordship's humble servant,

W. H. GRAHAM,
Captain Engineers.

Mussooree, 1st June 1844.

THE DEATH OF THE HON'BLE AND REV. MR. CLIFFORD.

We grieve to have to announce that the Hon'ble and Rev. Mr. Clifford, S. J. attached to the Madura Mission, was drowned while bathing in a river near Trichinopoly.—The following authentic account from Doctor Rose, Civil Assistant Surgeon at Combaconum, of the lamented death of this truly good pastor, we have been permitted by his Grace to publish.

MY DEAR LORD,—With feelings of ineffable regret I have to announce to your Grace the melancholy and premature death of our esteemed and talented friend the Hon'ble and Rev. Mr. Clifford. This sad catastrophe occurred two or three days ago, a few miles from Trichinopoly, near a native village containing some Catholics, to whom our poor friend was going to administer spiritual relief. He was riding along the banks of the Caverey, and feeling rather hot and feverish, he told the two men who accompanied him to retire to some little distance as he wished to bathe; the men advised him not to do so at that particular spot, as the river was very deep, but he only told them to leave him, and not return until called. They retired to some distance and after a short time observed him apparently to lose his footing and slip into the river, and, from fear or stupidity, the fellows never stirred from their position, where, by their own account, they remained for two hours! when at length, becoming alarmed, they came to look after their poor master, who, alas! by that time had gone to his last awful account.

The body was found the same evening, and taken to Trichinopoly for interment.

This distressing circumstance has thrown all the Catholics of this neighbourhood into the most profound affliction,—every one who had the honor and pleasure of his acquaintance, feels this sad shock most painfully, and by none, I am quite satisfied, will it be more severely felt, than by your Grace, for whom he always entertained the most profound respect.

I should be doing much violence to my feelings were I to mix up any less important matter with this truly distressing subject.

Humbly imploring the Almighty Disposer of events to bless you for many years yet to come with health of soul and body,

Believe me, my dear Lord,

Gratefully and sincerely yours,

WILLIAM ROSE.

Combaconum, }
25th May, 1844. }

FROM A CONVERT.

The following edifying letter from a recent Convert to the address of the Archbishop will be read with interest:—

MY LORD,—I had the honor of being favored with your Lordship's edifying epistle dated so far back as the 4th March, and the gratification I experienced in being aware that I held a place in your Lordship's attention, was certainly great, and I only hope that, by the grace of God I may be able so to conduct myself through life as to secure your Lordship's good opinion of me and be remembered in your prayers.

I would have made it my paramount consideration to give an earlier acknowledgment to your Lordship's kind favor, but I was diffident in doing so, as it would be an intrusion on your Lordship's time and devotion during the Penitential season.

I sincerely wish, my Lord, that my separated brethren would for a moment reflect on the momentous subject of their salvation, and I am persuaded they would eagerly seek our blessed Saviour by the path pointed out in our holy religion by Him. The composure and peace of mind which one and all of us have enjoyed since our conversion is really inexpressible. Nothing, my Lord, will be wanting on my part and that of my family in the conversion of others, and, with the Divine aid, I hope I may be able to afford such exemplary conduct through life as to induce others to profess the true faith.

I feel grateful for your Lordship's parental advice, and assure you that, aware of the rebellious spirit and feelings I hitherto evinced to the Divine being, my daily prayers are offered to the merciful seat of heaven to appease the anger which I richly merit for my obstinacy and perverseness in deriding so long the true religion. I beg your Lordship's and the prayers of all my pastors on my behalf.

Need I assure your Lordship that I do not forget my separated brethren in my daily prayers, nor those Catholics who are nominally so. May grace direct, enlighten, and rescue them. By admonition and counsel I am endeavouring always to point out to them the enormity of their sins, and I pray God that the mists may be cleared, and may they be able to discern the true faith to obtain salvation.

I cannot conclude my letter without bringing to your Lordship's notice the kindness of Mr. R. J. Loughnan, in having presented me with some valuable works of devotion, the perusal of which has strengthened me in my faith, and will enable me to demonstrate the truth of the Catholic, and prove the falsity of the Protestant religion. I entreat your Lordship's fervent prayers for the conversion of a large number of my relatives situated far, and distant from me, and beg your blessings for my family and myself.

I have the honor to be,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most obdt. & hum. servt.

J. JACKSON.

Zillah Backergunge,
Bhompul, 1st June, 1844.

ST. THOMAS, THE APOSTLE OF THE INDIES.

For the information of the correspondent of the Englishman who signs himself A SUBSCRIBER AND FRIEND, we have much pleasure in extracting the following, from Butler's Lives of the Saints :—

After the descent of the Holy Ghost, St. Thomas commissioned Thaddæus to instruct and baptize Abgar, king or toparch of Edessa. This prince, according to the records kept in the church of Edessa, transcribed by Eusebius, (1) and mentioned by St. Ephrem, (2) had wrote to Christ to invite him into his kingdom, and begging to be cured by him of a distemper with which he was afflicted. Christ, in his answer, told him, that he must accomplish the things for which he was sent, and then return to him who sent him; but that immediately after his ascension he would send one of his disciples to the king, to heal him, and give life to him and all his family.* This promise of our Lord was made good by St. Thomas, who, by a special direction of the Holy Ghost, sent Thaddæus, one of the seventy-two disciples, and, according to some, his own brother, to Edessa, who restored the king to his health, baptized him and many others, and planted Christianity in that country. This disciple Thaddæus is distinct from St. Judas the apostle, and is honoured by the Greeks,

(1) Hist. l. 1. c. 13. p. 36 ed Cantabr.

(2) S. Ephr. in Testam. t. 2. p. 235 ed. Vatic. anno 1743.

* This letter of Abgar to Christ, and our Lord's answer, are rejected as counterfeit by Erasmus, Coster, Melchior, Cano, Bellarmin. Dupin, Rich, Simon, and Natalis Alex. sec. 1. diss. 3. Among the Protestants, by Rivet, Hornbeck, the younger Spanheim, &c.; but are stiffly maintained to be genuine by Tillemont. t. 1, Edessens et Obroena, l. 3. p. 104. Jos. Simon Assemani, Bibl. Orient. t. 1. p. 318. 430. 554. Joan. Albert. Fabricius, Codex Apocryphus N. Test. t. 1. p. 317. Le Gues. Orig. Christ. t. 2. p. 624. Mamachi, Orig. Eccles. t. 2. p. 301.

who tell us that he died at Berytus in Phenicia on the 21st of August. As for St. Thomas Origen (3) informs us, that in the distribution made by the twelve, Parthia was particularly assigned to him for his apostolic province, when this nation held the place of the Persian empire and disputed the sovereignty with the Romans. After preaching with good success in the particular province of Parthia, he did the same in other nations subject to that empire, and over all the East. Sophronius (4) mentions, that by his apostolic labours he established the faith among the Medes, Persians, Carmanians, Hyrcanians, Bactrians, and other nations in those parts. Modern Greeks mention also the Indian and Ethiopians; (5) but these appellations were sometimes given by the ancients to all the eastern nations. The modern Indians and Portuguese tell us, that St. Thomas preached to the Brachmans, and to the Indians beyond the great island Taprobana, which some take to be Ceylon others Sumatra. They add, that he suffered martyrdom at Meliapor, or St. Thomas's, in the peninsula on this side the Ganges, on the coast of Coromandel, where his body was discovered with certain marks that he was slain with lance; and that such was the manner of his death the tradition of all the eastern countries. Eusebius affirms (6) in general, that the apostles died by martyrdom. Theodoret, (7) and St. Asterius of Amasea, (8) mention St. Thomas among the principal martyrs of the Church. St. Nili says, that he received the crown of martyrdom after SS. Peter and Paul. (9) St. Gaudentius mentions, (10) that he was slain by the infidels, and that the miracles which were performed through him, show that he still lives with God. The same father and Sophronius testify, that he died at Calamina in India. This city the modern Indians suppose to be Meliapor. But Tillemont and many others think it was not far from Edessa, and that it is not clear that he ever preached beyond the isle of Taprobana. Beasobre (11) thinks he never preached far beyond Parthia and Persia. For the name of kir Gundaphore, mentioned by Leucius, in his false Acts, and his copier Pseudo Abdias, seems corruptly written for the king of Gundschavur, Gandisapor, which city was rebuilt by Artaxerxes who founded the second Persian monarchy, and called from his son Schavar, whom the Greek name Sapor I. who made it his residence. The author of these false Acts gave to the city the name which it bore when he wrote. All the false Act and the Greek Menæ agree, that the infidel kir was incensed against the apostle for having baptized some persons of his court, (some say his wife and son,) that he delivered him over to his soldiers, in order to be put to death, and that he was conveyed by them to a neighbouring mountain

(3) Orig. ap. Eus. Hist. l. 3. c. 1. p. 87.

(4) Sophron. ap. S. Hier. in Cat. de S. Thomæ. Theodoret, de Leg. Sermon. 9.

(5) Niceph. Hist. l. 2. c. 40.

(6) Eus. in Pa. lxxi, in Collectione Patr. Græc. S. Montfaucon, Proleg. lib. c. 9. p. 38.

(7) Theodoret, de Curand. Græc. Affect. c. 8.

(8) S. Aster. Sermon. 10.

(9) S. Nilas ap. Phot. cod. 276.

(10) S. Gaud. Sermon. 17.

(11) Hist. de Maniché. l. 2. c. 5. p. 401. 406.

tain, and there stabbed with a lance. It is certain that his body was carried to the city of Edessa, where it was honoured in the great church with singular veneration, when St. Chrysostom, Rufin, Socrates, Sozomen, and St. Gregory of Tours (12) wrote. St. Chrysostom says, (13) that the sepulchres only of SS. Peter and Paul, John and Thomas, among all the apostles were then known; and it is mentioned to have been at Edessa in the oration on this apostle compiled in the year 402, published among the works of St. Chrysostom. The church of Edessa was certainly most numerous and flourishing in the second, third, and fourth ages. (14.)

Many distant churches in the East ascribe their first foundation to St. Thomas,* especially that of Meliapor; but many of them probably received the faith only from his disciples. The use of the Chaldean language in the churches, and the dependence on the patriarch of Mosul, which the church of Meliapor, and all the Christians of St. Thomas in the East profess, seem to show, that their first teachers came from the churches of Assyria; in which the patriarchs of Mosul (a city built upon the ruins of Seleucia, erroneously called Babylon) exercise a jurisdiction, and have been for many ages the propagators of the Nestorian heresy, with which they are tinctured. The Portuguese, when they came into the East-Indies, found there the St. Thomas-Christians, it is said, to the number of fifteen thousand families, on the coast of Malabar. For a detail of the Nestorian phrases, and other errors, abuses, and superstitions which prevail among them, see the synod held at Diam-

(12) S. Greg. Tour. Ide Glor. Mart. c. 32.

(13) S. Chrys. Hom. 26. in Hebr. t. 12. p. 237. Rufin Hist. Eccl. 1. 2. c. 5.

(14) See Eus. 1. 5. c. 23. Chron. Edessenum ap. Jos. Assem. t. 1. Bibl. Orient. p. 423. Le Quien, Orient. Christ. t. 2. p. 655.

† The Moguls, and some other nations of Great Tartary, are said to have received the seeds of our holy faith by the preaching of St. Thomas. That it was formerly planted both about Tibet, and in some eastern parts of Great Tartary, toward the borders of China, is unquestionable. The great princes called Prester-John (the last of whom that reigned with great power was conquered and slain by Gingiscan) certainly reigned in Eastern Tartary, in Asia, as Otto Frisingensis. (1. 7. c. 38.) Martinus Polonus. Albericus, Vincent of Beauvais, Sanutus, James of Vitri, Paulus Venetus, &c. assure us; consequently not in Africa, as Renaudot would make us believe, (Hist. Patr. Alex. p. 233 et 337.) an author in accuracy and judgment much inferior to Herbelot, though the collection of the latter is not digested, nor did the compiler compare the parts together. Catrou (Hist. Général de l'Emp. du Mogol, t. 1. p. 7.) is willing to believe, that even Tamerlane leaned to Christianity; but Herbelot. (p. 888.) with more reason, thinks, that he favoured chiefly Mahometanism. Some of these Tartars were Catholics; but many were Nestorians, and obeyed the patriarch of Mosul. Nestorianism was distinguished by several privileges under the Mahometans. (See Renaudot Not. in Vet. Latin. Itiner. in Indiam. n. 319. Assemani, Bibl. Orient. t. 3. p. 108. 215. et vol. 4. p. 94.) The Eutychiens were not less encouraged by the same masters. (See Renaud. Hist. Patr. Alex. p. 108. Jos. Assemani, t. 3. &c. and among the protestants. Mosheim, Hist. Eccl. Tartar. &c.) From the Tartars it seems that the Chinese had formerly some acquaintance with our holy religion, of which the late missionaries found certain monuments. See Mamachi, t. 2. p. 373.

per, in the kingdom of Cochin, in 1599, by Alexius de Menezes, archbishop of Goa; in the preface it is shown, that these Christians were drawn into Nestorianism only in the ninth century, by means of certain Nestorian priests who came thither from Armenia and Persia. On two festivals which they keep in honour of St. Thomas, they resort in great crowds to the place of his burial; on Low-Sunday, in honour of his confession of Christ, which gospel is then read, and chiefly on the 1st of July, his principal feast in the churches of the Indies. John III. king of Portugal, ordered the body of St. Thomas to be sought for in an old ruinous chapel which stood over his tomb without the walls of Meliapor. By digging there in 1523, a very deep vault in form of a chapel was discovered, in which were found the bones of the saint, with a part of the lance with which he was slain, and a vial tinged with his blood. The body of the apostle was put in a chest of porcelain, varnished and adorned with silver. The bones of the prince whom he had baptized, and some other of his disciples, which were discovered in the same vault, were laid in another less precious chest. (15) The Portuguese built a new town about this church, which is called St. Thomas's, inhabited by Christians of several denominations, and situate hard by Meliapor, which is inhabited by the Indians. Many of the Christians of St. Thomas have been brought over to the Catholic faith and Communion; but many continue in the Nestorian errors, and in obedience to the Nestorian patriarch of Mosul. Since the Dutch have taken or ruined most of the Portuguese settlements on that coast, the Indian king of Golcond has taken possession of the town of St. Thomas, but the Portuguese missionaries continue to attend the Catholics there. The Latins keep the feast of St. Thomas on the 21st of December, the Greeks on the 6th of October, and the Indians on the 1st of July.

CONFIRMATION.

Last Sunday, at the Cathedral; his Grace the Archbishop administered the Sacrament of Confirmation to thirty-eight persons.

FEAST OF THE SACRED HEART.

Sunday next being the day on which the Feast of the Sacred Heart is to be solemnized at the Church of Durrumtollah, the Archbishop will celebrate Pontifical High Mass, and the Very Rev. Dr. Kennedy will preach on the occasion.

(15) See Maffei, Indic. 1. 2. p. 85. and Laflau, Hist. des Conquêtes des Portugais dans le Nouveau Monde, 1. 11. t. 1. p. 327, Univ. History, vol. 20, c. 31. p. 108.

LETTER NO. XII.

FROM A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA TO HIS PROTESTANT FRIENDS IN EUROPE.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—In my last, I said that perhaps you would ask me to demonstrate by more pointed and practical illustrations the definition of St. Jude, that, "These are they, who separate themselves, sensual men, having not the Spirit," as being applicable to Protestantism. The only difficulty which may be encountered in doing this, is, how to condense and arrange most aptly the multitude and the magnitude of the cases of disruption which present themselves to view, I feel in attempting to do this something in the same manner as if I were asked to point out the rents and the fragments of one vast and wide ruin: all lies before me, and I see you standing as it were upon one of the ruined abutments—I desire you to look, and behold! there it is—there you are in one almost indescribable confusion and disunion. But this you may view as an ideal picture—It is however easier to sketch such a ruin than to describe it; easier to ask you to look, than for me to carry you as it were and against your will over the broken fragments. Oh! that I could represent it to you as I see it, not as a vision, but as a reality; that I could awaken you from your fatal dream—arouse you from your deep trance, or stop you as you walk in your sleep, or as you reel on intoxicated towards that beetling and fearful precipice! I shudder as I think of the boiling abyss below, and tremble as I meditate how you can cross the dreadful chasm!! I would fain cry out, "my friends, my dear friends, awake, stop, listen, and behold."—Oh God! will you in mercy flash the lightning of your truth upon the minds and senses of my friends and fellow men, so that they may see, in the present profound darkness, the ruinous road before them; or will you, O Lord, in your goodness, be pleased to sprinkle the unction of your grace upon my humble pen, unworthy as I am, that I may be enabled to awaken even a few of my fellow creatures, and to point out to them the devastation which they themselves have helped and do assist to make. Thy will, however, be done. But, my friends, at what period of time, or where am I to begin with your disunions and dissensions? Suppose we take the present day, and look to Scotland! Oh! my dear friends, in dear Scotland, it may appear simple perhaps in me to look at a place in which many really residing at this moment—actually taking a prominent part in pulling wider asunder your before dilapidated Kirk; yes, I could name, even from this distance, the Rev. Father and the Rev. Son who now stand upon or rather cling to different planks of the wreck—Shade of Know! Spirit of Calvin!!! Could you but now view the children of your wild and dark fanaticism! so you broke forth—so you broke down "with axe and hatchet" in the words of the Psalmist, the sacred temples of the Catholic Church, "hath done wickedly in the Sanctuary," and made war upon your fellow man, as they, your followers, would now do to those which you helped to raise up, and to the offspring you left, whether of body or of spirit, were it not that the civil law is too strong for their fury; literally, thine inimical disciples, "roar in the midst of thy congregations, and set up their ensigns for signs" against each other; again would the claymore and the Bible be wielded in each hand by the belligerents and the "Reformers" of the nineteenth century as in days of yore, and who would turn like robbers upon each other, were it not that the present age is too enlightened for such dark deeds. Yes, my friends, you see with your own eyes that one party will not give building ground to the other for the erecting churches thereon, and that the other will not give admittance to the renegades into theirs, so much do they hold each other in religious abhorrence. Wildly and hoarsely indeed does the accursed spirit of disunion laugh at the scene he now enacts in Scotland; he seems as it were for a time to lull the Protestant world in rest, and to steep it in a milky and indifferent lukewarmness, in a fatal and deceptive security, until again he bursts forth like a volcano, spreading his destructive lava—his pernicious principles, wider and wider, becoming bolder and bolder; the only hope is that in his hellish designs he may undo himself; that infatuated man, and whom he has so deeply inebriated, may awaken, open his eyes, recover his senses, and detect the cloven foot, by the horrid glare which he casts around, and thus make clear the wicked plot that has been for ages back hatched underneath by the powers of darkness to plant the Standard of Infidelity upon the ruins of Christianity. Yes, my dear friends, it appears as if you must be brought to the very brink of the precipice, and forced, in a manner, to experience the intense malice of your enemy, before you can be made sensible to your danger; the dark fiend is not satisfied with his somewhat slow but sure success, but he would whirl a giddy Christian world along speedily to perdition; he would not only rob you, as he has already nearly done, of the holy doctrines of the Christian faith, but would deprive you of its very semblance, and unmask you entirely, that you may appear in all the horrid and naked deformity of infidelity; that you may run reckless to destruction—that you may exclaim, “there is no God—all religion is but the shadowy bugbear of the ancients”—for as the Psalmist describes the wicked one, “His mouth is full of cursing, and of bitterness and deceit; under his tongue are labour and sorrow.”—That you may not however deem that this is an hypothesis of my own; the sentiments, as you may think, of a somewhat warm and sensitive imagination, or the lively apprehensions of friendship and affection, awakened by Christian charity, or further conclude that Scotland is alone involved in these fears and forebodings, I will here quote for you a few extracts from the records of the day. I read that the Rev. J. W. Brooke, rector of East Retford, remarked in his discourse, recently published, to this effect—“I witnessed myself in Newcastle, during the Easter of last year (1843) the walls of the town placarded with bills, announcing that, on Easter Sunday, at Joiners’ Hall, lectures would be given, exposing the fraud and fallacy of the Resurrection and Ascension of Christ, and the doctrine of a general resurrection and judgment grounded thereon, the whole concluding with a phantasmagoria, for admission to all which a price was required, and the Clergy were challenged to attend and advocate the opposite side. Placards of a similar character I have frequently observed in Manchester, Edinburgh, and other large towns.” Such is the advanced progress of the sect called Socialism; it is stated that “travelling lecturers” with “tracts” in their hands are perambulating the country for its dissemination, and the English “Observer” of some date back states of it, that, “they had parcelled out the island of Great Britain and Ireland into fourteen main districts, the Congress, which was the great legislative body of the Socialists, meet at different places in different years.” Besides the legislative body, “there is a distinct executive central board which sat at Birmingham; there were no fewer than 350,000 persons regularly visited by these Missionaries, so called, in the course of their itinerant movements.” Again, the blasphemer Patterson published and publicly exposed lately in his shop in London the blasphemous sentiment, that “The fool hath said in his heart there is a God,” and Lord Brougham, I find, is stated to have said before the Committee formed for inquiry into the “Law of Libel” that he had seen a list of one hundred and sixty-three Publications filled with the most irreligious and infidel sentiments—Bishop Porteus acknowledged in his day, that “in some parts of his diocese the people are in a state little short of Pagan ignorance and irreligion.”—The celebrated Hannah More complains in her letters, “while we are sending Missionaries to India, our own villages are in Pagan darkness, and upon many of them scarcely a ray of Christianity has shone.”—The Quarterly Review remarks, in one of its numbers, “the populace of England are more ignorant of their religious duties than they are in any other Christian country,” and it is the observation of the British Critic that, “Infidelity and Indifference, are the prevailing and damning sins of the nation.” And hear and observe what the truly philanthropic Lord Ashley declared at a meeting at Exeter Hall, May, 1843, at which he presided, and at which were present four English Protestant Bishops and a large number of the Clergymen of the Church of England, that, “we are between the two seas of heresy and infidelity; thousands, nay hundreds of thousands, and almost millions of children and young persons now live in a state of more than practical heathenism. I have seen enough, in my commerce with the mighty provinces of the North, to know that the country is resting on a dormant volcano!” And here I may put in, as a strengthener to my observation, the startling fact, that your own religious dissensions threw out the Education Bill which was intended to destroy this gigantic organization of infidelity. But to go on, I find it again in a highly respectable journal of the day, that is, the Quarterly Journal of the Statistical Society of London for April, 1840, in its report on St. John’s and St. Margaret’s parishes, Westminster, stated that out of five thousand three hundred and sixty-six principal members of families amongst the working classes, these were two thousand and seventy-seven who attended no place of worship, and eleven hundred and eighty one who professed no religion at all; when the lower part of the building and the most bulky and combustible materials within have caught fire, it is time for the inmates to take the alarm, and to quit the dwelling speedily,—this, you would say, common sense would dictate; so when the combustible mass of the people, and the strength of the nation, are allowed to grow up in heathenism, and when the infant mind has the seed of infidelity publicly and boldly instilled into it, what hope is there of the salvation of nations, but to give up and quench as it were quickly the terrific principle involved in what is called 'The Reformation.' Protestants themselves seem to see and dread the conflagration, but the more vigorously they strive to put down the growing flame, the more fiercely it appears to burn, as if the watery substance they made use of, was by some demon hand changed into oil. If Churchmen are lukewarm then the religious spirit of the nation gradually moulders and corrodes, if again they show zeal, this but adds fuel to the fanaticism of dissent; it is but a dead carcase on one side; a wild spirit on the other. If at one time the 'waters of contradiction' run muddily and sluggishly along, at another they rush turbulently and furiously down towards the gulf of spiritual anarchy and confusion, and this will bring us either at a slow or galloping pace to that fearful pass which one of the Revd. divines of the Kirk lately and so justly foretold us, in the General Assembly will be eventually our unhappy lot, that, "whenever the sense of religious obligation becomes languid, it may be predicted that the dissolution of social order is at hand!"* Alas! it does not require the eyes of an Argus to see the prediction assuming a shape in the dark shadow before us; the terrible element is thickly gathering around us; this we may see, that the terrific principle produced at the Reformation is like mountain torrents furiously rushing into one great reservoir, until that reservoir presently gives way, and carrying devastation to all within its reach, or we may view it like a mighty engine, an infernal machine, which in its continual revolve converges gradually the mind of the nation, nay, of Christendom, to one fatal point, to Infidelity." The infidels of Germany and France have long been distilling the accursed spirit, which England is now beginning so extensively to infuse; it is not the ignorant alone, but the learned who foster it—Universities support its Professors, and talented lecturers traverse the land, inoculating in their course the rising generation with the poisonous matter; the pestilential vapour is spreading largely and widely; the written sentiments of Protestants of the present day are somewhat different to that of their fathers. Latitudinarianism is fast running into scepticism, and in this dance of death, the latter is close upon the heels of what their children may see in their old age; alas! the dark figure of

* "Unitarians multiply, and calmly persevere; Methodists multiply, and rage, and swagger: High-church men hate both, and abuse both; 'The Church is in danger,' I own it, but let them look to it who have brought it on, and who will not adopt the only method of saving it, (reforming themselves); As sure as the uprooted tree must bend, or the tower undermined must bow, so surely our Church must fall, unless it be reformed in the good opinion of the people."—Life of Dr. Parr, by Field, Vol. II. p. 126.

Infidelity already casts his shadow before him; he is an infant giant now to what he may be then; then their infidel children may laugh at you their now half unchristianized Grandfathers, for some of you still believe in the Resurrection, Ascension, and general judgment. I look then upon Protestantism itself as a dark, potentous, surcharged cloud filling nearly one side of the sphere with its dark form, while Catholicism like the orb of day shines upon the other, so I cannot but fear that lurid and fatal lightnings and destructive thunderbolts will naturally proceed from the first before the spiritual horizon can or will clear up—Let us now look how awfully it lowers over Scotland, and how threateningly it glares around England. In the General Assembly, but I must carry the subject to my next letter.

Your's faithfully,
C. A. C.

Original Poetry.

THE PENITENT SOUL'S ADDRESS TO THE SACRED HEART OF JESUS.

O honor and praise to the thorn-crowned Heart!
Each fibre 's a beam, and each beam is a dart;
Its arteries, streamlets of pure liquid fire,
Its pulse, the emotions of love's fond desire.

Hail, bright sun of love!—It is good to be here,
The Heart of my God let me see without fear;
Still let me approach and in extacy gaze,
Till spirit and flesh shall ignite in the blaze.

The Heart of my Jesus!—How bright are its flames!

How pointed the arrows of fire that it aims;
How skilful the archer, the victims how few,
That die to the world and live, Lord, to you.

O furnace of love and of melting desires!
Why is not the world consumed in thy fires?
Why is not thy brightness a sun to my soul,
To cheer it, to light it, to melt, to console?

Divine King of hearts, ever faithful to me,
What I gave to the world, had I given to thee,
My heart soft as wax 'neath thy pure living ray,
Thy hand had obeyed, as the potter's, the clay;—

My tears and my hopes, my affections and sighs,
Had daily gone up to thy throne in the skies,
And met by thy smile, like a vision of bliss,
Had forestall'd the joys of the next life, in this.

Thrice hail, radiant beauty, thou captor of hearts!
The joy how serene, which thy brightness imparts!

How sweet thy communings, thyself, King, how dear,

Ah! still let me see thee, ah! still let me hear.

O! see where the ransom of man was designed,
Where Love all the splendour of glory resigned,
Where Mercy a throne for the dearer Cross gave,
And the Death of his God purchased life for the slave.

O! see where the wonder of Angels began,
Where order was changed and their God became man,
Where Mercy and Justice their claims first combined,
And Innocence paid for the guilt of mankind.

O! see where the Godhead resides still in love,
With all his bright treasure of grace from above,
And see where the ardour of love yet remains,
And yet of the coldness of mortals complains;
Complains of their sins, their neglect and their fears.

Complains, but invites them to mercy and tears;
Complains of his own, of his own, most of all,
Who love him too little, or love not at all.

Ah! well does my God of his servant complain,
So favoured, so loved, but who loved not again;
As her chickens the hen, as her nestlings the dove,
Thou wouldst press me to rest in thy bosom of love.

Then pierce my poor heart with an arrowy ray,
Its hardness subdue, and its gloom chase away,
Let it languish and pine in love's luscious pain,
Till the spark shot from thine consumes ev'ry stain.

Transfixed by thy shafts, let it die, let it live:
But be thine ev'ry throb, the last beat, it shall give;

And should one string not answer the breathing of thine,

Tear it, Lord, from my bosom—it shall not be mine.

G.

NATIVE MISSION AT COWCOLLY.

Collections at the Fort Chapel,	34	8
Collections at the Dhurrumtollah Church, 16 10
Do. at the Bow Bazar Chapel,	40	4
Do. through the Rev. E. Veralli,	23	8
From a friend through the Rev. J. Storck	25	0

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

Collections through the Rev. Mr. Johnson	28	12
Do. from H. M. Recruits at Dum Dum, through the Rev. Mr. Mascarenhas, . .	3

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

A Convert from Hindooism, through the
very Rev. Dr. Kennedy,	5
From a Friend through the Rev. J. Storck	30

THROUGH MR. N. O'BRIEN.

H. Reynell,	5
W. Cleghorn,	2
R. Maclean,	5
H. W. Dugand,	10
C. Heald,	1
L. A. R.,	2
E. Neil,	2
J. King,	1
R. E. Rogers,	5
J. D. Cooper,	4
S. B.,	1
A. W.,	2
H. H. H.,	2
J. M. L. V.,	5
M. D. Cohen,	5

J. H. Chalk,	4
E. Oakes,	5
W. B. Tydd,	2
Bissumber Law,	1
C. Waller,	5
W. A. Peacock,	5
H. Burn,	5
Captain Champney,	10
Bahoo Roop Lall Mullick,	5
T. Statham	8
P. Garvey	6

LIST OF SUBSCRIBERS IN AID OF
THE SUFFERING CATHOLICS AT Gwalior.

His Grace the Most Rev. Dr. Carew,
Lord Archbishop, V. A. B.	10
St. John's College, Intally,	7
Loretto House, Calcutta,	5
Ditto, Serampore,	5
Ditto, Chandernagore,	5
Clergy of the Catholic Cathedral,	8
Rev. Mr. Veralli, Durumtollah Church,	2
Mrs. Gray,	10
J. Lyall,	5
D. C. Mackey,	5
J. Rennie,	3
H. C. Lackersteen,	5
C. A. Lackersteen,	3
M. C. Lackersteen,	3
C. R. Lackersteen,	5
W. R. Lackersteen,	3
Adeline Lackersteen,	2
Anthony William Lackersteen,	1
Lorenza Lackersteen,	1
Bonaventure John Lackersteen,	1
Edward Olliffe Lackersteen,	1
Caroline Rozalen Lackersteen,	1
Delphina Lackersteen,	1
Catherine Angelena Lackersteen,	1
Mary Lackersteen,	1
Joseph Polycarp Lackersteen,	1

Subscriptions for the Destitute Christians at Gwalior will be gratefully received by the Catholic Clergy of the several Churches in Calcutta, by Messrs. Lackersteen and Brothers, and by Messrs. P. S. D'Rozario and Co. No. 8, Tank Square.

Selections,

DISORDERLINE.—SHOOKING PROFANITY.—For a considerable time past various congregations have been annoyed in their devotional exercises by bands of young lads who, imagining that the Kirk was the best place for fun to be found on Sabbath, congregated together in seats, and there carried on all manner of frolic—ringing pitchforks on the seats, jerking peas at ladies bonnets, making wry faces at the preacher, and playing cards during the sermon, have been with them common practices, and to such a height have they proceeded, in defiance of public decency, that several ministers have had to stop their discourse and give a public rebuke.—F. Herald.

MISSIONARY HOSPITAL AT NINGPO.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE ENGLISHMAN.

Sir,—In reference to the late discussion in your and other journals, regarding Dr. McGowan's proposed Missionary hospital at Ningpo, will you permit me to make a remark or two. In the first place, I think the public are indebted to you for putting them on their guard, how they part with their rupees to Dr. McGowan. However, at first sight, praiseworthy and benevolent may be the intentions of Dr. McG., and the American Baptist Society with which he is connected, still it is very prudent not to trust our money entirely to them. While we are charitable, we need not be credulous and imprudent. The Friend of India and Hurkaru, who support Dr. McGowan's scheme, differ as to the character in which he comes before the public. The Friend, who ought to know best, says Dr. McG. is sent out to accomplish the views of a religious board, "which directs the attention of its Missionaries exclusively to the propagation of Divine truth among the Heathen." On the other hand, the Hurkaru tells us Dr. McGowan, "is no clergyman." There is some mystery or mistake here, surely; deeply persuaded as I am of the importance of converting the heathen to a belief of the Gospel of Christ, I am perfectly certain in my own mind, from what I have read, as well as from what I have observed in this country, that there is a vast deal of exaggeration and pious legerdemain regarding Missionary projects in distant parts of the world,—distant, I mean, from those who, by their purse, support such schemes. I myself have seen a Missionary engaged in money-making schemes. Even the Friend of India admits, that the American Missionaries in the Sandwich Islands may have used their influence for other purposes than the "propagation of Divine Truth," namely to "foster the Commerce of their fellow countrymen." Then what security have we that Dr. McGowan also may not use his means and influence "to foster the commerce of his fellow-countrymen." How wonderfully soft and harmless that expression sounds, when applied to "trading sectaries"! But there is a tale connected with Protestant Missions in that quarter which, for the edification and warning of those who are too easily imposed upon by popular orators, newspapers, and Missionary magazines, deserves to be well known.

The Friend of India boasts that the Missionaries in the Sandwich Islands, the civilized instructors of a barbarous people, have met with the most gratifying success in converting the inhabitants to the faith of Christ: that more than 30,000 converts have been received into churches, and are now growing up in moral habits. Of these, 6,000 were added to number during the past year. This is, indeed, strange, and, if true, appears a most convincing evidence of Divine power—more so, we consider that, for the first seven years Baptist Mission laboured in India, only one convert was made. But the following extract, the lecture of a celebrated Divine, delivered not a few years ago, may throw some light on these wonderful conversions among the Islanders of the Pacific.

"I have with me," says the Lecturer, "Extracts from writers describing the state of these Islands, after they had been, not converted, but subjugated by the Missionaries, who, after having made themselves masters of the whole temporal dominion of the Islands; after having made the king and his people their slaves; after having stripped the people of their simplicity of character, for which they were before remarkable, have reduced the country to such a state of wretchedness, that persons who have since visited it, declare that, instead of a blessing, the new religion has been its utter ruin." Among other things tending to their deterioration, he states, "That feuds, quarrels, and disputes have been so general, that a prince, one of the most intelligent persons in the country, and the first to embrace Christianity on the arrival of the Missionaries, had fitted out an expedition to emigrate from his own country, because he could not bear the severity of their yoke." In support of these assertions, the lecturer refers to "Voyage of H. M. S. Blond to the Sandwich Island," London, 1827; Quarterly Review, vol. 35, p. 400, and 70, p. 609; Kotzebue's second voyage round the World, and "Augustus Toole's account of nine month's residence in New Zealand." Speaking of the apparent ease and success with which converts have been made in these islands, the above lecturer remarks further:—

"It is a singular fact, that this is almost the only instance on record of a nation having been the first to desire Christianity; and consequently of their having been willing to receive it, under whatever form it might first come. It is a known fact, that the natives of these islands, in consequence of seeing the superiority of traders from other nations, and principally of those from America, were led to ask for Missionaries, to propagate Christianity among them. This at once forbids our considering the establishment of Christianity then as the result of any principle of faith presented to the acceptance of individuals. They conceived that Christianity was a better system than their own, because they had seen it give men a superiority of mind and character, and with exceeding good sense no doubt they determined on embracing it."

The public are not aware what immense sums yearly are expended in support of the various Protestant Missions. In the year 1824, it was boasted in a Protestant Missionary magazine, that £1,000 a day was expended on the work of conversion, and the Missionary register exhibits a table, showing the progressive increase enjoyed by religious Protestant societies, from 1823 to 1835, in which there is a steady advance from £367,373 to £778,035 per annum. A great part of this enormous sum is expended in attempting to convert the heathen natives of the East. In my opinion, there is a great extravagance in this expenditure, and but little fruit to show for it all. If half of this yearly sum had been at the disposal of the Jesuits, or any body of Christian Missionaries actuated with their zeal—true Apostolic Missionaries I mean—we would have had more fruit. Our Protestant Missions in general I think are nice provisions for married clergymen, whose cares and anxieties about their wives and families, in this tropical climate, divert too much of their attention; and occupy too much of their thoughts. The Jesuits have only their pupils to occupy their attention; and their enthusiasm and energy are well known in the work of teaching. They sacrifice many things, too, which, however allowable or gratifying to the natural feelings and inclinations of mankind, would obstruct them in the noble work of instructing and Christianising the Pagan nations of the earth. Some among the company of the twelve Apostles were guilty of treason to their master, of lying and ingratitude. The members of the Society of the Jesuits may not be all free from reproach either. But shall we for the faults of a few Jesuits, condemn the whole body, and not acknowledge the noble and disinterested manner in which so many of them devote all the energies of their mind, to the heavenly work of instructing the ignorant, reclaiming the vicious, and comforting the sick and afflicted; aye, and that too, at the sacrifice of those comforts, feelings, and indulgences, which so many of our well-paid Protestant Missionaries will not, for their work's, and for their master's sake, forego? The Friend of India, whose liberality and benevolence embrace all the good and virtuous of every sect and creed, I expect, some day ere long, to see sounding the praise of some of our good Jesuit teachers, and exulting in the success of their benevolent exertions, to dispel the darkness of heathen ignorance. Why don't you set on foot a subscription to extend the benefit of Seal's College, and ask the Friend to put in a word in favor of the Jesuits? But, seriously, what have the various Protestant Sectarian bodies; nay all the Protestant Missions, done in the East, since their establishment, with all their lavish expenditure of money and bibles? How many native congregations of Christians can they show? A few conversions no doubt, owing to local and peculiar circumstances, we may expect, and the several missionaries have done a good deal in the way of giving many of the natives an education such as will fit them to make good karannies, and to conduct English correspondence in their own mercantile transactions. This is, no doubt a benefit to them, so far as it goes, but it is not conversion to Christianity. The apostles, or their official successors, who converted the several nations of Pagan Europe, never perhaps could boast that they expended £1,000 a day in the work of conversion, or had so many printing presses in their employment to print bibles, as our Protestant Missionaries have. Yet the original and earlier missionaries, with their scanty means, were successful, while our modern Missionaries are not, at least our Protestant Missionaries, for some years ago, the Church Missionary Society confessed, and declared by their mouth-piece, the Revd. Mr. Beckersteth, that "in the course of the first ten years, the Society never heard of a single individual who passed from idolatry to Christianity." The only sect who have succeeded decidedly as yet in the conversion of the natives of India, to such an extent as to give reasonable promise of their exertions leading to a national movement in favor of Christianity, is the Roman Catholics, and that, too, with means so slender—human means, that is to say—when compared with what has been at the disposal of our Protestant religious societies, as to justify the Catholics in referring their success to a higher power than wealth, printing presses, or popularity—efficacious as these influences are, in promoting the success of any scheme. When I see how some of our Protestant Missions are managed, with what liberality the funds are expended, and what a meagre account of conversions they have to give in India; and know at the same time that almost one-half of our poorer population at home are in such a state of gross ignorance as not to be able to affix their own signature to any document, I am forcibly impressed with the truth of the old adage,—that charity begins at home; and think we should direct our efforts, and expend our money, more on the education of our own countrymen, instead of supporting so many benevolent schemes abroad,—such as a Missionary Hospital at Ningpo, over which the subscribers can have no direct control or superintendence, so as to prevent abuses.

Yours, &c.
X.

RELIGIOUS TOLERATION.

Not only our whole system of religion, but our whole system of religious toleration, in which so many people in this country are interested, depends, upon the laws on which the Reformation has been founded.—Speech of the Duke of Wellington, 18th March, 1844.

The above is one of those short and pithy dicta which the Noble Duke sometimes delivers, and which, by a large class of Englishmen, are taken for gospel. What then is the kind of religious toleration founded on the laws of the Reformation? Let history answer. Under these laws, have not the Catholics been compelled to participate in all the burdens of the state, but prohibited from aspiring to any of its rewards or honors? Is this the toleration founded on the Reformation? In England, no Catholic can give, or till lately at least could not, grant lands, money, or other property, for the permanent endowment of any Catholic clergyman, house of worship, school-house or other pious or charitable foundation for a Catholic. Is this toleration?

In Ireland, any Catholic priest, who shall celebrate marriage between any two parties, knowing them, or either of them, to be of the Protestant religion, shall, on conviction, be deemed guilty of felony, without benefit of clergy, and suffer death accordingly. Are these the sort of restraints agreeable to the boasted laws on which the Reformation is founded, and consonant to the precepts of our benevolent religion? English Peers, professing the Catholic faith, have an hereditary right to sit in the House of Lords by the 30th Charles II., they could not exercise this hereditary right, unless they first became apostates, and abjured their religion. This was one of the laws founded on the Reformation; was that toleration? The Duke would fain have had that intolerant law continue; but national justice was too strong for him even. "To be declared incapable of serving his Majesty," says a celebrated writer, "in any office of trust, emolument or power, is the severest penalty which, in many cases, the law inflicts on delinquents, guilty of atrocious offences; and will it be said that the same disqualification enforced against the Catholics for their religious tenets, is not a punishment, but a measure perfectly consistent with the true principles of toleration?" These disqualifications have now been removed, but the Noble Duke would have us believe that they were founded on the laws of the Reformation, and ought to have been continued. It is a cheering prospect to the friends of liberty and religious toleration, when they see that even the conqueror of Napoleon's legions, cannot conquer National Justice. To it, Catholics of the present day owe much, in spite of the Noble Duke, and the "laws founded on the Reformation."—Englishman, 8th June.

THE CLERICAL DELINQUENCIES.

Whenever a bad case of misconduct in the Church occurs, the ready hackneyed remark is, that the general exemption of the clerical body from such transgressions makes the exception the more conspicuous; that it is the spot on the white ground. But is this so? Do members of the Army, the Navy, the Law, and Physic, all put together, figure so frequently in Courts of Justice as the Clergy?

Within the last month what a throng of clerical cases we have had.

First, we had a clergyman who shot a policeman. The reverend gentleman had been alarmed in the night, by some noise, rose, armed himself with a fowling-piece, and fired three shots, the last of which hit a policeman going his rounds.

Several gentlemen gave the reverend prisoner in excellent character for humanity, and it is quite certain that it was not his purpose to shoot the policeman; but why did he fire three shots in a direction in which any one, whether thief or not could be wounded? There seems a strange recklessness in such acts; but it passed unremarked and unrebuked by the Judge, who was only anxious to say civil things to the reverend gentleman, who was acquitted.

At least he should have been admonished on another similar occasion to give his fowling-piece the same aim as his lessons, and to point it heavenward, instead of point blank in the ways of men.

An Englishman and a foreigner fought a duel in a dark room. The Englishman not wishing to run the risk of having blood on his hands, fired his pistol up the chimney to make safe, and to his horror down came the foreigner.

This was not the sort of mischance of the reverend gentleman who brought down the policeman. He did not fire away in the direction in which it was least probable that his enemy would be found, but unluckily aimed too well at the quarter where some one might be wounded by his shot.

Next we have the case, of another complexion the Rev. Mr. Marsh; next a Brutamagem terpart of it in a Rev. Mr. Jones, an account of those transgressions we have copied from the Chronicle and lastly, to crown all, we have the Rev. Mr. Day's pastoral treatments of his sheep.

Now is it because Mr. Day happens to be a that his case has excited so much attention, and caused such scandal? In what profession or walk of life, however low and debased, is the like of it to be found? What would have been thought of the same act of barbarity if it had been committed by a ruffianly costermonger? Imagine the same sickening cruelty perpetrated by a low ruffian, and prosecuted by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals. Would a Magistrate have acquitted the brute of any malicious purpose, advised him to govern his temper, and to learn the first principles of law? No, he would have imposed a fine that he could not pay, and in default of it have sent him to the tread-mill for his improvement.

There is no brutality, in fact or in fiction, like the conduct of this man. Fancy his reverence driving the poor animals into a corner, and stabbing them in the flank six inches deep, not sickening after the first act, and repenting at the sight of the poor creatures suffering but plodding on with the mutilation of all seven, as a labour of love. Then driving the maimed animals out into the highway to add that torture to their sufferings.

When we read this shocking account, how the contrast of Dryden's character of the Good Parson started to our recollection—

With patience bearing wrong; but off ring none:
Since every man is free to lose his own.

No, said Mr. Day, if you lose your own, if your sheep stray on my land, I hamstring them with this pastoral hand, which turns the pages of the book of mercy and charity in the eyes of you all on the Sabbath day.

He warned the sinner with becoming zeal;
But on eternal mercy lov'd to dwell.
He taught the Gospel rather than the law;
And forced himself to drive, but loved to draw.

The Rev. Mr. Day "loved to draw"—he "loved to draw" the knife to hamstring his neighbours sheep, and "forced himself," nothing loth, "to drive" the flock after he had maimed them. It is thus that this reverend gentleman realizes the beautiful picture of the poet.

If we must go on and say

His preaching much but more his practice wrought.

How shocking must the effect be upon his parishioners.

That nothing might be wanting, the cruelty was followed by a hardy lie. The owner of the sheep having charged his reverence with the outrage, he impudently denied it, and with a vulgar insolence matching his morals, said "You are a liar."

The flimsy defence was, that he did not know that he was doing wrong; that he fancied he had the right to maim the sheep; but if that had been the case he would not have resorted to the lie.

The Judge, Lord Abinger,

"Addressing the prisoner, advised him to be very circumspect, in future, and endeavour to govern his temper. It was really most lamentable to see such an ignorance of the first rules and principles of law in a man occupying the station and filling the office which the prisoner occupied and filled; and he most seriously advised him to profit by the grace and the mercy which had been shown to him, by applying some portion of his time in acquiring a knowledge of the laws of his country and the rights of his neighbour.

It has been remarked by a contemporary, the Chronicle, in an excellent article on the case, that the Judge did not tell the prisoner to supply the deficiency which was most glaring in the case—that of humanity; but perhaps he was not so wrong in this as may at first appear. Could such a man learn humanity? He may learn the first principles of law:—can he acquire the first touches of humanity? As well advise the stone-blind to learn to distinguish colours. The only school for a man of this sort, aged thirty-six, is the tread-mill. By the steps of that primer he may be taught a lesson of forbearance which he cannot acquire any other way—the channel of the heart being utterly closed.

Every one knows Hogarth's "Progress of Cruelty," beginning with the boy's spinning a cock-shafer, and ending with the gallows; and if the graphic moralist had given us the hamstringing of the sheep, in which part of the "Progress" would he have placed the diabolical incident? Would it have been nearer the torture of the insect, or the deed for the gallows? Certainly he would have made it mark a very advanced stage of progress.

But Hogarth, if he had conceived the barbarity, could not have presented it in its unique perfection of vice, for he would not have dared to assign it to the character whose beautiful type is the shepherd, and whose loving offices have so many tender illustrations in the care for the sheep. A particle of the pastoral spirit would have forbidden the atrocity to the poor animals, which point so many a holy moral.—Examiner, March '23.

ANOTHER CLERICAL SINNER.

The old proverb, "It never rains but it pours," has assuredly been verified with reference to the parsons. Ever since the pitiless exposure of poor Marsh—or rich Marsh rather, though he has been so unmercifully drained—a succession of clerical delinquency, more or less heinous, has been presented to the public. The open revelations of adultery, cruelty, and drunkenness lately made, have struck dismay into the clerical camp, and are calculated to induce a conviction that there is something rotten in the state of our holy establishments. We did imagine, however, that for one week we should rest from our labour of recording clerical misdeeds.

It seems that we were doomed to be mistaken. An inquest held before Mr. Payne, the city coroner, on Monday evening, and adjourned to Thursday evening, brought to light sundry facts, strongly implicating the character of the Rev. Charles Scratchley, who is described as officiating near Queen-square. The inquest was held on the body of Charlotte Griffin, housekeeper to Mr. Scratchley, chemist, of Fleet-street, brother of the reverend gentleman alluded to. A strong impression, it appears, prevailed that the death of the deceased, who had taken poison, was in some way connected with the intimacy that was alleged to have existed between her and the Rev. Mr. Scratchley. This was strengthened by the circumstance that an intimacy had existed between them, albeit Mr. Scratchley was reported to have strenuously denied the fact in the first examination. His mode of giving his evidence did not, however, produce an impression of a favourable kind, whatever suspicion it might create that there was much that was untold, which, if revealed, might throw a light on this unhappy affair.

At the adjourned inquest the reverend gentleman was again present and Mr. Moxon, a "professional gentleman," likewise attended on his behalf. Mr. Moxon was deputed, doubtless, to give a triumphant refutation of any injurious reports, and clear his clerical client from any stain that might be cast upon his purity. He did so, but in a curious fashion. He said, "he should be able to exonerate the reverend gentleman from so serious a charge as that which had gone forth to the public through the means of the press. The truth was, that all connection between the deceased and Mr. Scratchley had ceased previous to that gentleman taking holy orders in 1836." This was a fact on which the reverend gentleman seemed mightily to plume himself. One witness, the sister of the deceased, proved that a connexion had subsisted prior to that time, and that her sister and Mr. Scratchley, not then the Reverend Mr. Scratchley, had lived together as man and wife. Really this liaison must have been a notable preparation for entering into the sacred profession. We know that the doctrine, "the greater the sinner, the greater the saint," is thought very sound and good by some people; and if it be well-founded, Mr. Scratchley was in a fair training for the sacred duties he was one day to perform. His previous course of sin was the only thing to make his after display of piety "stick fiery off, indeed." "Who drives fat oxen should himself be fat," is doubtful as a philosophic axiom, but the principle is quite as sound as that which prescribes a course of sin as the best preparation for ministering to the wicked. It seemed right, perhaps, to Mr. Scratchley that he who has to preach to sinners should be a sinner himself, if only for the additional unction derived from his own experience; and if these conditions be desirable, he is evidently in a fair way to be a most useful minister of the establishment, whenever he may be called upon to officiate. In fairness, we beg to state that the reverend gentleman, according to the evidence of the sister of the deceased, was not the seducer of the latter, as "she had already had a child by another gentleman!" We willingly give him the benefit of this fact, though some may think that it demonstrates no great nicety of selection on his part, to adopt so readily the cast off mistress of another man! The remaining evidence went to show that the poor creature afterwards fell into dissipated habits, was charged with robbing her employer, and swallowed poison in despair of being able to extricate herself from her miserable situation.

How far the Reverend Mr. Scratchley can be considered fairly answerable for this result, is a matter on which we give no opinion. We have touched simply on the facts as disclosed at the inquest, and reported in the papers, and most certainly we shall not attempt to strain them in any way, to the damage of his reputation. The verdict of the jury, however, we are bound to record. It was as follows:—"That the deceased destroyed herself while labouring under a temporary insanity, induced by the cruel and heartless conduct of the Reverend Charles James Scratchley; and we are compelled to express our strong disapprobation of the flippant manner in which he gave his evidence before the jury on Monday last."

After such an investigation and such a verdict as this, we do not imagine that the Reverend Mr. Scratchley is destined to rise to great eminence in the Church!—Satirist, April 7.

MISCELLANEA.

On Sunday, the 4th of February, in the Cathedral of Augsburg, M. Charles Hae, Doctor of Philosophy, and Protestant Rector of Groningen in the Kingdom of Wurtemberg publicly embraced the Catholic religion, and made a solemn profession of faith.

The Catolico of Madrid, of the 6th inst., describes the baptism of a negro at Barcelona under very interesting circumstances.

The Right Rev. Dr. Tyler, Bishop elect of the diocese of Hartford, left Boston on Wednesday last for Baltimore, accompanied by the Right Rev. Dr. Fitzpatrick. ~~It~~ was presumed they will not return until after the consecration.

We understand that the consecration of the three Bishops from this city, viz., Right Rev. John McCloskey, Co-adjutor Bishop for New York; Rt. Rev. Andrew Byrne, for Little Rock; and Rev. Wm. Quarter, for Chicago; will take place on Sunday the 10th of March, in the Cathedral, of course. The Very Rev. Dr. Power will preach the Consecration Sermon in the morning, and the Rev. Dr. Pise will preach in the evening. The Right Rev. Bishops of Philadelphia, Boston, and Richmond, will be present.

BISHOP PHILPOTTS.—We begin fairly to despair of him—we dread that the last end of this Bishop will be worse than the first, and all good men should cordially unite in one solemn act of devotion, and pray for the soul of Henry Philpotts. D.D.—Western Times.

DEATH OF THE RIGHT REV. DR. KERNAN.—We have just learned with the most profound sense of the feeling of regret and of bereavement which the faithful in his diocese must feel, that the Right Rev. Dr. Kernan departed this life on Tuesday morning, at an early hour, at his residence, Carrickmacross.—Freeman.

The deceased was a divine who combined the duties of a prelate with those of a patriot, with such scrupulous love of religion, and affection for his country, that his demise will be long lamented by every true friend of Ireland.—Newry Examiner.

able prelate was consecrated in April, 1844, consequently, upwards of twenty years in charge of this extensive diocese, in all of which he was beloved and revered for his truly apostolic virtues.—Pilot. The coadjutor Bishop, the Rev. Dr. McNally succeeds.

TUAM.—PREFERMENTS.—His Grace the Archbishop of Tuam has made the following changes:—The Rev. John M'Collogh from Robin to Ballyntubber, vacant by the death of the Rev. Mr. Adams; the Rev. Terence O'Kean from Kilmenna to Robin, to be succeeded by the Rev. Patrick Lyons from Corofin; the Rev. M. Curley from Spiddle to Castlebar.—Ibid.

CATHOLICS.—The Catholic population of New South Wales is estimated at 40,000.—Ibid.

ROME.—THE LATE CONSECRATION.—The Pope consecrated as bishops four of the cardinals on the 11th instant. This is the first instance, it is said, for 150 years, of the Pope having performed this ceremony in person. The Prince of Wirtemberg, Don Miguel, and all the diplomatic corps, were present on the occasion.—Herald.

AMERICA.—A NEW SECT.—THE BIBLE REPU- DIATED.—A writer in the Richmond Christian Advocate reports the existence of a new sub-division of Ana-Baptists in North Carolina, calling themselves "Splungers." One of their preachers says the Methodists and Presbyterians may take their knives and cut off the Old Testament, and do what they please with it, so they leave him the New Testament, he shall be satisfied. Here is another step in Protestantism. What will be rejected next?—Boston Pilot, Feb. 3.

ENGLISH CATHOLICS' ADDRESS TO THE QUEEN.—This address, which was agreed to at the great meeting of Catholics, held in Freemasons' Hall, on the 7th ult., on the subject of the exclusion of Catholics from juries in Ireland, was presented to her Majesty, at the levee, on Wednesday last, by Lord Camoys. It measured 593 feet in length, and had about 50,000 signatures attached.

NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE.—CONSECRATION OF BISHOP RIDDELL.—On Sunday last the consecration of the Right Rev. Dr. Riddell took place, at St. Cuthbert's College, Ushaw, near Durham. The ceremony was accompanied with all the solemnities peculiar to the religious services of the Catholic Church. The Right Rev. Dr. Wiseman delivered an eloquent discourse on the occasion. The Right Rev. Dr. Briggs was the consecrating Bishop, assisted by the Right Rev. Dr. Gillis, of Edinburgh, and the Right Rev. Dr. Sharples; and, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, the attendance of parties from a distance was highly respectable and numerous.—Tyne Mercury.

JUST AND EQUAL GOVERNMENT IN IRELAND.—At a meeting of the leading Reformers of Liverpool, held this day at the Reform Association, William Rathbone, Esq., in the chair; it was resolved, on the motion of Thomas Blackburn, Esq., seconded by William Wood, Esq. that a public meeting of the Reformers of Liverpool should be held, for the purpose of expressing their conviction—that, that impartial justice was not done in the recent State trials in Ireland; and, second, that the only true way to act towards Ireland was to deal with that country justly and fairly, both in legislation and administration. And it was further resolved, that the opportunity of Mr. O'Connell's return to Ireland should be taken for this public demonstration.—Liverpool Times.

THE
BENGAL
CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

No. 25.] . CALCUTTA : SATURDAY, JUNE 22, 1844.

[VOL. VI.]

"PROTESTANTS AND ROMANISTS."

An extract, under this head, from the Agra Ukhbar, has been published by our cotemporary of the Hurkaru in his issue of the 15th instant, with rather a curious editorial notice.

The burden of the song, or at least the peg from which both our cotemporaries hang their ballads, is the publication, in our little periodical, of the misdoings of some Protestant Clergymen, which had been previously published in all the Protestant Journals of England. We published facts which had been decided in the courts of law, and we published them, as we found them published by Protestants, "without note or comment,"—they are facts admitted by every one, even by the Hurkaru and Agra Ukhbar, and what crime have we, therefore, committed? Let us ask our cotemporaries, and as our friend from Agra is the stranger, let us hear him first. "They (the Catholics) do not scruple to use any means, without reference to propriety or justice,—to resort to any shifts and subterfuges to lower the Protestant religion of our country."

Now we leave the candid Protestant to decide whether we have forgotten justice or propriety in publishing the "misdoings" above referred to; and if we have, how shall all the Protestant Journalists that went before us in the publication of the same facts, be able to save their souls. Why are they not called on by the ghostly Editors of the Hurkaru and Agra Ukhbar to do public penance for having had recourse to impropriety and injustice, to shifts and subterfuges in order to lower their own, the Protestant religion of the country, by publishing facts attested in the courts of law? After this sample, we need not be surprised to find the Editor of the Agra

Ukhbar expressing his apprehensions that his brother of the Hurkaru is too indulgent to us, and professing his conviction, that the Catholics share the honor due to our Saviour alone, between Christ, the Virgin Mary and the Pope. We think that the honor of saving the Protestant religion from being lowered by the publication of the malpractices of the Protestant Clergy, should be shared in some proportion by the Agra Ukhbar, and if the Editor of the Hurkaru had not told us that his brother from Agra, had gone too far, we should be inclined to pronounce him, decidedly the best and fittest defender of immorality. When we say "defender of immorality," we mean, Protestant immorality, just as the Kings and Queens of England are styled Defenders of the Faith; and in very truth, the Editor of the Agra Ukhbar is no palliator or screener of immorality perpetrated outside Protestantism.

He reminds us of a certain Saint who was said to be able to distinguish the chaste from the impure by the faculty of scent, but the olfactory powers of our Agra brother appear to be stronger, though perhaps not so accurate or discerning. If he would like to do it, he could publish continental villainess in convents and nunneries, and prove that priests have given more sons and daughters to the world than many legitimate parents, (who perhaps have given none at all;) but no, he will not publish the facts that could prove these assertions, because being ascertained by the olfactory powers alone, they are not capable of being substantiated in the ordinary way. There is, he says, a convent at Agra, horrible to mention!—a secret society about which the public knew very little, and he may find it his duty to revert to the topic; and yet he discovered, some how or other, while he was penning these words, (how he could ascertain the fact except by snuffing the breeze, we know not) that the Convent at Agra is one of the best of the kind and conducted on strictly correct rules.

What Saint ever pretended to such powers of scent, as the sagacious Editor of the Agra Ukhbar.

If we had imitated the unmanly and insidious, we had almost said, treacherous conduct of the Agra Ukhbar, in throwing out hints and starting suspicions, awakening the drowsy energies of an unclean imagination, and appealing to the old standard of prejudices, to make out a case of delinquency against a few individuals or a corporation of Protestant clergymen, we confess we should deserve all the indignation of our cotemporaries and the reproaches of our own conscience; and as we are not bound to love our neighbour more than ourselves, we submit, that our cotemporary is a culprit who deserves punishment.

Let us now hear how angry our brother of the Hurharu is with us for having published the truth, and it is not the first time that truth has made people angry. I am become an enemy to you, saith St. Paul, speaking the truth. Though he is much displeased that we prefer giving extracts from "the liberal columns" of the Calcutta Star, rather than from the illiberal columns of the Hurharu, yet he is not disposed to go quite so far, on all points as his Agra cotemporary. He hopes to be pardoned, however, for extracting an article from the Agra Ukhbar, to show that the opinion which he (the Hurharu) expressed relative to the concealment system of the Romanists, is by no means a singular opinion. "Singular" indeed! When were we so foolish or misinformed as to suppose, that there was but one Editor in India ready on all occasions to calumniate our religious faith and practice, by asserting, and shamelessly re-asserting, what he could not prove, and could not know to be true. If this were all that the Hurharu intended by extracting from the Agra Ukhbar, he might have spared his columns and his reputation considerably, by making a different extract from some other journal. But the Hurharu has caught a monk in his claws, "a horrible delinquent" of whose scoundrelism the Catholic Herald has taken no notice. To this our plain answer is, that we think the Hurharu far too indulgent to the monk, and too much disposed to make a mystery of him. What is his name? Has he been tried in the court of law and punished? What monastery did he live in? and how has he been treated by his superiors in religion, after conviction? Did his superiors declare, that they would not punish him because their hands were tied, as the Protestant hishop declared, when the parson's guilt which we published, was brought to his notice?

We shall be glad to hear more about this monk; for if he be the horrible delinquent that the Hurharu represents him, he will, by the Grace of God, become a great penitent, or a zealous Protestant, and perhaps quite as shrewd a declaimer against Romanists, as the Hurharu himself. It may be, if there be any such person, that he is such another as the unfortunate Fra Fulgencio who went over to Luther and the rest of the monks who broke their vows, and remained with them while he had strength to sin, but left them when death visibly approached him. We assure our cotemporary of the Hurharu that, as a zealous Protestant, he quite forgets the interest of his cause in being so severe on monks who transgress horribly, since they almost invariably and immediately go over to Protestantism, and range themselves under Luther, the arch monk-offender. What would have become of the Protestant religion, if so many monks had not transgressed horribly, and then turned reformers? The monks are like the angels, more favoured than the rest of men, singing the praises of God, day and night, like their Prototypes in heaven; and a "horribly delinquent" monk is, therefore, a fallen angel who loses his faith and innocence together, and forthwith joins the ranks of opposition, like the rebel host that fell from heaven.

NEW MISSIONS.

We learn from a letter which the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic has just received from the Right Rev. Dr. Borghi, from Rome, that a new Mission is to be opened at Lahore and on the Himalaya Mountains, and that a Vicar Apostolic will be appointed for the Mission of Patna and Nepal.

MORE CONVERSIONS.

We have authority to state, that a highly distinguished Officer of the Company's service, has, after much examination, declared to a brother Officer, a convert, his firm conviction of the truth of all the doctrines of the Catholic Church.

We are enabled to state that the Lady of a Captain in the same service has been converted to the Catholic Faith chiefly by the agency of another Lady, who was once her ward, but who since her marriage embraced the Catholic religion; her husband remaining still a Protestant.

The Guardian (a Convert) of a Protestant child has placed the child in the Bengal Catholic Orphanage for education.

The Rev. Mr. Boulogne, Chandernagore, has six native adult heathens and four Protestants under instruction preparatory to their being admitted to the Sacrament of Baptism.

A German Lutheran Minister, Mr. Müller, has lately been reconciled to the Catholic Communion in London, and has resolved to join the Society of Jesus.

Upwards of one hundred natives in the vicinity of Cowoolly, where the chapel and schools are about to be erected, have expressed their desire to attend the instructions of the Catholic Clergymen in care of the new Mission.

CONFIRMATION.

The Sacrament of Confirmation will be administered at Dum Dum on next Wednesday morning, and on the following morning at Chinsurah.

EX-AMEERS OF SCINDE.

The Catholic Community will learn with pleasure that their Highnesses, the Ex-Ameers of Scinde, on being informed, at the instance of the Archbishop, of the nature and object of the Bengal Catholic Orphanage, promised in the kindest manner, to contribute twenty-two rupees per month to that excellent establishment.

LETTER No. XIII.

FROM A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA TO HIS PROTESTANT FRIENDS IN EUROPE.

MY DEAR FRIENDS.—I concluded my last letter by remarking that in the 'Pastoral Address by the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland,' as given in the Edinburgh Witness, 14th June, 1843, you may cull out of the mass of matter these sentiments, these annunciations of your disunion. It says, "When the judgments of God are abroad in the earth; when these judgments have begun at the house of God, when our holy and beautiful place, in which our forefathers worshipped God, is burnt with fire, and our pleasant things are laid waste, it is the duty of those who are set as watchmen in Zion to sound an alarm, to proclaim aloud the danger; a great calamity has befallen us affecting our nation, our Church, and the families of our land: The Church of our fathers is rent asunder; long was it the peculiar distinction and high glory of the established Church of Scotland to maintain the sole Headship of the Lord Jesus Christ, his exclusive sovereignty in the Church, which is his kingdom and house; on whose side we are to be found, for the Lord, or against him, in this time of trial? It is an old device of Satan to draw the distinction between truth and error so sharp and narrow that it seems almost invisible, but however sharp the line may be, on the one side of it is God's truth, on the other Satan's delusion. Think it not a light matter which part you take; rest assured it much concerns your own growth in grace; we warn you, with all earnestness and affection, to beware lest Satan sift you as wheat, and tempt you to deny your Lord and Master. We know well that the solemn and awful character of the times will be glossed over. Be not deceived by those who tell you that the present controversy is respecting a matter of minor importance, a point not necessary to salvation; besides involving by unavoidable consequence the character and qualifications of the Christian ministry, and thus in effect the promulgation of all doctrines together, it directly involves no less a question than this. Shall Christ be King in Zion, or shall he not? Shall Christ be the sole Head of the Church, which is his body, or shall he not? Can his servants, without treason against him, enter into any other alliance? Those are the true and only schismatics who only refusing to take the same step when duty required it, have thus, and thus only, caused the disruption in the Church." Thus it goes on; of course a counter 'Pastoral' is issued, and on the same month, by the Assembly of the old Church of Scotland, till we see Assembly against Assembly, text against text, a Jerusalem against a Jerusalem; God with the one, Satan with the other, or vice versa as that whirligig, private judgment, dictates. Dr. McFarlan says, "the Church they have left was not the Church of Scotland, it was bereft of its brightest ornament." Dr. Welsh adds, "we can hold no communion with those who think there should be connexion between the Church and state." "No," echoes Dr. Candlish, "It is of great consequence that they (the people) should not be subjected to the necessity of worshipping within the walls of the establishment;" to rebut which the others bring forward the 'confession of faith,' that, "the civil Magistrate has authority, and it is his duty to take order that unity and peace be preserved in the Church; that the truth of God be kept pure and entire; that all blasphemies and heresies be suppressed; all corruptions and abuses in worship and discipline prevented or reformed, and all the ordinances of God duly settled, administered and observed;" and they further tell them, that "it is important to set an example of steady adherence to the great principles of the reformation.' This was all nonsense with the new reforming doctors and divines; true, it was included in their ordination vow, but what of that? 'The great principle of the reformation' private judgment, makes short work of it; breaks the evil wand; and warns its wielders to keep on the other side the Tweed; from 400 to 500 ministers of the Gospel rise in the Assembly, rush out of the Meeting, and rend the air with the shout 'we are free,' or, as Dr. Chalmers congratulates them, 'it is well, I say, to have made such a clear escape from such a temptation.' The clergy out thus close their pastoral. "Let us labour seriously in rebuilding our prostrate Zion, though in troublous times, till the top-stone be brought forth with shouting; grace, grace into it, and everlasting glory to Him who is king of Zion" Yes, but "unless the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it." What! is the Lord to 'rebuild this prostrate Zion,' and maintain the opposition Zion also; another contrary Zion in England, another opposite to that in Germany, another and another? Oh! my friends view yourselves at this stage; your disunity, your puerile littleness: ask yourselves, is this the Church which Christ would, "present to himself a glorious Church not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing, but that it should be holy and without blemish?" Is this she of whom Isaiah prophesies, that "the house of the Lord shall be prepared on the top of mountains; and it shall be exalted above the hills, and all nations shall flow unto it?" Of whom he says again, "all thy children shall be taught of the Lord; and great shall be the peace of thy children." Trace this Church if you can in the sentiments of your own Divines. "The lights of the world," as our Saviour applied to the Apostles and their successors. One of these "lights," Dr. Candlish, speaks thus of his new Zion at one of the Free Presbytery Meetings. "The principles on which they set out in their new position, was, as he understood it, that they had separated from the establishment on a vital question of doctrine, discipline, and government, not upon any trifling or subordinate point, but because they held the establishment to be now so constituted, that it implied in it to remain in it; the whole bearing of their testimony in separating from the establishment was this, that its present constitution was unscriptural and a sinful"

Another hoary luminary of the v. Dr. Macdonald, fulminates that, "the established Church is a Christ-denying, God-dish- noring and soul-destroying Church."—On the other hand a contrary "light," or as they love to interlard themselves, one of the "Princes and great men of Israel" breaks forth from the opposite Tabernacle, that is, the old Scotch Kirk of 1600 and odd (how old!) and prophesies of the new Scotch Kirk of 1800 and odd, thus, "can we be assured that they will maintain that unity of purpose which I consider to be the greatest excellence of the establishment, and which in my mind an establishment alone can secure? No doubt our friends are bound together by a great and general principle, and it would appear at present as if the protesters (new Protestants) were all of one mind and one sentiment. But does any man who is acquainted with the history of human nature believe that 400 or 500, when they begin to discuss arrangements of such magnitude as must come before them, will all remain united?" This is 'the rub,' this is certainly hitting the right nail, and a pretty and plain parody upon the sort of spirit which keeps Protestantism upon its legs; "an Establishment alone can secure unity of purpose;" unquestionably a square of Bayonets is not easily broken through; and I greatly suspect, that the protesters will find that they have, at an unfortunate hour, seceded from 'the bulwarks of Protestantism;' that they have started without their host; have put to sea without the Pilot; they would be Catholic, if an opposite spirit did not mislead them. Come now let me waft you from the cold North to India, that you may see that heat is only congenial to your spirit. One of the Free Church organs at Calcutta, called, 'The Free Churchman' honestly tells the community, "We," he says, "separate as Church Members, because we would avoid the sins of heresy and schism; heresy as to the Head of the Church, schism as to its Members: holding also as we do, that the unity of the body, arises from union to Christ, the head; we must also further hold, that all false doctrine as to the Head, involves a schism in the body, and we would avoid the heresy of compromising the supremacy of Christ, as we would the schism of joining with those who make such compromise; we have forsaken those who are in error, and have joined ourselves to those who are walking (as to this point) in the truth; they, not we, are in schism, and they, not we, are in danger of Erastian heresy, a heresy that would ultimately place the sceptre of Christ in the hands of Cæsar." I will here stop to ask if the Church of England recoils at that blow? He, however, runs on. But now she (old Kirk) has accepted of secular bondage, so she is now a bond woman, whose children we are not. Every congregation which by its ministry and eldership stands united to the Established Church is of necessity incorporated with that sinful error; no seceding minister can be invited or permitted to preach in any pulpit of the Scottish Establishment (in Scotland.) In Calcutta the same acts (General Assembly) have effect, and the same result must follow. The Ministers of St. Andrew's Kirk dare not even if they would invite any of the five ordained Missionaries to the Free Church now in Calcutta to preach in their pulpit." "Tit for tat." "Wherefore by their fruits you shall know them," they enter an interdict against preaching in one another's pulpits; no more will they, and as one of their Pastors remarks, "eat of his bread and drink of his wine", together, nor meet in prayer; the rich among them make petty war upon the others' poor, and the others' poor retaliate by rioting and violence. Preachers inflame, "who speak peace with their neighbour, but evils are in their hearts." Witness their acts in Scotland, "wherefore by their fruits you shall know them," you cannot find 'grapes' or 'figs' upon such 'thorns' and 'thistles' as these of the North. Another, 'prince and great man of Israel' at Calcutta preaches and publishes an elaborate Sermon on what they call, 'the present great truth,' but what 'the next great truth' or new discovery which may be made, remains hidden in the same dark womb which produced this one. But this celebrated Sermon is headed, "The cause of Christ and the cause of Satan," and the text is. "The hope of the righteous will be gladness; but the expectation of the wicked shall perish." The implication inferred is pointed, as no doubt the preacher intended it should be. Dr. Duff, the lecturer thus embodies it; "There is the cause of truth, and the cause of error; the cause of sin and the cause of righteousness, the cause of Christ, and the cause of Satan; the cause of Christ is the cause of truth—the cause of Satan is the cause of error, the cause of sin, the cause of fallen angels, and of wicked men." "He who runs may read." You have now in Scotland, not only such Seceders as the Cameronians, Burghers, Anti-Burghers, Irvinites, Rowetts, &c. but I observe it enumerated in one of your works, that, "nearly 500 ordained ministers, 200. Licentiates, a still greater number of students of Divinity, a great proportion of the Eldership, and upwards of a million of people" have broken unity with the rest. The former separatists may be considered as having all along instigated the breaking up at a future period of the whole body, as we may observe in all buildings erected by man's hands small particles and pieces at times fall out before the mass comes down, wisdom would therefore dictate to you to fly from such a building; but alas! some strange fatality seems to envelope your senses, as if the ruin was too vast, too complicated, and the mist of darkness upraised, was too thick, for you to be able to extricate yourselves and to get out of it. Oh! my dear friends, that I could but awaken you, that I could but help you, could but come to your rescue. I feel for you as if I saw you within a house enveloped in flames; I shudder for you as if I viewed you within a fabric tottering upon its sandy base, and I tremble for you as if I witnessed you clinging to single planks, and struggling for life in the deep waters. When I think of you, and contemplate your state, the words of our Saviour continually revert to my mind, that, "a house divided against itself shall not stand." I believe Him! Do you not?—then what can you be thinking of, or can you suppose for a moment that your dilapidated conventicles can be that, "Jerusalem, which is built as a city, which is compact together," or imagine that your discordant sects can be "The House of the God of Jacob?" for are you not told, "His place is in peace, and his abode in Zion?" Fly, then, my dear friends in Scotland, fly, but where to, to England! view her Zion, and see with me, if the Lord is there, for "his place is in peace." But this I must make the theme of the next letter. In the meantime, I beseech you to repeat nightly the Royal Psalmist's beautifully inspired soliloquy, as I find it in my Bible, and may God who catches up the aspirations of the sincere heart direct you, when you utter. "And I meditated in the night with my own heart; and I was exercised, and I swept my spirit."

Yours faithfully,

C. A. C.

FEASTS OF CORPUS CHRISTI AND SACRED HEART.—CHANDERNAGORE.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—It will no doubt be to you and your readers a great gratification to be informed that at the Church of our Lady, at Chandernagore, the joyful festival of Corpus Christi was observed in the true Catholic spirit.—Under the skillful direction of the truly amiable, and indefatigable Father Boulogne, the beloved Pastor of this flourishing Mission, the ceremonies were performed with solemnity and splendour. The early part of the day was sanctified by a grand high Mass, which was sung by the Rev. Father, in his usual sweet and effective style; the music on the occasion was excellent, which was sung by the orphans, assisted by one of the masters. Truly there was something ethereal in the charming voices of those innocent little ones, each of whom vied with the other in chanting the praises of their Creator and Redeemer. Yes, the angelic sounds of the orphan voices, which chimed harmoniously together, were sublime, and would tend to soften the heart of the obdurate and unthinking. Oh! how true is the saying of the Royal Penitent.—“Better is one day spent in thy house, O Lord! than ages spent in the tabernacles of sinners.” At the conclusion of high Mass, solemn benediction was given, after which the pious Pastor placed the Most Holy Sacrament in a beautiful recess over the tabernacle, where it remained exposed all the day, for the adoration of the faithful. The Priest and his attendants retired to the Sacristy to unvest; thus closed the morning service.

Extensive preparations were made for a grand procession of the Adorable Sacrament to take place in the evening, but the unfavorable state of the weather prevented it. We had, however, a splendid evening service, the Vespers of the Holy Sacrament were beautifully chanted and other appropriate hymns being sung, the devotions of the day were closed with a solemn benediction. But our pious and zealous Pastor was not yet satisfied, for, during the Octave, we had a continuation of the same holy devotions,—the morning of each day was sanctified with the exposition of the Holy of Holies, the Mass of the blessed Sacrament, and in conclusion, solemn benediction. We had again in the evening of each day, the devotion of the Rosary, repeated by the orphans, with the benediction of the blessed Sacrament. On the Sunday within the Octave, the ceremonies were the same as on the feast day; in the evening there was a solemn procession of the Holy Sacrament which took place after the sermon. During the progress of the procession, benediction was given at three neat Altars, erected for the occasion, and the procession slowly returned to the Church.—Benediction being given at the high Altar, the Priest and his attendants left the sanctuary to disrobe.

The feast of the SACRED HEART OF JESUS was likewise kept here with all the solemnity of the Church.—The morning service was grand and imposing; the number of Communicants who approached the Lord's table was not a few. After Mass the pious Pastor placed the Blessed Sacrament in the recess prepared for it, for the adoration of the faithful. In the evening we had a splendid PRIVATE procession of the Holy Sacrament for the Nuns, than which, a more edifying sight we never saw. Shortly after five o'clock the procession entered the sanctuary preceded by Cross-Bearer, Master of Ceremonies, Acolytes, and Thurifer, the Celebrant in his Cope and a neat canopy borne over him, closed the procession.

Benediction being given at the high Altar, the procession slowly moved out of the Church, some of the young female orphans “clothed in white garments,” preceded the blessed Sacrament, carrying baskets of flowers, which they at intervals reverently and gracefully strewed. Immediately after the Cross-Bearer walked the orphan boys, forming on each side a line,—the procession having now reached the back of the Church, it halted, whilst the Celebrant gave solemn benediction on a neat Altar prepared by the saintly Nuns. After we had received our Lord's benediction, the orphan girls, conducted by the Nuns, joined the holy procession,—immediately behind the Canopy walked the Lady Superioress and a Nun, the elder orphan girls, “clothed in white garments,” accompanied the Rev. Mother, each Nun bearing a lighted taper in her hand. What an edifying sight was this, thus to behold virgins consecrated to their heavenly Spouse, here following the immaculate “Lamb of God.” In this order the procession moved around the “Convent garden,” the Celebrant gave solemn benediction at two neat Altars, prepared by the Nuns, for this truly solemn occasion; after which the procession slowly returned to the Church:—The Nuns and orphans formed themselves into a line on each side of the Garden gate, to reverently receive the adorable Sacrament; immediately after, the Nuns returned to their choir. The procession halted at the Altar behind the Church, where benediction was again given, after which, we proceeded to the Church in the same order as on leaving it; the orphan boys being formed in a line, on each side the centre of the Church, to receive the Holy Sacrament. The Celebrant having now reached the Altar, appropriate hymns were sung and a last solemn benediction given. Thus closed the soul-stirring and imposing ceremonies of these glorious festivals of the Church.

The edifying demeanour, the modesty, piety, humility, and reverential awe with which each child conducted itself was truly consoling to the Christian's heart, nor was this the least conspicuous feature in our holy procession. How reverently did the humble Orphans fall down before the Lord, to adore the God of their hearts and Him who is their portion for ever. Oh! how pleasing and acceptable to the Adorable Heart of Jesus must be the devotion of those innocent little ones! Many a prayer do they send up to heaven for their charitable benefactors, by whom they are thus protected, and brought up in the paths of Religion and Virtue, rescued from the paths of Vice and Infamy, and rendered ornaments to their religion instead of being a scandal to it, and thus are the happy instruments of adding one day to society useful and honest members. Truly the reward of such charitable Christians will be very great in Heaven.

C.
Chandernagore,
June 19th 1844.

SUBSCRIPTIONS IN AID OF THE SUFFERING CATHOLICS AT GWALIOR.

St. Xavier's College,	10 0
A Catholic,	60 0
Mrs. Rustomjee Cowasjee, ..	20 0
Mrs. Manackjee Rustomjee, .	15 0
L. B. Oliva,	5 0
J. M. D'Luz,	3 0
J. M. D'Silva,	4 0
Mark Lackersteen,	5 0
C. J. Lackersteen,	2 0
Found in the Cathedral Collection Bag, ..	3 0
S. Jones,	4 0
J. W. C.,	4 0
Received in an Envelope, ..	2 0
David John,	2 0
M. Crow,	2 0
P. S. D'Rozario,	8 0
G. Casella,	5 0
J. Curnin,	20 0
M. F. Gordon. Captain, Bombay Service, ..	10 0
A Protestant,	2 0
T. Simeon,	1 0
C. ditto,	1 0
M. ditto,	1 0
M. F. ditto,	1 0
H. ditto,	1 0
A. ditto,	1 0
J. ditto,	1 0
J. Brasier,	1 0
H. ditto,	1 0
E. Eyooch,	2 0
M. Gonsalves,	5 0
A Friend,	5 0
Ditto,	1 0
Ditto,	1 0
Ditto,	1 0
Ditto,	1 0
Ditto,	1 0
Ditto,	1 0
M. A. Piaggio,	1 0
J. ditto,	1 0
J. E. ditto,	1 0
J. J. ditto,	1 0

C. Piaggio,.....	1 0
J. Gibson,.....	1 0
H. Frantz,.....	1 0
M. ditto,.....	1 0
J. ditto,.....	1 0

DUM DUM.

Band Master Stride,	5 0
Serjeant Cooney,	1 0
Mrs. Cooney,	1 0
Mary Cooney,	1 0
Louis Cooney,	1 0
Susan Cooney,	1 0
Gunner Weens,	3 0
Serjeant Sweeny	2 0
Corp. Casey,	0 8

A list of the other Subscribers at Dum-Dum hall be given in the next issue.

J. D'Cruz through the Rev. Mr. Verlai ..	2 0
A Lady through do.....	4 0

THROUGH MR. J. ROSTAN, JUNIOR.

L. Cooper,	5 0
A. Speeroos,	2 0
John C. D'Cruz,	2 0
P. Martinelly,	2 0
H. Jewell,	1 0
A Friend,	1 0
T. Sinaes,	1 0
S. Augustin,	3 0
J. Marriott,	2 0
J. Rebeiro, Junior,	1 0
A Protestant,	1 0
E. Tronson,	1 0
K. C. Dutt,	1 0
A Poor Man,	0 8
E. O'Brien,	5 0
J. Rostan, Jn.	3 0
C. M. Rostan,	2 0
Matthew Phillip Jackson, ..	1 0
Cath. Rostan,	4 0
W. B. Rostan,	5 0
Mrs. C. Guezenec,	3 0
C. M. B.,	2 0
Cordelia,	1 0
N. C. B.,	2 0
C. P. Wiltshire,	3 0
B. R. C.,	5 0
R. Halfhide,	5 0
J. N. Quin,	2 0
P. B.,	5 0
J. O. B.,	3 0
Another Protestant,	1 0
A. Baptist,	3 0
C. Cornelius,	2 0
C. Cornelius, Jn.	2 0
A. Cornelius,	2 0
C. H. S.,	2 0
B. L. V.,	1 0

THROUGH MR. N. O'BRIEN.

Mrs Hopwood,	25 0
Mrs. N. O'Brien,	5 0

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

J. M. through Messrs. Arson, and CO.	20 0
---	------

THROUGH MR. J. ROSTAN, JUNIOR.

J. D.,	10 0
R. K.,	10 0
M. S.,	10 0
H. M. S.,	10 0
J. J. L.,	5 0

THROUGH MR. N. O'BRIEN.

J. H. Goodeve,	16	0
J. H. Grant,	4	0

NATIVE MISSION AT COWCOLLY.

Collections at Chandernagore through the Rev. Mr. Boulogne,	23	8
---	----	---

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

Mr. Jewell and Associates, for the months of March, April, and May,	4	8
--	---	---

Selections.

INROADS OF POPERY.

About the month of February, some persons who had been excluded from our native churches for sinful conduct, joined the Papists who had not long before settled in Intally. One of them was subsequently sent to Dacca, and another to Chittagong, where we doubt not, they will endeavour to do mischief. We would caution our brethren in the mofussal stations against trusting any Native Christian, professing to come from Calcutta, who is not provided with a testimonial of church-membership or a letter of dismission.

In one of the villages near Narsigdarchoke, about half a dozen members of the church, with their nearest relatives, have gone over to the Papists; and we doubt not that the adherents of Rome will spare neither money nor labour to sow their pernicious tares in the wide field of evangelization, which has so long been occupied by Protestants in the district south of Calcutta. They have published and circulated there, to some extent, a pamphlet entitled, The Bengali Catholic Manual, which contains a full account of the leading principles of Popery. In fact, it is to be expected that the papal Antichrist will shortly bring his energies to bear, not only upon the native Christians connected with Protestant missions, but also upon the heathen population of Bengal. We would earnestly recommend to our brethren, to make this matter a subject of special prayer, and to redouble their efforts in spreading the word of God, that sword of the Spirit, before which neither the devil nor his emissaries can stand.

Though not exactly coming within the object of the Herald, we may just mention that, if the common report be correct, nearly one hundred Christians in the south, connected with the Propagation Society, have gone over to the Papists, and that a number of others have expressed a willingness to follow their example.—Baptist Missionary Herald.

REV. MR. SEWELL.

We see in several of the London papers the report of some proceedings under the Church Discipline Act against the Rev. William Sewell, the charge being "for drunkenness, intemperance, intoxication, scandal and other evil report." This case was heard before Commissioners of whom the chief was an Archdeacon, the Rev. John Rushton, Archdeacon of Manchester. We told that the proceedings being of a very nature, excited great interest in Amble-side (Westmoreland) and the surrounding neighbourhood. After witnesses had been examined on both sides, the Commissioners adjourned to consider the evidence and on the Court being reopened, said, there did not appear sufficient prima facie evidence to induce them to proceed further; but they also added "there is evidence before us to warrant us in admonishing him to be more careful for the future over his public and private conduct." This is perhaps a little unintelligible, that there should not be prima facie evidence of any of the misbehaviour charged, but evidence calling for a public admonition both as regarded his conduct, public and private! We have chiefly noticed this affair for the closing scene of it. We are told of the admonition, which for the time at least we might have supposed, and indeed for decency's sake, would have placed the Reverend accused below his judges, and then we learn—"The Rev. Archdeacon then came towards, and most cordially shook hands with, the Rev. William Sewell, as did the rest of the Commissioners, wishing him health and happiness." Now, reading this, is there any reason to suppose that a person would be far wrong who concluded that judges and culprit withdrew together, and made merry over their bottle about the farce that had been performed.—Calcutta Star.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

The Record of March 14th advertises for a Curate, "wanted by the Rector of a populous parish in the metropolis"—and it is said, "He must be in full orders, of no extreme views, and, above all, no Tractarian." The salary promised is £100 per annum.

In the same column we see the following:

"Wanted, a Curate to assist a resident Incumbent in the Sunday and parochial duties of a large and rather populous parish. A gentleman of Evangelical sentiments and active habits indispensable. No objections to give a tithe. Stipend, 100*l.* per annum.

Letters to be addressed to R. S., care of Mr. Mort, bookseller, Newcastle, Staffordshire."

Immediately following we have another:—

"A Clergyman is in immediate want of a Curate to assist him in the duties of his populous parish. A truly devoted man, whose heart is in his work, who would walk in Christian love and fellowship with his Incumbent, and desire with him to know nothing among his people but Jesus Christ, and him crucified, would doubtless find it a comfortable and happy sphere: The least tendency to Tractarian principles would be a decided objection, and it is expected that any applicant will give references to clergymen of well-known and decided piety. Stipend, 90*l.* per annum.

Address, the Rev. J. W. Watts, Vicarage, Bicester, Oxfordshire."

And then we have what is called an

ELIGIBLE CURACY.

"Wanted, immediately a Clergyman, in full orders, of Evangelical principles, sound churchmanship, and with good testimonials, to undertake a sole charge in a southern county, about forty-eight miles from town, in the first instance for three months, and perhaps eventually for a permanency. Should the last named arrangement take place, peculiar advantages may be the result, of which it is sufficient to state that preferment to a considerable living may more than probably be one: the Incumbent eighty years of age. The locality is well suited for pupils. The population is 800, and the remuneration offered for the temporary charge is an excellent house, fully furnished, lawn, garden, and the use of a horse.

Address (pre-paid,) No. 60, at the Office of the Record."

Would any one believe that such advertisements as these could appear in connexion with the wealthiest establishment the world ever knew! in connexion with a profession, the head of which receives certainly £20,000 per annum, a fourth more than the Pope himself can command for private purposes.* "There are portions of the British empire," says the authority we have just quoted, "where three hundred clergymen, professing, and indefatigably teaching, the same faith as the Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop of London, do not share among them, with equal abilities, equal virtues, so large a sum of money as these two prelates." This indeed may weaken the astonishment that might otherwise be felt at the above announcements; but though it weakens the astonishment it cannot lessen the regret. We see ministers of the Gospel advertised for, precisely as we should men-cooks, but at much lower wages: the cure of 800 souls for the use of a house, a garden, and a horse! The advertiser wont pay a fraction; all that he gets he will put in his own pocket, and leave what he can't take away as remuneration for some poverty-stricken curate, whose necessities may drive him to accept the offer of a shelter,—the mockery of a full furnished house with an empty larder, the use of a horse and not a penny to pay a turnpike.

We have heard a good deal of Church Reform of late years, of equalizing incomes, and providing at least decent maintenance for all ministers of the Church, and yet we have such advertisements as the above!

This huckstering of the Church is not only degrading to Religion but suicidally destructive of the thing—the Establishment—the Church would uphold. If a man desires to bring up a son as a Minister of Religion, and has no patronage within his reach, as a mere matter of speculation it is better he should devote him to any form of dissent, since, if he deserves well, he will fare much better than by being of—as the term is used—the Church, and it is quite idle to suppose that worldly prospects are not regarded in this as carefully as in every other profession, or steady trade, or itinerant calling—from tinkering kettles up to tinkering laws. It is not for us to enquire how much difference of doctrine has weakened the Church as compared with disgust for the Establishment, but we verily believe the latter has mainly prevailed. Suffice it that to the Establishment the growing Dissent ought to be alarming. In the last letter but one of those to which we have alluded the writer says:—

* Letters of a conservative on the English Church. Ed Cal. Star.

"Whoever will take the trouble to calculate, may find how many would remain in the Church of England seventy years hence, were dissent to encrease in the same proportion as within the last seven, or say fourteen. Now if the same causes produce the same effects, and if we allow them to continue, we shall perceive that about one in four, throughout the United Kingdom, will be of the Establishment at the close of seventy years. Of course long before that period, the Dissidents must overthrow it. Consider now whether it is better to see it overthrown than corrected: consider whether many great and excellent things have fallen into ruin by permitting only (what appeared) a brief procrastination. Some are of opinion that the Church of England, at the present hour, does not embrace half the inhabitants of the United Kingdom. In that case it would be just and lawful at any time, with consent of Parliament, to subvert it utterly. Should it not be the case, it soon must be. Would it not be such a miscalculation as no gamester ever was accused of, were the distributors of the national wealth and offices to resolve on holding in their hands, rather than laying on the table, the winning card? Their children and friends may enjoy the station of bishops with much respectability and dignity: but never in future, with papal display and oriental splendour. They may continue to be as wealthy and elevated as the prelates of other countries, or as the governors of cities, or even of provinces: but they must not stand above most princes of the continent, and (higher than any of them) above those Englishmen who, concentrating the might and majesty of the nation, strike down our subject with the audacity of kings and emperors."

This is what the great may not do in hiving the honey for themselves: perhaps it sufficiently declares what the humble may not be—ministers of religion and menials in their wages. The highest payment offered in the above advertisements—and similar ones appear weekly—is £100 per annum, just what Duprez, the new Tenor singer, gets for one evening's performance!—Calcutta Star.

• DR. PUSEY,

[From Horne's New Spirit of the Age.]

In the vigorous and very ominous contest which has for a considerable time been raging between different sections of the Established Church, it will form no part of this brief notice to engage, on either side. A work like the present cannot, it must be obvious, afford space for lengthy and complex disquisition on any subject; and least of all would its design accord with controversies which are usually, in themselves, endless, whether on matters of religion, science, or politics. A few broad statements of leading principles and facts are all that will be attempted—intended solely for the benefit of those who do not know much of the subject, and have not time to study the "Tracts," but who wish for some concise information.

The necessary avoidance of theological conflicts and the inadmissibility of polemical treatises, must also prevent our taking into the present paper some account of Dr. Chalmers, the leader of the High Church party in the Presbyterian, as Dr. Pusey is in the Episcopal section of the Protestant Church in this kingdom; and must equally prevent any view of the natural opposites of both these leaders in their theological aspects; otherwise our design must have included the lectures of W. J. Fox, and those of the late Dr. Channing, whose transatlantic birth has not precluded his influence among ourselves. Our purpose, however, being limited to the consideration of certain novel doctrines which have been designated after the name of their originator, the following remarks are offered in elucidation.

Dr. Pusey is the representative of that class of Englishmen, who, looking with reprehension and alarm upon the changes in the ecclesiastical and political system of our country, which have slowly but constantly gained ground during the lapse of the last fifteen years, have ranged themselves under the freshly emblazoned banners and newly illuminated altars of the Church, have unsheathed the sword of Faith and new interpretation, earnest to restore the ancient constitution in Church and State; to stem the advancing tide of modern opinion and endeavour to retain the stronghold of the Divine Right of Kings and the Spiritual Supremacy of the Priesthood, and from this detached ground to say to the rising waves, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther," and to the troubled waters, "Peace,—be still."

The first note of alarm was sounded to this class when, fifteen years ago, the Repeal of the Test and Corporation Act passed the legislature. This measure (to use the words of a distinguished member of their own body, Mr. Palmer,) was, in their eyes, a "cutting away from the Church of England of one of its ancient bulwarks, and evidencing a disposition to make concessions to the clamour of its enemies." In the next year, called by the same authority "the fatal year 1829," they saw the admission of Catholics to posts of trust and responsibility, and to a share in the legislation. The feelings which animated them now, may be understood from the fact, that this part in the transaction cost Sir Robert Peel his seat in the University of Oxford, and from the language of the same authority we have already quoted, who described the Emancipation Act as "a measure which scattered to the winds public principle, public morality, public confidence, and dispersed a party, which, had it possessed courage to act according to its old and popular principles, and to act on them with manly energy, would have stemmed the torrent of revolution and averted the awful crisis which was at hand." Such was the state of appalled apprehension on which the tocsin of revolution in France struck like an electric shock in 1830, and on which the echoes reverberated nearer and nearer thunders through the reform agitation in England. "The Tory aristocracy," says Mr. Palmer again, "which had forsaken the Church in yielding Emancipation, were now hurled from their political ascendancy, and the REFORM BILL of 1831—a just retribution for their offence—made for the time the democratic principle all powerful in the state." Events glided on. The claims of the Dissenters were loudly urged—a reverence of Church and State was demanded—ten Irish Bishops were suppressed—even Church Rates were in many quarters successfully resisted—and CHURCH REFORM was actually called for, much in the same manner in which Parliamentary Reform had been demanded a year or two before! Struck by these signs of the times, by the increase of dissent, the avowedly low views of church authority entertained by a majority of the clergy and nearly the entire body of the laity, the extreme laxity of discipline and great diversity of doctrine prevailing in the Church, and the tendency to further innovation manifesting itself in many, and those not unimportant quarters, a few clergymen, chiefly residing at Oxford and members of the University, formed themselves into an association under the title of "Friends of the Church." At the head of these was Dr. Pusey.

Edward Bouverie Pusey is the second son of the late Hon. Philip Pusey, and grandson of the Earl of Radnor. His father assumed the name of Pusey on becoming the possessor of Pusey, in the county of Berks, an estate held by that family from a period considerably anterior to the Norman conquest, and held under a grant from Canute by cormage, or the service of a horn. The Pusey horn is well known to antiquaries. Dr. Pusey was born in 1800, and entered the University of Oxford in 1818, as a gentleman commoner of Christ Church. His name appears in the first class in 1822. Shortly afterwards he became a fellow of Oriel College; in 1824 he obtained the prize for the Latin Essay, and in 1828 he became Regius Professor of Hebrew and Canon of Christ Church. In this year he married a lady, since deceased. In 1825 he had taken the degree of M. A., and at the usual periods subsequently took those of B. D., and D. D. Dr. Pusey is therefore in his 44th year. He is somewhat under the middle size, pale and of a meditative and intellectual countenance. As a preacher he is calm, logical and persuasive, and there is an air of sincerity about every word which he utters which is never without its effect. His theological views were at one time supposed to be verging towards those of the German theologians, but they underwent a very decided change before the years 1833, when he became one of the founders of the association, out of which sprung the Tracts for the Times.

The first object of this association was to stir up clergy and laity to activity and to more zeal for the office and authority of the Church, and this was done by correspondence, addresses, associations and similar means, with very satisfactory results. But inasmuch as it was by the press that opposite principles had been most successfully inculcated, so the leading members of that society determined to issue some short publications adapted, as they considered, to the exigencies of the times. These publications were not sent forth with any corporate authority. The writers spoke only their own individual opinions, and no system of revision, though often recommended, was ever adopted. The title given to them was "Tracts for the Times, by members of the University of Oxford." Some were addressed especially to the clergy, and headed "ad clerum," others to the laity, headed "ad populum," others to both.

The tenets maintained by the Tract writers were chiefly as follow. They asserted the three-fold order of ministry, Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, as essential to an Apostolic church. They claimed a personal, not a merely official, descent from the Apostles, i. e., they declared that not only had the Church ever maintained the three orders, but that an unbroken succession of individuals canonically ordained was enjoyed by the Church and essential to her existence; in short, that without this there could be no church at all. They held the doctrine of baptismal regeneration, of sacramental absolution, and of a real, in contradistinction to a figurative, or symbolical, Presence in the Eucharist. They maintained the duty of fasting, of ritual obedience, and of communion with the Apostolic Church, declaring all Dissenters, and as a necessary consequence, the members of the Church of Scotland, and all churches not episcopal, to be members of no church at all. They denied the validity of Lay-baptism; they threw out hints from time to time, which evidenced an attachment to the theological system supported by the non-juring divine in the days of James II.; and the grand Protestant principles as established by Luther,—the right of private interpretation of Holy Scripture—they denied.

A facetious, but somewhat profane Letter, shortly appeared, purporting to be "an Epistle from the Pope to certain members of the University of Oxford," and was extensively circulated. Dr. Pusey replied to this highly reprehensible pretender, in a grave and earnest tone, deprecating a light and irreligious spirit on a topic of so great magnitude and importance.

The Evangelical party in the Church next objected to certain expressions used in the "Tracts" such as "conveying the sacrifice to the people"—"entrusted with the keys of Heaven and Hell"—"entrusted with the awful and mysterious gift of making the bread and wine, Christ's body and blood,"—all which expressions they considered might perhaps be understood in rather a Romani-zing way. The Record, a religious newspaper, conducted by gentlemen of Presbyterian tenets, but circulating chiefly among churchmen of Calvinistic doctrine, directly accused the Tract writers as Jesuits, and covert Papists. The conduct of the Bishops, who were supposed to favour Dr. Pusey, was watched, their dinner parties noted, and the disposal of their patronage tartly commented on. The inferior clergy were subjected to espionage. If a priest or deacon was seen at a ball or concert, his name was sure to appear in the next week's Record, as a musical or a dancing clergyman, and a Puseyite; for the term Puseyite originated with this journal. The Tracts meanwhile went steadily on, never replying nor recriminating, but continuing to put forth new and more startling deviations from the received theology of the day.

In 1836, a new species of hostility commenced, in which the Puseyite party were the assailant, Dr. Hampden, canon of Christ Church, and Principal of St. Mary Hall, was appointed Regius Professor of Divinity. The admirable personal qualities, and the splendid abilities of

Dr. Hampden, made the man both admired and esteemed; but he had preached a course of Bampton Lectures which were considered "rationalistic"—or tending to a daring use of the rational faculty, and had published a pamphlet, in which, says Mr. Palmer, "the boldest latitudinarianism was openly avowed, and Socinians were placed on a level with all other Christians." His appointment was therefore vigorously opposed by the high Church party; but the opposition being fruitless, an agitation was commenced chiefly by the Tract writers, and a formal censure of the University on Dr. Hampden was passed by an overwhelming majority in Convocation. By this censure, the Margaret Professor of Divinity was substituted for the Regius Professor, and the attendance of the under graduates on the latter, dispensed with.

Periodicals were now started with the avowed object of opposing the "Tracts;" and one, "The Church of England Quarterly Review," was alluded to in the House of Commons, and had two articles, which were marked by vehement invective, quoted in The Times. That paper, however, subsequently discovering certain inaccuracies, repudiated the articles in question. Thus attacked, the Oxford party resolved to have an organ of their own; and the British Critic being at that moment thrown into the market, Dr. Pusey became the purchaser, and placed in the post of editor, Mr. Newman, the most learned the most astute, and the most practised in controversy of all concerned in the tracts. At the same time, Professor Sewell took up their cause in the Quarterly Review.

The singular book called Froude's Remains edited by Mr. Newman, has been excused by moderate writers as having been the result of prolonged bad health; but as its Editor gravely answered in print, that "Mr. Froude was not a man who said anything at random," the supposition, one would think, can scarcely be justified. The author, among many other similar expressions, spoke of himself and his coadjutors as organizing a "conspiracy for the unprotestantizing of the Church;"—he called the Reformation "A limb badly set, which required to be broken again;" and wondered that " * * * did not get on faster to hate the Reformers."

The first learned opposition which the Tractarians had to encounter was in the work of Dr. McIlvaine, Bishop of Vermont, in America. In the same year, 1840, The Church of England Quarterly, passed into other management, and maintained a firm, consistent opposition to the same writers, uniformly, however, treating them as gentlemen, scholars, and Christians. In April, 1843, it was however again placed under its former conductors.

Meanwhile the Tracts themselves had been silenced, the Bishop of Oxford having recommended their cessation, and been promptly obeyed. The last of the series, the celebrated No. 90,* which was avowed by Mr. Newman, was pointedly condemned by many of the Bishops, and a note of censure passed on it by the Hebdomadal

* The tract called "One Tract More," printed subsequently to No. 90, was written by a well-known poet and M. P.

Board. Books, sermons, reviews, charges, memoirs from the Puseyite party, have since manifested their determination to continue to be heard through the press.

The excitement was increased by the charge of the Bishop of London in 1842, in which he touched on some points of ritual observance, apparently favouring the Puseyites. A professor of poetry, who never published a single poetical work, has been elected at Oxford, "because he was not a Puseyite." "Mr. Gladstone's two works, "On the Relation of the Church to the State," and "Church Principles," were attacked as Puseyite, and Mr. Christmas's treatise on the "Discipline of the Anglican Church," though touching on no disputed point of doctrine, afforded matter of criticism for six weeks to a Presbyterian journal on the same ground. Old Divinity was now remembered with affection. Societies for the publication of neglected Old Divinity have been established, and also rival societies of Anglo-Catholic theology. As a good influence, may be noticed the impulse to correct Gothic Architecture, to the employment of art in the embellishment of Churches, and the improvement of the musical part of the service. As evidences of dissension, we observe one rector advertising for a curate, with—"No Puseyite need apply;"—another, "No Oxford man will be accepted;" on the other hand, a vicar "wants an assistant of sound Anglican views, who is untainted with Erastianism, and entertains no objection to the daily service, the weekly offertory, and to preaching in a surplice!" Thus, are the very bowels of Mother Church inflamed and convulsed.

The last public act of Dr. Pusey was the delivery of a sermon before the University, in which he was accused of advancing the doctrine of transubstantiation. Judges appointed by the University have censured him, passed a sentence of suspension on him, and condemned the sermons as heretical; but his friends maintain, that by not specifying their grounds, the judges have laid themselves open to the charges of unfairness and severity. It is much to be feared that these doings closely resemble many things which may be discovered as far back as the times of Abailard and St. Bernard.

It is said that Dr. Pusey is about to quit Oxford, and to take up his residence at Leeds, where a superb church is in process of erection for his ministry.

RAPID ADVANCES TOWARDS CATHOLICISM.

The following extracts from the Catechism compiled under the authority of Government, to be used in conformity with the Factory Education Bill, if it had become law, are interesting. The bill failing, the Catechism is now published and circulated for all. It is entitled "A Catechism for the use of young persons of the Church of England, compiled from authentic sources." It is published by James Toovey, 38, St. James's Street. The following are a few extracts, arranged under their different heads, to teach "Young Englanders Protestantism:—

1. "The Worship of Images."—What puts us in mind that Christ became man, and suffered on a cross? The very making the sign of the cross or reverently beholding that sacred emblem. Why, then, do we place crosses in and on our Churches? To put us in mind that God the Son became man, and died upon the cross for us. Are pictures and holy symbols allowable in Church? Yes; for they movingly represent to us the life and passion of our blessed Lord, and other doctrines of our most holy faith. Is there any idolatry in honouring saints and angels? No; provided we honour them only with an inferior honour, as the friends and creatures of God, not as Gods nor with God's honour.

"The Doctrine of Purgatory."—What is the fifth article?" He descended into hell; the third day He arose again from the dead. What means "he descended into hell?" That part of hell called Hades. What do you mean by Hades? I mean a place of rest, where the souls of the saints who died before Christ were detained.

"Worship of Saints and the Virgin Mary."—Have we, then, any communion with the saints in Heaven? Yes; we communicate with them as our fellow-members, under the same head, Jesus Christ; they feeling for us, and assisting us in all holy and kind offices, and we giving thanks to God for their good examples, honoring them for their virtues and holding spiritual communion with them. Is it any disrespect to God to remember the saints with reverence and honour? Quite the reverse, inasmuch as we glorify and adore God in and through them; for even the saints are indebted for all goodness to him alone. Do we keep any other days besides the Feast of the Purification of the Blessed Virgin Mary which reminds us at once of our Lord and his blessed Mother? Yes; the Feast of Annunciation of our Lady on the 25th of March. Are there any other days, which, though not publicly observed, are named in the calendar of the Church? Yes, there are several days in honour of the blessed Virgin Mary—her visitation, on the 2nd of July; her nativity, on the 8th of September, and her conception, on the 8th of December; with many days of holy Martyrs, Virgins, Bishops, &c. How, then, should we keep these festivals? We should endeavour to make ourselves acquainted with the persons or events commemorated, and allow none of them to pass by without thinking of them.

"Duty of Confession."—Does our Church encourage the people to seek counsel of the clergy? Yes; for the disburdening of conscience and the quieting of scruples and doubts, especially before Holy communion.

"Infallibility of the Church, and duty of a rigid obedience of all Feasts and Festivals."—What do you mean when you say, "I believe in the Holy Catholic Church?" I mean that Christ has left a Society behind Him on earth to be what He was, and that in the sacraments we obtain communion with him, through that society. To whom has Christ given the power to forgive sins? To the Apostles and their successors, the Bishops and the Priests of His Church. Are we bound to obey the commandments of the Church? Yes; because Christ has said to the Pastors of the Church, "He that heareth you heareth me, and he that despiseth you despiseth me," Luke x. 16. Why does the Church command us to fast and abstain? To humble us before God for our sins, and keep our bodies in subjection. Will not a Christian then feel himself bound to do more in this way than to comply with the mere rule? Without doubt, health permitting. Are persons in bad or weak health obliged to fast or abstain, or again, very young persons? No; in all such cases the rule is relaxed: children, for instance, keep abstinence days, when seven years old, but fasting days not till they come of age. In other cases, then, may you decide this question of yourself? No: we should apply to our Clergyman. How do Christians in general keep the week days of Lent? Throughout the Western Church Christians are universally allowed during Lent to eat meat at least on two days in the week, besides the Sundays; but even on those days one full meal is allowed.

"Transubstantiation."—Is the holy eucharist a sacrifice? Yes; it is a sacrifice commemorative the one sacrifice upon the cross; or, as the fathers call it, the unbloody sacrifice of the body and blood of Christ. Is it not, also, a propitiatory sacrifice? It is; it renders God propitious to us when rightly used, and is a mode in which the great sacrifice upon the cross is applied to ourselves and to others.

[This doctrine is perfectly Catholic—the words are almost identical with those of the "Catholic Catechism" recommended by the Catholic Bishops of Ireland, and used by the Catholics of this Colony, under the sanction of the Archbishop. If our space permitted we should place the passages in juxtaposition, but the similarity is so striking that there is no need of comparison.—Ed.]—Sydney Morning Chronicle.

VAN DIEMEN'S LAND.*

PERSECUTION AT PORT ARTHUR.—CASH, CAVENAGH, AND JONES.—These men were sent to Port Arthur. The two former have publicly declared, and Jones has frequently stated, that a great cause for their taking to the bush was their being deprived of the practice of their religious exercises. In respect to Jones, this oppression was carried to a grievous extent. He, a Catholic, was ordered to attend the Protestant worship. He begged to be excused, entreated, but his prayer was refused; he was compelled to attend, but did not conform to the prescribed rule. On the succeeding Sunday, being again ordered to attend, but feeling that by doing so he violated a point of religion, he refused to enter the place of worship. For this he was confined and imprisoned for a week. What imprisonment is at Port Arthur need not be stated. At the expiration of the week he was again ordered to attend the Protestant service. Again, considering bodily suffering preferable to violation of religious duty, he refused. For this he was again confined, tried, and flogged! The charge was for disobedience of orders, but that was the disobedience; so also Cash and Cavenagh. Both of them declare that the only religious instruction they have ever received, the only religious consolation ever afforded them, was that which has been so unremittingly and affectionately bestowed by the excellent minister of their faith in the cell of death. They both declare that they had been permitted to receive this instruction and this consolation before, they would have been very different men, and attribute all their offences, to its being prohibited. [From a letter signed "A. B." in Murray's Austral-Asiatic Review of the 15th Sept.]

Cash was tried on the 13th of September and found guilty of shooting constable Peter Winstanley, who attempted to take him as an absconder illegally at large. Lawrence Cavenagh was then tried for the robbery of the Launceston coach at Epping Forest. When called on for his defence, the prisoner bowed, and spoke as follows:—

"I have seen a good many scenes of misery in my time; but what I saw at Port Arthur beat all. There is one circumstance that I feel bound to mention. I was driven to a place of worship by the lash of the law. My own prayer-book was taken out of my hand by the superintendent, and I was forbidden to read it under pain of severe punishment. I do not blame the superintendent: it was not his fault. But I put it to any conscientious Protestant in this Court whether he would like to be driven to a Catholic place of worship, or punished for not going there? All men are not of one mind at Port Arthur. There are some men who forget that they have been men. I have not forgot that. I flew from Port Arthur on this account, at the hazard of that life I am now about to forfeit. While I was in the bush, I would rather have been shot than have fallen into the hands of the Government. But I fell into a mistake; for since I have been in custody I have been treated well (with emphasis), and I am very much obliged to the gentlemen for their kindness and attention.

"Gentlemen, after I went into the bush, and when I was under arms, I committed no act of violence or cruelty, and did nothing but what became a man. I did no violence to any body. Stains of blood we always avoided—both me and my companions; and if I have been unfortunate, and done wrong, thanks be to God I have no stain of blood upon my hands! If I abstained from violence, it was not because I expected any mercy whilst standing at a bar like this. I did not surrender through any expectation of mercy, but through a feeling that I had in my own breast, having met with an accident. I would have pleaded guilty to this charge, only I was accused of having used violence, and violence I never used to any one. But if I came against armed men, I would stand against them the best way I could; but as to using violence against an unarmed man, or an unarmed party, I would not be guilty of so cowardly an act. I have nothing more to say, your honour. I have no witnesses."

His honour addressed the jury; he explained in his usual lucid manner, the nature of the charge against the "poor man" at the bar, and the fatal penalty attached to its commission. Upon the evidence little was said, as it was explicit, plain, and incontrovertible. The defence set up by the prisoner, his honour observed, was being forcibly driven to a place of worship contrary to the tenets of his own religion, and this was the only defence; but it touched not the duty of the jury, neither had they any evidence of such a fact; yet if that was the case, it was most detestable and cruel tyranny, and an instance of bigotry against which his honour, for one, would most resolutely set his face. Why the prisoner should have stated this circumstance his honour did not know, unless it was to excite the compassion of the jury; but their duty was plain and straightforward, and must be performed without favour or affection.

The jury retired for about twenty minutes, and then returned a verdict of "Guilty."

The prisoner was then remanded, his honour deferring his sentence, but affording him no hope that the capital part would be abandoned. The many outrages committed by the prisoner and his companions, and the anxiety and terror which they had caused in so many families, rendered an example necessary. His honour was glad to see the prisoner in a state of mind so favourable to the reception of that religious instruction and consolation which would be abundantly afforded him. He earnestly hoped that such a state of mind was sincere; and although his honour could not deny that the prisoner had used no violence, yet no mercy could be extended him on that account.

The trial lasted but a very short time, and the prisoner throughout preserved a demeanour cool, firm, and collected; there was nothing of the bravo about him, and he appeared fully aware of his situation; he expected no mercy—and he asked for none; and he delivered his defence in a style of natural but simple eloquence, which was extremely affecting. He related the cruel treatment which he had received at Port Arthur, with an expression of indignant feeling, which, to our minds, carried a conviction of its truth, while he avowed his abhorrence of bloodshed, with a fervour which evinced his sincerity. He was dressed in a long dark great coat, and had his left arm in a sling; he appeared otherwise, in good health. He is rather a good-looking man, with an expression of vivacity and intelligence on a fair countenance. — Austral-Asiatic Review.

MISCELLANEA.

Father Mathew is to visit America in June. A free passage has been offered him by Grinnell Minturn and Co. proprietors of a London and Liverpool line of packet ship, which he has accepted.

Conformably with the strict application of the existing Swedish laws, the Swede Court of justice has sentenced Mr. Nilson, a master painter, for having embraced the Roman Catholic religion, to banishment from Sweden, and to the loss of all hereditary and civil rights in his own country.

We learn from Munich that the King of Bavaria has published a decree, in virtue of which, Protestant Soldiers are no longer forced to be present at the service of the Roman Catholic Church, or Catholic Soldiers to attend on the occasion of religious ceremonies in Protestant Churches.

The Rev. A. A. Rees, some time curate of Sunderland, and lately the unlicensed minister of Thomas-street, Episcopal Chapel, Bath, who has thrown off all ecclesiastical authority, and disregarded the admonitions, advice, and guidance of his ecclesiastical superiors, has arrived at Sunderland to form a "religious community" under his own leadership. — Durham Advertiser.

THE "CHURCH" IN IRELAND.—As I feared, the good Bishop of Meath has found himself constrained to throw the responsible office of Archdeacon upon the young shoulders of his own son, the Rev. Edward Addely Stopford. This is the twelfth Irish archdeacon now living whose father is (or was) a Bishop. Their names and dignities are as follow;—Waller, Bishop Mant, Archdeacon of Down; James Saurin, Archdeacon of Dromore; Honorable James Agar, Archdeacon of Kilmore; Marcus G. Beresford, Archdeacon of Ardagh; Charles Warburton, Archdeacon of Tuam; J. Verschoyle, Archdeacon of Achonry; C. Lindsay, Archdeacon of Kildare; S. M. Kyle, Archdeacon of Cork; Edmond Know, Archdeacon of Killaloe; James S. Butson, Archdeacon of Kilmacduagh; and Edward A. Stopford, Archdeacon of Meath. To these I am tempted, to add the name of the Venerable and Very Reverend Henry Cotton, D. D., Archdeacon of Cashel, Dean of Lismore, Treasurer of Christ Church Cathedral, Dublin, incumbent of the rich union of Lismalin, near Killenaule, and likewise of that other most valuable and multifarious preferment of Thurles and the Holy Cross, both lying, being, and situate in the sweet county of Tipperary. But he was only the son in law of his Most Reverend Father in God the last Archbishop of Cashel. And well it was, perhaps, for the poor indigenous clergy that he was not a blood-relation, or he might have swallowed up the whole diocese.—Tablet.

SONG OF THE SECESSION.

(From Bon Gaultier and his Friends.)

When the Cock of the Kirk is forbidden to crow,
When crowdy is scarce, and the stipends are low;
When lairds are rebellious, and few of "our friends"

Are left in the Court of Commission of Teinds,
When payment is asked of solicitor's bills,
As a general principle—Take to the hills,
With a down, down, derry down!

Like our fathers of old we shall march o'er the green.

With the blue flag above us—that never was seen,
We'll cant, and we'll rant, and condemn to the rope

Both Protestant, Presbyter, Prelate, and Pope.
The mountainous region is rich in "sma' stills,"
No little inducement to take to the hills,
With a down, down, derry down!

Come, put on the plaid that our grandfathers wore,

And belt o'er your hurdies the ragged claymore.
Stick on the blue bonnet, the badge of the Whig,
Since the era of Bothwell, the raid of the Brigg,
And a handful of sulphur, in powders or pills,
Is a splendid provision to take to the hills,
With a down, down, derry down!

We've sucked the old egg of Establishment dry,
We've ta'en the last pig from the parsonage sty,
We've gutted the manse, and we've cut down the trees,

We've delved up the garden, and smoked out the bees,
And feint a potato exists in the drills,
For those that come after the lads of the hills,
With a down, down, derry down!

CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

No. 26.]

CALCUTTA : SATURDAY, JUNE 29, 1844.

THE ORIGIN OF MONASTIC INSTITUTIONS AND THE BENEFITS DERIVED FROM THE ORDER OF ST. DOMINIC.

In speaking of Monasteries, it is evident that these important institutions cannot be ascribed to the unworthy and inadequate causes, which a Protestant Divine of the Church of England has ascribed them to, viz., "the policy of the court of Rome in detaching the clergy from civil connections with the country to which they belonged." These institutions can be traced as far back as the retirement of the famous St. Antony into the desert, which happened in the third century, or what is more probable the latter part of the 2nd century, a period at which it has been acknowledged that the conduct of the Popes was exemplary, and free from ambitious policy. An ascetical or retired and contemplative life, has been even more ancient than the time which we have marked. For we discover traces of it early in the 2nd century, we find it in the time of the Apostles and of Christ himself. Let us ask our Protestant readers, what idea they have of the kind of life which the prophetess Anna led in the temple, in prayer, fasting and celibacy, and of that which the prophet and more than a prophet, St. John the Baptist, passed in the desert? Do not these come under the description of an ascetic life, at least they are liable to all the objections which have been raised against it? Again has not the Divine Founder of our holy religion explicitly recommended the essential practices of such a course of life by his doctrine, and confirmed them by his example, being destitute of house and money, observing celibacy, being obedient to his own creatures, and employing whole nights in prayer upon the tops of mountains, and in gardens? On one occasion in particular did he not spend forty days together in the wilderness, destitute of society, of food, and of every worldly comfort? Let us descend now from these exalted authorities to the most illustrious fathers and doctors of the Church in the 4th, 5th, and the following ages, many of whose names are enrolled in the Protestant as well as in our Calendar. Of what profession were the saints Athanasius, Basil, Gregory, Nazianzen, John Chrysostom, Ambrose, Augustine, Jerome, Benedict, Gregory, Swithin, Boniface, Bede, &c.? were not all of them institutors, patrons or members of monastic establishments? How flimsy and trifling must the airy speculations and new-invented theories of Protestant divines of the Church of England on "the utility of virtue on the social affections, and on the laws of nature," prove to the sincere Christian, when confronted with these victorious maxims, and illustrious examples. Thus having traced the origin of monastic institutions to so early a period, as the 2nd, 3rd and 4th centuries, and having in a former issue given a general outline of the numerous political and literary advantages derived from these poor Devils of Monks, we will direct the attention of our readers to an extract taken from a work entitled An Apology for the Order of St. Dominic, that they may see what claims of gratitude that single order has on us for the lasting benefits which they have conferred on us. Look at the number and skill of the artists with which it has furnished us, the eloquence and wisdom displayed by the Cardinals, Bishops, &c. with which it has supplied the Church, and the number of saints it caused to be enrolled in the Roman Calendar.—The following is the extract.

Although preaching and science were the principal objects of his order, St. Dominic did not exclude from it any occupation which might be useful for the salvation of souls. We must not, then, be astonished to find the names of his disciples celebrated in the arts, in the pastoral charge, in the general government of the church, and in a multitude of departments, which are only connected by the unity of purpose and devotedness in those who fill them.

If we be astonished, for example, to find artists, and even great artists, among the Friar-preachers, we have not conceived an adequate idea of the religious character of art. Art being nothing more, like language and writing, than the expression of truth and beauty, should be cultivated by all those who endeavor to raise the souls of their fellow creatures to the contemplation of the invisible; and God himself, when he gave the tables of the law to Moses, showed him on Mount Sinai the form of the tabernacle and of the ark. By this he taught us, that the Creator of the universe is the sovereign artist; and that the more man receives of this spirit, the more capable and worthy is he to aspire to the holy functions of art. The monks of the middle ages were not ignorant of this truth. The cloister had its architects, sculptors, painters, and musicians, as well as its writers and orators. On entering the sweet shade of its arches, the Christian offered God, with his soul and body, the talent he had received from him; and whatever was this talent, he never failed to find there predecessors and masters in its development. Assembled round the altar, the monks were assimilated to each other by their common exercises of devotion; when restored to their cells, the prism was decomposed, and each one expressed, in his peculiar way, the ray of divine beauty. O happy times! terrestrial paradises destroyed by despotism and barbarism! All modern civilization cannot build a Christian church; and yet poor Friar-preachers of the thirteenth century, Fra Sisto, Fra Ristiro, and Fra Giovanni, raised in Florence the Church of Santa Maria Novella, which Michael Angelo went daily to see, and which he said was beautiful, pure, and simple as a bride; hence is derived its ordinary name with the Florentines, Sposa. The citizen and the stranger incessantly repeat this penegetic, when passing through the Piazza della Sposa;—but no one names the artists: fame respects them even in their tombs, and fears to alarm those chaste hearts, whose humility was even greater than their genius.

Sometimes, however, she has offered violence to their brethren in art and in religion. What name more celebrated in painting, than that of the Dominican Fra Angélico de Fiesole? "Fra Angélico," says Vasari, "could have lived happily in the world; but, as he wished to secure the salvation of his soul, he embraced the religious life in the order of St. Dominic, without abandoning painting; thus uniting to the care of his eternal happiness, the acquisition of an immortal renown among men." Fra Angélico never painted the images of Jesus Christ and of his Holy Mother, but on his knees; and often the tears which bedewed his cheeks, attested the sensibility of the artist and the piety of the Christian. When Michael Angelo saw, in the Church of St. Dominic at Fiesole, the picture of the Annunciation painted there by our Friar-preacher, he expressed his admiration in these words; "a man could not have made these figures, without having first seen them in heaven." Called to Rome by Eugenius the IV., Fra Angélico painted in the Vatican the grand frescoes, representing the history of St. Laurence and St. Stephen; and the Pope, equally delighted with his piety and his pencil, offered him the archbishopric of Florence, his native city. This was a recompense sometimes given in those and preceding times, to similar talents; it was not that a painter or an architect was less worthy of the episcopal dignity than a preacher; both expressed the same things with the same faith in a different manner. But Fra Angélico obstinately refused the archi-episcopal cross; and pointed out as more worthy than himself, Fra Antonine, whom Nicholas V. raised afterwards to the See of Florence, and who is honored by the church among the Saints.

The annals of painting boast also of Fra Bartolomeo, whose name in the world was Baccio della Porta. When about twenty, of age, before his talent was discovered, by himself or by others, he heard the sermons of Jerome Savonarola, and took a lively interest in the reformation which this eloquent friar wished to introduce into Florence. At the moment that his master was arrested, he was in the convent of St. Mark, among the five hundred citizens who had assembled to defend Savonarola. He was so afflicted at his death, that he determined on taking the habit of St. Dominic at the convent of Prato,—resolved to bury himself there for life, and never to touch canvass with his pencil. Many illustrious men of those times experienced the same feeling of discouragement, and, after the death of Savonarola, did not think it worth their while to write, to speak, to paint, or to occupy themselves with any other thought, than the eternal sentiment of the vanity of the world. In effect, modern paganism was getting the ascendancy; Luther was at hand; and the pile of Savonarola, who had predicted this approaching catastrophe, was the last flash of a light, which his contemporaries were not again to behold. During the rest of his life, Fra Bartolomeo mourned inconsolably the loss of his friend, and even the friendship of Raphael could not fill up in his heart the vacuum it had created. However, at the end of four years, he was prevailed on by the solicitations of his brethren, and consented to produce new chef-d'œuvre with a feeling of melancholy which success did not absorb.

And let us not forget Fra Benedetto, miniature painter in the convent of St. Mark, unknown for his talent, but deserving of eternal remembrance; because, on the day when Savonarola was arrested, he armed himself to defend him, and was only prevailed on to keep his sword unsheathed by the remonstrance of his master, who said to him, that a monk ought to use no arms but those of the spirit. He wished at least to accompany him to death and suffer with him, and Savonarola was obliged to forbid him, saying: "Brother Benedetto, by virtue of obedience, I command you not to come, because this day I am to die for the love of Christ." I cannot tire of these recollections, because we are but shadows, and it is a consolation for the living to turn and converse with the dead.

The Dominican order has given to the church, a great number of bishops, many of whom have acted a distinguished part. I will not enter into any biographical detail of them, or of those who have been raised to the dignity of cardinal,—the first in the world after the sovereign dignity, as Louis XIV. wrote to Cardinal de Bouillon. I will content myself with saying that, in 1825, six centuries after the death of St. Dominic, there had been taken from this order sixty-six cardinals, four hundred and sixty archbishops, two thousand one hundred and thirty-six bishops, four presidents of general councils, twenty-five legates a latere, eighty apostolic nuncios, and one prince-elect of the Roman Empire. The greater part of the Dominicans who were raised to these dignities were simple religious, without birth and without fortune, and owed solely to their virtues the choice which popes and princes made of them. The Roman Church has always been used to take from the dust of the cloister, poor monks and raise them to elevated stations, at the same time that she places in similar dignities men of an exalted rank. This church, mother and mistress, has no ostracism against any superiority; she accepts the nobleman and the undistinguished citizen; and when we assist at her holy ceremonies, the eye sees beneath the same stuff or the same purple, all ranks confounded in the equality of merit or of abnegation. The papacy especially bears this glory on its brow. The tiara passes, without losing in dignity, from the prince to the swine-herd; and the Sovereign Pontiff, who struggles now with the House of Brandenburg, (Prussia,) is the son of an undistinguished citizen of Belluno. The white garment he is clad with, was his monastic dress; and in passing from the cloister to the Vatican, he was not obliged to change either his habit or his heart.

More than one friar-preacher was invested with, and honored, the tiara. The first was Peter de Tarentaise, archbishop of Lyons, subsequently transferred to the See of Tarentaise, cardinal-bishop of Ostia and Velletri, grand penitentiary, and finally pope, under the name of Innocent V. In his short pontificate of five months he reconciled the Republics of Lucca and Pisa, and restored peace to Florence.

The pontificate of brother Nicholas Bocasini, elected in 1303, who took the name of Benedict IX., was also short; but it is famous for the important circumstances in which he received it, and to which he was equal. It was he who succeeded Boniface VIII. The conclave chose him, to reward his courageous conduct at Anagni, when every body having abandoned the Sovereign Pontiff, he, with another cardinal, alone remained, and sustained the dignity of the Holy See against the assault of Nogaret. After his election, he labored for the peace of the church, with a moderation of character equal to his firmness in the hour of danger; and France owes to him its preservation at a dangerous crisis, without having shed a drop of blood.

In 1556, brother Michael Ghisleri was elected pope, and took the name of Pius V. He had given in the preceding pontificates such proofs of independence and of firmness, that the Romans were alarmed at his accession. The Pope knew this, and said to some one who spoke to him on the subject: "I will make the Roman people regret my death more than they have done my election." Such was the case. So many illustrious acts distinguished the six years of his pontificate, that general mourning accompanied his funeral. It is universally known that in 1571, he concluded, between Venice and Spain, a league against the Turks, which terminated in the famous naval battle of Lepanto, where the Christian arms obtained one of the most important victories, that ever entitled them to the gratitude of Europe.

THE FEAST OF THE SACRED HEART OF JESUS, DURRUMTOLLAH.

We have to apologise for having omitted to notice in our last, the celebration of the Feast of the Sacred Heart, Durrumtollah, on the Sunday within the octave; and we regret that want of time and space now prevents us from giving our readers an adequate idea of the ceremonies or the Sermon.

Pontifical High Mass was sung by the Most Rev. the Archbishop of Edessa, assisted by Deacon and Subdeacon, and was followed by procession and Benediction of the Most Holy Sacrament. The ceremonies were very edifying and impressive, and the singing and music more than ordinarily solemn and affecting; the congregation was unusually numerous and respectable, and it was very consoling to observe the numbers that approached the sanctuary to receive the Holy of Holies. The contrast between the last solemnity, and the celebration of the Feast on former years, was too remarkable not to be noticed by every one present, and must have been a source of joy to all who witnessed it.

Immediately after the Gospel had been chaunted by the Rev. Mr. Veralli, who acted as Deacon, the Rev. Mr. Kennedy ascended the pulpit, and after having explained the nature of the Devotion to the Sacred Heart, its origin, its object, its end, and the copious blessings which attended its progress through Christendom, he earnestly exhorted the congregation to the practice of this amiable devotion.

"The Solemnity of Corpus Christi," said the Rev. Preacher, "which we have just celebrated, was recommended by a special revelation from heaven as a remedy against the irreverences and scandals by which the God of love was daily offended in the Blessed Eucharist, and because Christians are still ungrateful, still cold, and still insensible to the love of God in that mystery of love, as a last effort to reclaim us, our beloved Redeemer shows us his Heart inflamed with love, and, like a tender father, complains that we do not consult our own interest by returning him love for love. He who loveth not, says St. John, abideth in death; the law of charity obliges us to love those who have injured us; but if we love not the God of love, who died to save us, how shall we be able to love our enemies? and if the complaint of the Son of God and the sight of his sacred Heart inflamed with love, do not awaken our love and gratitude, it is to be feared that we shall abide in death for ever. Devotion to the adorable Heart of Jesus was the means adopted by God to bring his followers back to a sense of their duty, when the injuries which the Divine Majesty endured in the sacrament of love from his own chosen servants, became more provoking and intolerable than the incredulity, the blasphemies and outrages of infidels and unbelievers; and such were the manifestations by which God was pleased to show how acceptable to him was this devotion, that in a few years, it was extended to all the provinces of France, and from France passed to all the nations of Christendom.

"How happy are we not, therefore, to have a Church in this city, dedicated to the most Sacred Heart of Jesus,—the very Church in which we are now assembled to do homage to that Divine Heart,—a Church which our Holy Father, the Pope, has taken under his special care and protection by the grant of numerous indulgences and singular privileges. How should not this circumstance inflame our devotion to the Sacred Heart of our Lord, and make this congregation a model of piety and fervor to all the neighbouring congregations. As often as we enter this Church, its very name reminds us of the dispositions of heart which we should bring with us before that altar. As often as we kneel on that sacred pavement and see the image of our Redeemer's loving Heart, how can we help recollecting what he said in the vision to Mother Mary Margaret—"Behold this Heart which has loved mankind so tenderly and spared nothing, even to the wasting and consuming itself, in testimony of its love, and yet, in return, I generally meet with nothing but ingratitude, contempt, sacrileges, irreverences and coldness even in the very sacrament of love"—And when we look to the Tabernacle and recollect who is humbled and concealed there for the love of us, and call to mind how we have treated him; we must confess that our loving Saviour has too much reason to make this plaint of each of us in particular, and if it not move a heart of stone to hear our plain of us and not be moved, when we know how much reason we leave him to complain.

"He did not complain in this manner when he was going to die for us; he did not complain of those who tied him to a pillar and scourged him; he did not complain of those who bound his temples with a crown of thorns, nor of those who loaded him with a heavy cross and fastened him to it with nails; and yet he complains of our ingratitude, of our contempt, of our sacrileges and irreverences, thereby giving us to understand that the insults and injuries we offer him in the Blessed Eucharist are more intolerable than the pains of crucifixion, than all the ignominies and torments of Calvary. "I generally meet with nothing," he complains, "but ingratitude, contempt, sacrileges, irreverences, and coldness even in the very sacrament of my love."—If, then, we must all acknowledge our own guilt and the justice of this complaint, shall we not all unite this day with one heart and soul to make that reparation which Jesus Christ demands, by devotion to his Sacred Heart during the eight days which the Church has consecrated to this devotion, and during the remainder of our lives;—shall we not offer it, this day and frequently for the future, a solemn reparation of honor and a public act of atonement, and receive the holy communion, if not on this day, as soon as possible, with an intention to repair by it as far as we can, all the injuries and affronts it has received when exposed on the altars? This is what our beloved Saviour demands, and demands with a promise of the choicest gifts of Divine love to those who shall pay to his sacred and adorable Heart this homage, or induce others to the performance of the same religious office."

Want of space prevents us from going more at length into the Rev. Gentleman's edifying discourse. It was remarkable for simplicity and pathos, and many of the congregation seemed much affected.

BISHOP OLLIFFE AND PARTY.

We glean the following paragraph from the Tablet of the 13th April last:

THE PILGRIMS FOR THE EAST.

We have had several letters on the subject of Dr. Olliffe's departure, with his truly religious and enterprising companions. We extract one passage from each of two very interesting letters:—1. "Professors from the Colleges of Maynooth, All Hallows, and St. Vincent's, thronged the deck, and lingered on board until the ship's bell, at two, announced the hour of departure. The Lascars, in their gala costume, manned the yards, and this compact and elegant vessel slowly moved from her moorings amidst the prolonged cheers and it is hard to hear the Son of God com-of thousands, and the fervent benedictions of many a warm heart and wet eye. An incident at her departure deserves mention. Upon nearing Dalkey Sound the vessel slackened speed, and steered as closely as possible under the beautiful newly-constructed noviciate of Loretto House. It was an interesting moment. The religious ladies came on deck, and the inmates of the convent also came within the enclosure, near to the water's edge, to bid their sisters adieu. At this instant several flags, bearing appropriate devices, were raised within the convent grounds—handkerchiefs mutually waved—the vessel smoothly glided on, and the scene thus closed upon the parties—perhaps for ever! Nothing of particular interest occurred during our run coastwise. Owing to the vessel's new machinery, and depth in water from stores, the Fire Queen did not enter Cove before the evening of Monday. Her novel appearance, numerous streamlets, and unusual crew, attracted attention from all sides. After being honoured with a salute whilst passing one of her Majesty's war steamers, we passed up the river, and safely anchored at Passage by eight o'clock.—A CONSTANT READER. P. S. Names of party—Right Rev. Dr. Olliffe, Rev. Messrs. Formosa, M'Girr and Doyle, Messrs. Tracey, Prendergast, Corbett, O'Shea, Maguire, White, Johnson, M'Auliffe and Daly (ecclesiastical students,) Religious sisters, novices, and postulants—Mrs. M'Donnell, Mrs. Hogan, Mrs. Charlotte Hogan, Miss Clarke, Miss Ireland, Miss Doyle, Miss Molloy, Miss Murtagh, Miss Cooney, and Miss Gaghagan. Mrs. and Miss Olliffe, Mr. Olliffe; Master M'Keever, student for Madras; Miss Currie, Miss Sandeman, Miss Hughes; and Messrs. Powell, Higgins, Sheridan, and Rushton, Nine tradesmen (shoemakers, carpenters, weavers, tailors, and printers) to teach their several trades to the boys of the Bengal Catholic Orphanage in Calcutta."—2. "The sight of this strange ship, and its crew, all black, all Mahomedans, arranged in their gaudiest native costume, but far more the nature of the occasion, and the object of the voyage, had collected to-day a great multitude on the pier, where the vessel lay at anchor. About noon the several bands of heroic missionaries began to arrive, each party attended by those fond friends who cling round the objects of the affection to the last. There were the Right Rev. Dr. Olliffe, the young Coadjutor Bishop of Bengal, three priests, six ecclesiastical students, eleven nuns from Loretto Convent going to join their sisters, who have already established a branch of the order in the East Indies. An additional reinforcement of three students and eight Christian Brothers will embark at Cork, where the Fire Queen will touch for that purpose. Joyful ardour animated every countenance; but when the signal for departure came, the movements of nature could be no longer suppressed, the voice of wailing arose, and tears streamed copiously from many an eye. No wonder:

"These were partings
Such as press the life out of young hearts,
Which ne'er might be repeated," at least in this world. As the ship moved off, a louder voice of hearty cheers broke from the faithful multitude that thronged the shore. Our friends visibly responded from the deck, and the Musselman crew, running up the rigging, returned the salute by a wild Indian cry, such as was perhaps never heard before upon our shore. Great numbers pursued the ship, so dear to us all, as far as they could. Again and again was there, interchange of greeting and salutations, until the voice were lost on the wind, and nothing but dumb gesticulations could be discerned. This scene, so painful to the feelings of our voyagers was shortly after re-enacted; for the Fire Queen, pursuing her voyage, passed almost under the windows of the beautiful new Loretto Convent of Dalkey; and the sisterhood could easily recognise each other, and exchange a last mutual salutation. In a few minutes the vessel, passing through Dalkey Sound, disappeared from our view; and they went on their way rejoicing."

To the above we regret to add, that by the May overland, accounts have been received that the Fire Queen put back to repair the Pistons of her Engines which gave way, and if the delay thus occasioned be considerable, Bishop Olliffe and party will, in all likelihood, proceed in another vessel to Calcutta.

FEAST OF ST. ALOYSIUS.—CHANDERNAGORE.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—I can well imagine that at all times you and your readers are ever delighted to hear that our holy religion is rising glorious and triumphant over the powers of darkness, notwithstanding the venomous and foul calumnies of the "Calcutta Christian Advocate," as it is called:—and Heaven be praised this is its state in the truly Catholic Mission of Chandernagore. Living here amid the soul-stirring ceremonies of our holy religion, we cannot but be grateful to the "Giver of all good gifts," who has thus favoured his unworthy children by having abundantly provided us with all the consolations of the one only true Church of Christ, which is the "pillar and ground of truth;" whilst thousands around us, nay millions, "sit in darkness and in the shadow of death," and, as the Apostle St. Paul says, "tossed about with every wind of doctrine." Truly there is no nation so blessed as we are, having our God so near to us. In the midst of these abundant consolations, let us ever be mindful, that from "those to whom much has been given, much will be required."

On Friday the 21st instant, the feast of St. Aloysius, the patron of young students and mirror of all virtues, was a day of holy joy and thanksgiving to Him, from whom all blessings flow. In fine, it was one of the many days which is set apart to honor the valiant soldiers of Jesus Christ, those faithful servants of the Lord, who renounced all things for the love of him, who is now "their reward exceedingly great." On entering our Church in the morning, the Christian would be at once struck by the beautiful and neat manner in which God's altar was decorated: its neatness was only surpassed by its chaste and lovely appearance, like a bride attired for her nuptials, and which silently whispered to the heart of the pious Christian, that this was indeed another day peculiarly set apart by the Church to honor the King of Saints, through some of his faithful and estimable servants, who are now enjoying the sweets of his blessed beatitude. At $\frac{1}{2}$ past 7 o'clock, a train of the orphan boys attired in neat crimson surtans and beautiful surplices, made for this interesting occasion, entered the Sanctuary, the venerable pastor closing the procession. High Mass immediately commenced, which was sung in Father Boulogne's usual sweet style,—the music on the occasion was very fine; the Lady Superioress presided as usual at the organ.

On this glorious festival kept in honor of the youthful Saint, how truly edifying it was to behold youths of both sexes, poor Orphans, going unto the Altar of God, to Him, who rejoiceth in those youths who love Him. Yea, there was a goodly throng of youths assembled around the Lord's table, whose souls were fed with bread from Heaven. Oh! with what holy joy, humility, and reverential awe did our humble Orphans approach the heavenly banquet of their loving Saviour to receive him, who said "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God." With what complacency must not their youthful and blessed Patron, Aloysius, look down from his exalted state upon these tender and youthful servants of Him, who is the "Father of Orphans and the judge of widows." May we not hope that on this his festival, he not only presented their humble petitions to Him who is the "God of their hearts and their portion for ever," but he also obtained many graces and favours for these humble Orphans? How consoling it is to those parents who are blessed with length of days, who live to see their children advance in "grace before God and man," and oh! how afflicting must it not have been to the departed parents of our poor Orphans, on their death-beds, to leave their weeping offspring without one friend to console their afflicted hearts and to wipe from their cheek the tear of sorrow? May we not presume, that the spirits of the just made perfect, look down now with joy upon the protected ones whom they left sorrowing behind, how they are overwhelmed with gratitude towards those generous and truly charitable Christians who thus hastened to the rescue of their dear little helpless ones, and by their charity have provided them a home. Many a holy and fervent prayer do they send up to Him, who "rewardeth a cup of cold water given in his name." The Orphan, by their liberality, is taught to dearly prize that winning innocence around which infinite innocence entwined his arms. The desolate through life, by their munificence, would always have a religious education to "sweeten the yoke" of their hardships and to lessen the "burthen of their labours."

Heaven, in fine, at the last day, will have an ineffable smile for those who, even by the "Widow's mite," have contributed to "instruct others unto justice." The morning service being concluded, all retired in edifying silence, thanking God for the great blessings conferred so abundantly upon them. During the day the Orphans were plentifully regaled with sweetmeats, fruit and an excellent dinner, &c. The whole day was spent in innocent hilarity and decorous amusements. In the evening, Vespers were beautifully chanted by our youthful choir, the ceremonies of the day closing with the Solemn Benediction of the adorable Sacrament. Thus ended the thrice joyful festival of the angelical youth, Saint Aloysius Gonzaga, of the illustrious Society of Jesus.

Chandernagore, }
25th June, 1844. }

C.

THE PROTESTANT CLERGY.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—It is truly humiliating to observe how party spirit and bias will often render minds naturally liberal, impervious to the most conclusive arguments or the most obvious truths; and when, in illustration of this unhappy fact, we turn to contemplate the catalogue of the dogmas of the Anglican Church, besides our conviction of the humility that attaches to such prejudiced minds, we are lost in wonder in endeavoring to account for the fact, how the many learned members,—laymen, and divines—of that Church, who have no reluctance to arrive at truth, can continue blind to the glaring imperfections of the creed they profess, and even boldly enlist as champions in their defence.

A writer in the Madras Athenæum, evidently a Church of England party, reports the following account relative to the postponement of the hours of Divine Service from six to eleven, A. M. this convenient plan being now feasible from the favorable depression in the temperature.

THE CHURCH.—The rains having set in, a Circular was issued last week giving notice that Divine Service would, in future, commence at eleven in the forenoon instead of six in the morning, as it used to do during the hot months; but in consequence of the serious indisposition of the Rev. Mr. Deane's child our worthy and highly esteemed Chaplain was too deeply afflicted to go through his ministerial duties on Sunday last. It, however, affords me much pleasure to add that a favorable change in the child's health enabled the Reverend Gentleman to go through the usual Wednesday evening Service. The little infant is one on whom the parents doat with all the fervency of human affection, and it is devoutly to be wished that the Almighty will restore it to perfect health and to the joy of its fond parents.—Athenæum, June 4.

Is not this lamentably suicidal? I recollect having read reports of a similar nature to the above from Roman Catholic gentlemen, but not one, save this, from a Protestant source. Strange the condemning nature of this account did not appear to the author as he wrote it! Here we see the worldly ties—those ties which Protestants will ridicule the Church of Rome for forbidding her clergy because of its inevitable interference with duties more sacred and demanding exclusive devotion—here we see those ties gaining a mastery over the observance of incumbent ministerial duties. The Rev. Gentleman referred to in the above extract, was stayed from the imperative discharge of his duties on a Sunday—why?—because—“his child was indisposed.” And this interruption might have been protracted to many more Sundays, if his child continued ill, unfortunately, all the while, and the laity would be fain to go without their Sunday morning service, probably consoling themselves, however, with the thought, that the interruption occurred from their Minister's availing himself of a privilege held out by his Church to all; and that, therefore, an omission of the usual Sunday service—a day so emphatically ordered by Holy Writ to be piously observed to the exclusion and at the sacrifice of all worldly concerns, a day which the Protestants themselves are loud in recommending to be sanctified, and that with the same positive injunction, may be excused. Protestants may say what they will in support of this privilege of their Church, and they have said volumes—but no liberal member of their Church can take upon himself to deny the error of an immunity that tends to such interruptions from ministerial duties from the affection or concern the close ties of matrimony may have produced.

When the black Cholera raged in England innumerable instances of far greater urgency and moment than Divine Service on a Sunday, were allowed to pass by without the pastor's solicited aid. The fears arising from a belief that the epidemic was contagious gave occasion to very interesting scenes in the family circle of the Protestant clergy. The wife clung to her husband's side and implored him to be within doors, when his services were solicited, and his office required him to tend the dying hundreds at their last awful hours. The little children gathered around their parent, and clasping fondly his knees tenderly besought him to tarry at home. The weeping consort conjured him by those ties he had contracted to desist. If he persisted she conjured him to think of her disconsolate condition at his fate if he caught the infection—she pointed to his children, those dear objects of his affection—she represented her future impoverished lot, their hapless, hapless fate. And all this the Minister was fain to listen to, to consider, and—to yield! He then thought not of the critical state of the unfortunate victims of the pest, who more than strongly needed at that moment his words of comfort—the all that his Church allows him of foreign aid. There kneels his affectionate wife, here his beloved children—all tears—all supplication—could he resist?—Any one conversant with the authenticated accounts given of the excited commotion that reigned in England among the great as among the low, among the rich as among the poor, will see that the above is no exaggerated sketch—no flight of imagination; and no liberal member of the Protestant persuasion will reject or rather pretend to reject it as untrue, because though it emanates from Roman Catholic sources, its authenticity, from the love of unity and integrity of their authors, is widely known to be unquestionable.

F. G.

June 19th, 1844.

SUBSCRIPTIONS IN AID OF THE SUFFERING CATHOLICS AT GWALIOR.

A Catholic,.....	10	0	0
P. T. Mercado,.....	16	0	0
M. Grant, C.....	5	0	0
M. Augier, & family....	5	0	0
G. Gill,.....	2	0	0
A. C.....	2	0	0
J. C.....	2	0	0
A. M. H.....	1	0	0
J. Fegredo.....	2	0	0
C. E. K.....	2	0	0
A. B.....	0	8	0
Found in the Cathedral collection bag,	1	0	0
J. Morrell,....	5	0	0
P. Chunder,.....	0	8	0

FROM DUM DUM.

Sergeant Garrett Byrne, & family, ..	2	12	0	James Sweeney,	0	4	0
Sergeant Major Haslam,	1	0	0	Gunner M. O'Brien,	0	2	0
Mrs. Haslam,	1	0	0	Do. O'Hanlon,	1	0	0
S. H. Haslam, Child,	0	2	0	Do. McCarthy,	1	0	0
C. Haslam, do.	0	1	0	Do. Connell,	1	0	0
M. Haslam, do.	0	1	0	Do. Keeling,	0	4	0
J. Haslam, do.	0	1	0	Bombr. J. Kiddie,	0	8	0
Mrs. Hart, Invalid's wife, ..	1	0	0	Gunner Moor,	0	4	0
Mrs. Gorman, do.	1	0	0	Sergeant Cunningham,	1	0	0
Daniel McSweeney,	1	0	0	Gunner Farrell,	0	8	0
Mrs. McSweeney,	1	0	0	Do. Tallen,	0	8	0
Cornelius McSweeney,	0	8	0	Do. McCarthy,	1	0	0
Sergeant D. Kelly and family,	1	0	0	Corporal McGarry,	1	0	0
C. H. and family,	0	8	6	J. J.	0	4	0
Gunner Gallaher,	2	0	0	Gunner Nowlawn,	0	4	0
Sergeant James Jones,	1	0	0	Do. Rannahan,	2	0	0
Sergeant Smith,	1	0	0	Bomb. Butler,	0	8	0
Corporal P. Walsh,	0	8	0	Gunner O'Sullivan,	1	0	0
Private D. Shiel,	0	8	0	Do. Bottomly,	1	0	0
P. McGuire,	0	1	0	Mrs. Bottomly,	1	0	0
W. Gillasper,	0	1	0	Sergeant Donnolly, ..	2	0	0
M. Plunkett,	0	1	0	Sergeant McDonough, ..	1	0	0
T. Fard,	0	1	0	Mrs. McDonough, ..	0	8	0
Privates, P. Dunn, T. Ginex, M. Rafferty, J. Keought,	0	4	0	M. McDonough, ..	1	0	0
Private J. Whitely,	1	0	0	Sergeant Kerney,	1	0	0
W. Tudor,	0	2	0	Staff do. Busted,	1	0	0
W. Holt,	0	2	0	H. M. Hawkes,	1	0	0
T. Purdew,	0	2	0	Gunner Nickels,	0	2	0
J. Lawler,	0	3	0	Bugler Major Connors, ..	0	6	0
L. Rattigan,	0	2	0	Gunner O'Halleran,	0	4	0
J. Colaham,	0	4	0	J. J.	0	2	0
J. O'Neil,	0	2	0	B. C.	0	2	0
J. Leamey,	0	2	0	F. W.	0	2	0
J. Shiel,	0	2	0	M. W.	0	2	0
J. Loughtman,	0	2	0	M. T.	0	2	0
W. Gallaher,	0	4	0	Received of Staff Serg. Brown, 3 Rs.
J. Hallahan,	0	2	0	4 Annas from the 3rd Company 1st
P. Green,	0	4	0	Battalion Artillery,	3	4	0
Sergeant Brennan,	1	0	0	Staff Pay Bugler T. Lane,	0	4	0
Do. Robinson,	0	4	0	Staff Sergeant M. Rohm,	1	0	0
Do. Caffy,	0	4	0
Mrs. Caffy,	0	4	0	Total Rupees, 58 6 6
Ellen Caffy,	0	4	0
Private Sharkey,	0	4	0	(THROUGH THE REV. MR. GRADOLI, HOWRAH.)
Do. K. Towers,	0	2	0	Fr. Paul,	2	0	0
Mrs. Foly,	1	0	0	Dr. Croly,	1	0	0
Mrs. Gorman,	1	0	0	M. Rodrigues,	1	0	0
Landricklaw,	0	2	0	M. A. B.	1	0	0
Gunner O'Brien,	0	4	0	Miss Mune,	1	0	0
Do. O'Loughlin,	0	8	0	L. Peters,	1	0	0
Mrs. Walsh,	0	8	0	T. Baptist,	1	0	0
Ellen Walsh,	0	1	0	R. Jacob,	1	0	0
B. Williams,	0	4	0	Mrs. A. Gonsalves, ..	1	0	0
Gunner Cockburn,	0	4	0		1	0	0
Do. Sullivan,	0	4	0	A. Bastien,	1	0	0
Do. Doyle,	0	4	0	J. Peters,	1	0	0
Do. Gill,	0	4	0	W. Bastien, .	2	0	0
Do. Hanbarham,	0	2	0	Anne Verboun, ..	0	8	0
Sergeant Geeron,	0	4	0	A. P. Austan, ...	1	0	0
Mrs. Geeron, ...	1	0	0	F. V. Mahers, ..	1	0	0
Mary Geeron,	0	2	0
Gunner O'Keife,	0	8	0	THROUGH MR. N. O'BRIEN.
Sergeant White, ...	0	4	0	J. Knight,	1	0	0
Mrs. White,	0	4	0	R. B. Ebir, .	1	0	0
Sergeant Shannahan,	0	2	0	J. Sherlock,	1	0	0
Mrs. Shannahan,	0	4	0	Mrs. McMullin, .	3	0	0
John Shannahan,	0	2	0	J. Henley,	1	0	0
Jane Sweeney,	0	4	0	Mrs. Henley, ...	1	0	0

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

M. F. Gordon, Captain, Bombay Service, 50 0
J. G. 2 0

THROUGH MR. N. O'BRIEN.

J. Maxton, Esq. 10 0
C. W. Blaquiére, Esq. ... 10 0

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

Corporal Casey & Associates of Dum
Dum, 9 11

NATIVE MISSION AT COWCOLLY.

M. F. Gordon, Captain, Bombay Service, 30 0

FESTIVALS.

Monday, July 1,—Octave of St. John Baptist,
d. com. oct. App.
Tuesday, 2,—Visitation of the B. V. gr. doub.
com. oct. & S. S.
Wednesday, 3,—S. Margret Queen sem (10 ult.
com. &c.
Thursday, 4,—Within the oct. do.
Friday, 5,—do. do.
Saturday, 6,—S. S. Apostles, Peter and Paul, d.
Sunday, 7,—VI. P. Pent. St. Thomas, B. M. d.
(E. S.) com. dom.
Monday, 8,—S. Elizabeth, vid sem.
Tuesday, 9,—S. S. Martyrs Nicholas & Companions d. (I. S.)
Wednesday, 10,—S. S. Seven Brothers M. M.
sem.
Thursday, 11,—S. Kilian, B. M. d. (I. S. 8 inst.)
com. S.
Friday, 12,—S. John Gualbert, Ab. d. com. S.
Saturday, 13,—S. Anacletus P. M. sem.
Sunday, 14,—VII. P. Pent. St. Benignus M.
d. 2. cl. com. dom. in the Vicariate of Bengal.
Monday, 15,—S. Henry C. sem.
Tuesday, 16,—B. V. of Mount Carmel gr. doub.
Wednesday, 17,—S. Alexis C. sem.
Thursday, 18,—S. Camillus de Lellis c. d. com.
&c.
Friday, 19,—S. Vincent of Paul, c. d.
Saturday, 20,—S. Jerom Emiliani c. d. com. &c.
Sunday, 21,—VIII. P. Pent. S. Gulielmus. B. C.
d. fixed day. E. S. 8 inst. com. &c.
Monday, 22,—S. Mary Magdalen d.
Tuesday, 23,—S. Apollinaris, B. M. d. com. &c.
Wednesday, 24,—S. Columba Ab. (I. S. 9 ult.)
com. Vig. & S.
Thursday, 25,—S. James the great, Ap. d. 2 cl.
com. S. M.
Friday, 26,—S. Ann, Mother of B. V. gr. doub.
Saturday, 27,—S. Alban M. d. (E. S. 22 ult.)
com. &c.
Sunday, 28,—IX. P. Pent. of it sem.
Monday, 29,—S. Martha V. sem. com. &c.
Tuesday, 30,—S. Bonaventure B. C. D. d. (14 inst.) com. &c.
Wednesday, 31,—S. Ignatius of Loyola, C. d.

ON TRUE COMPUNCTION OF HEART.

Thou wouldst not now have Peter, who sinned by denying Thee thrice; nor Paul, who blasphemed thee by his persecutions;

nor Matthew, the publican, who thirsted after worldly gain; yea, not even one of thy great Apostles, whom Thou hast appointed judges over all the earth.

But now they are become most dear unto Thee, and Thou hast made known all things unto them, which Thou hast heard from Thy Father; and Thou art glorified in them; and they have glorified Thy name upon earth.

These things hath Thine Almighty hand performed, yea, Thy mercy, and Thy right hand, that is filled with all sweetness. For Thou hast hidden Thine indignation from us, and Thou hast been pleased to make us sons of grace, partakers of Thy divine nature, and co-heirs of Thy kingdom!

O! Fountain of infinite goodness and mercy, that never ceasest to overflow, but art ever ready to pour forth Thy streams upon those that draw near unto thee! Oh! would that all might draw near unto Thee, and taste of the food of Thy table how sweet it is, and because death is not therein, nor any bitterness.

But, ah! many turn back from Thee, and love this world more than the society of Thy heavenly children; many cast hope aside, and give themselves up to the service of all uncleanness and iniquity, on whom a certain judgment awaits; and they have gone far away from Thee; and "they pleased themselves among these kind of things, and counted it delightful to be under the briars."
(Job xxx. 7.)

But Thy beloved children, and Thy faithful servants, flying from evil, love Thee with all their heart, and meditate day and night on Thy Commandments; and Thou hast hidden them under Thy wings, lest they be taken captive by the allurements of the world.

These, for the most part, glowing with an ardent desire of eternal life, long to be soon dissolved, that they may live much more happily with Thee.

And when they are not heard according to their own desire, yet it happens unto them more to their own salvation, and to the fulfilment of Thy will; that still they are exercised by sundry labours and trials.

Not that Thou, O Lord, dost then love them less, because Thou dost not immediately fulfil their prayers and their desires; but by deferring them, Thou wouldst more plentifully reward those whom Thou permittest now to be the more worn out in this world.

It is well for them who have obtained such grace from Thee; who now swell with a desire for eternal life, and, by the fruit of good works, wait for a plenteous retribution.

(To be continued)

EDUCATION IN FRANCE.

When a recourse to new laws is proposed, and that with reference to an institution so universal as Catholicism, it is right—nay, it is necessary—to look around.

Fix your eyes for one instant on what has passed in the world during the last fifteen years, and say on which side are the persecutors and where are the oppressors?

In Sweden, is it Catholicism that condemns a citizen guilty of having desired to return to the faith that his country professed for seven centuries? Is it Catholicism that condemns him to banishment and the confiscation of his property.

In Switzerland, is it Catholicism that violates the federal compact, in order to destroy the abbeys, and says, in language worthy of the college of France, that it is necessary to harness the monks to the cannons?

In Russia, is it Catholicism that has destroyed a nation, and that tears from them by little and little, with what remains of life, the faith of their fathers? No: it is a schismatic power that has exercised before you, and better than you, the monopoly of teaching by the State. It is Russia that cuts the throat of Catholic Poland.

In Prussia is it Catholicism which does violence to conscience; which imprisoned an aged man, and set the Banks of the Rhine in a blaze? No: it was a Protestant King, in the land of rationalism, that carried off a Catholic prelate guilty of unwillingness to grant the blessing of the Church to unions that conscience reproves.

In England—that oppressed nation that longs to burst its chains—are they Catholics who are enchained, robbed, insulted? No; it is a Parliamentary Church, a State religion, a Church in the State. This it is that has trampled under foot the Catholics of Ireland, and has prepared for the English nation the most fearful dangers. On all sides the Catholics are the oppressed, and on no side do they oppress.

And the only country in which—since the revolution of 1789—the Catholics have had, not the highest, but the preponderating voice, safe from the Gallican and Jansenist spirit, Belgium, is also the only country in which liberty for all in all has been proclaimed, loyally applied, and nobly guaranteed.

But, in amends, if on all sides Catholicism is persecuted, nowhere is she persecuted with impunity. See how, in Prussia, the heroic resistance of the Archbishop of Cologne shook the Prussian power to its foundations. The last king of that country has not carried off the victory, notwithstanding the astuteness of his diplomatists, and the zeal of his administrators and his generals of cavalry: he was conquered, I dare to say it, by the resistance of the imprisoned old man who saved the rights of conscience and the sanctity of marriage.

In Russia, what opposes to the Imperial power an indomitable resistance? What prevents its teaching securely to the accomplishment of its ambitious designs? Is it not Catholicism, that nothing can ever uproot from the martyred heart of generous Poland? Is it not the Pope, who alone among the sovereigns of the world has the courage to protest against the abuses of this power and the iniquity of this despotism?

And in Spain, behold this man, whom the Marquis of Boissy last year described as an executioner, but whom I confine myself to calling the persecutor of the Church. His also was one of those Governments that are not to be opposed. He had exiled and imprisoned the bishops, and spoiled the Church of the last wrecks of its splendour. He had done more, and I recommend this trait to the canonists of the Council of State and the Court of Cassation, he had conceived the plan of interdicting the exercise of the sacerdotal function to every priest who could not present a certificate verifying the correctness of his political opinions. Well, I saw this man in the last days of his splendour. He was believed to be all powerful; he had expelled his benefactress; shot his rivals; he was sustained by England; he was playing with France. Such was the state in which I saw him; he was thought more powerful than ever. All at once a slight cloud formed in the horizon, this cloud soon transformed itself into a formidable tempest.

This man, who had overcome at once both courage and good sense, let fall his sword, and the intelligence which had happily guided him up to that point abandoned him; and I do not mean to insult misfortune when I say that he fell without honour and without glory. What then, did the Church do? In the midst of the derision of philosophy and liberalism, the aged Pontiff who reigns at Rome, who directs our consciences, and troubles them when need is, ordained a jubilee—that is to say, that from all parts the weapon which never will be mastered shook in our hands—the sword of prayer is pointed towards heaven, and from the Ganges to the Danube all Catholics prayed; the devout old woman of Paris, and the devout old woman of New York, said to God, in the language of David, “Arise, and judge thy cause.” The cause has been judged, the persecutor of the Church has fallen; and this day the bishops, whom he had expelled, whom he had banished, whom he had spoiled, are returning one by one in triumph, and amid public acclamations resume the seats from which he had precipitated them.

Do not think, gentlemen, that I present this to you as a miracle; it is but the most natural consequence of our faith, the most ordinary lesson of our history.

And whither has this dethroned Duke of Victory turned his steps? To England. And what has he found there? Ah, it is here that the justice of God is manifested. Yes, the free, the powerful, the invincible England sees her greatness menaced, her power compromised, her incredible prosperity neutralised, in consequence of her attempts against the Catholic Church and people. In the very bosom of Anglicanism, of the despoiling aristocracy, a powerful party is found, and increases every day; a party that is called there as here an ecclesiastical party, which claims for their phantom of a church the liberty, the authority, and the property of which the Catholics were despoiled.

What do I say? Hear it, gentlemen, they even demand the re-establishment of the monastic orders as the only remedy for this daily increasing misery of a people who have been robbed of Catholic faith and charity.

While the organ of the pretended Conservatives in France threatens Cardinal Bonald with the suppression of the salaries granted to the clergy, the Times, the organ of the English Conservatives, exhorts the English Government to endow liberally the Catholic clergy of Ireland, in the same view both for one and the other, because they hope to enslave the Church, the one by spoiling, the other by enriching it. And yet Ireland stands up beside England to demand an account of three centuries of oppression exercised against Catholics. Every day the danger increases; no one can predict how it will end. But what is already palpable is, that there are certain spoliation, for which there is no prescription; certain iniquities for which there is no pardon;—the spoliation and iniquities inflicted on the Church.

In vain does the wave of ages, of the oblivion of all human prosperities, appear to have covered the rock; the moment of reflux comes sooner or later, and the rock appears again unshaken and sound.

Do you believe, gentlemen, that this grand spectacle of the justice of the Lord can be without influence upon us? We who, during eighteen centuries, formed the most vast fraternity of the universe? Do you believe that we are become insensible to the lessons which our brethren of foreign nations give us? And when you yourselves throw down the barriers that separate us from the waters; when railroads and steam annihilate distances; when what was said yesterday in Dublin, or at Brussels, is printed to-day in Paris, and goes to-morrow to carry courage and hope into the remotest presbytery of France? Do you think that we shall remain deaf and blind, and that the Catholic fibre will not vibrate with a growing energy in our hearts?

In this France, accustomed to give birth to none but men of heart and spirit, shall we alone—we Catholics, consent to be weak and cowardly? Do we know ourselves to be so basterdised, degenerated from our fathers, that we must abdicate our reason, and give it into the hands of rationalism? deliver up our consciences to the University, our dignity and our liberty into the hands of those legists whose hatred of the liberty of the Church is equalled only by their profound ignorance of its rights and dogmas? What! because we are of those who are confessed is it to be thought that we shall rise from the feet of our priests quite disposed to hold out our hands to the hands of an anti-constitutional legality? What! because the sentiment of faith reigns in our hearts, is it to be thought that honour and courage have perished there? Ah! be undeceived. Men say to you, "Be implacable." Very well! Be it so; do all that you will, and all that you can, the Church answers you by the lips of Tertullian and the gentle Fenelon. We are not to be feared by you, but we do not fear you; and I will add, in the name of Catholic laymen, like myself, the Catholics of the 19th century, that among a free people, we will not be helots; we are the successors of the martyrs, and we do not tremble before the successors of Julian the Apostate. We are the sons of the Crusaders, and we will not retreat before the offspring of Voltaire.—(From the speech of Count Montalembert in the House of Peers.)

CONVERSION OF THE HON'BLE H. J. GLANVILLE, CHIEF JUSTICE OF DOMINICA.

March 9, 1844.—To the Editor of the Tablet.—SIR,—I had hoped that ere now the account of the conversion of the Honourable H. J. Glanville, Chief Justice of Dominica, would have reached your notice through the medium of the colonial journals, and have found its way into your columns; but this hope not being realised, and as I know that you and your numerous readers rejoice at the triumph of truth, I forward, with sincerest pleasure, the following short notice:—The Honourable Mr. Glanville is a native of Dominica, a gentleman about fifty years of age, and most universally and deservedly admired in public and private life. He was a member of the Church of England; and in September last, wishing to know the arguments urged by Catholics in support of their doctrine of Transubstantiation, he had recourse to the Catholic clergymen of the parish in which he resides, and readily admitted the important dogma which had been the object of his inquiry. Mr. Glanville was soon after convinced of the truth of all the other tenets of the Catholic faith, renounced the errors of Protestantism, and was received into the bosom of the true Church, on the 30th September, the eve of the Feast of the Rosary. Within the last two years the number of conversions in this colony has been very considerable; and scarcely a day passes that we have not the consolation of witnessing new accessions to the cause of truth.—A Correspondent.

To the Editor of the Tablet.—SIR—In the Tablet of this day, I notice the copy of a letter received by you from Dominica, giving an account of the conversion of the Hon. H. J. Glanville, Chief Justice of that island. The facts therein stated being perfectly correct, I regret that, in consequence of your correspondent not having given his name, some doubt is thrown on his statement. Myself, a native of Dominica, and having the pleasure of being personally acquainted with Mr. Glanville, I can vouch for the truth of the whole of your correspondent's letter. —I am, Sir, your most obedient servant, J. M. BOYER, 31, Arbour-square, Commercial-road, 13th April, 1844.

CONVERSIONS.

JERSEY.—On Palm Sunday thirteen persons made their profession of Faith, and were publicly baptised in the Catholic Church; Vauxhall, by the Rev. Mr. Cunningham. The ceremony of admitting converts into the Roman Church is a very solemn one, and was witnessed with much apparent gratification by a crowded congregation. On Good Friday evening a solemn service was performed at the Catholic Church. A Missa of the Passion was preached by the Rev. Mr. Cunningham, and a selection of pieces had been sung. Mater of Rossini was sung successfully com-festival High Mass was celebrated with unusual splendour. Haydn's celebrated No. 3 Mass had been got up for the occasion: in addition to which Zingarelli's "Laudate," and Handel's "Hallelujah Chorus" were sung. In the evening Grand Vespers were given.

CONVERSION AT KINNEIGH.—Our Saints of Kinneigh are overwhelmed with grief and indignation. Mr. Daly, of Castletown, a most respectable member of their communion, has been lately attacked by the fever, and perceiving himself reduced to the last extremity, has, contrary to all expectation, sent for a Priest. Mr. Daly's conversion might well be considered a miracle; for being one of those Protestants substituted for the poor Catholics long since ejected by Lord Bandon from the five ploughlands of Castletown, he was not only a great stickler for Protestantism, but a continual reviler of Catholicity.—Cork Examiner.

ANOTHER CONVERSION AT LOUGHREA.—There was another interesting ceremony performed in the Catholic Church at Loughrea, on Saturday last, the 2d instant, after the nine o'clock mass, when Mrs. Harriet Farrell abjured Protestantism, and was received a new member of the true Church of Christ, by the Rev. J. H. Whelan, C. C., he having obtained the power and authority for that purpose from the venerated bishop, the Right Rev. Dr. Coen.—Freeman.

MISCELLANEA.

CHAPELIZOD.—PROTESTANT LIBERALITY.—The Rev. Mr. Dungan has received the following sums for the erection of the new Catholic Church at Chapelizod—His Excellency Earl De Grey, 10*l.*; Viscount Palmerston 10*l.*; Earl Donoughmore, 5*l.*; Lord Morpeth, 5*l.*; Edward Lucas, Esq., Under Secretary, Dublin Castle, 5*l.*; Leland Croshawite, Esq., 25*l.*; and General Shortall, 1*l.*

THE CATHOLIC HIERARCHY.—THE SENTENCE.—We have reason to know that the reverend bishop and clergy of the united diocese of Waterford and Lismore—ever foremost in the cause of their country—have determined on taking the initiative in that agitation to which the sentence of incarceration against O'Connell will impart redoubled vigour and determination. At the earliest possible moment after the news arrives of the sentence being carried into effect, the clergy, headed by their venerated diocesan, the Right Rev. Dr. Foran, will assemble to petition the Queen against the impolicy and cruelty of the proceeding. It has been resolved also that on the same occasion the renewed subscriptions of both bishop and clergy will be forwarded to the Repeal Association.

ROME.

On the morning of Holy Saturday, in the Basilica of the Lateran, and at the Baptistry of Constantine, Cardinal Patrizzi, Vicar of his Holiness, administered the Sacrament of Baptism to two Israelites named, the one, E. Goldemberg, aged 22, and the other, J. Forti, aged 19. They heartily reported at the font by the Commander, who alone, antinho de Ianna, Envoy Extraordinary has the courage to of Brazil, and the Viscount Gas-this power and the Tonnerre. The sacrament of Confirmation was conferred upon them after the ceremony of baptism. On the same morning, while Cardinal Fransoni officiated in the Sistine Chapel in presence of the Sovereign Pontiff, Cardinal Patrizzi held an ordination of 11 tonsured, 23 minors, 18 sub-deacons, 32 deacons, and 46 priests.

On Easter Sunday the Holy Father officiated in the Basilica of the Vatican, supported by Cardinal Lambruschini as Bishop Assistant, and Cardinal Fieschi as serving Deacon. Cardinals Riario and Gazzoli performed the duties of Deacons Assistant, and those of the Subdeacon Apostolic were discharged by Mgr. d'Avello of Navarce. The Archbishops and Bishops, as well as the College of Prelates, assisted at the service of the altar. After having communicated, his Holiness distributed the Eucharistic bread to the cardinal, deacons, and noble laics; the Mass over, his Holiness performed an act of Veneration to the holy relics of the Passion, and then was borne on a portable chair to the principal exterior balcony of the Vatican where he gave the Apostolic Benediction and a plenary indulgence to the immense multitude kneeling on the place beneath. Then the artillery roared from the Castle of St. Angelo, and with the thunder of its salvos were mingled the sound of bells and the dash of the salute, or the fanfare of the pontifical soldiery. In the evening, the cupola and colonnade of the Vatican and the girandola of Adrian's Mole, were illuminated.—Diaria di Roma.

The emigration from the south towards England has commenced, the incredible number of 4,000 English Passports having been signed at Rome in three days subsequent to the termination of the Holy Week.

FRANCE.

NEW BISHOPS.—The following nominations to vacant sees appear to be definitely decided on. M. Fabre des Essarts, V. G. of Blois, to be Bishop of Blois; M. Maiglard, Curc of St. Eustache, in Paris, to be Bishop of St. Drez; M. Buissas, Canon and Archpriest of Toulouse, to be Bishop of Limoges; Mgr. Rossar, Bishop of Gap, to be transferred to the Bishopric of Verdun; and M. Wicarr, V. G. of Cambrai, to be Bishop of Gap.—Univers.

BELGIUM.

LADIES OF MERCY.—"Yesterday afternoon," says the Journal de Bruxelles of the 23d, "crowds of the faithful beset the gates of St. Gudule; many persons of high rank were among the number. The Rev. Father Dechamps was to preach upon the work of mercy undertaken by some charitable ladies who visit and relieve poor families. The sermon began at four o'clock. Charity was, of course, its subject, and the orator set forth the wide difference between works that come from God and works that proceed from men. The former spring up in the shade and in silence, but they grow and spread for ever; the latter are announced with pomp of phrase and sound of voices, to blaze a moment and expire in smoke and stench. Good works in themselves exercise a powerful influence in social life, yet they divide men's minds rather than unite them unless charity presides. Charity alone has the power to draw hearts together, and establish a fine harmony tween them. This happy union is of the very essence of Christian charity. So, by a providential effort, collective alms are a hundred times more efficacious than a crowd of individual and isolated alms. Alms are the debt of him who is to him who has not. This debt is sacred, and the Gospel exacts its full, careful, and persevering payment. The rich are, in a spiritual point of view, accountable for their superfluity to the poor. He who does not practise almsgiving knows no peace of heart, all his joys are poisoned; trouble and travail annoy him even in the bosom of his family. Domestic life becomes to him a load; he brings home nothing but sadness and care, and too often a bad example. He seeks in noisy pleasures out of doors, rhaps in dissipation, a happiness that flies faster from him the more eagerly he pursues.

Thus it is that domestic life, the source of so much inward joy, is lost, destroyed; all ties are relaxed, and society in general feels their bound. The balm of charity alone can heal these wounds and restore happiness. The rich cannot recover serenity of soul by any other means than by fulfilling the condition that God has attached to the possession of the good things of the earth. The ladies of this charity who have not yet been united quite 70 years for the purpose of visiting the poor, already relieve more than 650 of them. In association of young men, having the same object in view, exists also at Brussels, under the patronage of St. Vincent of Paul. These two societies do an immensity of good. Father Dechamps did justice to their zeal and efforts, reminding them that to God, and not to themselves, was due the success of their labours. St. Vincent of Paul, who appeared in his time to personify in himself the genius of charity, was accustomed to say that he did not know how the good he did was done, but that God had inspired to use him as his instrument to work.

It is this sentiment of humility, of self-denial, of disinterestedness that works miracles by Christian charity. It is, besides, sustained by considerations to which human philosophy, left to its own force, could never rise. The well-being of the humble Catholic doing good works, the sound of the Word of God and his pastors, has a divine sanction. It is indeed very wisely written, that "he who understandeth the need of the poor, him will God deliver in the day of evil." Father Dechamps gave an edifying development to these consolatory truths. We confine ourselves with regret to this brief recollection of some of the ideas that he so strongly and so happily expressed. No doubt every one who quitted that church yesterday did so in the resolution to become charitable, to give alms, to sink of all the miseries, physical and moral, of the poor. May these pious resolutions bear early and lasting fruits! In concluding this article, we ought to observe that, independently of the poor, whom the Ladies of Mercy relieve at their homes, two distinct establishments have been fitted up in this capital by their endeavours: a factory for lace, where young girls receive solid instruction while acquiring a knowledge of the manufacture of lace, that important branch of the industry of Brussels. In the second establishment servant girls out of place are received, for a very trifling contribution. They receive such instruction as they require, and only leave for a new place.

LANCASHIRE DISTRICT.—The extensive house and ground called Eton House, situate on the Woolton road, have been purchased for the residence of Dr. Brown, the Roman Catholic bishop of this district. The house was at one period the residence of the late Dr. Crompton, where he resided for a number of years previously to his decease.—Manchester Courier.—The object of the purchase is to provide a suitable residence for the Right Rev. Dr. Brown, V.A. of the Lancashire District; it will also be for the use of the clergy as a place of resort for spiritual exercises, &c. The necessary alterations and improvements are now being made in the building, preparatory to the arrival of the Right Reverend gentleman in this country, he being at present on the continent.—Liverpool Mercury.

ST. MARY'S SEMINARY, SYDNEY,

UNDER THE IMMEDIATE PATRONAGE AND INSPECTION OF HIS GRACE THE MOST REV. ARCHBISHOP POLDING.

The Examination of the Students of the above institution took place on the 20th and 21st instant before the Most Rev. Dr. Polding, the Very Rev. Dr. Murphy, V. G., the Rev. Mr. Bourgeois, president, the Rev. Messrs. M'Encroe, Trippe, and M'Gennis, the Rev. Mr. Hallinan, and Mr. Clarke, masters, and a numerous assembly of the friends and relatives of the pupils.

The Examination of the classes in the various branches of a Classical and Commercial Education, evidenced the marked progress of all the Students without exception in the development of those intellectual and highly moral qualities which have been so successfully inculcated and fostered under the careful and indefatigable superintendence of their instructors.

Previous to the distribution of the prizes to the successful candidates, His Grace rose and addressed the Students, observing that the result of the Examination must have given the most complete gratification and satisfaction as well to themselves as to their parents and friends, for that next to the acquisition of knowledge, the highest pleasure they could derive from their successful and meritorious assiduity was to be found in the reflection that their attention to their studies had won for them an united testimony of approbation from those who so earnestly devoted their time and exertions to the high and important duty of superintending the education of their youth. In every class and in every pupil he had remarked that those exertions of the Reverend Superiors of the Institution had been most successful, and in every case he should say that the ground-work of a sound intellectual and moral education had been laid which needed only the same continued application to be brought to a happy maturity. In awarding the several prizes they had carefully and deliberately weighed the respective merits of each pupil, and whilst he congratulated those to whom the meed of praise and honor had been allotted, he would not have the unsuccessful competitors be disappointed of their efforts.

would rather incite in them a spirit of friendly emulation, and encourage them in indulging the hope of striving more successfully with their more fortunate young friends, at the next Examination.—Sydney Morning Chronicle.

MRS. CHISHOLM.

We publish with pleasure the following extract from a letter of that friend to virtue, and benefactress of her species; and only wish that there were but a few such philanthropists, male or female, amongst us! Oh, that those possessed of the power and the means of ameliorating the condition of their fellow men were imbued with that spirit, under whose holy impulse she spends her time, her ease, and her health, in enjoying a luxury of the heart, beyond the power of wealth to purchase. It is consoling to think, that we have (if not ten like a certain city) at least one such as Mrs. Chisholm amongst us:

"Faisant du bien pour son plaisir,"

"I have settled all the families much to my satisfaction and theirs; they must, with common prudence, do well. I could settle 300 families during the next three months, but, except I meet with some aid, I cannot go on. You will be amused to hear I had to lead the surveying party!!! I think I can locate 150 families in the Wollongong district. Mr. Henry Osborne and Mr. Jenkins have offered me land, and 40 families can be located at Shell Harbour, in addition to those already there. Yours, &c, C. CHISHOLM."
—Ibid.

COREA.

Fifty years ago, say the Anna's of the Faith, Corea knew not the Gospel. The first seeds of the faith were sown there by a Chinese priest, who in 1801 received the crown of martyrdom, prophesying that at the end of thirty years that church, founded in his blood, would receive succour and support. In 1834 a second Chinese priest arrived, followed by French priests of the Congregation of Foreign Missions. The first bishop was sent out in 18— who died before he reached his see. Mgr. Imbert effected his entrance in 1837, and again in 1839. These Coreans, whose absolute cowardice and abject submission to the hideous tyranny that rules over them is not to be expressed, have nevertheless given (so to speak), at one stroke, a hundred martyrs to the Lord! A hundred martyrs, among whom were wives, virgins, babes, whose heroism was equal to the noblest examples in the history of the Church! Mgr. Imbert was of the diocese of Aix, in Provence. Having proceeded, on his first mission in his 25th year, he was martyred at the age of 44. He was concealed after having allowed the first burst of the persecution to pass over; and, his two companions, M. Maubant and Chastan, had also found hiding places. But a price having been set upon their heads, and this circumstance having whetted the zeal of the satellites of power and the apostates from Christianity, who began to seduce many of his converts, and opened a frightful source of vexation to the firmer Christians, the bishop delivered himself up, in order to defend his dear flock from those terrible evils, and he directed his priests to join him in his prison. They immediately and joyously obeyed him, and—we know the rest. The Bishop of Bellini will depart very soon. Is it not possible to support him in his efforts by some negotiation with the Corean authorities? We shall have more to say on this subject.—Annals of the Propagation of the Faith.

HARTFORD—The consecration of the Right Rev. Dr. Tyler, Bishop elect of Hartford, took place on the 17th, at Baltimore, in the Metropolitan Church, the Bishop of Boston consecrator, the Bishops of New York and Richmond assistants.—Tablet.

MILWAUKIE—The consecration of the Right Rev. Dr. Henni, Bishop elect of Milwaukee, took place at Cincinnati, in St. Peter's Cathedral, on the 9th of March.—Ibid.

BOSTON.—The consecration of the Right Rev. John Fitzpatrick, Coadjutor elect of Boston, took place on the 24th March, at Georgetown, D. C.; the Bishop of Boston consecrator, the Bishops of Richmond and Hartford assistants.—Ibid.

BE KIND TO THE POOR.

Be kind to the poor,

Oh! ye great in the land,

Give forth from your store,

With a generous hand.

Dark winter hath come,

With its frost and its cold,

And many a home,

Of want we behold.

Grim Poverty stalks,

Through the length of the land,

And Misery walks,

At her skeleton hand.

Oh! Think on the poor,

As ye sit round the board,

With plenty spread o'er,

And with luxury stored.

For many a cry,

Of sorrow is heard,

And a desolate sigh,

Breathes in every word.

Oh! The ingle will smile,

With a livelier glow,

If your hands for a while,

Have softened their woe.

And the wine-cup will send,

A relish when quaffed,

If but one needy friend,

Had tasted the draught.

Be kind to the poor,

Oh! Ye rich in the earth,

As ye gaze on your store,

Amid sorrow and dearth.

For ponder and see,

God's words, and adore;

"Thrice blessed is he,

Who provides for the poor."

Liverpool Mail,
March 30th, 1844.

Printed and Published by P.S. D' Rozario and Co.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 1.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, 1844.

[VOL. VI.]

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 28.

Last night's Calcutta Gazette contains the draft of an Act declaring Lotteries a common and public nuisance, and prohibiting them altogether, with the exception of those which may have the sanction of Government. Thus they have received the coup de grace just before the expiration of the present year.

Sir Jasper Nicolls, our late Commander-in-Chief, landed at Bombay, under the salute due to his rank, on Saturday, the 16th instant. He embarks with his family for England in the next steamer.

The Bombay papers of the 18th, state that the Akbar Steamer from Suez, with Col. Malcolm, the Secretary of Legation in China, and the Treaty, was daily expected. That vessel would go into dock immediately on her arrival, and Col. Malcolm would, in all probability, proceed on to China in the Semiramis.

A letter from Agra of the 19th instant, published in the Hurkaru, states that the Dada Khasgee has been delivered over to Sir Richmond Shakespear. This circumstance will, in all probability, arrest the advance of a considerable portion of our troops.

The Delhi Gazette has received his usual batch of intelligence from Cabul. The Wallee of Khooldoom had retraced his steps to his own country. Dost Mahomed was at Cabul, with his son Akbar Khan, the account of whose passage through the Khyber Pass appears to have been fabulous. There does not seem to be any intention on the part of the Dost, or the Affghans, to take advantage of the present distracted state of the Punjab to recover Peshawur and re-occupy the right bank of the Indus. Nothing can more effectually demonstrate the distracted state of Afghanistan, and the complete prostration of all the powers of Government than this inability to dislodge the Sikhs from Peshawur,—on which the heart of the Dost was so warmly set,—when the opportunity of doing so appears to be within his reach.

From the Punjab there is nothing new. Gob Singh and Sucheet Singh have taken their departure for Jumboo, leaving Heera Singh alone in his glory and his troubles. The troops are still represented as extremely unruly; and their violence is restrained only by a lavish disbursement of money, which can only serve to het their appetite for plunder.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 29.

The Star states, that Her Majesty's 80th regiment is daily expected to arrive from New South Wales, when they will relieve the 10th regiment in Garrison, which latter corps will probably proceed to Ghazee-pore.

The Agra Utkhar states, that, in consequence of the surrender of the Khasgeewalla, a large portion of the siege train proceeding to join the Commander-in-Chief, would return to Agra immediately. That journal speaks of the young Rajah as being actually with the Governor General, but this announcement is evidently premature. The last accounts from the Camp state, that he would advance to receive his Lordship when our army had crossed the Chumbul, and entered the Gwalior territories. The Khasgeewalla had arrived at Agra in a palkee, escorted by a troop of Cavalry and a company of Infantry.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 30.

We have seldom known a day more barren of anything worth presenting the reader, in the shape of Intelligence than this; the last week day of 1843. News seems to have worn itself out with the year. The only item we can glean is that some of our officers had shot one of the sacred alligators in the hot pond near Kerachee, an outrage which has created great excitement among the inhabitants, and excited great indignation in the Governor.

MONDAY, JANUARY 1, 1844.

The Hurkaru announces that the Bengal Herald, with which was incorporated the Literary Gazette and the Refugee, will itself undergo the process of absorption into the Bengal Hurkaru, from the present year. It will be published on Saturday evening, as a part and parcel of the Hurkaru, under the same editorial responsibility.

The Literary Gleaner is in the market seeking a purchaser.—The Church Magazine will, we hear, be discontinued from this time forward.

A very daring dacoitee which has just been committed about a mile above Serampore, is mentioned in the papers of this day. It was perpetrated almost within hail of the Thannah of Bydepaty. The robbers came upon a fleet of fifty-two rafts of Timber, knocked the boatmen into the river and triumphantly carried off, as we hear, about twenty noble timbers. These will be sunk by the divers who are in the plot, and then raised, one by one, at night, when the search has subsided, and sold to the timber merchants on the banks of the river, who will immediately efface every mark to prevent discovery.

General Simpson, who left Hydrabad in search of a Sanatorium, has returned without having accomplished his object. Few of the officers who accompanied him have escaped fever.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 2.

Yesterday we received, altogether unexpectedly, an Extra, announcing the arrival of the Akbar Steamer at Bombay, with intelligence to the 15th of November, just eleven days later than our previous news. She was detained at Suez to bring on Col. Malcolm with the Treaty. It is said that the vessel was received with a salute before it was known that Col. Malcolm was not on board; but we have as yet no Bombay papers, and are therefore unable to ascertain whether the Colonel and the Treaty have arrived or not. The Hurkaru conjectures that the Steamer may have been hastened out with despatches to Lord Ellenborough written when the first intelligence of the revolution at Lahore arrived, and under the dread that he would swallow up the Punjab as he has done Scinde.

The very brief period which has elapsed since our last publication, affords little scope for comment. The events which have transpired are, however, neither few nor unimportant; but they are completely absorbed in the overwhelming interest which attaches to every circumstance connected with the State Prosecutions in Ireland. From the details, it will be seen that true bills, occupying over thirty yards of parchment, have been found against Mr. O'Connell and others. These charge sedition only, but the Attorney-General has given some dark hints of a dreadful conspiracy, and threatened another indictment, supposed to be for high treason. There is no doubt the government are in receipt of information, whether true or false, of a most alarming character, and the belief is very general that there are traitors in the Repeal camp, who have been bought over, and will appear for the prosecution on the day of trial. The mistake of Mr. Bond Hughes, the reporter, as to the identity of Mr. Barrett, and discussions originating in a clerical error in the bills, and a laxity of expression in making "the jurors for our lady the Queen," (one of them was a Quaker), "upon their oath, &c." instead of "upon their oath and affirmation, &c." served to occupy earlier stages of the proceedings. Since the bills have been found, the struggle has been, on the part of the prosecution, to compel the accused to plead within four days, so as to bring on the trial at once; on the other side to delay it till after the revision of the Dublin jury-list which it is supposed will be favourable to the traversers. In his manner of conducting the proceedings hitherto, the Attorney-General has not justified the expectation of his friends; he has shown neither tact nor temper. The last accounts state that Mr. O'Connell is not in the possession of that robust health which the honourable gentleman has enjoyed almost uninteruptedly during his life, and it has been recommended that he should take the benefit of a change of air, for which purpose he has removed to the country residence of his son, Mr. John O'Connell.

The dreadful massacre at Lahore has occasioned some sensation in this country, and the question is, what course will the British Government pursue? We believe that instructions are transmitted by this mail forbidding any interference in the affairs of the Punjab; but Lord Ellenborough, no doubt, remembers his late Majesty's very pithy postscript to the famous Navarino dispatch to Sir E. Codrington, in which hostility was officially deprecated—"Go it Neddy!"

The Bishop of Derry and Raphoe (Dr. Ponsonby) and 130 of his clergy have put forward what he Derry Sentinel designates "a solemn and unequivocal protest against Tractarian error." Lord E. Chichester, Dean of Raphoe, heads the list of the clergy who have signed an address to the Bishop. A protest against that address, and the doings of the Anti-Puseyite majority, has been published. It is signed by the Revd. Charles Butler, Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Dublin, and five other clergymen of the diocese.

The accounts from the country show that the subscriptions to the O'Connell tribute are likely to be immense in amount, on account of the State prosecutions, and the course adopted by the Crown in regard to them. The wealthier classes, generally, are doubling their former contributions. The humbler classes will endeavour to do the same.

The Governor General and the Commander-in-Chief crossed the Chumbul and entered the territories of Scinde on the 23d, on which day they were encamped at Hingora. The ford was not more than three feet deep.—The Friend of India.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 5.

Important intelligence has just reached us from Head Quarters, which we hasten to lay before our readers. A serious engagement has taken place between the British Troops, and the Gwalior forces, in which the latter have been routed, and a considerable quantity of artillery, ammunition and stores captured. The loss on our side has been very heavy; among others we regret to find the name of Major Sanders, the late Military Secretary to the Governor General.

The action was as sharply contested as any in which our forces have for a long period been engaged, and the loss on both sides is estimated at a very high amount.—Englishman Extra.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.

We beg to acknowledge, with thanks, the following Subscriptions, on account of the Bengal Catholic Herald:
T. W. Seyers, Esq. Futtehpore, up to Dec. 1844 22 0 0
N. Brier, Esq. Dinapore, up to December. 1843 12 0 0
Rev. Marcellinus, Ghazepore up to Decr. 1844 10 0 0

EDUCATION.—SERAMPORE

NOTICE TO THE CATHOLICS OF BENGAL

A Branch School of Loreto House was opened at Serampore on Monday the First of May, 1843. The course of Education includes English Grammar, Reading, Writing, Arithmetic, History, Geography, the use of the Globes, and the several kinds of Plain and Fancy Needleworks. Young Ladies beyond 14 years or under 4 years of age are not admissible.

TERMS.

Boarders,.....Rs. 15 per month.

Day Scholars,..... 4 per do.

SERAMPORE MALE SCHOOL.

On the First of May, a Seminary for boys was opened at Serampore under the immediate care of the Rev. Mr. Rabascall, Chaplain to the Serampore Convent. The course of Education comprises Reading, Writing, Arithmetic, Grammar, History, Geography, the use of the Globes, Algebra, and Geometry. The Native Languages also are taught.

TERMS.

Boarders,.....Rs. 5 per month

Day Scholars,..... 4 per Ditto.

In both the Male and Female Schools, Boarders have to pay an entrance Fee of 20 Rs. for the use of Dormitory and Refectory Furniture &c. All the domestic arrangements of the Boys' Seminary are placed entirely under the superintendence of the Lady Superiors of the Serampore Convent, in order that every attention may be paid to the health and comfort of the children. Boys beyond 14 or under 4 years of age are not admissible. As any profits which may arise from these Institutions are to be appropriated to the support of the Bengal Catholic Orphanage, W. R. Laeckersteen, and C. H. Laeckersteen, Esqrs. have, at the request of the Arch-Bishop Vicar Apostolic, kindly consented to act respectively as Secretary and Treasurer to the Serampore Catholic Schools.

April, 1843.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 2.]

CALCUTTA! SATURDAY, JANUARY 13, 1844.

[VOL. VI.]

THURSDAY, JANUARY 4,

Jamadar Khoseal Sing, born in Saharunpore in the English territories, and for a long time a favourite of Runjeet Sing, in whose service he rose to great distinction, and amassed great wealth, has been disgraced by Heera Sing.

Some startling intelligence, as the Hurkaru informs us, has been received from the North West Frontier. On the 24th of December, Sir Robert Dick received intelligence from Col. Richmond, that large bodies of Sikh troops were gathering together on the right bank of the Sutlege, apparently with the design of crossing that river. In consequence of this movement, the whole of the troops at Umballah, have been ordered to hold themselves in readiness to march at a moment's notice. The troops in the Sirhind division have been warned for immediate service. There are many conjectures regarding the cause of this movement. It seems scarcely possible, that Heera Sing should be so infatuated as to begin an attack on our posts, which must end in the subversion of his power, and the conquest of the Punjab. It has been suggested, that the object of the troops may be plunder; but it is most probable that the step is simply precautionary.

The Hurkaru states that Baboo Hureenarayan Ghose, the Principal Sudder Ameen of the 21-Pergunahs, has been suspended for some questionable orders in a civil case. He is one of the most experienced and energetic of our Native judicial officers.

Mr. Langslow, one of the District Judges in Ceylon, has been suspended by the Executive Council,—according to his friends, from an unfavourable bias against him among those in authority; according to his opponents, for the unprecedented dilatoriness of his judicial proceedings.

The Steamer Sesostris has been sent on from Bombay to China with the important despatches brought by the Akbar.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 5.

The most important intelligence has been this morning received from the Camp of the Army of Exercise. The Bace had promised to come with the young Rajah and pay her respects to the Governor General; but intelligence was received on the 28th that the refractory troops would not allow her to quit Gwalior, and had determined to oppose the advance of the British: Eight battalions of infantry, and a body of horse, with fifty guns, took up a position about seven miles in front of our encampment at Hingonah, with a determination to contest the field with us. Col. Garden, the Quarter Master General of the Army, went out to reconnoitre, and was received with a heavy cannonade, which of course made the Governor General's path plain. It was resolved to make preparations for the attack of the 'enemies' forces and it was expected that the engagement would take place on the morning of the 29th. The Agra Ukhbar's Correspondent at Gwalior states distinctly, that the Bace, so far from acting under the compulsion of the troops, had herself laid down the plan of resistance, and sworn the Officers to be true to her; that she had sent forward the battalions, and was at the bottom of this whole scheme of resistance.

Intelligence has been received direct from China to the 23d of November, and by way of Bombay to the 1st of December, by the Spitfire steamer, which had arrived in that port. By this opportunity we have the dismal intelligence of the death of Major Eldred Pottinger, at Hong Kong, of Dr. Graham of the Bengal Service, and Col. Knowles of the Royal Artillery.—The number of British ships lying at Whampoa, Hong Kong and Macao roads, was greater than had ever been seen congregated there, being not less than two hundred in number, none of them probably under 150 tons, and some of them equal to 1400. The Rev. C. Gutschall had come down from Chusan where he had been acting as Magistrate, apparently to the great satisfaction of the people, to occupy Mr. Morrison's place on the staff of the Governor. Trade was reviving at Canton, and many of the mercantile houses intended to remove to Hong Kong. They had been deterred by the extraordinary sickness which prevailed there.—The Imperial Commissioner had returned to the North.

There does not appear to be any farther intelligence from the Sutlege. Col. Richmond, the Governor General's Agent, arrived at Umballah on the 25th, and probably received his information of the approach of the Sikh troops to the Sutlege from the Puttiala Raja, who has a mounted dawk. The Governor General is said to have written to General Vincent, commanding at Ferozepore, instructing him to acquaint the Durbar with the happy tidings of the adjustment of all differences at Gwalior, and to assure him, that he would repair immediately to the frontier, and give his undivided attention to the affairs of the Punjab. But this is evidently fabulous, for it is well known that before the battle he had resolved to return to Calcutta.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 6.

The all engrossing topic of yesterday was the battle fought with the troops of Scindea. After the Khasee had been given up, and the new treaty had been signed, and all our demands admitted by the Durbar, it appears to have been thought that the business was over. But to the surprise of many, though not of all, in the Camp, while the Governor General was looking out anxiously for the arrival of the Regent and the Raja, Col. Sleeman came in from Gwalior, having been repeatedly fired on, with information that the refractory troops would not allow the Regent to move, and had determined to oppose our advance to Gwalior. Then it appeared evident that an engagement must ensue, and the Ladies who had accompanied the army in this promenade militaire, and the public records, were sent back in haste, and preparations made to meet the enemy. An extra from the Englishman office first announced that the battle had taken place, though on what day was not mentioned, that Col. Sanders had been killed, and that our loss was considerable; but that the enemy had suffered dreadfully, and that their ammunition and guns had fallen into our hands. The Star issued an extra, with some farther particulars, but, till the Calcutta Gazette Extra, with the public despatches, appears, we are not likely to obtain full particulars.

The Agra Ukhbar, received this morning, has some wild rumours regarding the engagement of the 29th ult. which we need not repeat, as full and accurate particulars will appear before this number goes to press. But there is one circumstance mentioned in the letter of its correspondent at Lahore not unworthy of notice. The hostile attitude which the Sikhs have taken up on the right bank of the Sutlege, we have already alluded to. It is now stated, that this determination to send troops to the banks of that river was adopted after the arrival of Cossids from Gwalior. It is not impossible that a correspondence may have been opened between the two parties at Gwalior and Lahore, and that the determination of the troops at the former place to meet us in the field, and of those at the latter to make a movement which was sure to distract our attention, may have arisen from mutual intelligence.

The covers and letters received by the Akhbar steamer from England, on the forty-eight hours notice, was 8584.

The sale of the Normandy Horses yesterday was very successful. The highest lot went for 1160 Rs.; the lowest for 500; the average price of the 36, was 703 Rs. While we are importing French horses, our brethren at Madras are getting them from Australia. Two batches have been recently imported, and another is on its way. The horses cost, in Australia 10£ each, the freight and passage to India 25£, and they have generally sold from between 6 and 700 Rs.

MONDAY, JANUARY 8.

Little intelligence has been yet received from the Army at Gwalior, descriptive either of the battle or its results. In addition to the death of Lieut. Col. Sanders, there appears to be no room to doubt of the loss also of General Churchill and Lieutenant Newton, 16th Native Infantry; and the catalogue of dead and wounded will be melancholy enough. The Agra Ukhbar, which came in on Saturday, alone gives any description of the battle; and the account is very hasty and uncertain.

The same Ukhbar, of the 30th Dec. says, that General Ventura fears going back to Lahore—and certainly he has good reason—that Dulceep Singh has been placed in confinement by Goolab Singh, who is residing at Kussoor, about 42 miles from Lahore—and that Lena Singh and other Sirdars are opposing the Raja in all his views, and hence another grand outbreak may be expected.

The first Criminal Sessions of the year open day in Calcutta; the calendar exhibits a list of fourteen cases of parties committed for trial and five others of such as have been held to bail. The offences charged are all of a light character.

The Honourable Mr. Geo. Clerk was expected at Cawnpore on the 28th or 29th ult. He is accompanied by Baboo Dwarkanath Tagore, who, says the Star, has availed himself of that opportunity of obtaining Medical attendance, of which he was much in need. Mr. Clerk's health is improved. A Steamer from Allahabad to Calcutta has been placed at his disposal.

The Record says that rumours are afloat at Madras of a correspondence between the Government at that Presidency and the Chief Justice, respecting the abolition of some of the offices about the Supreme Court, the doubling up of others, and the reduction of salaries. The Attorney's fees are also reported to be in danger of a reduction by one-fourth.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 9.

The Englishman of this morning gives the following list of officers killed and wounded in the late battle near Gwalior: Major General C. H. Churchill, C. B. dead, Lieut. Col. Sanders, C. B. dead. Major Crommelin, 1st Cavalry, severely wounded, since dead. Major Bray, H. M. 39th Foot, slightly wounded. Lieut. and Adjutant Munro, H. M. 39th, slightly wounded. Ensign Bray, H. M. 39th, slightly wounded. Lieut. Newton, 16th N. I. dead, Captain Codrington, H. M. 40th, dangerously wounded. Brigadier Wright, H. M. 39th, severely wounded. Captain Frend, A. D. C. severely wounded. Lieut. Colonel McLaren, 16th N. I. slightly wounded. Brigadier Valiant, slightly wounded. Brigadier Littler, slightly wounded. Captain R. N. Maclean, A. D. C. to the Governor-General, slightly wounded. Lieut. Leathes, Foot Artillery, dead.

Other names have yet to be added, and amongst the severely wounded, without doubt, Captain Somerset. It is added, that the whole of the enemy's guns amounting to 50, were captured, and that their troops fled in all directions.

The Hurkaru gives the following names of sufferers not mentioned above: Lieut. Cavanagh, 4th Irregular Cavalry, lost a leg; Captain Finley, H. M. 39th, slightly wounded; of the same corps, Captain Campbell, wounded slightly; Capt. Hibbert, slightly; Lieut. Gray, severely; Lieut. Atkinson, severely; Lieut. Colville, severely; Lieut. Currie, slightly; Ensign Seaman, severely; and Ensign Newport, slightly.

The Bombay Times gives a list of more than thirty passengers proceeding on the Beronic on new Year's Day.

The same paper gives it as a rumour current since the arrival of the Akhbar that Colonel Outram has been nominated to succeed Sir Henry Pottinger as Governor of Victoria, and Plenipotentiary for England with China. The public would doubtless rejoice in the utmost honour and reward being conferred on Colonel Outram; but we confess that the appointment of this most chivalrous soldier to duties so delicate as those of Her Majesty's Representative in China would seem rather hazardous.

The Madras papers say that a call has been made on that Presidency for troops for Scinde. —Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 3.]

CALCUTTA : SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, 1844.

[VOL. VI.]

THURSDAY JANUARY 11.

The draft of an Act has just been published, which ordains that all suits which are cognizable by a Sudder Ameen, or Principal Sudder Ameen, shall ordinarily be instituted in their Courts. Hitherto these suits have been instituted in the Judge's Court, and he has then transferred them to the subordinary courts. There was no reason for perpetuating this round about system, or allowing a suit to be instituted directly before the Moonsiff, and not before the two higher grades of Native Judges. The Act also enacts that where more than one Principal Sudder Ameen or Sudder Ameens may be attached to the Court without special local jurisdiction, the Judge will appoint a certain number of Moonsiff's jurisdictions which shall constitute the special jurisdiction of the superior officer, to whom all suits of a higher amount within the circle will be brought. This will tend greatly to simplify the proceedings of the Courts.

The Bombay Tradesmen have resolved, it is said, to act upon the same principle as their brethren in Calcutta, and to sell only for ready money; but in their manifesto they declare that all purchases not paid for on the nail, will be liable to interest. This negates their previous resolve never to sell on tick. The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette congratulates the community on the prospect of obtaining articles at cheaper rates; but he is reckoning without his host. In almost all transactions, tradesmen are in the habit of charging, more or less, a hundred per cent. profit on their commodities; the only difference will be that the ready money buyer will be required to give the tradesman a profit of Eighty-eight per cent.; the man who buys on credit, a Hundred per cent. If the difference was forty per cent, between the two classes, there would be some liberality to boast of.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 12.

At the last Meeting of Magistrates, a report was read from the Superintendent of Roads, shewing the various simple contrivances by which the municipal expenditure and income had been equalized. Eleven Sub-Overseers have been dismissed; all repairs of roads, drains, &c. except such as were indispensably necessary have been suspended, and 389 street lamps have been put out. This process of economy is so easy and simple that we rather wonder it has not been carried out to a greater extent. The Magistrates have only to put out all the lights in the town, and the saving will be immense. We really wish they would adopt this plan in the European part of the town, and contrive to smash half a dozen gentlemen's carriages instead of the Kranchees of the native town. In that case funds would soon be found for lighting up the city. By the bye, the improved Bude light, has, we find, been introduced at Paris in the Place Vendome, and five of these lights have been found so powerful as to eclipse all the gas lights in that broad and magnificent street. Would not these lights answer for Calcutta?

A new light house has been erected at Madras, at a cost of 75,000 Rs. It is 117 feet above the ground and 130 above the sea, a drawing of it which accompanies the Madras papers received this day, shews that it will prove as great an ornament in an architectural point of view to the place, as it will prove useful to the Mariner.

Sir Jasper Nicolls, our late Commander-in-Chief with his family, embarked for England at Bombay, on the 1st of the month, on the Steamer.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 13.

The Star published an extra yesterday with the information that the Sikhs had been driven out of Jumrood, Peshawur, and across the Attock, by the Afghans and Khyberees. The Afghans are also said to have written to our Government to say that they were ready to advance on Lahore and Umritsir, and to co-operate with us in the subjugation of the Punjab, if we would advance from our frontier. The Sikh army is said also to have declared that they would receive neither more nor less than the troops of the Company's army received, and would no longer submit to the dictation of Heera Sing or any of his family. Report has it that 50,000 Sikhs with 50 guns are at Kussoor, twelve miles from Ferozepore.

The Assam steamer, now commanded by Capt. Mackellar, late of the India Steamer, has more than maintained her reputation for speed in the present trip, having reached Koolna, 257 miles, in about two hours above two days. The Star says that the Government vessels do not reach that place under three days and a half.

The Exchange Gazette tells us that the Police has stopped a number of clocks; which is by no means surprising, since the Magistrates have long been employed in putting the clock of municipal improvement back.

The recent affair at Gwalior has made sad havoc of the prophetic reputation of the Indian press. The cup has gone fairly round. Our Calcutta contemporaries fancied that the business was over when the Khasgee was surrendered. We ourselves were out, sadly out, in predicting that the soldiery were a mere rabble, and would not be able to turn the noble park of artillery to any account. But our Bombay friends also come in for their share of disappointment. The Courier says, in his Overland Summary of the 1st of January, in allusion to the surrender of the Khasgee, "Thus ends the Great Gwalior campaign!" The Times treats the subject like a poet; and observes, "All at once the prospects of the affairs of Gwalior have become unexpectedly and thoroughly pacific. 'The God of Battle stamps, and nations feel the shock.' Two hosts marched forth, and were met by the olive branch of peace—and the diplomatist may now settle that which it was feared the sword alone could decide—Once more tranquillity reigns supreme throughout our dominions in the East!" The olive branch was supported by a masked battery of fifty pieces of ordnance; and at the very time when our great western contemporary was singing of tranquillity, a thousand wounded men and officers were bleeding on the field of battle. For our parts we are disposed to give up altogether the trade of prophecy.

MONDAY, JANUARY 15.

The Star states, on good authority, that a Regency is to be formed at Gwalior, with Ram Rao Phalkeah at the head. A force is to be raised of 10,000 men to supersede the present army; of these, 5000 will be commanded by British Officers, and the rest will act as Palace guards, and perform miscellaneous duties. The Contingent force at Sepree will be doubled. These are the terms dictated; but the great body of the Mahratta army,—consisting however for the most part of our own subjects and deserters from our army—is entrenched in the old Cumpoo, about six miles from Gwalior, with 200 pieces of Artillery, and they may yet try another field day, before they submit to the starvation which now threatens them.

Major General Sir William Nott, G. C. B. proceeds to the Cape in the Earl of Hardwicke. The community in Calcutta intend to give Lady Nott a fancy ball.

On Saturday last, the first exhibition of fruits and vegetables of the year took place at the Town Hall. There was a very numerous attendance of Ladies and Gentlemen, and among the rest were Sir Lawrence Peel and Sir John Grant. The samples of the chief vegetables of the season were good and numerous. There was also a good shew of fruit and of flowers; and on the whole the exhibition is said to have been favourable. In the evening a considerable number of members sat down to the usual dinner.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 19.

We are happy to learn from the Hurkaru, that there is no prospect of any more bloodshed at Gwalior. We have yet, however, to learn by what means the large and apparently unbroken force of the enemy, which is said to be entrenched behind two hundred pieces of cannon, has been brought to listen to terms which must be death to their prospects.

The Bombay Times of the 6th states that the cholera had broken out among the unfortunate sick of the 2d European L. I. Seven men died of the disease on Wednesday, the 3d instant, and no fewer than twelve the following day. This Regiment had previously lost 83 men in a single wing in the course of two months.

Yesterday a special meeting of Magistrates took place, which the Hurkaru describes as the most business-like meeting the Justices have held for a long time. The principal question under discussion, was the propriety of recommending to Government that the proposed Small Cause Court should be invested with authority to take cognizance of suits preferred by the Collector against defaulting rent payers. The proposal was agreed to. The present system of collection was also discussed, and we are surprised to learn that the business is so mismanaged that while the Collector entrusts hundreds of bills to each sirkar, he cannot, at pleasure, ascertain what bills have been realized. We should think nothing more easy than to register them all in a book, and to require an account every two or three days of the number which have been collected, requiring the sirkar in every instance to produce the bills which have not been collected. These bills are, we suppose, signed, and remain in the possession of the sirkar till the amount is actually realized, when they are given as vouchers to the payers.

A Coroner's inquest was held yesterday upon Capt. West, late commander of the Enterprise Steamer, who had cut his throat in a fit of insanity. The Jury were unanimous in their opinion that the act had been committed while he was of unsound mind.

The Madras Government has determined, it is said, to spare two regiments for Scinde. They are to be sent apparently by steam.

The Bank of Bombay has just declared a dividend for the last six months at the rate of seven per cent. per annum.—The Friend of India.

OVERLAND MAIL.

FRIDAY 19TH JANUARY.

The Express via Bombay arrived this day at 11 o'clock.

The Hindustan would have been in several days previously but for an accident which occurred to the Great Liverpool, by the breaking of her intermediate shaft. She will probably arrive about Tuesday or Wednesday next.

Mr. O'Connell's trial is postponed to the 15th January. The trial is positively fixed for that day, and O'Connell is rustivating at Darrynane.

Steam Affairs progress well—A deputation to Lord Ripon has urged the carrying out of the comprehensive Scheme in its fullest acceptation, and we have little doubt of its eventual attainment. The cause has many co-operators, although they are influenced by different motives. Of this, however, the public care little, provided the main object be accomplished.

Amongst the deaths we find the names of General Webster, of the Madras Establishment; the Countess Nugent; the Marquis of Winchester; Sir Francis Workman Macnaghten, in his 81st year; the Countess of Rathdown; Admiral Sir Graham Moore, G. C. B.; Countess of Mayo; the Countess Roscommon; the Hon'ble Mr. Henry Brown; Sir Lachlan Maclean.

The Archbishop of Goa has arrived at Bombay, accompanied by several priests, per Steamer Atlanta on the 14th Jan.

On Dit.—Mr. MacGregor from the Board of Trade, and Mr. M'Gregor the British Consul at Elsinore, are both spoken of as likely to relieve Sir Henry Pottinger in China; they are men of first rate talents, and it is generally considered that a better selection could not be made, should either the one or the other succeed to the appointment.

The Court of Directors have presented Mrs. Mackenzie, the aged mother of Capt. Mackenzie, who was killed during the insurrection in Afghanistan, with a gratuity of £200.—Eng. Extra.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.

We beg to acknowledge with thanks the following Subscriptions for the Bengal Catholic Herald, viz.
Capt. H. Graham, Meerut, to Aug. 1844, Rs. 10
M. Nazareth, Esq. Lucknow, to Decr. 1844, 10

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 4.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JANUARY 27, 1844.

[VOL. VI.]

THURSDAY, JANUARY 18.

The last accounts from Gwalior extend to 8th instant; at which date the "mutinous" soldiers were still in the entrenched camp.—The period granted them for the consideration of the terms offered would, it is said, expire at noon on the following day. The 18-pounder guns had been sent up to the fort which overlooks their encampment, and it was understood, they would open on it, if the camp was not quietly evacuated. It is fortunate for the cause of humanity that so determined an enemy did not resolve to hold out in the strong fortress of Gwalior, the capture of which could scarcely have been achieved without a great sacrifice of life.

The Delhi Gazette of the 10th January contains an account of the operations of the 5th Brigade 3d Division of the army, under General Lit-tler, so concise and so clear in its details. We call their particular attention to the position of Lord Ellenborough and the ladies at the opening of the engagement. It appears that the enemy, on perceiving the elephants on which they were seated, towering over the position of the field of battle, elevated their guns and sent a volley among them. Both the ladies and his Lordship seem to have had a narrow escape with their lives.

We were told some days since that the Affghans had come down to Peshawur, and driven the Sikhs out of the province and across the Indus. From the report of occurrences at Cabul given in the Delhi Gazette, it would appear that the information was premature, and that the Dost trembles for the safety of the capital if he should go to Jellalabad.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 19.

The dispatches from the Governor General reached Bombay on the 6th instant. The Express reached Calcutta on the 5th, though the distance is much greater. A Bombay Royal salute was immediately fired to commemorate the victory; whereas the salute in Calcutta was not fired till nearly a fortnight had expired after the receipt of the first news of the triumph. This is now accounted for by the unaccountable fact, that though the Express Mail from Gwalior duly arrived in Calcutta, the letter from the Governor General to the Council of India with which it was especially charged, was not in it.

Lady Nott is to be complimented with an entertainment on the part of the members of Society in Calcutta. Lady Pollock, who has just taken her departure for England and was for some time in Calcutta, received no similar token of public respect; and this omission has, we learn, been severely remarked on. The Hurkaru explains it satisfactorily, by saying that Lady Pollock was in so delicate a state of health, as to be obliged to decline the invitation of the President of the Reunions to attend those assemblies; and it was judged therefore that to invite her to a public entertainment in honour of her distinguished husband, would be an empty compliment.

The Agra Ukhbar of the 10th has afforded some valuable information regarding the Native Army of Gwalior, which fought so desperately at Maharajpoo. It is derived from one who was well acquainted with its constitution and members, and will be found interesting.

The following account of the entertainment given by Lord Ellenborough at Gwalior, is from the Agra Ukhbar. From it we learn that Brigadier Stubbs has been appointed Governor of Gwalior, and Commander of all the forces in Scindia's territories. The appointment was first announced at the dinner table, instead of being, as usual, proclaimed through the Gazette, probably from the greater effect which would be thereby produced. "Affairs at Gwalior are progressing rapidly. On the afternoon of the 4th instant, the celebrated Fort of Gwalior was garrisoned by Scindia's Contingent, and on the same evening a grand dinner was given by Lord Ellenborough. After the cloth was removed, the Governor General delivered several speeches with his accustomed fluency. He regretted, that he was not a soldier, and that sentiment was of course very loudly cheered. He eulogised the bravery of our troops, and dwelt on the late glorious achievements of our Army, in language which showed that his powers as an orator are very nearly first-rate. He concluded his speech by announcing to the company that the Fort of Gwalior had been taken, and then drank the health of Col. Stubbs as 'the Governor of Gwalior.'

We understand that Colonel Stubbs is appointed Governor of the Fort of Gwalior, and Commander-in-Chief of all the forces in the country belonging to Scindia.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 20.

The London Mail of the 6th December came in yesterday morning about eleven o'clock, having been a little above 43 days between London and Calcutta. Happily the Express of the month does not go out before the 23d, by which date all the letters brought on this occasion will have been delivered, and the answers to letters of the 6th December will probably be in England by the 6th or 8th of March.

The Bombay Times states, that the trade in Arab Horses is likely to meet with a serious check from the determination of Government to purchase no more horses. It has been in the habit of purchasing to the extent of a thousand, but the purchases this year have been limited to 150 or 170, while the number imported amounts nearly to 3000. It is with the price they obtain for these animals that the Arab traders have usually been provided with funds for the purchase of English manufactures; and their operations are now paralyzed. The annual value of horses imported into Bombay, on an average of five years, is nearly five lakhs of Rupees.

MONDAY, JANUARY 22.

At the Meeting of the Proprietors of the Union Bank on Saturday last, a dividend at the rate of Seven per cent. was voted, as a kind of compromise between the Six which the Directors wished to give, and the Eight which the Shareholders wished to take. Mr. J. C. Stewart was elected Secretary, at a reduced salary of 2,000 Rupees a month. Some objection was raised to the appointment on the score that he had been brought out from England by a clique, with the promise of their support in this contest for the office. To this it was replied, that there were three or four candidates for the office; and that Mr. Stewart, having been among the first to hear of the probable vacancy, had been the first in the field. Whatever may be the objections to what is called a clique, or combination, or confederacy, as brother Jonathan terms it, if there was a clique on the present occasion, it has worked well for the Bank; for it would be difficult to find a man better fitted for the office than Mr. Stewart. We cannot but consider the present tone of feeling regarding the prospects of the Bank, both in the community and among ourselves of the fourth estate, as connected in some measure with his appointment and the expectations which have been built upon it.

The opposition which the Hills has somewhat unaccountably made to the testimonial to Mr. George Clerk, has proved beneficial. It has elicited a just eulogium of his eminent services, from a correspondent of that paper, who appears to be intimately acquainted with his career.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 23.

Letters which have appeared in the papers from General Grey's Camp state, that there were ladies in it just before the battle of Punnier. They say that ladies were present also with the Sipree contingent, but we cannot suppose that they came on with the troops into the engagement; probably they were left behind in the cantonment. The last account from Hyderabad, also states the arrival of the lady of Lt. Col. Squire, of H. M. 13th Light Infantry at that station. Surely after the sad experience we have had in Afghanistan of the great inconvenience to the army, as well as danger to the Ladies from their presence in these scenes of warfare, there seems to be some necessity for more stringent injunctions against this practice from the Home authorities.

The Agra Ukhar states, that among the Maharratta troops in the battles of Maharajpore and Punnier there were a considerable number of deserters from the Company's native army and one or two European deserters. One of the latter, named Berry, from the 2nd European Regiment, had, when he fell, his lighted port-fire in his hand, and fired off his gun, sweeping away fifteen men.

The Hurhuru gives a letter this morning from a passenger in the Hindoostan Steamer, which made a splendid run of 26 days from Calcutta to Suez, stoppages included. He speaks in the highest terms of the excellent arrangements on board, of the uniform attention of the Commander, and above all of the excellence of the "feeding." It is but an act of justice to place this fact prominently before the reader, and thus to remove the unfavourable impression created by the accidental shipment on one occasion of sour beer for the passengers. It appears that the Hindoostan will bring as many passengers as she can accommodate, and that both her cabins and those of the Bentinck, are all bespoke for the next trip to Suez. The Company certainly have no reason to complain after this that they have not been supported. If with a full complement of passengers these vessels cannot pay, there is nothing for it but to adopt the native theme of resignation and exclaim, "it is our bad fortune."

There has been some discussion, whether or not Mr. Millett will succeed to the vacancy which will be created in Council by the departure of Sir W. Casement. We should think there cannot be two opinions on the subject. It is the rule that the Provisional member succeeds to the first vacancy; it is not the rule that a Military member must be succeeded by a Military member. On the retirement of Mr. Bird, the Court will doubtless appoint a successor from their army. But, there cannot surely be any reason to complain of the want of a military member to look after the interests of the Army, while Lord Ellenborough has a seat at the Board.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 24.

From a notice which has appeared in the Delhi Gazette it appears that the rage for every thing Military which marks the present administration, has found its way even into the sanctuary, and that at Delhi, the congregation is to be called to service on Sundays, not by the sweet tones of the Church going bell, but from the mouth of a six powder gun.

The Gentleman's Gazette at Bombay has this mysterious sentence in the paper just received. "Every preparation is making for the departure of Col. Outram, who is to set out immediately for Agra to take important despatches to the Governor General. It is said this gentleman is to return to England with the replies of his Lordship." What is the nature of these despatches which cannot be entrusted to the ordinary post and steamers, and which require to be presented in person by so acceptable a messenger as the gallant Colonel?

We deeply regret to learn from the Star that Mr. Bignell, who was recently Government Pleader, died from inflammation of the brain. He was a man of great legal attainments; and after leaving the army and joining the Native bar, rose to considerable eminence in his profession.

The Captain of the Agincourt, which was expected to leave Calcutta on Sunday morning, begged that the vessel might be allowed to ride at single anchor, and the indulgence was granted. But she parted from her anchor during the night, and floated against two steamers at Kidderpore on Saturday night and subsequently walked into a third. She escaped without any injury, but the damage done to the steamers is between 15 and 20,000 Rupees.—Friend of India.

Printed and Published by P. S. D'Rosario and Co.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 5.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1844.

[Vol. VI.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 25.

The Delhi Gazette states, on the authority of a letter from Loodiana, that "the arrival of guns and military stores at that place continues unabated; that every, even the slightest, movement of the troops, is duly reported at Lahore; and that if our policy is really to repel and not commence aggression, the less parade we make of the instruments of war, the better." But, really, is our frontier to be left unprotected, while every thing is in commotion in the Punjab? Are the Sikhs more likely to avoid aggression when they know we are not prepared to meet it, than when they are aware of our being fully armed for any crisis? It is the unprotected, not the protected, state of the frontier that is likely to invite intrusion.

Capt. H. Johnson has published another letter in the Delhi Gazette, relative to the signature of the engagement with Saleh Mahomed by General Shelton and Col. Palmer. It contains some very interesting particulars of that awful crisis when the safety of our captives seemed to hang by a single thread.

The Indigo Planter's Association, which has long been in a rickety condition for want of support, gave up the ghost yesterday and was duly interred. Three Indigo planters were present at its obsequies. Its effects are to be divided in equal shares between the Sailor's Home and the Howrah Hospital.

A very important and useful Act has just been published for protecting His Highness the Nabob of the Carnatic, and certain members of his family, as well as certain of his retainers from the process and jurisdiction of the Courts of Justice. The names of the privileged are to be duly published in the Madras Government Gazette, and will serve as a useful warning to all persons not to allow them any credit.

The gallant Cornet Shaw, of the 10th Cavalry, who lost his leg in the battle of Muharajpore, has been appointed an Aid-de-Camp on the staff of the Governor General.

The Hurkaru mentions that the young volunteers of the Pilot service, who have hitherto been allowed to roam about the town when not on duty and run into mischief, will in future be required to remain on board a vessel suitably fitted up for their accommodation.

The Delhi Gazette states that the report of Heera Sing's intention to abandon the Punjab to the rival factions who are ready to tear it in pieces, and join his Uncles in their inaccessible position in the Jumboo Hills, is confirmed.

Moulmein Chronicles have reached us to the 3d instant. The Editor is about to abdicate, which is much to be regretted, for he says his principles are not the principles of a party, and it may not be so easy to obtain another Editor with principles that belong to no party.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 26.

The names of seven officers of Infantry and one of Artillery appointed to the new Gwalior contingent have been published. The selection has been made, as in every other instance during the present administration, on the ground of merit alone; all those who have been selected having either formerly or recently distinguished themselves.

The Hurkaru states that Capt. Somerset, the Military Secretary to the Governor General, who received three wounds at Muharajpore, was doing well on the 14th instant, and it was expected that in two or three months he would cease to feel any ill effects from his recent sufferings.

From the same source we derive the information, that Lord Ellenborough intended to leave Gwalior by the 23d or 24th, and expected to reach Calcutta about the end of February, as he will march part of the way and travel the rest by post.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 27.

The Star notices a letter addressed to the Naval and Military Gazette relative to the great gun at Agra, in which the writer speaks of the various means used for transporting it. Our contemporary very properly observes that he appears to be altogether ignorant of the fact that it was broken up and sold by Lord William Bentinck, about eleven years ago, one of the most objectionable and gothic of the acts of that great man. Had it survived to the present time, it would probably have graced the southern front of Government House in Calcutta.

The same paper has letters from Gwalior of the 15th instant. The last of the Jhinsee guns had been given up on the preceding day, and these dangerous weapons have thus been rescued from those who had the power and inclination to do mischief with them. Nineteen lakhs of Rupees had been paid up by the Scindeah Durbar, which, with a receipt for seven lakhs due by our Government to it, makes a total of twenty-six lakhs, but this sum will not cover the expenses incurred by the Army of Exercise.

The General Orders of the 13th instant direct the formation of a Rifle Company in seven Regiments, and authorize the substitution of Forage caps throughout the army, to be used on all ordinary occasions instead of the present heavy chako.

The last Penang Gazette states that the seven convicts who were engaged in the murder of Capt. Benyon, of the ship Harriett Scott, at sea, on her way to Penang from Bombay, have been tried, convicted and executed.

We learn with the highest satisfaction, that the Government of Bengal has resolved to take the most active measures for suppressing human sacrifices among the Khoonds, in the districts which lie within the limits of this Presidency. Mr. M.

the energetic Commissioner at Cuttack, has been deputed in conjunction with Lieut. Hicks, on this benevolent errand. We may rest assured, that the victims, when rescued, will not be made over to the Mahomedans, or to the savages who practise infanticide.

We have placed among our extracts some brief notices obtained from the papers just received from China. It is very gratifying to learn that the Chinese Government and people are so very anxious to increase the external commerce of the kingdom. The Hong merchants, however, in order to meet the demands made upon them by the Canton authorities, have proposed the establishment of a slight additional duty on Tea and Cotton. This would be a clear infraction of the Tariff, and it is to be hoped, that Sir H. Pottinger will make the most strenuous efforts to resist this new demand in a country in which what is an innovation one day is a precedent the next.

MONDAY, JANUARY 29.

The Star states, that Lieut. Col. Benson, at present officiating as Member of the Military Board, is likely to succeed the late Lieut. Col. Sanders as Deputy Secretary to Government.

The Madras papers are speculating on the appointment of General Waugh to the Supreme Council. The candidates for this post, therefore, are Major General Fraser, Sir George Pollock, Sir William Nott, Col. Sutherland, and General Waugh; but the choice may probably fall upon the first named officer. It is certain however that Mr. Millett comes in for the first vacancy; and that the Military Member will succeed only on the second opening. But we are somewhat surprized at the great anxiety expressed by our contemporaries for a representative of the army, while the Friend of the Army occupies the most influential seat at that Board.

The Bombay papers state, that Lord Ellenborough had ordered an Express Steamer to be held in readiness at that Port, to convey the intelligence to England of our two recent victories and the submission of Scindia's Durbars.

In reference to our remark, that the number who fell at Assye, was greater in comparison than those who fell at Muharajpore, the Hurkaru says, "we suspect our contemporary will find that the number engaged at Assye was greater than that at Muharajpore." It is difficult to ascertain from the documents before us, the exact number actually engaged at Assye, but we think our contemporary will find the reverse of his supposition to be the fact. The Duke says, "by one of those unlucky accidents which frequently happens, the officer commanding the piquets which were on the right, led up immediately to the village of Assye: the 74th, which was on the right of the second line, and was ordered to support the piquets, followed them. There was a large break in our line between these corps and those on the left. They were exposed to a most terrible cannonade from Assye and were charged by the Cavalry belonging to the Campos; consequently, in the piquets and the 74th Regiment, we sustained the greatest part of our loss. One company of the piquets of one officer and 50 rank and file, and one officer and 44 rank and file." Mill says, "Of the British Army 428 were killed and 28 were wounded. As the whole are said to be consisted of only 4500 men, between one-third and one-half of the whole army were either killed or wounded." Having thus had occasion a second time to compare the battle of Assye with that of Muharajpore, we cannot help thinking how fortunate it was for the great Duke's reputation, that it did not fall to the lot of those who have been criticizing the engagement near Gwalior to dwell on the military blunders and the carnage by which the battle of Assye was marked.

There has been some demur among the men of the 47th Madras Native Infantry to embark for Kerachee; they asked for rations, in addition to bounty, clothing and full batta. Government immediately acceded to their wishes, and they offered to embark cheerfully.

A General Order of the 15th Instant orders the formation of a Service Battalion from the Military corps in Bundelkund, to be kept ready to act upon any sudden and unlooked for occasion. We have therefore three descriptions of Military force in this disturbed district. A Regular Army of from 5 to 6000 men, a Military Police of more than 2000, and now a Service Battalion. Certainly if, with this large army, it is impossible to keep the peace, more especially after the lesson so recently taught at Muharajpore, there must be something radically defective in the system of our internal administration—Friend of India.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 1.

VIZAGAPATAM.—We understand that a fire has lately broken out in Vizagapatam, in some houses adjoining the parade grounds, with such violence, that all efforts made to suppress its progress were useless (in consequence of the high wind on that day) until it had consumed almost all the houses between the parade ground and the river. The loss of property sustained by one individual alone is estimated to be about 2,000 Rupees.

CHUSAN.—Extract of a letter dated Chusan, 8th November last, written by an Officer of Her Majesty's 55th Regiment:—"You will be shocked to hear how our poor Regiment has suffered within the last four months. Out of five hundred men of the left wing at Hong Kong, only three hundred remain alive and scarcely one of those fit for duty. Three of our officers died of yellow fever after a few hours sickness, and three have gone home on sick leave. Nothing shocked me more for a long time than the melancholy account of Colonel Fawcett's death. Our prospects of leaving China at present are very bad; report says that we will be lucky if we get out of this in 45.—The Vixen Steamer arrived here two days ago with the Consul for Thanghae, who started to-day for his destination, she also brought the July letters; we had only received the June mail a few days before.—Ireland seems to be all alive for repeal, I wonder how it will end."

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS.

The following subscriptions on account of the Bengal Catholic Herald, are acknowledged with thanks:

Sub-Conductor Peter Ryan, Loodianah, to Sep. 1845. Rs. 10
 Captain H. Huddleston, Gurwal via Almorah, to December, 1844. 10
 Rev. Mr. Zubiburn, Backergunge, to April, 1844. 10
 Rev. Fr. J. Mary da Bione, Landour, to Dec. 1844. 10
 Mr. D. Macnamara, N. S. Moorshedabad, to Dec. 1843. 12
 Half yearly and annual Subscribers are solicited to remit their subscriptions as early as practicable.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 6.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 10, 1844.

*[VOL. VI.]

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 1.

The Delhi Gazette has given his usual budget of Lahore and Cabul news. It contains three important announcements; 1st. that news had been received from the Khyber of Mahomed Akbar Khan's arrival at Jellalabad, and that he was expected in the passes; 2d. that Raja Heera Singh had expressed great and open sorrow, that the British should have beaten the Mahrattas at Muharajpore; 3d. and that the young Sovereign, Duleep Singh, had requested some sweatmeats for his elephant who was getting thin, on which the Prime Minister sent him a Rupee's worth.

Some time since there appeared a notice in some of the English papers, that the Court of Directors had refused a writership to one of the orphan sons of the late Mr. David Carmichael Smyth. The Hurkaru has expressed great indignation at the refusal,—but the Court have no public patronage in their gift; the various appointments in the service are the private and individual patronage of the Directors. This is the mode in which they are paid for the labour of governing India, according to the Charter; and there is no more reason to censure them for not having parted with a writership to reward the public services of a meritorious servant, than there would be if they had individually declined to contribute 500£ out of their salaries for the same purpose, supposing they were paid in sovereigns instead of in patronage. It is the system not the individual that is in fault. Lord Auckland very strongly recommended Dr. Theodore Cantor to the Directors for an Assistant Surgeonship, but without the smallest success; they had prior engagements, and their own friends and connections were to be served in the first instance. It was by means of a representation from a number of scientific gentlemen in London to the President of the Board of Control that this eminent naturalist obtained his appointment on this establishment.

Baboo Seatoleea, who, before the engagement at Muharajpore, was one of the Envoys from the Gwalior Durbar to the Governor General, and if we mistake not, signed the treaty which lulled our Authorities and then opened his guns on our troops, has refused to acknowledge the Regency. The Commander-in-Chief, says the Star, was desirous of despatching a Brigade to bring him to reason, but the Governor General preferred addressing a letter to him in which the ruin which his contumacy would entail, was forcibly pointed out to him.

The Windsor Castle steam yacht, which was to have begun her trip from Calcutta to Hooghly this day, was not ready at the appointed time; and it may be a fortnight before the experiment commences.

The Englishman has alluded in his number of this morning to the fact mentioned in the United Service Gazette, that the Burmese Prize Money had not been distributed, because the Rolls from Bengal only had reached England. The Burmese Prize money fell to the captors in 1825 and 1826 and the captors have not yet received it. The Bhurtpore Prize money was acquired at the beginning of 1826 and was distributed with little delay. Our contemporary ascribes the difference in these two cases, and very justly, to the fact that in the case of Bhurtpore, the Commander-in-Chief, Lord Combermere, had a large sum at stake. The accounts were therefore made up, and the money disbursed with remarkable expedition. The final distribution of the Mahratta Prize Money accumulated in the year 1816, and 1817, yet remains unsettled!

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 2.

At the Half-yearly meeting of the Steam Tug Association, on Friday last, the Report was read and approved as usual, the accounts were passed as correct and satisfactory; a dividend of Ten per cent. per annum was declared, and the Directors were requested to continue their services. The usual business of the Society having thus been concluded as usual, a proposal was made for extending the business of the Steam Tug Association by augmenting its capital, to the extent of Twenty lakhs of Rupees, and embarking in River Steam Navigation. A prospectus of the plan has been published, which declares that the Government have made Twelve per cent. clear profit on their steamers after paying every expense. We are most happy to hear this announcement, as it gives the assurance that another Company may reduce the price of freight to one-third, and yet make a clear gain of Eight per cent. A Meeting is to be held on the 6th instant to consider the plan, when explanation will be afforded, which will enable us to write more confidently on the subject.

The Agra Ukhbar states, that a Gentleman connected with the Board of Control, had written to a friend in India to say, that Lord Ellenborough's Scinde Policy had been entirely approved of by the Board, and that the Ancers would be sent to Calcutta.

The young Rajah was duly installed at Gwalior on the 20th. The two most important personages in this grand scene, the Governor General and the young Rajah, are thus described: "There, under a canopy of gold, sat the creator of Indian Princes. His Highness, Jyagesh Mah Rajah, now in his eighth year, in the centre, unconsciously see sawing his puny legs under the throne as school boys are wont to do under their seats while desperately struggling with the profundities of classical lore." We hope these memoranda will not be thrown away on Punch.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 3.

A public Notification, dated Gwalior, the 18th of January, notifies that a treaty had that day been signed by the British Plenipotentiaries and the Council of Regency, and had been ratified.

by the Governor General, and the boy Muhammad Rajee Rao Scindea. It states that the acknowledged friendly relations between the British Government and the Gwalior States had been restored, and that the British Armies would immediately return to their own states. The first paragraph is written in so very slovenly a style, that it is difficult to understand it without two or three perusals.

Mr. Baillie, the Government Attorney General in the Sudder Court, has resigned his appointment, and it seems that there is some difficulty in selecting a fit person to succeed him. It is a point of importance to Government and confers importance on the individual; and it is said that the Sudder Board and the Sudder Court have been called on to name those whom they deem most worthy for the selection of Government. The former have named Ameer Ally and Baboo Prasunno Koomar Tagore; the latter, some of the pleaders at their own bar.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 5.

Advices from China mention, that Captain Denison, who sailed with the American Schooner Raymond from Chusan to Macao, has made off with the vessel, and 40,000 dollars in treasure which were on board of her.

The Agra Ukbar of the 27th gives an account of the fifth and last Act of the drama at Gwalior, on the 22d instant when the young Scindea paid a visit of ceremony to the Governor General, and the whole army consisting of twenty thousand men, was drawn up to receive him. In the evening the Commander-in-Chief gave a farewell dinner to the Governor General at which eighty sat down. His Lordship as usual made a speech, but with more than his usual animation regretted that public duties required his presence elsewhere, that is at the Council Chamber; said that the state of our foreign relations was unsettled; and declared his unalterable resolution, should the necessity arise for war, to be again where alone he experienced happiness, among the officers of the Army in the field of battle. If his Lordship's sentiments have been faithfully represented, we cannot expect him to remain long in the City of Palaces.

Sir Robert Sale, we perceive, has leave of absence for three months, preparatory to his embarking for England, on a two years' furlough.

It is now positively stated, that Dost Mahomed and his son Mahomed Akbar are at Jellalabad with 5000 horse, and that their object is of course to take possession of Peshawur and chase the infidels across the Indus.

Lord Ellenborough left Gwalior for Calcutta on the 23d of January, and it is said will proceed there leisurely to Futehpore, from whence he will start for the City of Palaces about the 16th of the present month.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 6.

News have been received from China to the effect, that in January, the contents of which however are of but little interest. Sir Henry Pottinger has just returned to Canton, and Major General Gage succeeds Lord Saltoun, in the command of the troops in China, had arrived at Hong-Kong. Some Mandarins had been sent at that place with the intention of the Supplementary Treaty, and the British affairs had been dispatched a steamer to the North every six weeks. A very melancholy account of the massacre of a Roman Catholic Bishop of Corea, with two Priests and seventy Christians has been received by this opportunity. So restricted is the intercourse with that peninsula, that the massacre now for the first time reported appears to have occurred so far back as 1839.—Friend of India.

AGRA AUCTION MART, COMMISSION ROOMS, AND GENERAL AGENCY.

The undersigned, with much deference, beg to announce to the United Service, and Indian Public in general, that they have, this day, established themselves as above.

Stowell and Co.,
From JOHN MONRO and Co's.

Agra, 1st December, 1843.

P. S.—We beg to state that the Senior Member only (Mr. R. D. Stowell) of our Firm came from Messrs. John Monro and Co.

With reference to the foregoing advertisement, we respectfully beg leave to state, that our Establishment will be conducted by our Mr. R. P. Stowell, whose long and thorough experience in every branch of the above business, combined with the arrangements now effected, will, we trust, ensure to us the patronage and support of the Community at large, to whom we offer our humble services, and to whose wants and wishes we shall most faithfully apply our assiduous attention.

Our premises (No. 50.) are situated in the centre of the Military Cantonments. EXTENSIVE, COMMODIOUS, and well secure GODOWNS, for every description of GOONS, CARRIAGES, HORSES, &c. &c., are attached.

The following will be our invariable charges of Commission, in the several departments of our Establishment, viz.

COMMISSION.

AUCTION SALES, amounting to 10,000 Rupees, and upwards,.....	at 2½ per cent.
Ditto, amounting to 5,000, Rupees, and under 10,000,	at 5 per cent.
Ditto, on Articles of PLATE, WATCHES, JEWELLERY, CARRIAGES, HORSES, &c., UNDER the value of 5,000 Rupees,....	at 7½ per cent.
Ditto, Miscellaneous Articles,	at 9 per cent.
COMMISSION SALES, amounting to 10,000 Rupees, and upwards,.....	at 2½ per cent.
Ditto, amounting to 5,000 Rupees, and under 10,000,	at 5 per cent.
Ditto, on Articles of PLATE, WATCHES, JEWELLERY, CARRIAGES, HORSES, &c., UNDER the value of 5,000 Rupees,....	at 8 per cent.
Ditto, Miscellaneous Articles,	at 9 per cent.

Auction Accounts Sale will be rendered seven days after the day of Sale, and paid within sixty-one days.

Commission Accounts Sale rendered monthly, and payable at sixty-one days' date. (For the accommodation of parties leaving the Station before Sales become due, they will be discounted at 1 rupee per cent.)

Property sent for Auction or Commission Sale must be accompanied with a List of Articles, and written instructions as to their disposal. No Article will be received for Auction Sale at a fixed price, every thing sold at Auction must be sold to the highest bidder.

GENERAL AGENCY, including Landed Property of every description. On realizations of rents, (repairs and outlays of every kind included), Commission at 5 rupees per cent. will be charged. Orders from all parts of INDIA, and Commissions of every kind, will be duly attended to, with punctuality and despatch. Goods and Packages forwarded to our care, will be examined, repacked, (if necessary), and forwarded to all parts; Commission at 5 rupees per cent. on amount disbursed, will be charged.

No Godown Rent will be charged for warehousing for a period of 3 months, after which a trifling charge will be made.

Stowell and Co.,
From JOHN MONRO and Co's.

Agra, 1st December, 1843.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 7.]

CALCUTTA, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1844.

[VOL. VI.]

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 8.

The Head Quarters of the Commander-in-Chief re-crossed the Chumbul and entered our own territories on the 27th January. The arrangements for the Gwalior Field Force, were promulgated the next day. The whole force will be commanded by Major-General Littler, while Brigadiers Wright and Stacey will command the first and second infantry Brigade.

The Hurkaru of this morning announces the establishment of a Metropolitan Loan and Discount Company, for particulars relative to which the public are requested to apply to the Secretary, Mr. Charles Brownfield, whose office is established, pro tempore, at No. 7, Garstin's Buildings. What a prolific Metropolis is Calcutta!

The Native account of the visit of His Highness Jyagee Scindea,—who is eight years old—to the Governor-General, ought not to be passed over. The day was the 22d January. His little Highness first mounted an elephant and proceeded to the British Camp, on reaching which the Secretaries received him and placed him on horseback. On reaching the Governor-General's tent, there was a salute of nineteen guns, after which he received at the hands of his Lordship, a valuable pearl necklace, twelve excellent horses, and five elephants. On the return of the party, the Moonshce, Bulwunt Row, gave her Highness the Regent, who is thirteen—a detailed account of all that had taken place at the Durbar. The Maharajah, the boy King, also commended with great satisfaction the order of discipline of the British troops, and expressed great admiration of the music.

The King of Delhi has expressed his determination not to return from the Kootub to the palace till he hears good news from Mr. George Thompson as to the progress of his Mission, and the restoration of the nuzzurs—the small compliment to fallen grandeur, we can so well afford, but which has been so wantonly withdrawn.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 9.

Sir Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy is about to present to the Bombay District Charitable Society a Dhurmshala, or Hall of Charity, to be erected at his own expense. In addition to the cost of the building, he intends to form a reserve fund for which he will subscribe 50,000 Rupces.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 10.

The Exchange Gazette of this morning contains an Advertisement from the Emigration Agent, Mr. T. Caird, who has been appointed to that office by the Mauritius Government, announcing that tenders would be received for the conveyance of 200 Emigrants to the Mauritius. If we mistake not, this is the first notice of the despatch of any labourers this year.

The Madrás Athenæum of the 30th of January states, that the Nabob of the Carnatic, convinced of the absurdity of the Mohurrum festival, has refused to perform it, and thereby created a host of enemies, who threaten him with due vengeance, if he should turn "Puritan."

The Englishman of this morning alludes to an article which appeared recently in the Anti-Slavery Reporter, stating that the Soliman Shaw, belonging to Calcutta, conveyed slaves from Mocha to Judda for sale. We believe this is the same vessel, the Nacoda and crew of which were picked up in the Soonderbuns by Capt. Scott, and whose movements are involved in so much mystery. Was she seeking for an opportunity of kidnapping labourers in that region?

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 12.

Last Saturday's Calcutta Gazette contains the long expected notice, that, after the 1st of March next, parties will be at liberty to pay in India the Steam Postage of letters they may send to England, via Southampton. This will be a great accommodation to all those who are anxious to avoid burdening their friends at home with the expense both of the letter and the reply to it.

The last Delhi Gazette states, that there is a rumour of the young Rajah Duleep Singh's having been put to death, and of a consequent collision both at Lahore and Kussoor, in which many lives were lost.

The papers state, that it is in contemplation to increase the army by the addition of the 10 men per Company who were struck off last year, as soon as we had washed our hands of Afghanistan. So it requires it seems a war establishment to maintain peace in Asia.

The local fever which has destroyed the strength and integrity of so many Regiments in Upper Scinde, has fastened itself on the unfortunate 13th Queen's Light Infantry, part of the illustrious Garrison. The journals state that Sir Robert Sale had been attacked by it previously to his going to Bombay to embark for England.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 13.

The number of covers despatched by the Steamer Cleopatra from Bombay on the 2d of the present month was 52,374; viz, 40,098 letters and 12,276 newspapers. This is the largest number of covers we believe ever sent through the Bombay Post office. The reduction in the rates of Marseilles postage—though to this day it has not been officially announced—is beginning to tell upon the despatch. The highest number heretofore sent was 10,347; in February the number was 12,079, with a corresponding diminution of letters sent by Southampton.

The Hurkaru confirms the report that the Amcers of Scinde are to be brought round to Calcutta immediately, and placed in honourable confinement at Baraset, about eight miles from Calcutta; once the residence of unruly Cadets. It is utterly impossible to fathom the wisdom or to discover the necessity of this step—unless there be some fear entertained—that the Belooches should invade the Bombay Presidency and carry off the Amceers.

The Opium Sale yesterday was languid and did not yield a profit of more than Three Hundred per cent. 3,190 chests were put up, and sold for 27,08,175 Rupees.

The Madras United Service Gazette states as a positive fact, that Sir Henry Pottinger has strongly recommended the immediate withdrawal from China of all the troops sent there from India, on account of the ill-feeling created among Her Majesty's forces by the disparity of pay.

The Hurkaru of this morning has some interesting intelligence about Capt. Macpherson's operations among the Khoonds. He has been so successful as to rescue eighty more victims. We hope the Government of Madras will make better provision for their education and moral training, than has been made for the poor creatures heretofore rescued from destruction.

The Hurkaru has a letter from his Ferozepore Correspondent dated the last of February, which repeats the report that there has been an engagement between Heera Singh and Lena Singh.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 14.

The Star states that the Hindostan Steamer left Calcutta at half past six yesterday morning, and grounded at Hooghly point at half past 10.

The Governor General is expected, says the Englishman, to reach Allahabad on the 16th, and after two days of repose, to resume his journey by dawk to Calcutta, which his Lordship will probably reach on the 26th.—Friend of India.

MARCH OVERLAND MAIL.—The latest safe day for the transmission of letters from Calcutta per steamer to leave Bombay on the 1st proximo, is this day, Saturday, 17th February. The Government overland Express will be despatched hence to Bombay on Wednesday next the 21st.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE.

INITALLY.

THE VERY REV. DR. KENNEDY, Principal.

St. John's College is designed chiefly to educate youth for the sacred ministry, for the Vicariate Apostolic of Bengal. The abundant benediction which it has pleased God to bestow on the mission of Bengal, the constantly increasing numbers of the Catholic community, and the necessity of establishing new missions in different parts of the Vicariate all demand, that provision should be made here immediately, to educate candidates for the service of the sacred ministry, in order to multiply the number of labourers in the Vineyard of the Lord, and to secure a succession of good Pastors for the Vicariate.

The Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic, although for a long time deeply solicitous to secure for the Church of Bengal an advantage of such great moment for its permanent welfare, abstained from pressing the subject on the notice of his generous flock, from a feeling, that the demands made on them, for the Orphanage and other charitable purposes, were as much as their circumstances would allow them to meet.

The same feeling would still prevent him from calling attention to the subject, if through a singular manifestation of the Divine Goodness, a House and Demesne had been placed at his disposal, (which cost the late the immense sum of about 100,000 Rupees,) for the establishment of a College. The conditions annexed to this foundation are such, as the Archbishop confidently hopes can be complied with, so as to satisfy fully the wishes of the benevolent Founder, and, at the same time, secure for the Bengal Mission, an Institution, which, with the blessing of Heaven, will, in a few years, send forth a holy and a learned Priesthood, qualified by their education and knowledge of the language and usages of the country, to be the Pastors of the faithful, and the Heralds of salvation to those who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death.

As the Funds under the administration of the Archbishop suffice to provide for the education and support of six students, it is intended, as soon as circumstances permit, to select candidates for these scholarships, by concursus, or according to merit to be ascertained by examination. For the present young men who have wholly or nearly completed their classical studies in some of the approved Seminaries of Great Britain and Ireland will be chosen, in order to attain more expeditiously the object for which the Seminary is established and to give time to the Anglo Indian Youth who aspire to the Priesthood, to make such a proficiency in the English, Greek and Latin languages and Mathematics, as will qualify them to compete for the above mentioned Scholarships. Due notice will be given to candidates, of the subject-matter of the examination to be undergone by them. In accordance with Catholic discipline, testimonials of exemplary conduct and attention to the duties of religion, must be produced before any candidate is admitted to examination.

Such benefactions as the faithful may bestow on the Institution, will be employed in purchasing a suitable Library, in furnishing a Hall with the apparatus required for the Study of Natural Philosophy, in erecting such additional buildings as may be found necessary, and finally, in founding free places for candidates for the sacred ministry, of distinguished piety and attainments.

In order to promote these important objects, and to assist in defraying the expenses of Institution, arrangements have been made for educating in St. John's College twelve young gentlemen not designed for the clerical profession, at the monthly charge of thirty Rupees for each Boarder and of twenty-one for each day Boarder. The course of education will comprise the Greek and Latin Classics, French, Reading, Writing, Arithmetic, &c. English Grammar, Geography, History, the use of the Globes, Logic, Mathematics, Natural Philosophy, and the native languages generally in use. No pupils will be received under six or beyond fourteen years of age.

Payment to be made quarterly in advance, and a month when once entered upon to be charged for in full. No extra charge will be made for Medicines and for the attendance of any other besides the appointed Physician of the Seminary. The monthly pension fixed for Boarders includes all charges, for washing, and for the use of books and table and bedroom furniture.

Reference for further information to be made to the Principal of the College.

ST. XAVIER'S COLLEGE.

No. 22, Chowringhee Road.

Day Scholars, at..... 8 Rs. per month.

Day Boarders, 16 " ditto.

Boarders, 25 " ditto.

For further particulars apply to the Rector.

Printed and published by P. S. D'ROZARIO AND Co. No. 8, Tank Square, Calcutta, every Saturday Morning. Price One Rupee per month, or Ten Rupees per year, if paid in advance. Subscriptions also received by MR. W. L. JOHNSTON, Madras; MR. M. A. D'MELLO, Bombay; MR. G. M. FREDERICK, Singapore; MR. J. P. DE MURAT, Penang; MR. T. BONNEFOY, Mauritius; MR. D. B. ANANDAPPA, Ceylon; MR. E. ABREV, Moulmein; MR. R. P. STOWELL, Agra; and M. J. A. SMITH, 14, Soho Square, London.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 8.]

CALCUTTA : SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 24, 1844.

[VOL. VI

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 15.

The Delhi Gazette has, it appears, received his bi-monthly budget from Cabul and Peshawur, and it contains, as usual, a contradiction of the rumours previously received. Notwithstanding the distraction which prevails in the Punjab, no effort has been made by the Affghans to take advantage of it by pouncing down on Peshawur and driving the Sikhs across the Indus. The report that Akbar Khan had reached Jellalabad, which was given with so much confidence, is contradicted. The rumour that serious differences existed between Maltomed Zeman Khan and Dost Mahomed, is said to want confirmation. It is now said for the first time, that Yar Mahomed, "the biggest scoundrel in Central Asia," the de facto ruler of Herat, had proposed a matrimonial alliance with Akbar Khan. The next Mail from Cabul will probably knock down this nine-pin also; for the good Samaritan is said to have as many wives already as the Prophet allows the faithful.

It has been found necessary to add to the strength of the Irregular Cavalry, in consequence of the "exigencies of the public service in Scinde," which like Affghanistan turns out to be a millstone on the neck of our finances. The detachment of the late Shah Soojah's mounted corps, commonly called Christie's horse, has therefore been formed into a corps "that will be speedily fit for immediate service." This corps will be styled the 9th Irregular Cavalry. The great recommendation of this measure, as stated in the General Orders, is, that it will occasion "an inconsiderate additional expense."

Another grand revolution in Asia has just transpired. The Englishman announces that intelligence has been received from Munnipore which can be relied on, that the Regent has been wounded by his brother, and that the young Rajah and his mother have taken refuge in Cachar, and claimed British protection. The whole place is in a state of anarchy and confusion and the "interference of Government will be required." Not a bit of it. We cannot send a Brigade to Munnipore, across the successive ranges of mountains, for less than ten lakhs of Rupees, and this sum the Governor General will assuredly not expend to furnish a guard of honour for the young Rajah and his mother. The money is wanted in Calcutta to pay off the five per cent. loan. Besides, our position in Munnipore is valuable only in reference to the politics of the Burmese Court; and the politics of Eastern Asia have been settled definitively for the next ten years by the treaty we compelled the Lord Paramount to sign under the walls of Nankin.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 16.

A Meeting of the subscribers to the monument proposed to be erected to the memory of the late Major Pottinger, was held at Bombay, on the 5th of February, when it was resolved, that the monument should be placed in St. Thomas' Cathedral, and that the subscription should be limited to the sum of 15 Rupees, which will enable all those who served with him in the Affgha campaign to testify their respect and esteem for his memory.

We are happy to learn that Mudkoor Sah, the son of the Thakoor of Narhut, the notorious outlaw, who was the chief abettor of the Saugor insurrection in 1842, has just been captured. I was he who butchered in cool blood six out of seven horsemen, and then attacked the rear guard of the party sent to arrest the murderers, when the unfortunate Capt. Ralfe fell. The Agra Ukhbar asks, whether he is to be hung or pensioned.

The same paper states, that the Dada Khas geewalla is to be brought down to Calcutta, to which place the dethroned Ameers of Scinde are also to be conveyed.

The Agra Ukhbar publishes the names of the officers who have been so fortunate as to be selected for staff appointment in the new Gwalior Contingent. The selections do great credit to the Governor General's judgment, and afford a new proof of his determination to bestow the prizes of the service as rewards for merit. Brigadier Orlando Stubbs, is to command the whole body and to be Governor of the Fortress of Gwalior.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 17.

The Madras Record, received this morning, states, that a rumour prevails at that Presidency, that Mr. Minchim will be appointed to the seat on the bench, vacant by the death of Sir John Norton; and hints that the influence which that gentleman possesses through family connections with the Chairman of the Court of Directors, gives the rumour the shape of probability.

A letter from Seebasgur in Assam, dated the 3d of last January, given in this day's Hurkaru states, that one of the largest flights of locusts ever remembered by the oldest inhabitant, had visited that part of the country.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY, 19.

The Bentinck, Steamer arrived off Calcutta yesterday afternoon with the Mails to the 6th of January, exactly in 42 days. She left Suez at 5 P. M. the 25th January, and has therefore accomplished the voyage in twenty-four days. According to the notice given in the Englishman, she appears to have been detained at Aden 38 hours; at Galle, 24; at Madras, 12, a little over three days, which would give her, between twenty and twenty-one days actual steaming. She has brought some copies of the London Mail and the London Times; but apparently no Mails. It is understood that, there are strict orders not to commit the Mails to our own Steamers. If this absurd rule had not been adopted, we should have been able to reply to all our letters by the Express which goes on Wednesday. We may thus lose a month. The Berenice with the Mails for Bombay, sailed from Suez six hours before the Bentnick, and though this latter vessel remained there thirty hours, the old slow coach had only just come up before she left it. We are very sorry to perceive that the Bentnick brings very few passengers.

The present Mail brings the confirmation of Mr. Cameron as Legislative Member of the Supreme Council. Mr. Millet, will soon be elevated to the same Board. Mr. Borradaile goes home, and Mr. Sutherland is dead. There remains therefore but one Commissioner, Mr. Elliott. For the individual members of that Commission, for their talents, and their zeal, we have the highest respect; but the fatal misdirection of its efforts has neutralized its value; and the Commission itself may be said to have been dead to all usefulness, even before it was dead to nature.

The Agra Ukhbar states, that the rabble honoured with the name of the Oude Army, is to be dismissed, and a large contingent force to be raised officered from our own army, on the modes of the Gwalior contingent. This would deprive our already under officered army of still larger portion of its European strength, which may be considered its life blood. It would be doubtless advantageous in creating some more staff appointments but we cannot see how the change would better the condition of the people. It is not a stronger army to coerce the cultivators with more vigor, which that country needs, but a more considerate and equitable government. Yet if Oude were well governed, the people would not be so eager to leave their homes and enlist in our army, and we might be cutting the sinews of our recruiting service.

The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette says, that Sir Charles Napier has recently made a requisition on the Government of Bombay for Chaplains. Our worthy contemporary says that the consolations of the Clergyman are as much needed as the attention of the Medical Officers in that deadly climate. Sir George Arthur is reported to have said, with the full concurrence of Lord Ellenborough, that he supposed Catholic Clergymen would be required as well as Protestants, and on Sir Charles Napier's replying in the affirmative, the Governor has sent home for a large supply of Catholic Priests.

The Agra Ukhbar announces, that the fifty-one cannons captured at the battle of Muharajpore, are to be sent forthwith to Calcutta to be turned into Stars for the breasts of the Army, and to be used in the Column of Victory.

TURN: AY, FEBRUARY 20.

The express from Bombay, came in early yesterday morning, but it had been anticipated by the Bentnick, nearly twenty-four hours. The Bombay Times Extra, acknowledges the superiority of this vessel over the Berenice, which she beat between Suez and Aden by 52 hours. We learn from the Hurkaru that the Bentnick would have made a better voyage, but for bad coal.

Several alarming statements relative to the health of Sir Charles Metcalfe having appeared in the papers brought by the present Mail, the Hurkaru applied to Dr. O'Shaughnessy who was recently in attendance on his Excellency professionally. His reply is the more satisfactory as the general impression in Calcutta was that the complaint was cancer.—Friend of India.

THE HOWRAH CHURCH.

By a misprint in our last issue we announced that the Novena at the Howrah Church, was to commence on the 4th proximo instead of on the first of March.

AGRA AUCTION MART, COMMISSION ROOMS, AND GENERAL AGENCY.

The undersigned, with much deference, beg to announce to the United Service, and Indian Public in general, that they have, this day, established themselves as above.

STOWELL AND Co.,

From JOHN MONRO AND Co.'s.

Agra, 1st December, 1843.

P. S.—We beg to state that the Senior Member only (Mr. R. D. Stowell) of our Firm came from Messrs. John Monro and Co. S. and Co.

With reference to the foregoing advertisement, we respectfully beg leave to state, that our establishment will be conducted by our Mr. R. P. Stowell, whose long and thorough experience in every branch of the above business, combined with the arrangements now effected, will, we trust, ensure to us the patronage and support of the Community at large, to whom we offer our humble services, and to whose wants and wishes we shall most faithfully apply our assiduous attention.

Our premises (No 50,) are situated in the centre of the Military Cantonments. EXTENSIVE, COMMODIOUS, and well secure GODOWNS, for every description of GOODS, CARRIAGES, HORSES, &c. &c., are attached.

The following will be our invariable charges of Commission, in the several departments of our Establishment, viz.

		COMMISSION.
AUCTION SALES, amounting to 10,000 Rupees, and upwards,.....	at 2½ per cent.
Ditto, amounting to 5,000 Rupees, and under 10,000,	at 5 per cent.
Ditto, on Articles of PLATE, WATCHES, JEWELLERY, CARRIAGES, HORSES, &c., UNDER the value of 5,000 Rupees,....	at 7½ per cent.
Ditto, Miscellaneous Articles,	at 9 per cent.
COMMISSION SALES, amounting to 10,000 Rupees, and upwards,....	at 2½ per cent.
Ditto, amounting to 5,000 Rupees, and under 10,000,	at 5 per cent.
Ditto, on Articles of PLATE, WATCHES, JEWELLERY, CARRIAGES, HORSES, &c., UNDER the value of 5,000 Rupees,	at 8 per cent.
Ditto Miscellaneous Articles,	at 9 per cent.

Auction Accounts Sale will be rendered monthly, and payable at sixty-one days' date. (For the accommodation of parties leaving the Station before Sales become due, they will be discounted at 1 rupee per cent.) Property sent for Auction or Commission Sale must be accompanied with a List of Articles, and written instructions as to their disposal. No Article will be received for Auction Sale at a fixed price, every thing sold at Auction must be sold to the highest bidder.

GENERAL AGENCY, including Landed Property of every description. On realizations of rents, (repairs and outlays of every kind inclusive,) Commission at 5 rupees per cent. will be charged. Orders from all parts of INDIA, and Commissions of every kind, will be duly attended to, with punctuality and despatch. GOODS and PARCELS forwarded to our care, will be examined, repacked, (if necessary), and forwarded to all parts: Commission at 5 rupees per cent, on amount disbursed, will be charged.

No GODOWN RENT will be charged for ware-housing for a period of 3 months, after which a trifling charge will be made.

STOWELL AND Co.,

From JOHN MONRO AND Co.'s.

Agra, 1st December, 1843.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 9.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, MARCH 2, 1844.

[Vol. VI.]

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 22.

A General Order has just been published by the Governor General, stating that in consideration of the demand for troops in Scinde, ten privates shall be added to each Company in the Regiments of Native Infantry of the Line on the Bengal and Bombay establishments. The army is thus raised to the same strength which was given to it when we were engaged in hostilities beyond the Indus. We are no longer therefore on a peace establishment; and the exigencies of the service are thus proclaimed to be as great as when we were encumbered with the Afghan war.

The same order, remands Captain Abbott, the Assistant in Nimar, and Lieuts. Maxwell and Thuillier, to regimental duties; and directs that Capt. J. D. Shakespear, Brevet Captain Mills, and Capt. Sir Richmond Shakespear, shall hold themselves disposable for Regimental duty, whenever their services may be required in the field. These orders are evidently dictated by the inadequacy of the present complement of Artillery Officers to the duties which fall on that arm; and they point out, in a manner not to be misunderstood, the necessity of augmenting it. The case of Captain Abbott, who acquired so distinguished a reputation by his courage, exertion and sufferings in Central Asia, is a very hard one. Colonel Outram succeeds Capt. Abbott; and is said, to have brought out his appointment in his pocket from home; but surely a post of 1000 Rs. a month in an obscure corner of India, is no adequate return for the services which he was enabled to render the state in the situation of high responsibility which he occupied in Scinde, while other officers who have occupied less conspicuous situations have received rewards of so much great value and dignity. If we suppose that this appointment is the result of order from England, we should be led to the conclusion that the Home Authorities concurred in that disparaging estimate which the Governor General has taken of his merits.

The Star says that the increase of the Army which we noticed yesterday, makes a total addition of 20,000 men. There seems to be an error of the first figure, which is probably typographical. We have 74, Bombay has 28 Regiments of the Line; an increase of 100 men to each, would give an augmentation of only 10,200. We are certain the public was not generally aware of the very small number of Artillery Officers absent on Staff employment; and it seems extremely harsh, that this branch of the service, which embraces so many men of distinguished attainments, should be debarred from its share of the prizes, which are so freely open to the Infantry, simply because the strength of the Artillery is not commensurate with its duties.

Proclamation was made at Lahore on the 2d February, that Muharajah Dulcep Singh had been placed on the throne, and Hieerah Singh appointed Prime Minister. It was also ordered that every one should illuminate his house on pain of having his face blackened and being drummed out of the city on a jackass, with his face to the tail. So the illumination was very splendid.

The Muharajah Jyagee Scindea has just been married at Gwalior, amidst rejoicings and pyrotechnic exhibitions. A lakh of Rupees were distributed among the brahmuns. But a more gratifying report than that of the royal nuptials, is that the Christian Officers of the Gwalior state, 270 in number, who were so summarily dismissed several months ago, have the assurance of receiving their arrears of pay through the kind intercession of Col. Sleeman.

The Khasgeewallah, the source of the disturbances which have ended in destroying the independence of the House of Scindea, has left Agra for Calcutta. He is to be a prisoner at large in Bengal, but will remain within the precincts of the ditch.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 24.

The Tenasserim Steamer left Calcutta on the 20th instant for Bombay, and it is supposed will come back with the Amcers of Scinde. What is the object of bringing within the neighbourhood of the Ditch, the parties who were the occasion of our interference in Scinde and Gwalior?

The Meeting at the Town Hall, to establish an Inland Steam Navigation Company, came off yesterday afternoon. Thirty gentlemen, European and Native, are said to have been present. It was resolved, that a Company be forthwith established, independently of the Tug Association.

Some farther information has been received regarding the Bokhara prisoners. It appears that strong reasons exist for supposing that Gen. Stoddart is alive, though the hope of Capt. Conolly's existence is more faint. Wolff will immortalize himself if he should find them alive and bring them off in safety.

A requisition has been sent to the Sheriff to call a Meeting of the Inhabitants of Calcutta, to prepare an address to the Governor General on his return to the Presidency. It is signed by one Member of the Sudder Board, two Judges of the Sudder, and thirty-three gentlemen, Merchants and Agents, two Hindoos and two Parsees.

The men of the 34th N. I. at Ferozepore have refused to march to Scinde, unless foreign service batta is guaranteed to them. It is also said that two companies of Native Artillery and another Regiment, the 4th, are of the same mind. This reluctance has sometimes been occasioned by the recent arrival at that Station of a number of invalids, in the most emaciated state after having lost a third of their number on the route.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 25.

A case of Manslaughter is now pending before the Chief Magistrate, in which Capt. John

See, the Commander of the Oriental, stands charged with Manslaughter, under peculiar circumstances. The charge was brought forward by the ship's crew immediately on the arrival of the vessel, who stated that one of their number was induced to throw himself overboard and was drowned in consequence of ill-treatment.

Capt. Macdonald, who was sent round from Moulsmein on a charge of shooting, after having in vain applied to be bailed, has been committed to take his trial at the Sessions. Mr. Martin, the party said to have been shot at, was also sent round by the Moulsmein authorities, but disappeared immediately after his arrival.

The number of covers brought by the Victoria Steamer to Bombay on the 11th instant was, 22,068; viz. 37,396 letters, and 44,667 covers. If this be the average of the monthly receipts, they already amount to One Million. The correspondence between England and India, and vice versa will soon reach two millions of letters and newspapers a year.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 27.

The Governor General landed at Barrackpore yesterday without any parade, from the Sonamoo, which had been sent up to Hooghly. The Star says, that his Lordship is to make a grand entry into Calcutta to-morrow morning, when all the troops in garrison are to be drawn out to receive him. The story of the triumphal arch, and the bamboos and the festoons, given in that paper, must be gratuitous.

The papers have announced with much pomp, that one of the new Infantry Caps has been sent out by Messrs. J. Barber and Co. of London, to Messrs. Burkinyoung and Co. Council-house-street, Calcutta, who have sent it across the road to Messrs. Tulloh and Co. where both this wonderful cap and a Cavalry helmet are objects of great attraction.

The little Steamer, Tindoor Castle is at length ready for starting. It will leave Calcutta to-morrow at 2 p. m. for Hooghly, and from Hooghly the next morning at 7. a. m. and this alternate voyage will be continued daily, if sufficient encouragement is afforded.

The last letters from Ferozepore state, that the 15th Regiment was still resolute not to proceed to Sukkur, but in other respects was quiet and orderly, and performed its duty as usual. Though this is the only Corps in open mutiny, there seems little doubt that the Artillery Companies are in the same mood.

The Star says that a rumour is strongly current respecting a large payment to be shortly made of the 5 per cents. It has long been suspected that the money now lying idle in the Treasury would be thus employed in reducing the public debt.

From the same source we learn, that the plan of a New Dock at Kidderpore capable of accommodating the largest Steamers, which had been proposed by Capt. Goodwyn, under Lord Ellenborough's directions, and submitted with his Lordship's strong recommendation to the Court of Directors, has been adopted. The cost will be £500,000.

A meeting was held yesterday afternoon at the Court, at which it was determined to send a congratulatory address to Lord Ellenborough on his return to the Presidency.—Friend

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE, INTALLY.

THE VERY REV. DR. KENNEDY, Principal.

St. John's College is designed chiefly to educate youth for the sacred ministry, for the Vicariate Apostolic of Bengal. The abundant benediction which it has pleased God to bestow on the mission of Bengal, the constantly increasing numbers of the Catholic community, and the necessity of establishing new missions in different parts of the Vicariate all demand that provision should be made here immediately, to educate candidates for the service of the sacred ministry, in order to multiply the number of labourers in the Vineyard of the Lord, and to secure a succession of good Pastors for the Vicariate.

The Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic, although for a long time deeply solicitous to secure for the Church of Bengal an advantage of such great moment for its permanent welfare, abstained from pressing the subject on the notice of his generous flock from a feeling, that the demands made on them, for the Orphanage and other charitable purposes, were as much as their circumstances would allow them to meet.

The same feeling would still prevent him from calling their attention to the subject, if through a singular manifestation of the Divine Goodness, a House and Demesne had not been placed at his disposal, (which cost the late Proprietor the immense sum of about 100,000 Rupees,) for the establishment of a College. The conditions annexed to this foundation are such, as the Archbishop confidently hopes can be complied with, so as to satisfy fully the wishes of the benevolent Founder, and, at the same time, secure for the Bengal Mission, an Institution, which, with the blessing of Heaven, will in a few years, send forth a holy and a learned Priesthood, qualified by their education and knowledge of the language and usages of the country, to be the Pastors of the faithful, and the Heralds of salvation, to those who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death.

As the Funds under the administration of the Archbishop suffice to provide for the education and support of six students, it is intended, as soon as circumstances permit, to select candidates for these scholarships, by concours, or according to merit to be ascertained by examination. For the present young men who have wholly or nearly completed their classical studies in some of the approved Seminaries of Great Britain and Ireland will be chosen, in order to attain more expeditiously the object for which the Seminary is established and to give time to the Anglo Indian Youth who aspire to the Priesthood, to make such a proficiency in the English, Greek and Latin languages and Mathematics, as will qualify them to complete for the above mentioned Scholarships. Due notice will be given to candidates, of the subject-matter of the examination to be undergone by them. In accordance with Catholic discipline testimonials of exemplary conduct and attention to the duties of religion, must be produced before any candidate is admitted to examination.

Such benefactions as the faithful may bestow on the Institution, will be employed in purchasing a suitable Library, in furnishing a Hall with the apparatus required for the Study of Natural Philosophy, in erecting such additional buildings as may be found necessary, and finally in founding free places for candidates for the sacred ministry, of distinguished piety and attainments.

In order to promote these important objects, and to assist in defraying the expenses of Institution, arrangements have been made for educating in St. John's College twelve young gentlemen not designed for the clerical profession at the monthly charge of thirty Rupees for each Boarder and of twenty-one for each day Boarder. The course of education will comprise the Greek and Latin Classics, French, Reading, Writing, Arithmetic, &c. English Grammar, Geography, History, the use of the Globes, Logic, Mathematics, Natural Philosophy, and the English language generally in use. No pupils will be received under six or beyond seventeen years of age.

Payment to be made quarterly in advance, and a month before each quarter is to be charged for in full. No extra charge will be made for Medicines and for the attendance of any other bodies the appointed Physicians of the Seminary. The monthly pension fixed for Boarders includes all charges for washing, and for the use of books and table and bedroom furniture.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 10.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, MARCH 9, 1844.

[VOL. VI.]

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 29.

Yesterday, the second anniversary of Lord Ellenborough's arrival in India, his Lordship left Barrackpore by water, and entered Calcutta with official state. The official community had been invited to meet the Governor General, and the Veranda of Government House presented a crowded scene. He shook hands with three or four of those who happened to be in his path, and hastened onwards till he was lost in the Council Chamber. The assembled visitors followed him to the Marble Hall where it had been usual for the Head of the Government on such occasions, to move round, and give a bow to one, a shake of the hand to another, a kind enquiry to a third, and a cheerful smile to all. Half an hour of these slight but courteous attentions has usually been bestowed on the Ditchers; but on the present occasion, the mob, finding that they were no longer wanted, dispersed. What his Lordship did in the Council Chamber will doubtless appear in due time.

The Bombay Times has taken advantage of the occasion furnished by a rumour that its subscription list had suffered from its having given insertion to some letters reflecting on the conduct of the officers in Scinde in reference to the Zenana of the Ameers, to publish a statement of its gain and loss through the year. The accession of subscribers has been 316, the diminution 278, leaving a clear increase of 38, and more it would be unreasonable for him to expect after he has booked 1200. But what a picture of the mutations in Indian Society does it present; at this rate the whole body of his subscribers would be changed in a little more than four years.—The Star having gone a head during the year at a kind of railway pace, has also published the result of its losses and gains; and the account stands thus; gain 501, loss 256—clear gain 245. He may therefore mark the year with a white stone.

The 9th Light Cavalry, which acquired so much distinction by its gallantry at Meanee and Hyderabad, has returned to its own Presidency. Sir Charles Napier has issued a short and expressive address in General Orders, in which he says "it returns to its Presidency full of fame, and with standards that bear the records of its glory."

The Windsor Castle Steamer made her first trip to Hooghly yesterday, and returned this morning. She will continue thus to ply between Calcutta and Hooghly daily, till it is found that the undertaking does not pay. From the number of passengers we saw on board, we fear, that discovery will come earlier than could be wished. She is a noble vessel; is very elegantly fitted up, and made very good way against the stream, and if she could be kept on this line, would afford the greatest possible convenience to the residents above Calcutta.

The Hurkaru of this morning has the latest account from Ferozepore, the scene of the mutiny. The letter says, "depend on it, that if Government don't give way, the sepoys will not move." "It is a bad thing when soldiers dictate to their own Government, but most people think they are right on this occasion. When told that Scinde now belonged to us and that they were not on foreign service, they replied, and Bokhara may belong to you in a few years, and then we must go there also."

FRIDAY, MARCH 1.

The first Act of the Governor General on his return to the seat of Government was to grant to the troops who fought at Meanee and Hyderabad, Muharajpore and Punniar, six months' batta. Though it is not usual to give such a gratuity on the occasion of a single battle, yet we are certain the order will be cordially welcomed by the brave troops. The order farther directs that all the troops who have served in Scinde for a twelve-month, commencing with the 28th of February 1843, shall also receive a gratuity of six months' batta. Though we were not admitted into the Council Chamber, we are greatly disposed to think that this was the proposal with which his Lordship hastened to his Council. The Hurkaru seems to think—and the conjecture is probable—that it is intended as a sop in the pan; that it is a sort of indirect method of propitiating the Native Regiments ordered for service on the Indus. If so, we much admire the wisdom which dictated it. If it meets the present crisis, if it averts a mutiny in the front of the Punjab, who will say that the means are not as commendable as the end? It is too late to discuss the wisdom of incorporating Scinde with the empire, or of cutting down the batta of the troops. We have to deal with a practical evil, which requires a prompt remedy, and the money is well bestowed if it obviates the necessity of concession which would cut the sinews of military authority, or a sanguinary attack on our own troops.

The Agra Ukhbar states that it is the intention of Government to make a severe example of the refractory 64th Regiment, and that it has been marched away from the frontier only for this purpose. The Hurkaru on the contrary states that this Regiment has already begun to shew symptoms of being ashamed of its conduct, and has now actually volunteered for service in Scinde.

Letters from Jhansi mentioned that a Brigade including the Bundelkund Legion has been detached against a number of petty forts in the Khachwagar district, the original owners of which, on hearing of the defeat of the Mahrattas at Muharajpore and Punniar, had resumed forcible possession of them. All the forts were found to be evacuated.

We are happy to learn, that Dr. John Grant, so well known to the society of Calcutta, is about to be appointed Examining Physician to the East India Company on £800 a year.

SATURDAY, MARCH 2.

The Delhi Gazette states, that despatches had been forwarded from Delhi, the Head Quarters of Sir Hugh Gough, to Ferozepore, giving the mutin-Regiment the alternative of going at once to India without batta, or being visited with the severest punishment which can be inflicted upon an insubordinate corps. It is farther stated, that the 14th N. I. had volunteered to go to Scinde, but both statements want confirmation.

The Second Criminal Sessions for the present year was opened yesterday. Sir John Grant charged the Grand Jury, and congratulated them on the probability of their having little or nothing to do. And true enough they got through all the bills by five in the afternoon, and were immediately discharged.

MONDAY, MARCH 4.

The long expected orders of the Court of Directors were promulgated in last Saturday's Calcutta Gazette relative to the acquisition of the remanular tongue of the Sepoys by their officers. No officer is to receive the command of a Company who has not shewn upon examination that he is fully able to converse with his men. It is only remarkable how an order so essential to the efficiency of the army could have been delayed so long.

Letters from Ferozepore of the 19th February state, that the 7th Cavalry, which has been ordered to Scinde, was to come in on the following morning. It was generally believed that all the corps ordered to that country sympathize with the mutinous 34th, and that no regiment will march until the double batta for foreign service is granted.

Letters from Sukker of the 9th February state, that the weather had become delightful; a fresh north-easter was blowing all day. Sir Robert and Lady Sale, and Mrs. Sturt, were to leave the station shortly on their way to Bombay to embark for England. Sickness was, it seems, rapidly diminishing; yet the troops were pleased at the idea of leaving a place which had proved the death of so many of their companions.

Lord Ellenborough gave a farewell dinner party Sir W. Casement on Friday last, when about eighty sat down to table. In proposing the health of Sir William, the Governor General paid a just pliment to the long and meritorious services, to the private worth of the gallant General, has been identified with the measures of the society of Calcutta for more than twenty years.

TUESDAY, MARCH 5.

The prospect of obtaining a cargo of ice from the Arctic appears to have quickened the movement of the Ice Committee at Bombay. The motion which had begun to flag from the prospect of a larger sum has been revived, and it is now proposed that the original sum of 10,000 be increased to 15,000, but that even a larger sum

LeBas having retired from the office of Hayleybury College, a man calls upon the Members of the Civil Service to form a subscription for the purpose of obtaining a first rate portrait of him from a first rate artist, and presenting it to his family to remain as an heir loom; and having it engraved on steel for the subscribers.

The Madras papers state, that the cost of sending the 47th Regiment to Bombay, where from its mutinous state it is worse than useless, has been little short of one lakh of Rupees.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 6.

The Madras papers of the 24th reached Calcutta yesterday the 5th. The distance the post has to travel, is 1060 miles. The Delhi papers of the same date reached Calcutta on the 1st instant, the distance between the two place being 900. There is something defective in the post office arrangement of the south, or a difference of 160 miles would not cause a delay of four days.

The Madras papers received a day or two ago, affirmed that the Hindustan Steamer refused to take any packages for Madras, under an apprehension that if the vessel reached that port on Sunday, she must either submit to a day's detention in consequence of Mr. Underwood's decision, or take the cases on to Galle and land them there. We now learn that the Bentinck took 50 tons and the Hindustan 150 tons of goods from Madras upon the late passages. But for the accident which happened to the Hindustan, it is much to be feared that she would have reached Madras on Sunday.

The Governor General has fixed on Thursday the 14th of March for the entertainment which the Civilians offered to give last year. The Star is justly shocked at this profanation of Lent, and calls for our assistance to prevent it, but we fear that the Editor of that paper and of this paper are perhaps the two individuals who have least influence in a certain quarter. We should like to know who drew up the advertisement in which the entertainers, instead of being styled the members of the Civil Service, are whimsically called the Civil members of the Society of Calcutta, as though there was no civility out of the Civil Service.—Friend of India.

APRIL OVERLAND MAIL.—The latest safe day for the transmission of letters from Calcutta per Steamer to leave Bombay on the 1st proximo, will be Tuesday, the 19th instant.

The Packets for Suez and the intermediate Ports (Madras, Ceylon and Aden) to be despatched by the Steamer Bentinck, appointed to leave Calcutta on the 15th instant, will be closed, at the Post Office, on Thursday, the 14th instant.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Subscriptions for the Bengal Catholic Herald received:—
 Mrs. Cruick, Purneah, Nov. and Dec. 1843. .. Re. 2
 Rev. J. Brown, Kamptee, to Dec. 1844. 12
 Monar, Talhouarn, Chanderagore, to Dec. 1844. 10
 J. F. Moran, Cagmarra, to December. 1844. 10
 W. Vincent, Cawnpore, to Feb. 1845. 10
 R. Doucet, Dacca, to December. 1844. 15
 H. Fitzgerald, Tirhoot, to June. 1844. 10
 Rev. M. Barbe, Chittagong, to Nov. 1844. 10
 Mrs. M. R. Grey, Natpore, to Dec. 1844. 10
 T. D. Freitas, Chittagong, from July, 1843, to June. 1844. 20

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 11.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, MARCH 16, 1844.

[VOL. VI.]

THURSDAY, MARCH 7.

The Act making all Lotteries illegal,—except those which have the sanction of Government,—has just passed into a law.

We never remember any Lent, in which the citizens of Calcutta were less disposed to put up with Lenten fare. In the list of public engagements, we have two public dinner parties and two plays and concerts for every sermon of the Archdeacon. The Bishop's presence in Calcutta is sadly missed. When the see was first established, and Bishop Middleton came to Calcutta, Mrs. — had made arrangements for a grand ball and supper in Lent, which the Bishop induced her, though with much reluctance, to postpone. She thought his Lordship very unreasonable in not putting off Lent to gratify a friend.

The conduct of the 7th Regular Cavalry appears in a very aggravated light, from the statement of the Delhi Gazette. It seems that the Commander led his men through Perozepore, that they might not hold communication with the mutinous 68th, and halted seven or eight miles on the road to Seinde, but the plan did not succeed. On Tuesday morning, the 23th, the troops decidedly and peremptorily refused to proceed, unless extra batta was guaranteed to them by Government. The European and Native commissioned and non-commissioned Officers then began their march, to the number of 80, with the colors of the Regiment, in the hope of shaming the troopers, but they would not be deceived. After proceeding a mile or two, the Officers were obliged to return. The Agra Ukhbar however says that 200, including the Officers, thus marched on. Three European Officers offered to guarantee the batta from their own pay. The 63d has volunteered to march to Seinde on any terms Government may choose to fix. The 68th was expected to immediately, and it was hoped would not exhibit any insubordination.

Her Majesty having been informed by the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, that the booty taken at Kheilat did of right belong to her, in virtue of her royal prerogative, has been graciously pleased to order it to be distributed as prize money, one-half to the Company, the other half to the troops who took Kheilat. As a large portion of it was lost at sea, the sum now to be divided does not greatly exceed one lakh and sixty thousand Rupees, from which the sum of eight thousand three hundred is to be deducted as Stamp dues and charges. What under current of private interest has quickened the distribution of this prize property, while booty captured twenty-five years ago still lingers in the Treasury?

The Agra Ukhbar states, that the Lieut. Governor of Agra will remain some time surveying the line of the New Canal, with a view of reporting to Government in what time, and to what extent, and at what expense it can be completed, as well as the revenue it is likely to yield. Now that the Treasury is so full that Government can afford to give away thirty lakhs of Rupees, in one order as batta to the troops, we wish it would catch a canal fever. What a glorious achievement for Lord Ellenborough's administration to have commenced a canal from Calcutta to Rajmahal, and from Allahabad to Hurdwar, thereby giving us a continuous line of uninterrupted navigation from the snowy range to the ocean! What a magnificent dividend both of money and reputation would it yield.

The Court of Directors have continued the suspension for the further period of two years of the execution of the provisions of the Act of 3d and 4th of William the 4th, Chapter 85 Sect. 38—which means that the Government of Agra is to remain upon its present footing for two years to come; and so we suppose its existence will be prolonged by successive leases of life of two years a piece, till the year 1854, when the whole frame of the Indian Government will be taken to pieces and reconstructed.

FRIDAY, MARCH 8.

The Windar Castle has ceased to ply between Calcutta and Hooghly, for want of sufficient encouragement. The Harkara questions whether the experiment has been fairly tried. We fear there is little hope of a separate employment for such a vessel on this line for some years to come. If Lord Wellesley's plan of making Barrackpore his permanent residence, and of collecting the Members of Council, and all the Government offices around him in the neighbourhood of the Park, had been carried into execution, we should long since have had a regular stern communication between that official town and the commercial metropolis; but there are not residents enough above Calcutta to pay a Steamer, more especially since good eight oared baulchs may be hired for a whole family for two or three Rupees.

There has been another strike at Perozepore. The 68th refuses to go on to Seinde without the guarantee of the extra batta. The 4th, 34th and 68th Infantry, the 7th Cavalry and the Foot Artillery,—Native we suppose—are now said to be in a state of open mutiny, and what is worse, their demands are reasonable. It is fortunate that just at this awkward crisis, the Punjab is menaced with an Afghan invasion, and that all idea of a rising among the Beloochees has died away.

SATURDAY, MARCH 9.

Some time since, the command of the Hyderabad Subsidiary Force having become vacant, it was understood that the Governor General left the nomination of a successor to the Governor of Madras; and his Lordship nominated Major General Showers, who had just completed his tour of Divisional Command. Many objections were raised to such an appointment, and it is now stated in the Madras papers, that Lord Ellenborough has disapproved of the nomination, and that Major General Wahab will accordingly be appointed to the vacancy.

Accounts from China to the 3d of February had been received. An Ordinance has been passed which renders all her Majesty's subjects within the dominions of the Empire of China, or on any vessel at a distance of not more than a hundred miles from the coast of China, subject in all matters to the Law of England, and to the Courts established at Hongkong. Macao will be taken to be within the dominions of the Emperor of China, for all the purposes of the ordinance. — A party of European Officers having gone into the interior of the country to visit the town of Chang-chew-foo, on the understanding that no objections would be raised by the Chinese authorities, and his Excellency the Governor General of the Peking and Che-Keang provinces having remonstrated with Sir Henry Pottinger on this instruction of the 6th Article of the Supplementary Treaty, His Excellency has severely reprimanded the Acting Consul at Amoy, Mr. Gribble, on the occasion, and Major General D'Aguilar, the Commandant of the Forces in China, has threatened the transgressors, if Officers of the army, with the most serious consequences. — The Emperor had spent eight days in consultation with the Members of his Privy Council, and the Board of Punishment, in weighing the case of the criminals convicted of heinous offences. The number condemned to death exceeded Five Hundred.

MONDAY, MARCH 11.

Among the items of intelligence from China we have the denunciation by Sir Henry Pottinger of certain smuggling transactions in silk at the Port of Shanghai. His Excellency says it would be strange if with the extraordinary powers vested in her Majesty's Chief Superintendent, means cannot be devised to put a stop to practices which must ruin the legal trade, and which are a stain on the national faith and character of England. But while his Excellency is thus reprobating a small contraband transaction in silk, the great contraband traffic in Opium is carried on with perfect impunity, both in the Canton river and along the coast, to the extent of two or three millions sterling a year.

TUESDAY, MARCH 12.

The Bombay papers mention another act of noble generosity on the part of Sir Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy. He proposes to devote a lakh and twenty thousand Rupees to the construction of works for supplying the city of Poona with water, on condition that Government will provide for their permanent maintenance.

The D. du Globe last received states that the Commander-in-Chief has taken the most active measures for removing the mutinous corps from the frontier. The 7th Light Cavalry marched for Loodiana, on the 29th ultimo. The 34th were sent off to Meerut on the 2d March. The 69th was in statu quo; and the 4th it appears has not mutinied, partly perhaps because it has not been asked to go to Seinde. The determination of the Supreme Government on this unfortunate business was not known.

Lord Saltoun reached Calcutta yesterday in H. M. S. Dido, and landed under the usual salute.

His Lordship proceeds to England in the Ben-look.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 13.

A large number of Gentlemen, European and Native, met at the Town-Hall last evening, and at 5 o'clock proceeded from thence to the Government house, headed by the High Sheriff. The deputation were received with a guard of honor in the great hall on the third floor, and a few minutes after their arrival, Lord Ellenborough, in the full Windsor uniform, and attended by his suite, entered the hall to meet the deputation. The band struck up "God save the Queen," after which the High Sheriff with a few introductory sentences, proceeded to read the Address, which was as follows: —

MY LORD, — We, the undersigned Inhabitants of Calcutta, beg to present our hearty congratulations on your Lordship's return to the Presidency, after the accomplishment of the great objects that called you hence to Upper Hindoostan. That those objects should have been so promptly and so triumphantly attained, is a matter of national concernment; to us it is doubly gratifying, inasmuch as it enables your Lordship to direct the energies of a powerful mind towards measures of internal benefit, — second only in real importance, to those affecting political security.

The presence of the Head of this Colonial Empire at the seat of Government, is so essential in every way to its prosperity, as to make it but natural that we should bear even his necessary absence with something like impatience, and hail his return with the warmest expression of satisfaction. That your Lordship's residence amongst us may be continued — that no State emergency may again demand your personal care in other parts of this wide Territory — must always be our earnest desire. It will be our study to make that residence, as much a matter of choice as it is of public expediency.

We have, &c.

His Lordship then, in a clear and audible tone, read out the following written reply: —

GENTLEMEN, — I thank you for your congratulations on my return to the Presidency, after the accomplishment of the great objects, which the courage and discipline of the Army have enabled me so promptly to effect.

It will be most gratifying to me, should the state of India permit me, to prolong my residence amongst you in this City, which must ever possess so much of intrinsic importance as the Commercial Capital of Bengal; but it is necessary, that the Head of the Government should place himself wherever his presence may, at the time, appear to be calculated to produce most benefit to the general interests of the Empire; and I must never allow any personal consideration to interfere with the performance of this public duty.

I assure you, however, that the friendliness of the expressions with which you have now welcomed my return, will tend much to increase my regret, should I be again compelled to leave you. — Friend of India. ELLENBOROUGH.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

JOE will have his doubts satisfactorily removed by referring to our Pages 192 and 205 vol. iv.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 12.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, MARCH 23, 1844.

[Vol. VI.]

THURSDAY, MARCH 14.

Last night's Calcutta Gazette contains the Order of Government, which is intended to remove the misunderstanding which is apprehended to exist in the army relative to the allowances to be drawn by the troops serving in Scinde. It would have done wonders a month ago, when that misunderstanding was first discovered. It will not of course restore the confidence of Government and of the Officers in the mutinous corps; but it may arrest the progress of disaffection, and lead to the volunteering of Regiments for that service.

The Hurkaru states, on good authority, that Sir William Casement, who had taken his passage in the Windsor, has relinquished it, and retains his seat in Council at the earnest request of Lord Ellenborough, in consequence of the critical position of affairs on both banks of the Sutledge,—a pretty clear indication that his Lordship has at length learnt to appreciate the value of his Council, and will not be so anxious to separate himself from it as he appears to have been.

From the same paper we learn, that Major Ouseley, having resigned the office of Superintendent of the Mysore Princes, on going home, the office is to be bestowed on Capt. Mackintosh, and that the salary is to be cut down to 1000 Rupees a month, though the labor is to be trebled, by throwing upon the new functionary the superintendence of the Ameers of Scinde and of the Khaseewalla.

FRIDAY, MARCH 15.

It quite escaped us at the time to notice from the Delhi Gazette, that a Sutte has just taken place at Gwalior. This has occurred since the establishment of our paramount power in that state, and in spite of the remonstrance of Col. Sleeman, the Resident. It was confidently expected, that the subjection of the Gwalior Raj to our authority would certainly be accompanied with the extinction of this abominable rite. It was supposed that, the Governor General would have made it one of the stipulations of the treaty, that female immolation should cease. But it seems that while our own political interests have been carefully attended to, the interests of humanity have been sadly neglected, though it would have been as easy to have constrained the prostrate durbar to agree to this prohibition as to abolish Slavery in Scinde. But what shall we say to the astounding fact, that while Muharajpore and Punnar, are yet, fresh in the recollections of the Regent, the earnest entreaty of the British Resident, that a Sutte might be stopped, has been treated with contempt? The Home Authorities will surely agree one day that the local Government was not allowed to complete the work of incorporation, when our armies were in the field.

The Star gives an important letter from Mauritius relative to the state of the labour Market at that Island, as affected by the recent immigration of coolies from India. The account is somewhat startling. It states that upwards of 8000 negro labourers are employed on the plantations. The number emancipated not ten years ago, exceeded 50,000. What has become of the other 42,000? It also states that of those who emigrated from India before 1839, and who were understood to be more in number than 30,000, about 12,000 are still in the island. We have not made any memorandum of the successive batches of coolies which have returned, but it does not appear to tally with our recollections that anything like half the number, of 18,000, can have come back. As we do not send a copy of the Friend to the Island, perhaps the Star will ask his Correspondent to account for the remainder of the coolies and negroes.

The Hurkaru gives a letter from Ferozepore of the 5th, which says, the troops which have refused to move are the 7th Cavalry, the Horse and Foot Artillery, the 34th, 69th and 4th N. I.; the latter corps is said to be as bad as the 64th. Of course none of the mutinous corps will be allowed to go into Scinde, but will be visited with some special mark of the displeasure of Government, which will long continue to distinguish them from the rest of the army. There can be little doubt, we should think, that the concession so wisely and graciously made by Government on the 12th, will produce the most favourable result through the army, and induce more corps to volunteer than have now held back. The refractory corps cannot be expected for a long time to come to be entrusted with the honour of the British flag in the field.

SATURDAY, MARCH 16.

We are happy to learn that a Light House at present being erected for the benefit of Shipping interest on the Chittagong Coast, the island of Kootubdea, thirty miles from the Port. The expense is to be defrayed by Government out of the Port dues, 25,000 Rs. have already been sanctioned for the purpose. It will be found very useful not only in protecting the shoals, in its immediate neighbourhood, but as a beacon for vessels making the Coast from the West and the South. The lantern is to be upwards of 100 feet high. It is intended to erect a smaller light, at the mouth of the Chittagong river, where there are several dangerous shoals.

The number of letters sent from Bombay the 1st instant, rather falls short of the monthly quantity. The letters amounted to 28,673, and the papers to 8,701. This diminution, as we believe, is owing to a large transmission of letters and papers to Hindoostan from Calcutta and Madras.

month of February. As we have before stated, the Home Government positively prohibits the transmission to India of Mail packets, and as far as possible of private letters, by the Hindoostan and the Bentinsk. But the Government of India makes up a Mail on every occasion, and if we have been rightly informed, 7000 letters and papers were sent by the vessel which left us in February.

MONDAY, MARCH 18.

The Englishman understands it to be generally believed, that the Governor General will soon return to the Provinces; the North West Provinces we suppose—and that the offices which usually furnish sections of their "bodies corporate" will proceed by water as soon as the state of the river permits, so as to meet his Lordship at the commencement of the cold season. All reports, says our contemporary, point to the Punjab as the destined scene of operations. It is rather early after the return of the establishments, before they have been three weeks in town, to make preparations for their being again transported to the West.

The Hindoostan Steamer, reached Galle on the 23d February, eight days after leaving the Sand Heads. She left that port the following day for Aden.

From the Hurkaru we learn that the Commander-in-Chief was expected at the frontier shortly. It was reported that he would bring with him the 2d European Regiment. The 1st European Light Infantry at Loodiana, and the 31st Foot at Ferozepore, have been ordered to stand fast till further orders. This looks as though some severe retribution was intended for the refractory regiments, which they will most sincerely deserve. It is to be hoped that the concession of full batta to the troops, by a declaratory Notification and the enlargement of compensation money, as well as the gratuities given to the troops which have served in Scinde already, backed with the exercise of severe discipline under the immediate eye of the Commander-in-Chief, will serve to restore the tone of obedience in the Native army.—Friend of India.

ARRIVAL OF THE FEBRUARY MAIL.

The Express, with the Mail of the 6th February, arrived at 11-30 P. M. on Thursday night.

Among the prominent events are the Queen's speech—the trial of Mr. O'Connell, in which the defence had been commenced—the supercession of Lieut. Munro, who has not appeared to his trial, and is believed to have left the country, the recovery of Mr. Gubbins, and the election of Mr. Oliphant to a seat in the East India Direction. Mr. J. F. Davis succeeds Sir H. Pottinger in China, and Mr. Roebuck has announced his intention to move for a Committee of Enquiry into the Scinde War. The Chief Justiceship of Hong Kong has been refused by no less than three members of the English bar. Mr. Montagu is appointed Treasurer of Hong Kong. The Calcutta Mail of December had not reached London on the 6th February. One of the letters which contain the letters had been between Marcellus and Paris. The news has been considerable. The Marquis of Salisbury, Sir Francis and Lady Burdett, Sir Hudson Lowe, the Duke of Saxe Cobourg, and the Earl of Desborough and Lady Wigram. General Bertrand, the faithful adherent of Napoleon, died at Chateauroux on the 1st February. The Duke of Wellington has conferred an Ensigny in the 15th Foot, without purchase, on Mr. Christopher Seyers, whose brother, Mr. Henry Knight Seyers, of the 31st, gallantly led the storming party through the Tzezen Pass, in Afghanistan, and lost, through death, the promotion which he had earned.

The proceedings against O'Connell and other traversers were resumed on 5th January, by the reduction of the special panel from 48 to 24, the traversers removing those persons least favorable to their cause; the Council for the Crown doing the same, by striking off every Roman Catholic from the list.

The address of the Attorney-General, though a simple statement of the case, occupied between twelve and thirteen hours.

When the learned gentleman sat down, the astonishment of the public was clearly manifested—that of the bench but ill concealed. He had pledged himself to expose "one of the most wicked conspiracies ever planned to destroy an empire," but it was clear he was unprepared with any startling revelation—he had no deserter from the camp to disclose the dark doings of the traitors. The witnesses established the facts stated by the Attorney General, adding in every instance that the public meetings were conducted in the most orderly manner.

The defence was opened by Mr. Sheil, on the part of Mr. John O'Connell, who delivered one of the most splendid addresses ever heard at the Irish bar—it has not been equalled since the days of Curran. In our judgment, it may be considered the speech of his life; and, strange to say, this is in some degree attributable to the severe indisposition under which he laboured.

We must pass unnoticed the speeches of Messrs. Moore, Hatchel, M'Donough, Whiteside, Henn, and Fitzgibbon, merely remarking that the Attorney-General, having taken offence at something which had fallen from the latter gentleman, took occasion, during a short adjournment of the Court, to send him a challenge without even waiting till he had concluded his speech. The Attorney-General was reprimanded by the Court, and the following appeared in the journals of the same evening.

"TO SIR ROBERT PEEL, BART.

"Traversers' Bar, Queen's Bench, Jan. 30.

"Sir,—Having had great practice in restoring the peace of Ireland among the Terry Aits and Whitescet among their midnight woods, and bogs and morasses, and mountains, during the two insurrections, I hereby volunteer my services in trying to prevent Her Majesty's Irish Attorney-General, the first law officer of the Crown (an office held by the virtuous Norbury) from using and threatening physical force and violence in the Court of Queen's Bench, where Her Majesty is presumed to be present in person.

"I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

"THOMAS STEEL.

"O'Connell's Head Pacifier of Ireland."

The Chronicle says, that the Attorney General means to tender his resignation. The Times calls for Mr. Smith's removal.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 13.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, MARCH 30, 1844.

[VOL. VI.

THURSDAY, MARCH 21.

The accounts in the papers from Ferozepore represent the troopers of the 7th Cavalry, which had been ordered to Umbala, as expecting to be disbanded, and very indifferent about their fate. The 64th on its way to Scinde fell in with the refractory 34th moving back to Kurnal, but that repentant regiment did not falter in its resolution. A letter received from the banks of Sutlege, informs us that the 34th has repented also, and begs now unconditionally to be led down to Scinde. This will we suppose prevent its being disbanded.

FRIDAY, MARCH 22.

The intelligence from Ferozepore is still unsatisfactory. The 4th and 69th continue refractory, and even the repentance of the 34th and 64th has not produced the effect of breaking their mutinous spirit. The 4th is by far the most outrageous of the Infantry Regiments. It is true the men were provoked by the very injudicious conduct of the inexperienced Ensign Young, but their insubordination was of an earlier date, and the resentment manifested for the attack made by that officer on one sepoy, would not have been of so ferocious a character if the minds of the men had not been in a very inflammable state. The orders which have been sent up to disband the mutinous corps will now apply to the 4th, the 69th N. I. and 7th Cavalry.

The draft of a very important Act has just been published. It provides for the sitting of single Judges of the Supreme Court for the despatch of criminal business; an arrangement which could not be effected but by a Legislative enactment. It also enables the Court to dispose of every kind of business out of term time. The importance of having a local Legislature with power to pass laws on such and other matters in reference to the Supreme Court, by which the administration of justice may be improved, has been peculiarly apparent in the present case; for this obvious improvement, application must otherwise have been made to Parliament, which has more than enough to do with O'Connell and Cobden; the Repeal of the Union and the Repeal of the Corn Laws.

SATURDAY, MARCH 23.

Sir Lawrence Peel's absence from the sitting of the Supreme Court yesterday morning, was occasioned by the melancholy intelligence brought by the last Mail of the death of his brother, Lieut. J. H. Peel, R. N. at the Isle of Wight.

A portion of H. M. 2d. or Queen's Royals, have had a narrow escape from a watery grave. They embarked at Cambay on the evening of the 3d instant for Bombay, but at four the next morning were awaked by loud cries that the vessel was sinking. She had sustained some injury from striking against the anchor of another vessel, and before the alarm was given, was half filled with water. Fortunately, another Pattimar was at hand, and the men, in number thirty, and Capt. Graham and his family were transferred to her with all the articles which were on deck; every thing below was lost.

The Steam frigate Sesostris has arrived at Bombay from China in twenty-four days, one of the shortest passages ever known. The same vessel left Bombay on the 26th December, with the monsoon against her, and was thirty-five days in making the trip. The journals in China allow twenty-four days for the conveyance of the Mails from Galle to Hong-Kong, and it will appear that they are not far from the mark; in favourable weather the trip will occupy less than that time with a contrary monsoon a little more.

Sir Robert and Lady Sale and Mrs. Sturt have arrived at Bombay from Kerachec, and arrangements were in progress to give a suitable entertainment to the Hero and Heroine. Col. Squire commands the station of Sukkur, and Col. Vigors, H. M. 13th L. I.

A most melancholy accident has just deprived the service of two fine and promising Officers, Lieut. Sanders of the 21st N. I. and Lieut. Mackenzie of the 22d. They were out in a cutter with five brother Officers yesterday afternoon, in a north-wester, not of particular vehemence. The vessel was carrying too much sail, became apparently unmanageable, and at length upset and sunk immediately. Vessels hastened to the rescue of the sufferers, five of whom were picked up and saved, but Lieut. Sanders who could not swim sunk to rise no more; and Lieut. Mackenzie, who is said to have been a dexterous swimmer, got entangled, it is supposed, with the mainsheet or tackling, and shared the same lamentable fate. There was evidently something wrong in the management of the vessel, or the party may have become confused in the moment of danger; for, to all appearance, the vessel would have righted at any time by letting go, or cutting, or lowering the main sheet.

MONDAY, MARCH 25.

Great uncertainty appears to hang over the movements as well as the objects of Akbar Khan. It has been reported to the Delhi Gazette that Peshawur is to be resigned to him in consideration of his aiding the Seiks in offensive operations against the British Government; but this is highly improbable. He can afford them no aid which can be of any value; and Heera Sing will not readily agree to relinquish so fair a province beyond the Indus. It appears highly probable that he has actually entered the Khyber, though the report of his having reached Jumrood is premature. A letter has been written from the Lahore Durbar to the good Samaritan and his father, in all simplicity, to ask why they have advanced to the Khyber.

Papers have been received from Moulmein to the 20th. The little settlement appears to be in a ferment. The Commissioner is anxious to improve the town by constructing a Strand of two hundred feet in breadth along the bank of the river, clear of houses. There can be no doubt that this would be a very great improvement; but it is said that he wishes to remove the occupants without compensation: and a letter published in the Hurkaru, evidently from one of the opposition has the following very silly remarks: "There is some property belonging to Europeans, and those plague spots have caused all the trouble; for the fellows are mostly Englishmen, and have some crude notions of right, which I have heard are peculiar to those islanders, and they cannot be flattered or frightened out of their opinions." This is nonsense. Government has a full right to take whatever land may be necessary for public objects, and the proprietors have a full right to compensation, not on their own fancies, but upon a fair and just valuation.

A Report was published some time ago that fifty men of the 6th Irregular Cavalry had deserted on their way to Scinde. The Agra Akbar, we are happy to find, contradicts the report, and states that no men have deserted, and that the regiment has continued its march onward in the steadiest manner possible.

Government, as we learn from the Hurkaru, has resolved to establish Small Pox Hospitals in various parts of the town; but the violence of this disorder is gone for the year.

TUESDAY, MARCH 26.

H. M. Ship Cornwallis, with Vice Admiral Sir W. Parker, G. C. B. on board, has arrived at Kedgeree. The Ganges Steamer has gone down to bring up his Excellency, who has received the most distinguished reception at all the settlements at which he has called on his way from China to Calcutta. It remains to be seen whether the Civil portion of Society will do themselves honour by getting up a public entertainment on this occasion. One of the first matters which meets the eye of the Naval hero of China is the report just brought of the reasons why the Ministry did not make him a Baronet for his services. It is to be hoped that long before his return to England his claim to this honour will be recognized.

This day's Hurkaru contains another pretentious example of the inestimable wisdom and incalculable blessing of English law. A number of seamen have deserted from H. M. ship Dido, and been received and concealed on board the Elizabeth Jane. An officer in her Majesty's service went on board that vessel to seek for them, when the chief officer denied that they were on board. On due search being made, they were found concealed in the cargo in the hold. The case was brought before the Police, when the Magistrates delivered the following strictly legal, but not the less absurd judgement. A punch house-keeper could be punished by fine for harbouring deserters from the Navy, but the Master of a vessel who committed the same crime could not be punished. A Justice of the Peace is authorized to punish any person who harbours a runaway armed seaman of a merchant ship, but he cannot punish for harbouring a deserter from a man of war. The matter must go up to the Supreme Court, and be solemnly brought before a Grand Jury and a Petit Jury. But as H. M. S. Dido cannot wait for the next Sessions, the case was dropped, and the Captain of the Elizabeth Jane, who had brought a heavy bag of money under the idea that he would be severely fined, departed with his money, rejoicing in the perfection of English Law.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 27.

The Admiral, Sir W. Parker, landed yesterday evening from the Ganges Steamer, which had been sent down with Capt. Rogers, the Master Attendant, to receive his Excellency. He was received on landing by an Aid-de-camp and Col. Warren, under a salute from the ramparts of Fort William, and H. M. Ship, the Dido. Sir W. Parker visited Moulmein on his way to Calcutta, and is said to have been greatly pleased with that rising settlement. He will remain, says the Englishman, about three weeks in Calcutta, and occupy a wing of Government House.

A very serious affray took place yesterday in Jaun bazar, when Constable Wheatley was stabbed to the heart by one of a gang of disorderly Malays, and expired almost immediately. The Malays, more than twenty in number, set the whole constabulary force at defiance for a considerable time, and were not captured before Mr. McCann, with some European and Native officers, and a few sepoys with fixed bayonets, entered the house.

A letter dated at Ferozepore the 16th Instant, and published in the Hurkaru, states that an express had been received by the 64th, after it had commenced and continued its march to Scinde, granting the men "an increase of pay in addition to the usual marching batta allowed in Scinde, and family pensions to all dying there, or afterwards, of diseases there contracted, and guaranteeing that if sickly, they should remain there but one year; if healthy, but two." We think the correspondent of the Hurkaru must have been misinformed, as the Adjutant General of the Army could offer the men no larger allowances than the public Notification grants.—Friend of India.

MARRIAGE,

On Thursday, the 21st March, by special License, by His Grace The Most Rev. Dr. P. J. Carew, Archbishop of Edessa and Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, at his residence, and afterwards at St. John's Cathedral, by the Rev. H. S. Fisher, Wm. Pringle Downing, Esq., Solicitor to Marianne, Widow of the late Dr. Thomas Chapman, E. I. C. S.

CEREMONIES OF HOLY WEEK.

Wiseman's Four Lectures on the Offices and Ceremonies of Holy Week, as performed in the Papal Chapels. Delivered in Rome in the Lent of 1837, Ten Plates, 8vo. cloth, Four Rupees, Four Annas.

P. S. D'ROZARIO & Co.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 14.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, APRIL 6, 1844.

[VOL. VI.]

THURSDAY, MARCH 28.

The papers give an account of a very extraordinary whirlwind at Amerkote in Jessore, which has blown the house, godowns and all the pukka houses to pieces. This was the report of one day; that of the next was an improvement; "lots of people were wounded all round about, and thousands of houses swept away no one knows where."

We are happy to learn from the Hurkaru that the Assam Steamer, which grounded near Ghazepore, was soon got afloat again, and arrived at Benares on the 21st.

FRIDAY, MARCH 29.

The Delhi Gazette gives the following account of Sawun Mull, the present ruler of Mooltan, who though nominally subject to the Government of Lahore, has become virtually independent of it. He is one of the most remarkable men of the age in India, and has in fact done that in Mooltan which his late master Runjeet Singh, did in the Punjab,—Sawun Mull appears to be as much the Sovereign of Mooltan as Mahomed Allee is of Egypt. He pays three lakhs of tribute monthly to the Lahore Government, but he is perfectly independent in the exercise of his authority, appoints and dismisses whom he pleases, enlists and pays his own Army. He has none of the Maharajah's or state troops quartered in his Vice Royalty. His Army therefore has no divided duty. Everything they owe to his favor and they have everything to fear from his resentment. He will not go to Lahore, although Heera Singh has often desired his attendance. Should any attempt be made to compel him he will resist. Sawun Mull is a Khetree, native of Wuzerabad in the Punjab, and described by the natives as able and just in his Government."

The Englishman publishes a whisper that the Governor General intends to give the Body Guard the most imposing appearance possible. They are to be converted into heavy dragoons and decorated with helmets similar to those worn by the Life Guards at home. This transmutation was talked of soon after his Lordship's arrival in India, but we thought the idea had been relinquished.

SATURDAY, MARCH 30.

The Bombay Courier mentions a report that Col. Outram is likely to succeed Sir C. Wade as Resident at Indore. He will long since have learned that the vacant post has been bestowed on Mr. Hamilton, of the Bengal Civil Service. Col. Outram still continues to occupy the very subordinate situation of 1000 Rupees a month from which Capt. Abbott was recently removed; and his acceptance of it has created some little disappointment, for it was confidently expected that he would not have accepted a post so far inferior to his deserts and reasonable expectations.

The Delhi Gazette states that the rebellion of Prince Kashmeera Sing in the Punjab appears likely to turn out a more serious affair than was at first supposed. The Sikh troops of the state are said to have refused to fight against the Prince, so that Hicera Sing is obliged to depend for the support of the throne on his own Highlanders. "Four hundred Cavalry," says our contemporary, "two Battalions of Infantry with ten pieces of cannon, under command of Col. Gardener, were to leave Lahore early on the morning of the 16th, and to proceed by forced marches, and also to be followed by 2 other Battalions with a number of beeldars, as Sappers and Miners, under the distinguished 'Coronello Don Domingo Ilurbon de Alcantara.' Twelve guns had left the Capital on the morning of the 14th with 50 rounds of ammunition, which were on the following day increased to 100, and these, with the 20 pieces already before Sealkote, besides mortars, will form a respectable siege train."

We learn from the Star, that the Chairman and several of the Directors of the India General Steam Navigation Company had an interview with the Governor General yesterday, their object being to interest his Lordship in the object, and more particularly to secure a Charter of Incorporation, when the Company is sufficiently advanced to justify it. His Lordship received the deputation favourably and expressed his perfect readiness to forward the object to the full extent of his powers. He saw no objection to an act of Incorporation, with the usual provisions, supposing there was nothing of the character of a Monopoly about it.

The Delhi Gazette states, that the Commander-in-Chief reached Umballah on the 19th and proceeded at once to investigate the circumstances attending the mutiny of the 7th Cavalry. A letter from Umballah, dated the 28th instant—this must be a misprint for 20th instant—states that the regiment was paraded the preceding day, and the consequences of their conduct pointed out to the men, and the option given them of proceeding to Seinde or standing the consequences of their refusal. The Regiment agreed at once to go, and marched off this morning,—the 20th, we suppose—for that destination.

Letters from Madras state, that the Bentinck reached that place at 1½ P. M. on the 21st instant, and left it at 9½ A. M. on the 22d.

The Hurkaru has been so fortunate as to obtain the Supplementary Seinde Blue Book from which the Editor is now daily publishing some very interesting documents. From one of the Governor General's letters to the Secret Committee given in the series we learn that the allowance for the ladies of the zenana was fixed by his Lordship at 4500 Rs. and that of the Ex Ameers at 15,000 Rupees a month.

MONDAY, APRIL 1.

The papers of this morning contain full accounts of the interview of the deputation of the India General Steam Navigation Company with the Governor General. The Association was represented by Mr. Larpent, of the House of Cockrell and Co.

The 7th Light Cavalry, which was supposed to be among the most refractory of the mutinous corps, strange to say, no sooner had the alternative of disbandment or obedience placed before them, than they embarked at once for Scinde. The 34th Native Infantry, which was represented ten days ago as having been among the foremost to repent, appears to have persisted in its obduracy, and is ordered to be disbanded. The number of the Regiment is to be struck off the army list, and all the non-commissioned officers, Native and Christian are to share the same punishment, all having been equally guilty.

The plot appears to be thickening in the Punjab, or rather the pear ripening faster. While Kashmeera Sing, a reputed son of Runjeet, has raised the standard of revolt at Sealkote, and the magnitude of the danger is manifested by the number of troops sent against him, and the Sikh troops refuse to fight the battles of Heera Sing, the progress of the Affghans beyond the Indus increases the confusion. The news writer of the Delhi Gazette states, that Mahomed Akbar has bought a free passage through the Khyber for 25,000 Rupees, and that Heera Sing took aside the representative of the Dost, and said that if the news was true there would be an end of the friendship between the Dost and the Durbar. Budur-ood-deen, the wily representative, said it could not be true, and promised to arrange the matter amicably if Heera Sing would permit him to go. When, we may ask, would he return. Meanwhile the Hurkaru has news that Tej-Sing, the Sikh Governor of Peshawur, has surrendered the place without a fight.

The mutinous 47th Madras Native Infantry instead of being sent to Scinde, has been shipped off to Aden, with full allowances. It has been dealt with leniently. Doubtless there are reasons and good ones for disbanding one Regiment with ignominy, and sending another away with flying colors.

The Bentinch Steamer has not made quite so quick a passage to Madras as the Hindoostan. She encountered a strong head wind, and an adverse current, yet her performance was satisfactory. A letter from a passenger on board, which has appeared in the Star, speaks in high terms of the urbanity of the Commander, and the comfort and convenience on board. The cellar however, he hints, will admit of some improvement. We would advise Captain Engledue to bottle off his own beer in future. The utmost good fellowship prevailed on board, and the Civilian and the tradesman sat down by each other without realisation of inconvenience. There was none of the barbarism which characterized the cuddy table of the ships of our Honourable Masters when the Company's Captains wore cocked hats and swords.

Five of the insurgent Chiefs of Bundelkhand have given in their adhesion to our Government, and the ex-Rajah of Jeitpoor alone remains at large, a vagabond in every sense of the word. The whole province is now represented as being in a state of tranquillity.

TUESDAY, APRIL 2.

Sir John Grant has fixed Friday, the 12th. as the day for the public meeting, for the transformation of the Mechanic's Institute into a Public Lyceum. We regret that we have not time or space for a more lengthened notice of the undertaking. It appears by no means advisable to begin the Lyceum with a heavy outlay for bricks and mortar. The erection of a building should more properly follow than precede the want of it. It is not certain that the Lyceum itself will succeed; the peculiar construction of society in Calcutta does not hold out any sanguine hope of its longevity. It is altogether an untried experiment, and it should be allowed to take root in the habits and wants of the community before any expensive mansion is erected. The old export Warehouse affords ample accommodation for the Institution, and as it is now for the most part unoccupied, Government would doubtless afford the use of it in the infancy of the undertaking.

From the Englishman we learn that a subscription has been set on foot for the purpose of erecting a monument to the memory of the warm hearted and gallant Lieut. Colonel Sanders, so prematurely cut off in the midst of his bright career.

The Hurkaru states, that the plan which has been for some time in contemplation of employing the trained officers of the Thuggee Department to operate against the gangs of professional dacoits who infest Bengal, is about to be carried into immediate execution.

Dwarkanath Tagore has received a letter by the last mail from the Honourable Mr. Murray, which accounts for the delay in the receipt of the portrait of herself which Her Majesty was graciously pleased to promise that distinguished Native gentleman. Mr. Murray states that the delay had arisen from the desire to send to India a good and faithful portrait of Her Majesty and that an artist, Winterbotham, had lately succeeded much to her satisfaction, and had produced a portrait which was deemed worthy of being sent to this country.

We regret to learn from a letter published in the Bombay Times and written at Bushire the 3d March, 1843, that the ambassador at Teheran had heard, from the best authority, that Stoddart and Conolly had been actually put to death, and that there was not the smallest chance of Dr. Wolff's finding them alive.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 3.

The intelligence regarding the refractory troops received from Ferozepore through the Delhi Gazette of yesterday, is most unsatisfactory; the 4th and 66th Regiments are in a state of unequivocal revolt. It is no longer the rate of allowance they quarrel with; they refuse any obedience whatever to the orders of Government. The 1st European Light Infantry, and Capt Dashwood's troop of European Horse Artillery have been ordered over from Loodianah, and marched for Ferozepore on the 24th ultimo.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 15.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, APRIL 13, 1844.

[VOL. VI.]

THURSDAY, APRIL 4.

The following interesting particulars relative to the course which the Burhampooter has taken "at its own sweet will," will be interesting to our readers. "The branch of the Burhampooter from the station of Jumalpoore to the Megna has been perfectly dry in many places—owing to the stream having turned into the Jenai River by the formation of a large chur just opposite the above station. This has completely paralyzed the trade of the country and put a stop to water carriage for some months past. If the country suffers, so will the Government revenue in the end. It would be wise in them to send up one of their Machine Boats to cut away the chur at the mouth, and turn the stream again this way—but it is too late this year, as the river is rising daily and will be navigable in another month."

The 34th N. I. has been disbanded at Meerut. The troops of the station were paraded forming three sides of a square. After the order had been read, the 34th was marched into the square, where they piled arms, stripped off their accoutrements and jackets, and, after receiving their arrears of pay, were marched round the square, and escorted to the boundary of the cantonment by a troop of the 10th Native Cavalry.

The Governor General has in the most gratifying manner rewarded the Bundelkund Legion for having volunteered to march to Scinde. Capt. Beatson has been commanded to express to the troops under his command the great satisfaction with which their services are accepted by the Government. At the same time his Lordship in Council has directed that the Cavalry, Infantry and Artillery of the Bundelkund Legion shall be permanently attached to the Bengal army and that the Native Officers and privates of the several arms will be entitled to all the advantages which are now enjoyed by corresponding ranks in the regular Infantry, Artillery and Irregular Cavalry of the Army. The Cavalry of the Legion will also be raised to the usual strength of a regiment of Irregular Cavalry.

The Chamber of Commerce is about to memorialize Government for a reduction of the export duty on Indigo. Among the causes which have affected and depressed the Indigo trade of India, the competition of Java Indigo is at length fully acknowledged, though at the time when we first drew public attention to this competitor, our apprehensions were treated with ridicule. "Now, however, when the ability of India to retain the manufacture of this important article of commerce may be doubted, it is necessary to look for any relief possible to be obtained." How far this application for relief may be successful after the Governor had declared that he will look to the duties on external commerce to make up any deficiency in the revenue may be doubted.

FRIDAY, APRIL 5.

The Agra Ukhbar, whose reports on proceedings at Gwalior, are generally of the most authentic character, states that on the evening of the 22d March great consternation was spread through the monied community at that capital by a rumour, that Ram Rao Phalkeea and Moonshee Bulwunt Rao, the two Ministers who have been placed in authority by the British Government, had been arrested by order of the Bae. The rumour turns out to be unfounded. But our contemporary observes with truth, that "the whole influence of the state, from Her Highness the Bae, to the youth of Gwalior who got up the mock battle has set in against Ram Rao Phalkeen, able as he unquestionably is, and that the greatest difficulty against which the Resident will have to contend will be to keep him in power." Seldom has a regency been established by our power in any Native state, succeeded in long maintaining its position. It is hated as being imposed by superior authority; its existence is a constant source of irritation, and a hundred secret machinations are constantly at work to destroy its influence and efficiency. Before the recent humiliation inflicted on Gwalior, that state was neutral in our greatest adversers. We have now converted it into a bitter enemy and may expect opposition whenever the star of our ascendancy appears to be on the wane.

A steamer belonging to the Steam Tug Association was launched yesterday from the builder's yard at Howrah, and named the Frances Gordon.

On Wednesday, the Artillery at Dum-Dum entertained Sir W. Parker at a splendid entertainment, when about a hundred Gentlemen sat down. The Brigadier proposed the gallant Admiral's health in a short and soldier-like address, and Sir William Parker returned thanks in a neat and appropriate speech.

We regret to learn from the Star that Messrs. Adam, Scott and Co., have stopped payment.

The same paper confirms the report given yesterday, that the 69th Regiment and the Artillery had returned to their obedience, and marched, after having given up the ringleaders in the mutiny. We hope a signal example will be made of these men, as well as of those who were surrendered by the 4th N. I. and 7th Light Cavalry.

A letter from Sukker, on the 16th ultimo, published in the Star, states that the extra batta of the Native troops stationed there had been actually retrenched; and that the corps were looking forward to receiving back the batta which had been taken from them. From the same letter we learn that the revenues of Shikarpore had been farmed for 87,000 Rs., whereas that district, with the aid of the canal to be opened, was estimated to yield nine lakhs of Rupees a year.

SATURDAY, APRIL 6.

The Delhi Gazette last received seems to confirm the intelligence of Akbar Khan's having obtained possession of Peshawur. The news mentioned in the Durbar was that he had fought and overcome the troops at that station. The only circumstance which seems to throw discredit on the report is its being coupled with a threat to march not only to Attock, but also to Sukker. The position of Heera Sing becomes daily more ticklish. The regular troops have risen in their demands, and in compliance with his earnest request, allowed him five days for determining whether he will agree to them or not. He is thus temporizing in the hope of obtaining help from his uncle in the Hills. The troops have demanded the release of Misr Belee Ram, with which the Minister has promised to comply. He held the Durbar on the 23d and 24th in his own house.

MONDAY, APRIL 8.

Intelligence was received on Saturday in Calcutta from Lahore, of an important character. From the time when Rajah Dhyani Singh fell, and the reins of Government were assumed by Rajah Heera Sing, Suchet Singh, his uncle, has exhibited the utmost disaffection to the new order of things, and has been ready to take advantage of any opening for subverting it. The present insubordinate state of the army and the open revolt of Kashmeera Singh, seemed to have afforded this opportunity, and it is said that he advanced with an escort of only 150 men to Lahore, in the hope that the refractory troops would join him; but he was met by his nephew Heera Singh, with Artillery and Cavalry, and put to death.

Papers have been received from China to the 22d February. The news is not without importance. The British authorities have struck a blow at the Opium trade, which to all appearance must inflict the most serious injury on it. A British vessel has been seized in the harbour of Shanghai by the British Consul, for having Opium on board, and brought down to Hong Kong. Yet we are told that immediately after this event, the price of the drug somewhat improved at that port!

The Hooghly Steamer, the slow coach that used to be three and four hours drawing up the Governor General's barge from Calcutta to Barrackpore, has been sent down to the Straits to assist the Diana. The Editor of the Singapore Free Press, who considers the vessel useless, thinks that this Government has palmed her upon the Government of the Straits, with the view of relieving the revenues of Bengal from the expense, and saddling the revenues of those settlements with it.

His Excellency Mr. Cushing, the American Minister to the Court of Peking, has arrived at Macao on the Brandynine frigate, and intends to proceed to the mouth of the Peiho as soon as his arrangements are complete. The Emperor will doubtless decline the honour of the visit. If he receives the American Minister, he cannot refuse the grand French embassy, which has set out to protect French interests in Siam, and which consists of the large tons burden. If he receives these two gentlemen, he will soon have his Court crowded with European diplomatists.

Dr. J. Satchell, the Editor of the Friend of China and the Hong Kong Gazette, died at Hong Kong of paralysis in February last. If we mistake not, he was for some years professionally engaged by the Indigo planters of lower Bengal.

The Commander-in-Chief has given a very severe reprimand to Major H. F. Caley and Lieut. Colonel Norton, who commanded the 4th and 60th Regiment. General Fast and the Judge Advocate General were sent to Ferozepore to bring the mutineers of those two Regiments to trial; but on their arrival, they found that these delinquents had received their rootsut (discharge) in a very civil way from their Commanding officers and were beyond the reach of punishment; so all hope of reading a great moral lesson to the army on this memorable occasion has been lost.

The Englishman states that it is rumoured that Sir William Parker is come round with a proposal from the Emperor of China about the growth of Opium. His Majesty is willing to pay down a million and a half sterling a year if the Company will give up the cultivation of the drug. It is scarcely possible to suppose that such rumour can be correct. Why, if we could prevent its cultivation in the Gangetic valley, this would only give an impulse to the growth of it in Malwa and in other countries, and the first chest that arrived, would afford the Emperor a pretence for stopping the compensation, and then Sir Hugh Gough, and Sir W. Parker, and Sir Henry Pottinger would be wanted again.

We are happy to perceive that the public subscription for the erection of a Monument to the memory of the late Col. Sanders, already amounts to 2000 Rs.

At the last meeting of the Asiatic Society, a very magnificent silver standish was presented with an appropriate speech by the Hon. the Deputy Governor, the President of that Society, to Mr. Henry Torrens, the Secretary, "as a testimony of the sense entertained of his distinguished services by his Associates." This piece of plate, which we hear has cost 1,000 Rs. does the highest credit to Messrs. Lattey, Brothers and Co.—Friend of India.

NOTICE.

Studies will be resumed on Monday next, the 15th instant, at St. John's College, at the Loretto House, and at the Cathedral, Dhurrumtollah, and Bow Bazar Male and Female Schools.

Printed and published by P. S. D'ROZARIO & Co. No. 8, N. E. Tank Square, Calcutta, every Saturday Morning. Price One Rupee per month, or Ten Rupees per year, if paid in advance. Subscriptions also received by Mr. W. L. JOHNSTON, Madras; Mr. M. A. D'MELLO, Bombay; Mr. G. M. FREDERICK, Singapore; Mr. J. P. DE MURAT, Penang; Mr. T. BONNEVOY, Mauritius; Mr. D. B. ANANDAPPA, Ceylon; Mr. E. ABREU, Moulmein; Mr. R. P. STOWELL, Agra; and Mr. J. A. SMITH, 14, Soho Square, London.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 16.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, APRIL 20, 1844.

[Vol. VI.

THURSDAY, APRIL 11.

There has been a later arrival from China, which brings intelligence from thence down to the 9th of March. The William the Fourth had been relinquished, the payment of a fine of 500 Dollars at Shanghai being considered a sufficient punishment for her participation in the smuggling transactions we lately noticed. The other two vessels had been permitted to discharge their cargoes on agreeing to place the proceeds in the hands of the British Consul, to await the decision of Sir Henry Pottinger. The letter from which this notice is extracted, and which appears in the Hurkaru, farther states that the author of all this mischief, that is; the individual who informed against the vessels which were smuggling Opium into Shanghai, contrary to the treaty, received a cold reception from Sir Henry Pottinger. This assertion must of course be received with some qualification.

FRIDAY, APRIL 12.

The Bombay community, both European and Native, but more especially the Native portion of it, have afforded the most gratifying proofs of their gratitude to Dr. Mackay, a Medical Gentleman not in the covenanted service, who has been in high practice at that town for fifteen years, and who laid the foundation of that Hospital, which has been enlarged under the auspices of Sir Jamsetjee Jeejeebhoy, and rendered so great a blessing to the people. He has now left the Presidency for England amidst the general regrets of the community.

The Agra Uhbar, under its usual head of News from Gwalior, states that the men accused of having conspired against the life of Ram Rao Phalke, the head of the Council of Regency appointed by our Government, have been tried by him and sentenced to imprisonment. A correspondence was found on them which implicated in this conspiracy, two men who formerly held high commands in the army, but who are not now in the Gwalior territory. Affairs are tolerably quiet, but there is neither cordiality, confidence or union in the councils of state. The Council is split into two parties.

SATURDAY, APRIL 13.

The Amciers of Scinde, may shortly be expected in Calcutta. The Bombay Gentleman's Magazine states that they are to be sent round forthwith on the Tenasserim Steamer, and the Hurkaru now tells us that they are to be sent to Harebaugh, as it has been found that the buildings at Baraset were not sufficiently large for such a party.

Intelligence has been received of the loss of the Columbine from China, on Saugor Sand. The vessel passed the upper floating light with a fine breeze about half past eight in the evening, and struck at nine. She floated with the flood, but as it was known that she would ground on the ebb and might go to pieces, or turn over, the boats were got over the side. Twelve persons started in the gig at 12 at night for the floating light, distant about five miles, and encountered an awful sea, from the meeting of the South West wind with the ebb tide; but after four hours and a half of imminent danger succeeded in reaching it. The boats after this went successively to the wreck and brought away all the people, with the exception of one poor lascar. The Columbine had more than forty boxes of treasure on board, of which it would appear that about eighteen have been saved.

The Calcutta Christian Advocate says, "Puseyite Missionaries are now sent out among the heathen; one of these, we are informed lately called a village in the Madras Presidency Pusey-poram!"

MONDAY, APRIL 15.

—A correspondent of the Englishman of this morning says, that in passing through a village in Shahabad, his attention was attracted to the shrieks of a female, and he was told that it was the daughter of a Zemindar whose husband had died, and whom they were immolating on the funeral pile. Of course the matter will instantly attract the attention of the Deputy Governor, and the most searching enquiry will be made. The Correspondent has however scarcely acted fairly in neglecting to give us the name of the village and the date of the transaction; all that he says, is, that it was near the Sudder station. We may take this opportunity of mentioning that we have on more than one occasion been assured that Suttees are still practised in places where there is a chance of concealment, and that large bribes, combined with the religious predilections of some Hindoo Thanadars, keep the matter from the knowledge of the Bur Officers of Government. They will not thus act wisely in considering such an act ~~impossible~~ when a whisper of it may reach them.

Admiral Parker has taken his departure from Calcutta to join the Cornwallis at Kadmat, from whence she will be towed to sea by Steamers.

The last intelligence from Cabul, as usual contradicts the preceding news; in fact, so contradictory has been nearly all the news received from it for a long time that little or no reliance can be placed on it. It now appears that Dost Mahomed is still at Cabul, that the Sikhs of Peshawur have not been chased to the Indus, that Akbar Khan has not entered the Khyber pass; but is engaged—though this may be equally apocryphal—in chasing some tribes the north of Jellalabad.

TUESDAY, APRIL 16.

We record with the deepest regret the death, by cholera, of Sir William Ouseley, nearly fifty years service in India. For than twenty years he was the Secretary to Government in the Military Department, and was raised to Council when it had been resolved to undertake the expedition to Afghanistan. His name has been associated with our military movements during the last twenty-five years. He rightly did Lord Ellenborough, who is said to have by the light of his own wisdom above every proceeding Governor General, appreciate the value of Sir William Casement's experience and judgment, that he took on him the responsibility of detaining him in Council, when his tour of service had expired. He attended a meeting of Council on Saturday last, and complained of pain on his return to Cossipore. The complaint turned out to be cholera. He was attended with the greatest assiduity by Drs. Nicholson and Garden, but all medical skill was baffled by the strength of the disease.—Friend of India.

MARCH OVERLAND MAIL.

The Express via Bombay, with the Mails of the 31st March, arrived on Tuesday evening at 5 o'clock.

During the past month, the affairs of India, as well as those of Ireland, have been the principal subjects of debate, and both have drawn so largely upon public attention, as to leave little or no room for the consideration of various questions of scarcely less general importance.

The State Trials in Ireland may be said to have closed at a late hour on Saturday, the 10th Feb., when a verdict was returned; but so informal that the Court could not allow it to be recorded. A reconsideration was necessary, in order to amend the terms in which the finding was conveyed; but before the necessary alterations could be made, the clock struck twelve, so that it became imperative to adjourn the Court, and confine the jury over the following day till Monday morning, when they returned a verdict of GUILTY against the several traversers—Mr. O'Connell upon all, and each of the other defendants upon one or more of the several counts of the indictment; negating, however, in express terms, the illegality of the "monster meetings." As matters now stand, the traversers remain out on their recognizances till the first day of next term, the 15th of April, when they will be served with a four-day rule, that is, have four days to move in arrest of judgment. Should they suffer this rule to expire without moving, the Court will proceed, as a matter of course, to pass sentence on them; but it is understood that council will move in arrest of judgment: First on the objection taken by Mr. Henn, that no evidence was given of acts done in the indictment, having taken place within the County or the City of Dublin. Secondly—on the objection taken by Mr. Monaghan, that having been proceeded with at past twelve o'clock on Saturday night, that the Court had no power, being Sunday morning, any power to proceed with the case, or to do any judicial act, on Sunday. Thirdly—On the objection taken by Mr. Henn, before the verdict of the jury was returned, that it was a mis-trial, by the nomination of one of the jury, John Rigby, who was sworn as "John Rigby," whereas the name was "John James Rigby." Fourthly—on the objection by Mr. Henn, to the progress of the trials after the expiration of Hilary Term. Should the Court refuse the motion, judgment there will be recorded against the traversers, but a writ of error will be sued out, provided the Crown consents, and it cannot well do otherwise; but should the Attorney-General refuse his consent, the traversers have no appeal, and judgment will at once be carried into execution. If a writ of error is obtained, the case will go before the Twelve Judges for argument, and, should they decide with the traversers, the whole proceedings are forthwith quashed; but should they affirm the decision of the Court below, then an appeal lies to the House of Lords.

The Overland Mail from Bombay to 1st Jan. reached London via Marseilles on the 7th, and via Southampton on 14th February.

By a new Post Office regulation, for which the public are mainly indebted to the exertions of the East India and China Association of London, letters marked via Southampton, may henceforth be prepaid to all places within the territories of the East India Company, and to Hong Kong.

The Queen has been pleased to appoint John Francis Davis, Esq., to be Governor and Commander-in-Chief in and over the colony of Hong Kong and also her Majesty's Plenipotentiary and Chief Superintendent of British trade in China; John Walter Hulme, Esq. to be Chief Justice; the Hon. Frederick William Adolphus Bruce to be Secretary to the Government; Brevet-Major William Cain to be Police Magistrate, Sheriff, and Provost Marshal; Robert Dundas Cay, Esq., Writer to the Signet, to be Registrar of the Supreme Court; Alexander Gordon, Esq., to be Surveyor-General; and William Pedder, Esq., Lieutenant in the Royal Navy, to be Harbour Master of Hong Kong.

The Rt. Rev. Dr. Oliffe has sailed from Liverpool on his mission to Calcutta.

There has been a rumour in circulation, to the effect that Lord Ellenborough had been recalled.

John Shepherd, Esq., is to be Chairman, and Sir H. Willock, Deputy Chairman of the East India Company for the next year.

Mr. Burton, of New South Wales, has been appointed to the Madras Bench.

Lord Ellenborough's project for administering the entire civil government of India by means of staff-corps has been considered by the Court of Directors. We need hardly say it is not at all likely to be adopted.

We understand that the Scinde resolutions were very warmly discussed in the Court of Directors, and ultimately carried by a bare majority of 12 to 11. It is quite certain that many parties who have supported these resolutions, approving of Sir C. Napier's military conduct, would have withheld their votes, had they supposed they were affording any sanction to the general policy pursued towards Scinde.

The absolute necessity for an augmentation of the Indian Army is so fully admitted in all quarters, that we can scarcely suppose it will be long delayed. The Court of Directors are willing to entertain any suggestion on the subject coming from the Duke of Wellington; and much will probably depend upon the course taken by the Indian Government with respect to the Punjab. —Englishman Extra.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 17.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, APRIL 27, 1844.

[VOL. VI.

THURSDAY, APRIL 18.

The Delhi Gazette states that no less than seventeen lakhs of Rupees belonging to the deceased Raja Suchet Sing have been discovered at Ferozepore. The sum has been claimed by the Lahore Government, but it is said that the question of surrendering it has been referred to the Governor General. The enquiry very naturally arises, for what purpose so large a sum was deposited in this frontier town; and as rumours have been for some time current that the mutiny of our troops was fostered, if not created, by the machinations of the Sikh authorities, it is naturally inferred that this sum had been deposited at the town of Ferozepore to assist in tampering with the fidelity of our Regiments.

The Delhi Gazette states that no fewer than ninety-five females of the family of the late Suchet Sing have perished on the funeral pile. This assertion is made on the strength of letters from Lahore; but when we recal to mind that it was upon the same authority that the massacre of Shere Sing's family was announced, which afterwards turned out to be entirely apocryphal, we must have more than a single confirmation of this sad news, and from more than one independent authority, before it is received as fact.

From the same journal we learn that Golab Sing has been greatly incensed at the murder of his brother Suchet Sing, and that on the suspicion that it arose from the machinations of Pundit Jella, has ordered the family of that individual to be imprisoned.

Her Majesty has not only appointed Major Rawlinson, whose services in Afghanistan have been rewarded by the charge of our political interests in Persia, a Companion of the Bath, but nominated him Consul at Bagdad.

Sir William Casement was interred yesterday morning with the highest military honours. Lord Ellenborough went down from Barrackpore, and attended the funeral in state. The attendance of officers, both Civil and Military, was very numerous, the result not less of sincere regard for the deceased who has been so intimately mixed up with all the Military movements of the Empire for the last quarter of a century, as of respect to the Orders of the Governor General.

Mr. Frederick Millet, of the Civil Service, having been appointed Provisional Member of Council, was yesterday sworn in, in consequence of the vacancy created by the death of Sir William Casement.

FRIDAY, APRIL 19.

The 1st European Regiment and Capt. Dashwood's troop of Horse Artillery, which had been sent to Ferozepore to aid in quelling the mutiny, have returned to Loodianah. The 64th Regiment has arrived safely and satisfactorily at Bhawulpore on its way to Sukkur. Of the mutineers who were so incautiously dismissed from the 4th and 69th when the Commander-in-Chief designed to make an example of them, many have found their way across the Sutlege, and though Heera Singh has ostensibly forbidden his officers to allow them to cross that river, yet many of them have been received into the Sikh army. Some of our own officers still continue to affirm, that the Sikhs have been tampering with troops at Ferozepore and its neighbourhood, and that the spirit of insubordination was continually encouraged by their secret emissaries. The Englishman says, that Col. Richmond, in reference to the disturbed state of the Sikh country and the instability of the Government, has requested the Commander-in-Chief to permit H. M. 81st Regiment to remain at Ferozepore, which request His Excellency has complied with.

SATURDAY, APRIL 20.

We are happy to learn from the Monthly Mail of the 6th March, that Mr. Davis, who has just been appointed Governor of Hong Kong, just before his departure from England, published a narrative of the massacre of Mr. Cherry and other European functionaries by Vizier Aly in the city of Benares. Mr. Davis's father gallantly defended himself and his family on the roof of his house against the assailants with a single spear, for which he was rewarded with the applause of a man who knew well how to appreciate and recompence such services, the Marquis of Wellesley.

The Hindoostan Steamer, on her last voyage to Suez, made one of the most splendid runs on record between Calcutta and that port. She was under Steam only 20 days and 30 hours. She remained at Madras 15½ hours; at Galle 30 hours; and 33 at Aden; thus losing more than two days and a half at these two latter places, a waste of time which will, we hope, be avoided. If she had been dispatched from each post in 15 hours,—which ought to be long enough for coaling,—she would have accomplished the voyage, including stoppages, in 22 days and a half. She has also made the quickest passage on record between Madras and the Sand Heads, having accomplished the distance in sixty-six hours.

MONDAY, APRIL 22.

The Athenæum informs us that the amount of nett revenue relinquished by the abolition of the transit duties at Madras, is twenty-nine lakhs of Rupees; or about three hundred thousand Pounds Sterling a year. It is a large and noble sacrifice for the welfare of a large tract of country, which has long suffered from the course of transit duties. Our contemporary objects to the substitution of a salt tax and proposes one on tobacco and bettle; but tobacco has been tried as a taxable article and found wanting.

It is reported that Capt. Haines, the Political officer at Aden, will probably be appointed Superintendent of Marine. This is the second if not the third time the papers have proposed to divest Col. Irvine of his office.

The Ameers of Scinde, who are coming round to Calcutta, that they may be let loose at Hazareebaugh, to enjoy more liberty at a distance from the Indus, have gone on board the Tenasserim Steamer, at Bombay, which is to bring them round. The Bombay Gentleman says, they look fat and contented. If the Tenasserim rolls as awfully as she did last year, they will look lean and discontented enough by the time they reach Calcutta.

The Court of Directors have granted another boon to the Medical service. By the rules previously established there was no intermediate period of retirement between 20 and 28 years, the pension for the former of which period was £191 a year, for the latter £300. They have now established an intermediate period of 24 years (three years furlough included) the pension for which is to be fixed at £250.

TUESDAY, APRIL 23.

The Commander-in-Chief was expected at Simlah on the 12th of the month. His Excellency has been detained in the plains by the refractory conduct of the Regiments, long after the heat of the weather had rendered it advisable to take refuge in the Hills.

Baboo Prusunno Koomar, who has so long been the soul of the Landholder's Society, has resigned his situation as Secretary on his appointment to the post of Government Pleader in the Sudder Court, partly we believe because his time will be so fully occupied with his official duties, and partly because the confidential situation now bestowed on him, which corresponds in some measure with that of Attorney General, is not altogether compatible with the leadership of an independent and sometimes an antagonist Society. We had a letter out he subject three weeks ago by an injudicious native friend of the Baboo's, whose fulsome panegyric would have been any thing but grateful.

The Tenasserim Steamer, with the Ameers of Scinde from Bombay, was announced yesterday the 22nd. It appears that they have experienced every degree of kindness on the voyage, and are apparently very grateful for the treatment they have received; but this perpetual exile from their own land, where they moved and acted of their own free will, must be a bitter pill which no considerations can sweeten. Meer Abbas Ali Khan the second son of Nusser Khan, a sharp lad of fourteen, is said to have made considerable progress in the knowledge of English during his confinement. We know not whether he be not the young scion of the Talpoora family, who manifested so strong a desire to visit Calcutta, and London.

The Tenasserim has arrived in the river in valley days from Bombay. On this day, the 23d of April, we have yet more than half our newspapers to receive from that city. They arrived at Bombay on the 8th, two days before the departure of the Steamer; they will not all be here till two days after her arrival; and this at the most favourable season of the year; that is to say, on the only occasion on which we have been able to test the relative speed of a Steamer and of the Mail, it is found that the Steamer coming round Cape Comorin would have brought our papers in four days less time than has been employed in bringing them across the country.

The Ceylon Government has been in the habit of employing the Seaforth, a Government Steamer, with its monthly Mail to Bombay. We are now informed that it has been resolved to give her up, because the interests of Government and of the public will be best promoted by adopting the Calcutta Steamers which call at Galle, for the transit of their Mail to Suez.

The Hon. Mr. Law, the son of the Recorder of London and the nephew of the Governor-General, has reached Egypt in the Oriental, and will remain there till the arrival of the Bentinck, when he will come on to Calcutta. The Bombay Courier has been deceived into the belief that he will join his Lordship and proceed with him in his contemplated journey to the North-West; and that the youth is to employ his time in writing a Chronicle of the administration. The Star informs us, that Mr. Law is coming out to join his corps, the 9th Lancers. The voyage of Lord Ellenborough up the country and the Chronicle, are mere moonshine.

The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette states that the twenty-five men of the Madras 47th who broke out into such daring mutiny while proceeding from Madras to Bombay, still continue imprisoned at the main guard, without having been brought to trial, for two months. The men who mutinied at Bombay have been long since tried and sentenced; but as the others were insubordinate on the high seas, they are to be kept in confinement until the knotty legal question can be decided, where men who were going from Madras to Scinde, and who mutinied on the voyage, and were taken into Bombay, are to be tried.

We are happy to learn from a letter published in this morning's Hurkaru from Mr. Stikeman, the Secretary of the East India and China Association in London, to Mr. Limond, Secretary to the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, that the Memorials on the subject of comprehensive Steam communication which were forwarded to England in December last, had been sent immediately to the India Board, and from thence to Lord Lowther of the Post Office, who immediately returned them to Whitehall stating that the entire re-arrangement of the transmission of letters by private vessels,—meaning thereby, the Hindustan and the Bentinck—was about to take place.—Friend of India

OVERLAND ROUTE.—The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company's Steamers will start on the following dates, from Calcutta for Suez, touching at Madras, Point de Galle, and Aden.

	From Calcutta.	From Suez.
Hindustan	15th May.....	22nd June.
Bentinck	15th July.....	22nd Aug.
Hindustan	15th Sept.....	22nd Octr.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 18.]

CALCUTTA : SATURDAY, MAY 4, 1844.

[VOL. VI.

* THURSDAY, APRIL 25.

At the great meeting held in Calcutta in December last, when we were threatened with the abstraction of the Hindoostan and Bentinck steamers, the thanks of the community were offered to the East India and China Association—though they have sometimes had half an eye to Bombay—for the interest they have manifested in the comprehensive Steam question, and the East India and China Association have reciprocated the compliment, and assured the Sheriff that they are most happy to find that the part they took has been so favourably received at Calcutta, &c. &c.

We are extremely sorry to learn, that not a single copy of the second Scinde Blue Book has been received by the Hindoostan. Whether it was that the proprietors of the Oriental Navigation Company did not like to vex the Governor General—for the book is said to make some discreditable disclosures,—or whether the Parliament and the Directors have resolved that the booksellers shall not obtain copies for the public, we cannot tell, but we chronicle the fact that the Hurkaru is the only one of our contemporaries who has been so fortunate as to obtain access to the book; and, even if copies should be received by the Bentinck, will have forestalled us by two months. As soon as we can obtain the second volume of these documents, we propose to epitomize the record of the whole transaction.

Two of the most "atrocious villains" in Bundelkund who have long disturbed the peace of that district and have hitherto eluded pursuit, have, by a successful stratagem, fallen into the hands of Captain Clem. Brown, the Deputy Commissioner. We are also told that the ex-raja of Jeitpore has made several advances and hopes to be pardoned. It is worthy of remark, that although the papers were filled with reports of continued disturbances in Bundelkund last year, and we were so repeatedly told that the new organization had proved a total failure, yet, since the affairs of Gwalior have been settled and the border district of Chandere has been occupied, all disturbance seems to have subsided, as if by the wand of a magician, and we hear no whisper of insurrection or dissatisfaction, even from the constitutional croakers.

The Lahore news of the Delhi Gazette of the 7th of April states, that Heera Singh had sent instructions to his newswriter at Multan, directing him to give a particular account of every thing that transpired both with regard to the people and the Viceroy, Sawun Mull. The latter is said to have become an object of great jealousy to the Minister. Sawun Mull is de facto independent, and Heera Singh cannot control him or reduce him to obedience. Whenever the Punjab shall fall to pieces, this principality will devolve on its present energetic ruler, and possibly be bequeathed to his posterity.

FRIDAY, APRIL 26.

The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette states, that nine men of H. M. 17th Regiment at Ahmednuggur have deserted with bag and baggage, and probably with their arms. Their object in this desertion it is difficult to guess, as they must be aware that escape is hopeless. They cannot move thirty miles from the cantonment without being recovered.

All the refractory Regiments which lately proceeded from Ferozepore to Scinde, have made steady progress. The 69th had arrived at Bhawalpore; the 4th was five marches, and the 7th Cavalry, eight marches behind it.

SATURDAY, APRIL 27.

The Bombay Times gives us the following statement of the contents of the London Mail of the 6th March. It brought 36,630 Letters, 50,948 Papers,—Total, 87,584. The Mail which left Bombay for London took home 34,307 letters and 9,290 newspapers; in all 43,597. It appears then that the number of letters sent, corresponds nearly with the number received; we have letter for letter; how long this proportion may last since the people at home have now the privilege of saddling us with all the postage, is another question. But in the matter of newspapers there is a wide difference. We send about 10,000, we import 50,000. It is manifest therefore that we feel five times as much interest in the affairs of our father land, as our friends and kindred at home feel in the concerns of this colony.

MONDAY, APRIL 29.

The Delhi Gazette received on Saturday, states that the post between Loodianah and Lahore had been stopped for two days: and that it was reported that Golab Sing had sent a strong party to Lahore to seize the person of the Pundit Jella, who is believed to have instigated Heera Sing to attack and put to death his uncle Suchet Sing. It is also said that a sanguinary conflict had taken place at Lahore, which proved fatal to many hundreds. This morning's Englishman gives an extract of a letter from Ferozepore, dated the 16th of April, which states that five of the principal Sikh Sirdars had gone to Col. Richmond to request British interference. We give these items as we find them; how far they may be depended on is another thing. They prove at all events that the Punjab is daily falling into a more unsettled state.

A letter in the same paper from Gwalior reiterates the accusation brought against our nominee, Ram Rao Phalkea, by all the disappointed at Gwalior, that he had betrayed the interests of the state to the English. We have also in another paper an account of a splendid entertainment given by this Minister to the young King; the Native ladies who were present were strictly secluded from public gaze by purdahs; the table groaned with all the delicacies of the Mahratta cuisine, and Ram Rao is said to have proposed the health of his young Master, which was drunk with great applause. Ram Rao is a Hindoo; and we are anxious therefore to learn, how the party—which included Sir Richmond Shakespear,—sat down, and what wine they drank, and where they obtained a dispensation for drinking it, and for eating with Mlechas.

The Delhi paper gives news from Sukker to the 10th April. The first and foremost of the refractory Regiments, the 64th, had arrived at that station and the 9th was to march back to Ferozepore on the 15th. During the period in which this corps has been cantoned in Scinde, every man has been in hospital twice, and of the 18 officers who were present at one time or another, only 7 were now with the corps. The Beloochees had come down from their hills and carried off a thousand head of cattle from a town fifty miles to the west, and had subsequently burnt a village within six miles of Shikarpore. Another letter says, that the number of plundering Beloochees was very great. H. M. 80th was however in fine feather, ready to give the Beloochees a warm reception. They had just commemorated the victory of Jellalabad by a grand entertainment.

Our contemporaries at Bombay have received China intelligence to the 11th March. The Consul of Canton, determined that the good example set by the Consul at Shanghai should not be lost on him, had proceeded to seize a vessel, the Carthaginian, which had proceeded to Whampoa with 14 chests of Opium on board. Mr. Tradescant Lay, the Consul, at first fined the vessel 700 dollars, and then permitted the Commander to send his opium out of the river and discharge his cargo. Soon after, he closed the hatches of the vessel; but the consignees had mean while sold the opium, and there the matter rested at the time the vessel with the news came away.

TUESDAY, APRIL 30.

The Star gives a letter from Tipperah, which states, that the cholera was raging with great violence at that station, the town was in a great measure deserted, and the Government School and some of the offices had been closed. In our neighbourhood, the grateful rain of Saturday evening has cooled the atmosphere, and the cholera has in some measure subsided.

The late Mauritius papers state, that no fewer than 8,000 Coolies sent to the island from this country had absented themselves from work and refused to return to their duty except on higher pay, and that the streets and high ways were swarming with Cooly venders, an assertion which we cannot comprehend. The papers state that the number of emigrants has been limited by the Government of India to 500 a month, a fact of which we were not aware, and of the correctness of which we have some doubt. The publication of the list of emigrants despatched by the Emigration Agent since his appointment, in January last would be an advantage.

The Hurkaru states, that the will of the late Sir W. Casement, which was signed the day before his death, has been informally executed, and is likely to be disputed by the next of kin. If we are not mistaken, it was drawn up, on the spur of the moment, by his Solicitor, Mr. Henderson, who has been himself cut off by the same disease within a fortnight after.

The Hurkaru, states, that Col. Davidson whose work on India has recently reached the country, when at Dacca in 1840, observed, that owing to the decay of the muslin manufacture and the desertion of the inhabitants, the jungle was advancing close up to the town. This is said to have been one cause of the great mortality which very recently pervaded the Regiment stationed there. The Hurkaru says, that Government has ordered four or five hundred convicts to be employed in clearing the jungle. Can any friend or correspondent at Dacca inform us what has become of the large legacy which Mr. Mitford bequeathed for the improvement of that town?

Capt. Powell, who was in command of the Steam Frigate Memnon when she foundered last year off Cape Guardafui, has been tried by a Court Martial, and honourably acquitted of every part of the charge.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 1.

The beginning of the new commercial year has brought the usual quantum of unions and disunions in the Calcutta firms. Mr. P. J. Sarkies quits the firm of Sanders, May, Sarkies and Co. and Mr. A. D. Fordyce enters it.—Mr. Deans Campbell ceases to have any interest in the firm of Carr, Tagore and Co. and Baboo Debendrenath Tagore, the son of Baboo Dwarkanath Tagore, becomes a member of it. Mr. John Allan and Mr. J. M. Mackay part company, and Mr. Deffell and Mr. Allan form a new house in which both their names appear. Mr. Haron joins Kelsall and Ghose; Mr. John Lyall joins Lyall, Matheson and Co. and Mr. John Bagshaw quits Bagshaw and Co. Mr. Edward Johnson and Mr. Thomas Marshall, Tailors and Habit Makers, have, by mutual consent, dissolved partnership, and Mr. Gustavus Hubert, has joined Mr. J. Hubert, which adds a Company to his name.

The Governor General has requested the honour of Her Majesty's and the Honourable Company's Civil, Naval and Military Servants to view a grand display of fire works in celebration of Her Majesty's birth-day at half past eight, on Friday, the 24th current. A good substantial dinner would however be preferred to the noise and smell and smoke of this pyrotechnic display.—Friend of India.

ST. XAVIER'S COLLEGE.

No. 22, Chowringhee Road.

Day Scholars, at..... 8 Rs. per month
Day Boarders,..... 16 „ ditto.
Boarders,..... 25 „ ditto.

For further particulars apply to the Rector.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

[No. 19.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, MAY 11, 1844.

[Vol.]

THURSDAY, MAY 2.

Last night's Calcutta Gazette announces that Mr. J. Casella has been appointed Consul in Calcutta, by his Sardinian Majesty, and approved of by the Government. This appointment of Consuls is quite a modern invention. It appears to be altogether irrespective of the necessity of the thing. The French and the Americans had no Consul here when they had twice the trade they now have; and with the exception of a solitary ship from Genoa, the Sardinians have no commercial dealings here.

The Agra Ukhbar just received, states, that the Pundit Jella has been put to death; but we must not forget to remember, that like the cowards mentioned by the poet, the great actors in the drama in the Punjab die many times before their deaths.

The only intelligence from the North West given in the papers is that, the fears of our Government of a Sikh irruption—if they ever entertained any—have so far subsided, that the two European corps, which were at Ferozepore and Ludiana, have been removed; that Lena Sing, the Lahore Chief, and the reputed rival of Heera Sing for power, has expended a lakh of Rupees at Hurdwar, and that he has been earnestly invited back to the Punjab by the Minister.

The Delhi Gazette states, that the Dada Khasgeewalla, the ex-minister of Gwalior, will not after all be brought to Calcutta, but be sent to Berhampore, where a residence is said to have been prepared for him by General Raper.

FRIDAY, MAY 3.

Lord Ellenborough, with the view of carrying out the plan of a Military Police—which our writer of Detached Thoughts, now embarked for England, called 'creating a Government of sentry boxes'—has directed the formation of four battalions respectively at Umbalah, Delhi, Meerut and Kurnaul. The necessary orders on the subject have just been issued by the Commander-in-Chief for volunteers from the Regiments of the line to be enrolled as officers in the new battalions.

The Hurkaru states, on the authority of a letter from Lahore of the 16th ult., that there is likely to be some more fighting in the Punjab, as Lena Singh Majetteah, one of the ablest, if not the ablest, Sikh Chiefs, who has been on pilgrimage to Hurdwar, is going to take back Ajai Singh's uncle, Uttur Singh.

The Bombay Courier says, we taunted the Ducks about the slowness of the Bombay Steamers. We only recollect the complaints made by the local press at that Presidency, that the Steamers became slower in their progress the older they grew. Our contemporary now desires us to notice that the little Cleopatra forms an exception to the rule, for she increases in speed with age. Thus in January, 1843, her net time on the voyage from Suez to Bombay, was 19 days 8 hours; in April of that year, 17 days and 10 hours, and in March of the present year, 11 days 23 hours. We are most happy to hear the good news. Next to the satisfaction we feel in the speed of the Hindoostan and the Bentina, is our delight in the improvement of the Bombay vessels.

The Star publishes a memorandum of the list of Emigrants sent by the Emigration Agent, to Mauritius in March and April. They amounted only to 605 males, but they were accompanied with the unusual number of 12 women and 99 children. A vessel will leave Calcutta about the 10th with 225 Emigrants.

SATURDAY, MAY 4.

The Record of Madras says, he has been informed upon the very best authority that the present Government Lottery will be the last. He has been rightly informed. All lottery speculators must now resort to the Cinnamon island, the last refuge of these gambling speculations in India. It was easy to see that as soon as Government had declared them public nuisances their doom was sealed; and that the abolition of the Madras lottery, which brought one lakh of Rupees by the year to the Treasury, was only a question of time.

The Star has given a local habitation and name to the rumour which has now been for some time current in Calcutta, that arrangements have positively been made for taking the Capital Allahabad; and that the approbation of Court of Directors is expected just as the weather sets in. It will be a sad disappointment to our brethren at Bombay and Agra. We been calculating the extent of our loss and gain, and we find nothing to regret in change. We shall lose the Governor General and keep the Barrackpore Park. We shall also two administrative members and one legislative member of Council; and the Secret to the Government of India and their Chief and the Military Departments, all of whom in late years have not spent half their time in Calcutta. The Mint must, and the Treasury probably will, remain. We shall also get a good road to Allahabad and mail coaches all the way, and the Deputy Governor will be relieved from attendance at Council. On the whole our gain will be greater than our losses. The Star says that as to the dignity of being the seat of Government, it is all moonshine, and he is not from the truth. But we had almost begun to ask what is to become of the Bishopric. Allahabad, the metropolis of India, will the Metropolitan be obliged to reside there, leaving the ecclesiastical affairs of the lower provinces to be governed by the Archbishop who has hitherto managed them with so much satisfaction to all parties?

hints that the Governor General has officers of Scinde at Baraset, out of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, some lawyer should apply to Sir Lawrence for a writ of Habeas Corpus, and at the poor birds at liberty.

Bombay Times states, that Muncherjee the brother-in-law of the Editor of Chitank, has been barbarously murdered by a man of his own caste, whose wrath incited by his forcible exposition of the rights of their religion and caste. In Calcutta, slaves have never gone beyond the tortures of a troublesome Editor. Bombay has at the first instance of the murder of one, are happy to learn that Captain Nicolson, 23th N. I. ex-attendant on the Dost, and then of the new Bengal Army List, is likewise appointed a Deputy Commissioner of the districts in the Sagor and Nerbudda Territo-readers may remember that last year on embarkation of H. M. 41st for England, going was prohibited, by which thirty or more were separated from their wives and

It seems that the Authorities at the Guards do not consider the arrangement as one, as fifty-three of these men have sent back to different corps in India, thus the state to the unnecessary expense of 0000. How much money might be saved by a little common sense.

MONDAY, MAY 6.

accounts from some of the largest Indigo are very favourable. In Jessore rain fell daily for nearly a week, and it is said prospects could scarcely be more favourable. In Tishoot, rain has fallen just in time to the planters to complete their sowings. Usually happened that a full crop one year was followed by a scanty one the next; but to all times the present season will prove an exception. Last year's crop was the largest on hand and that of the present season promises above an average one. The accounts from the also favourable to the interests of this, by diminishing the chance of a famine river. It is said that the cultivation of island has not proved so lucrative as expected, and that the supply, instead of increased, is likely to be curtailed.

A letter from Mr. Theobald, a Barrister of the Supreme Court and the President of the Elder's Society, to the Secretary of that body the following remarkable opinion. "It is all well for wealthy merchants and traders to love the Supreme Court, but that Court has no title to the love of the nation. It has ruined half the natives of Calcutta."

A Lunacy was held last week, at ascertaining whether Gooroo of sound mind. Mr. were elected. Committee of special jury. After a prolonged and a forcible speech Mr. Hume, the Jury of unsound mind and own affairs for three

TUESDAY, MAY 7.

However much we may approve of the object which the British India Society proposes, we cannot say that the present report will excite any great interest in its proceedings, while the amount of subscriptions, which its members—and they are very wealthy—have furnished for the prosecution of them,—about 500 Rs.—is calculated to produce a very unfavourable impression on the public mind.

A Report of the progress of the students in the College of Fort William has just been published in the official Gazette, but it does not call for any observation, more especially after the very recent review which we gave of the operations of the institution during the past year.

The Hurkaru publishes an account of a very objectionable conduct of Mr. Montresor, a young Civilian, in endeavouring to enter the Fort with a dog in his buggy, and forcing his way out at a gate appropriated exclusively to the entrance of vehicles. It also narrates the contrition he has shewn for the offence, and the apology by which he has honourably redeemed his character.

The last Calcutta Gazette publishes for general information, a list of the Uncovenanted Deputy Collectors employed under Reg. IX 1833, in the Lower Provinces. We are totally unable to divine the cause of this publication, unless it has some reference to the recent amalgamation of the office of Deputy Collector and Deputy Magistrate. But we embrace the opportunity it affords us of mentioning that the number of employés in this department is 131; of whom 71, or more than half, are Hindoos; 35 Europeans, and only 25 Mahomedans. The predominance of Hindoos must be attributed we suppose to their greater aptitude in matters of revenue or account. We cannot attribute it to the same reason which actuated Moorshed Kooly Khan, who "employed none but Hindoos in the collection of the revenue, they were most easily compelled by the punishment to disclose their mal-practices, and their confederates.—In the few instances in which he found that they had defrauded him or had made away with the revenue and were unable to make good the deficiency, he compelled the offender, with his wife and children to become Mahomedans."—Friend of India.

Notice.

TO THE FAITHFUL OF THE DISTRICTS OR PARISHES OF DURRUMTOLLAH AND BOW BAZAR.

The Faithful of the above districts are informed that, by order of his Grace the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic, the first Mass at Durrumtollah and Bow Bazar will, during the warm season, be celebrated at St. O. Rev. Doctor Kennedy, of St. O. College, will celebrate the first Mass and give instructions in English at Durrumtollah, and the Rev. Mr. will at Bow Bazar and give instructions in English at Bow Bazar on Sunday May 9th. 1844.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 20.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, MAY 18, 1844.

[VOL. VI.

THURSDAY, MAY 9.

The Governor General held a Durbar at Barrackpore on Tuesday afternoon, when some of the Scinde Ameers were presented to his Lordship with the "usual marks of honour and respect." How deep must have been their feelings—for Ameers can feel—as they contrasted the time when the Envoy of the British Government was barely admitted to present his compliments to the Talpoora Chiefs on the banks of the Indus, with the present time when they were brought up the Ganges to be presented as prisoners of war to the Ruler of British India. In the evening there was music, noble music, by the Governor General's Band, but the captives would doubtless cheerfully have relinquished its melody for the hideous twang of the tom toms and their own wild chants, could they but have listened to them at Hyderabad.

We are happy to see that Dr. W. B. O'Shaughnessy has been placed at the disposal of the Government of Bengal for re-employment as Chemical Examiner.

At the meeting of the General Inland Steam Navigation Company yesterday about seventy gentlemen are said to have attended. There was more freedom at the Meeting than we remember to have remarked at any Meeting for the last two years; which we should regard as a good omen, if such omens were not fallacious. Three years hence, it will be difficult to get a dozen shareholders together, to perform that very ungentlemanly act of scrutinizing the accounts. But the freedom which characterized the Meeting was beneficial. There was not that dull uniformity of assent to every proposal; that eternal blind and often fatal confi-

Council, and that Sir Charles Napier will take the command of the troops on the North-West Frontier.

The Englishman quoting the extract of a letter from the North West, states that in addition to Suchet Singh, there has been some other person murdered at Lahore, the Moonshes it is believed of Heera Singh. No revenue has been collected for two months, and the troops are without pay, and deserting daily.

The Bombay papers state that there is to be a grand gathering of Scinde Chieftains at Hyderabad on the 24th of the present month, to meet Sir Charles Napier, and that the assembly will probably not fall short, with followers, of 20,000. No one has been able to conjecture the cause of this meeting. We think it is plain, that the Governor of Scinde wishes to signalize her Majesty's birth-day, the 24th, by holding a grand levee, which shall be attended by all that remains of nobility in "Young Egypt."

SATURDAY, MAY 11.

The Bombay Times gives letters from Kerachee to the 24th of April, at which date the troops continued to enjoy good health, but the heat was increasing and the river rising, and the experience of the past year created many anxieties regarding the health of the troops, when the fatal season returned. The letter further states, that the Hyderabad collections of the year were likely to be ten lakhs; and those of Kerachee three, which was rather more than had been expected. It is further said, that Shere Mahomed had collected 20,000 men above Sukker, and intended to come down upon our encampment, when the heat was most intense.

The 42d Madras Native Infantry has been fearfully cut up by that awful scourge, the cholera. It has lost within a few days two officers, Lieut. Comyn and Ensign Reilly, a Native officer, 6 Havildars, 80 Sepoys and above 360 Camp followers.

Mr. Falkener, a very superior dentist, who came out to this country with very strong recommendations not a month ago, has just fallen a victim to the cholera, together with one of his children; they were both laid in the same grave.

Intelligence has been received from China to the 26th of March, but it is not of particular value. It is said, that three of the firms, Messrs. Matheson and Co., Flether, Larkins and Co. and Turner and Co. had already arrived at Hong-Kong, and that the others would come as soon as their buildings were fit to be inhabited. These movements were made of course before it was known how favourably Lord Stanley had spoken of admitting Opium for consumption into Hong-Kong. The thin end of the wedge being thus introduced, nothing but time would be necessary to drive in the broad end.

Tugs

The Englishman of this morning is warlike. The Editor has heard on good authority, that an army will take the field in the cold season across the Sutlege. This every body has heard; but our contemporary says, that the several corps destined to share in the operations have been fixed on, and that Sir Charles Napier will command the troops, and that Sir Hugh Gough has been invited to take his seat in Council. Is it to be believed however that if there is any sharp fighting work to do,—and the struggle with the Sikhs, will be different from that with the Chinese—the Commander-in-Chief will not be in the immediate vicinity, or that the Governor General will not find that his post is by the side of His Excellency?

The Colombo Observer states, that his Excellency the Governor of Mozambique, his Lady and three children had arrived from Galle, and proceeded to the Rest House, but did not meet with the slightest hospitality from any of the British functionaries. Mr. Misso, an East Indian, and a medical practitioner in the Petta was the only individual who opened his door to them.

MONDAY, MAY 13.

The papers of this morning give a list of eighteen additional passengers on the Hindoostan which leaves Calcutta on Wednesday; namely sixteen gentlemen and two ladies; making a sum total of 96 passengers from this Port.

Letters from Sukker confirm the rumour that our troops had experienced a reverse beyond Sikarpore, in an encounter with the marauding Beloochers. "Tait, with the Camel corps, attacked one of their forts on the other side of the desert, and was driven back with 11 killed and 20 wounded, and was hotly pressed in a retrograde movement he afterwards made."

We regret to state that the Editor of the Delhi Gazette has learned from a man lately arrived from Bokhara direct, that Col. Stoddart and Captain Conolly have certainly suffered death. The man states however that there is a European there, disguised as to dress; and he is supposed to be Mr. Hart, an officer of the Bombay army, who was known to have gone from Bhawalpore across the Indus up to Peshawur, and thence into Central India, in the garb of a Jew during the year 1843.

The Hurkaru's direct advices from Lahore to the 25th Instant state, that Golab Singh is extremely indignant at the murder of his brother, and declares he has no confidence in the minister, his nephew. Troops are flocking to him in every direction, and it is possible he may move down upon Lahore, where the Government is becoming daily more and more disorganized, and the troops more and more obstreperous.

The Bombay Courier states that a recommendation has gone home for the appointment of Sir Charles Napier to the Supreme Council; to this, there are two objections, first that Sir Charles is in the Queen's and not in the Company's service; and secondly that his Excellency would be quite as much out of place in the Cabinet as he is at home in the Field.

TUESDAY, MAY 14.

We find that all our contemporaries have been trusting their summaries to the Hindoostan Steamer. The Star is afraid she may take the ground from the weight; if so, it must be the fault of the office that sends most copies and we rather wonder our contemporary should, by regarding the Overland Englishman as the cause of the two former mishaps, concede this honour to that journal. But will the papers reach England as quickly by our Steamer as they would if sent by the Bombay Steamer, supposing both vessels to arrive simultaneously at Suez? Will the Government Agent receive the packages of the interloper, and transmit them with the same care and punctuality as those brought by the official vessels of the state? Our experience leads us to believe, that they are not treated alike. In November last all the letters we sent by Bombay, arrived; of those sent by the Hindoostan not one reached its destination; and we have repeated complaints, that papers sent by the Steamers direct from Calcutta, do not arrive punctually.

The Assam steamer which left Calcutta last week was obliged to return, but having been refitted started yesterday on her 6th voyage. The Hurkaru has given a long list of her packages from which the New Steam Navigation Company will easily be able to determine that there will be no lack of employment.

We alluded some weeks ago to the gratifying fact that Bundelkund had subsided into a state of tranquillity ever since our ascendancy was established at Gwalior. But it seems that we have been whistling before we were out of the wood. The Delhi Gazette assures us, that he has learnt from an undoubtedly authentic source, that scarcely a week passes without villages being plundered and burnt. It is somewhat singular, that no one should hear of the maraudings and conflagrations, but our good brother of Delhi.

Letters and papers have been received from China and the Straits; but the intelligence is neither fresh nor interesting. From the Straits, we are sorry to hear that the Steamer Royal Sovereign took her departure for the last time for Malacca and Penang. The experiment of running a steamer between the three settlements has failed. There is not sufficient intercourse to pay her expenses. Two French frigates had arrived at Singapore and were to await the arrival of the grand embassy which the French Government is sending to the Emperor of China.

A Correspondent of the Englishman in this morning's paper, writing from Arracan objects to our notice of the remarkable salubrity of the country as contrasted with its former unhealthy state. He thinks our error has arisen from the long list of passengers who go down to the Coast in the Amherst. Not so; we know that they go for the sea breeze. Our information was derived from officers who have long resided on the island and our opinion was more particularly formed from the extraordinary health enjoyed by the 65th N. I.—Friend of India.

Printed and Published by P.S.D' Rozario and Co.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 21.]

CALCUTTA : SATURDAY, MAY 25, 1844.

[VOL. VI.

THURSDAY, MAY 16.

Letters from Lucknow state that Captain Hodgson who, suffered so severely from the attacks of a tygress, is doing extremely well.

The Star says it is unquestionable that Government intends to have a large army in the field next cold season; and that the Commissariat officers at Ferozepore have been instructed to lay in large supplies of grain. It is also said that Sir Hugh Gough is invited to give his assistance in Council, with the view of bringing Sir Charles Napier into command on the N. W. frontier, and that the Governor General proposes to go off as soon after the fire-works as possible. Are we to understand then that Sir Hugh Gough is to be brought down to Council, where he will have nothing to do, and that Lord Ellenborough and Sir Charles Napier are to manage the war with the Sikhs next winter? Such an arrangement is preposterous and unlikely, for there must be two parties to the bargain.

The London December Mail, reached Singapore on the 13th of April. That Mail was in the harbour on the 24th February in the Laurick, which took the letters on to China instead of delivering them. The fault rests with the Chief Mate who assured the Commander that the Singapore packets had been delivered; when to his dismay they were found to be still on board on the arrival of the vessel in China. The Captain must of course suffer for the misconduct of his officer, and submit to a heavy fine.

The Englishman states, that Baboo Mootee Lall Seel, whom the Supreme Court allowed the other day to levy twenty-five per Cent. interest with perfect impunity, has addressed a Circular Letter to the Commission Agents in Calcutta denouncing a mercantile House as being in the habit of selling their constituent's goods at one price and rendering their account sales at another.

Sir W. Parker has safely reached Madras, and arrangements have been made to get up a public entertainment in honour to the old Admiral who assisted in humbling the dragon throne.

FRIDAY, MAY 17.

The Hurkaru states, that the disbandment of the 34th N. I. and the escape of the other mutinous corps have caused much dissatisfaction among several of the Native Regiments. He also states, that Jack Sepoy has become a politician of late years. By what means? He has not learnt English, nor does he read our newspapers. Has there been any attempt to instruct him in his own tongue, or to feed him with literature.

The number of letters and covers despatched from Bombay on the 1st instant, was 46,607; namely 35,508 letters, and 11,099 papers.

A most audacious case of forgery has just been brought to light at Bombay. Two Natives some months ago, went repeatedly to the office of Messrs. Leckie and Co. to ensure goods on the part of Native or Parsee merchants of that town. On each occasion, they produced bills of exchange, purporting to be drawn by the Insurers on their Correspondents in England, and received the brokerage, which on these various transactions amounted to more than 600 Rupees. The Bills were drawn on fictitious firms and were of course returned, and the drawers whose names they bore, denied all knowledge of them. The forgery was perpetrated for the sake of the brokerage. The rogues are in custody.

SATURDAY, MAY 18.

The Bentinch arrived yesterday morning before noon. She has beat the Express, and brought us London papers in about forty days and sixteen hours. She left Suez on the 23d April at 5 p. m.; arrived at Aden at midnight on the 28th in 5 days and 7 hours. She was detained there, 1 day and 9 hours. She reached Galle on the 9th May at 1-45 p. m., that is in 9 days and 5 hours; remained there, 1 day and 4 hours; reached Madras in 2 days and 18 hours; remained there 6 hours and a quarter; left Madras, May 13th at 6-30 a. m. and in 2 days and 18 hours obtained a pilot. She was actually under Steam from Suez to Garden Reach 21 days, and under detention 3 days. Including stoppages as she has made the trip in 24 days. We are mortified to find that she brings from Suez only fourteen passengers.

The intelligence from Lahore is important. Affairs seem to be approaching a crisis, though they have been approaching it apparently for the last three months. Itur Singh, the uncle of Ajeet Singh, who murdered Shere Singh in September last, has since that period been living across the Sutlege, in the territories of the Puttecala Raja; all the estates of his family have been confiscated, and their establishments broken up. At the instigation, it is said, of Lena Singh, who recently went to Hurdwar to perform ablutions and then to Simlah to consult General Ventura, Ittur Singh crossed the Sutlege with a few attendants and found himself at the head of an army. He marched to the encampment of the two Princes, Kashmeera Singh and Peshora Singh, and Heera Singh is said to have moved out against the allies. Heavy cannonading has been heard at Ferozepore, and there are reports that a great battle has been fought with much slaughter on both sides; but all the rumours are uncertain, and we must wait a day or two for accurate particulars. It is said that Golab Singh and the widow of Suchet Singh are marching on Lahore, but which party they will join, is as yet unknown.

The Hurkaru says, that unpleasant reports are rife in town of a fresh mutiny across the Indus, among the troops whose subordination was recently purchased by submission to their demands. The rumour may be totally unfounded, but an outbreak among these troops would excite no astonishment. What is conceded to fear, and not to justice, is ever unsatisfactory to those who have been conciliated, who never cease to reproach themselves with not having demanded more, and seize the first opportunity of renewing and augmenting their demands.

We rejoice to learn from the Hurkaru, a corroboration of our own intelligence, that the Cholera and Small Pox have now subsided. The ravages of this last disease in Calcutta, in the first four months of this year exceed all former records. The victims in 1839, as reported to the Police were 81; in 1840, 22; in 1841, 66; in 1842, 21; in 1843, 300; in the first four months of this year 1839. The Cholera returns are also fearful, having been in the whole of last year, 4686; in the first four months of this year, 4426.

MONDAY, MAY 20.

Letters have been received from the Cape to the 28th March. The Earl of Hardwicke had arrived there after a passage of seven weeks. There had been ten deaths on board; two of the deceased were passengers;—Capt. Edmonds of the 9th Foot, and Mr. Taylor. Sir Peregrine Maitland, the new Governor, had arrived, and Dr. Wallich had taken his passage in the Lord Hungerford, which may be expected, they say, about the middle of June.

The intelligence of a battle having been fought in the Punjab is confirmed. Heera Singh brought 120 pieces of Artillery, 24 battalions of Infantry and a great proportion of Cavalry against the insurgents, who were completely routed. Ittur Singh, Bacc Wyr Singh and Cashmera Singh have been slain, with the larger portion of their followers. The head of Ittur Singh is said to have been sent to Lahore. We have extracted from our two North-Western contemporaries full accounts of this decisive engagement, which for the present, leaves the young Minister with no enemy apparently to manage, but the troops who have given him this triumph.

The Gwalior Durbar has been thrown into a state of consternation by the unexpected arrest of Goreparry, the father of the Regent Bacc, by order of Mr. Hamilton, the Resident at Indore. He is to be sent as a state prisoner to Asseergur. Nothing treasonable, nothing dangerous was found upon him. He is described as a great simpleton, and far too timid to be a traitor; yet he is arrested, they say on the charge of having stirred up the Mulwa people to mutiny! Before this prostrate Durbar had recovered from its surprise, the Residency Moonshee appeared at the Council and read aloud a Khureetah from the Governor General the purport of which was that Boorhanpore, the Capital of Candesh, the wealthiest town in Scinde's dominions, must be ceded to the British Government. Immediately after, information was received from the Amil that the British Government had already taken possession of the town, even before a formal surrender could be made!! The Minister present protested against the seizure, as directly contrary to the last treaty, but the Moonshee advised the assembled chiefs to yield to invincible necessity, and his eloquence is said to have prevailed, and a chit was signed relinquishing to the Governor General, the only manufacturing town of the Raj!!! What cordial support may we not expect from the Gwalior state, if we should meet any check across the Sutlege in the present temper of our sepoy.

TUESDAY, MAY 21.

At the public sale of Opium held yesterday, 2175 chests were sold, and yielded 29,70,675 Rs. at an average of 1354 Rs. the chest. Assuming the original cost of the Opium at 300 Rs. the chest, the clear profit was £230,000 or twenty-three lakhs of Rupees.

The Bombay Times of the 11th gives us particulars of the reverse which a small party of our troops has suffered in Beloochistan. It appears that Captain Tait and Lieut. Fitzgerald followed the enemy to their stronghold at Poolajee, which they found fortified and defended; they attempted to force the place at noonday, but were obliged to retire with the loss of ten men killed and twenty wounded. Lieut. Bruce was the only officer hurt. There was a rumour a day or two ago of a fresh mutiny in the 64th, one of the refractory Regiments; but the Times simply states that discontents still prevailed among the men, and that some ten were in confinement for trespasses in the Bazar.

The Bombay Express with the Mails of April, came in yesterday morning, about three days after the arrival of the Bentinch.

Yesterday, was consigned to the tomb at Serampore Mrs. C. Bie, at the advanced age of 70 years. She was the oldest European inhabitant of this settlement. She came out from Europe at the early age of twelve, at a time when the town of Serampore was in the zenith of its prosperity; when, as we learn from Warren Hastings's Review of the State of Bengal, twenty-two vessels of 10,630 tons burden discharged their cargo at our wharf in nine months. She was married to Mr. Bie, the Magistrate, the nephew of the Governor who first welcomed the Missionaries to Serampore when the Bengal Government had issued orders for their instant departure, and she survived her husband more than twenty years. She was attended to the grave by a large concourse of the inhabitants, anxious to pay their respects to the last of the ancients.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 22.

The Delhi Gazette states that the ex-Raja of Jeitpore, who has long been a fugitive in Bundelkund, has cut up a party of Capt. Parker's people, and that ten villages have been plundered and burnt. We put this startling intelligence in italics that it may attract the notice of some friend in Bundelkund who can confirm or contradict it. It is very unaccountable that the distracted state of Bundelkund, the defeat of our troops, the plunder and conflagration of so many villages, should not be considered worthy of being communicated to any of the Editors in Calcutta.—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 22.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JUNE 1, 1844.

[VOL. VI.

THURSDAY, MAY 23.

A subscription has been set on foot among the Medical officers of the Presidency, and will soon be circulated in the country, for the purchase of a Testimonial to Mr. J. R. Martin for the good office he has rendered the service of which he was formerly so distinguished a member. In the scale of retiring pensions for medical officers, the Court had fixed one of £100 for 17 years service, and one of £300 for 25 years, but without any intermediate pension. Through the exertions of Mr. Martin, they have now been induced to create a pension of £260 for twenty-two years service.

The Madras papers state, that the Mortar found at Kurnaul, had been actually shipped on board H. M. Ship the Cornwallis. It weighs eight tons, and is a huge unsightly monster; yet it will create an interest at home, and if shewn for money, might be brought, by a little puffing, to yield as much as would be sufficient to cast another.

It was stated in the Madras Journals some weeks ago, that some Native youths belonging to one of the public institutions in that town having gone on board the Bentinck Steamer to examine her machinery, were treated with extraordinary rudeness by some of the gentlemen passengers, members of the Bengal Civil Service. As the names of all the passengers on that vessel were well known, no little reproach was reflected on those whom the ruinour was known to refer to. The Madras papers now state that the report was gratuitous from beginning to end, and that there was not the smallest foundation for it. What powers of invention some of the good folks at Madras must possess?

FRIDAY, MAY 24.

The papers advertise a new and invaluable Hat which has just been invented in Bond Street. It is a ventilating Hat, a non-conductor of heat or damp, and unchangeable in all climates; and it has the marvellous virtue of keeping the head cool.

The Hurkaru alludes to the important fact mentioned in letters brought by the last mail that the product of the gold mines of Russia had nearly doubled last year, and that the returns reached three millions and a half sterling. At this rate of increase, a most important change will soon be wrought in all commercial dealings throughout the world.

The Agra Ukhar states, that the troops in Jumna, under Goolab Singh are clamorous for higher pay and have been invited by Heera Singh to join him. This latter part of the story however may be well doubted.

Rumours are current at Delhi that Lord Ellenborough intends to make that city his Head Quarters, and that an army of 100,000 men is to be assembled. Where are they to come from.

The Englishman of this morning questions the propriety of encouraging the cultivation of Cotton in the mode which has been adopted by the Court of Directors; in the course of the argument it says, "We are convinced that with the encouragement which Government could give without much cost, a very great and permanent improvement might be effected in this important staple. Remove the difficulties thrown in the way of the cultivation by the Revenue Officer" &c. We should like to know what those difficulties are, since the revenue officer, we believe, collects a rent, permanently fixed in the Lower Provinces, and fixed for thirty years in the Upper Provinces.

SATURDAY, MAY 25.

Yesterday, being her Majesty's birth-day, the flag was not hoisted in the cantonments at Barrackpore. This is the second year in which this insult has been offered, and we trust it will not pass unnoticed by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief. The day was suitably honoured by the Governor General, who held a Durbar, which was attended by the heads of Native Society in Calcutta, and the representatives of the princes of India. The Durbar, says the Hurkaru, was conducted after the native fashion; but what does the reporter of our contemporary mean when he says, the Durbar broke up at about 11 "after the mode of thanksgiving?" It is understood that 1200 Rs. worth of "their favourite mehtoyas" in the shape of moondas, were distributed among the Sepoys. We seem determined to cram them with sweet till their heads are turned, and they think themselves necessary to us, and then will come the beginning of the end. The fireworks which were to have been let off were not ready, and will not be exhibited before Wednesday.

We learn from an advertisement, that "Hodgson" has sent out a batch of Beer by the China, with the hope of regaining his footing in the market. Time was when nothing but Hodgson was drunk in India, and when the announcement that he intended to repair his premises and could send no supply for six months, produced as much consternation almost as the half batta order. But he has gradually gone entirely out of fashion. We shall watch with some curiosity this attempt to revive an extinct reputation.

The Agra Ukhar received this morning, announces another revolution in the Punjab. The Delhi Gazette gives the same news with the additional report, that Heerah Singh has been murdered or has fled; that the lad Dhuleep has been dethroned and Peshora Singh seated on it, with Lena Singh Majettea for his prime Minister. This is rather a more rapid shifting of the scenes than we were prepared for, but every account from across the Sutlege, must be received with mistrust, till it has been thrice repeated.

The Englishman contradicts the rumour that Sir Hugh Gough is to be brought down and detained in indolence at the Council Board, while we are conquering the Punjab. He says, that the announcement was premature, which is not altogether the most appropriate term to apply to a project which he says immediately after never was intended.

The same paper says, there is a rumour that the 64th has mutinied beyond the Indus and been dreadfully cut up by the Bombay troops. This says the journal, may be possible, but is hardly probable, for the move of the above corps to Scinde was unconditional. No, not unconditional. The ablest correspondent of the Delhi Gazette, and one of the best writers in India, we mean Goban Cear, in an admirable letter which appears in the last number, says—The 64th vowed they would not move, and it is positively averred by those on the spot that they would have kept their word and had arranged an open mutiny for next morning, but luckily (or unluckily as it may be) that very night arrived the letter of the Commander-in-Chief (who it seems had crate blanche to deal with them) promising every thing they wanted, at least so it was explained.

MONDAY, MAY 27.

The papers state that soon after the battle fought in the neighbourhood of Ferozepore between the troops of Heerah Singh and Ittur Singh, when the victors came down and encamped on the banks of the Sutlege, threatening to cross over and visit Ferozepore, an express was sent off to Sir Hugh Gough, which arrived when his excellency was at church. Within five hours expresses were sent by him to the plains to concentrate troops on Sirhind, and before the close of the day the Commander-in-Chief himself was on his way with his personal staff to Kussowlie. Soon after, a second express arrived from the Political Agent at Ferozepore to say that the Sikh troops had returned towards Lahore, and the concentration of our troops was accordingly countermanded. But this exhibition of vigour at Head Quarters cannot fail to inspire confidence. Had the same vigor been exhibited when the intelligence of our disasters at Cabul arrived, more than half the army might have been saved.

The native merchants of Bombay have again covered themselves with honour by their public spirit. Sometime back a fire broke out in Bombay, which but for the virgorous exertions of a number of sailors and soldiers under the direction of Capt. Sir R. Oliver, General Baumgardt, and the Senior Magistrate, Mr. LeGeyt, would have been attended with a very heavy loss of life and property. The Native merchants have formed a little purse of 5000 Rs. among themselves, and sent it to the gentlemen above named, who have distributed it among the soldiers and seamen, and those who were most active in extinguishing the fire.

We regret to announce the death of G. F. Hamilton, Esq. the Collector of Patna, at the age of 34.

The Star informs us, that the Windsor Castle Steamer, has been sold to the King of Ava, and left this report for the Burmese dominions some days ago. The Fire Queen, started under the auspices of Messrs. Mackay and Co. and intended to ply between Calcutta and Singapore, has left England, and may be expected here in July next.

We now learn that the monster Howitzer captured at Kurnoul was according to the last accounts, still on the beach of Madras. Every attempt which had been made to get it off on a raft to the Cornwallis had failed.

TUESDAY, MAY 28.

An Advertisement appears in the papers of this morning relative to a Hooghly Steam Tug Company. The Messrs. Green have built two powerful Tugs, and they wish to dispose of them to a Company which shall use them in Tugging ships in this river. The Tug business is a very profitable one, and yields ten per cent. But the projectors of the proposed Company must give us more data before they can expect their scrip to gain a footing in the market. Do they intend to charge the same price as the Association which has so long engaged a monopoly of the business? What percentage do they promise shareholders, and on what data is their calculation based?

There was a curious police case in the Hurkharu yesterday. A respectable Native went to the auction with 500 Rupees in Notes tied up in the corner of his toga, and meeting a Jew, a conversation ensued. Subsequently the notes were found to have flown away; and not long after the Jew was discovered changing some of them, which were identified by the number. He came with them of course by acshedent, and as there was no evidence of any fraudulent transfer, the Jew got the benefit of the doubt and escaped.

The accounts from Lahore are again contradictory. Peshora Sing has not ascended the throne, nor has Heera Singh, the Prime Minister, fled to his paternal mountains. The result of the battle, as yet known, has only been to increase the hauteur of the victorious troops, and to weaken the authority of Heera Singh.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 29.

We regret to learn from the Hurkharu, that Lady Nicholls, the Lady of our late Commander-in-Chief, died at Rome on her way to England.

The latest accounts from the Punjab, up to the time of our going to press were that Peshora Singh had received a Jaggeer from Heera Singh and proceeded to take possession of it, that the troops suspecting that he had been put to death insisted on seeing him, and Heera Singh told them to depute two men from each regiment to ascertain the fact. It is said that Mihrab Lall, who succeeded to the command of Heera Singh's troops on the death of Goolab Singh was sending the Zenana of the murdered Cashmeera Singh to the hills when his own troops discovered it and rescued the females, drove away Mihrab Lall, and marched on Lahore. It is reported that they are in a state of open revolt, and have gained possession of the city and vow that unless their pay is raised to 15 Rupees a month, they will sack it. Heera Singh had not been able to pacify them.—Friend of India.

Printed and Published by P.S.D' Rozario and Co.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 23.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JUNE 8, 1844.

[Vol. VI.]

THURSDAY, MAY 30.

We have received a Singapore Free Press, of the 25th April, from which we are happy to learn that the report which was industriously circulated in China that the Dutch commercial agents at the island of Bali had been massacred by the Natives, is contradicted. A Vessel which left the island so late as the middle of February brings accounts that the Dutch were never in any danger.

From the same paper we regret to learn that the Hooghly Steamer had returned from her search for the missing crew of the Pelorus, without having seen or heard any thing of them.

A letter from Hong Kong, published in the Englishman, states that the gallant 55th had embarked for England from that place. About 1,351 men proceeded with this corps to China in May, 1841, or joined it subsequently, of whom 160 have been invalided, 68 have volunteered for the 98th Regt., and 460 men have been killed in action, or by the climate, or have perished in the course of Military service; only 664 men embark on their return to England.

FRIDAY, MAY 31.

The number of covers dispatched by the Cleopatra steamer from Bombay on the 20th of May exhibits a sad falling off, as compared with previous months. The letters amounted to 17,483, and the newspapers to 5,810; total 23,293. But as the Home Government does not permit the mails to be sent by our Steamers and will not allow them to be made up except for Bombay, the covers brought to Bombay by the Atalanta from England on the 12th instant, exhibited no decrease. The letters amounted to 41,430, and the papers to 48,100; total 89,530. Nearly one-half of these were destined for Calcutta and Madras, and the vicinity; and the Hindoostan was at Suez at the time when the mails arrived there, but instead of our mails being sent on by her, at a small charge of postage, the whole of the mail was sent to Bombay, and all the letters came that round-about route, charged with a heavy rate of postage.

The Singapore Free Press of the 9th May, mentions the arrival there of Mr. Davis, the Governor of Hong Kong, together with the official Staff on the Spiteful, Steamer. They proceeded to their destination on the 30th of April.

The Bombay papers for some time back have announced the intention of Sir Charles Napier to hold an assembly of Chiefs at Hyderabad on Her Majesty's birth-day. The object of this gathering of all the principal men in a country not yet reconciled to our yoke, has not transpired; though it must be of sufficient importance to justify the risk which is incurred. The Military preparations which have been made to prevent any danger, could scarcely have been greater if Sir Charles expected a hostile army, instead of an assembly of subject chieftains. The guns on the fortifications of Hyderabad are to be shotted; the entrenched camp is to be fortified, and the Steamers on the river are to be moored in such a position, as to prevent a surprise. It is said that no fewer than 15,000 chiefs will be assembled on the occasion, each of whom is to be limited to a single attendant; the assembly will therefore comprise no fewer than 30,000 Mahomedans. Can all this pomp and show be intended only to inform the bearded Belogheo, that his youthful Sovereign, the Queen of England, has attained her 25th year, or is there some deep stroke of policy at the bottom of the scheme?

The Star of this morning publishes a letter from Berhampore, which is worthy the notice of the mercantile community. It is well known, that for last two or three years, Indian silk piece goods have sadly fallen in estimation in the London market, owing to the dishonesty of the native manufactures who had adopted the practice of preparing goods of inferior value and weight, and making up the deficiency by covering them with a composition of rice-paste, and sugar. Latterly the article has been recovering its credit, but there appears every chance of its retrograding from the renewed adoption of those fraudulent practices, which come so natural to the Native manufacturer, and which would always keep the manufactures and produce of India in a depressed state, were not European honesty interposed. A sound Corah ought to weigh from 30 to 32 Siccas, faithfully woven throughout, with 1700 threads. The deteriorated Corah has only 1400 threads, and weighs from 26 to 29 Siccas, but it is brought up to the standards by paste, which may easily be detected by washing.

The Madras Record gives us the names of the additional passengers taken by the Steamer from Madras. They amounted to 14 gentlemen, 4 ladies, and 10 children. Including the passengers from Calcutta, the Hindoostan, has no fewer than 600, perhaps the largest number which any vessel ever carried from the shores of India.

SATURDAY, JUNE 1.

We have an arrival from Singapore of so late a date as the 9th of May, but the intelligence brought is devoid of political interest. It is melancholy to learn that the Hon. Erskine Murray, who left Hong Kong some time back in his own yacht, with two other vessels for Borneo, has been barbarously massacred by a Native chief at Menado, where he was endeavouring to form a settlement.

While every effort is made in England to fix the stigma of public reprobation on the barbarous practise of Duelling, we are informed that an affair—as it is called—of honour, came off at Mussouric, between Lieutenant Campbell of the Invalids, and Lieutenant Tytler of the 38th N. I. The former is dangerously wounded.

We stated last Week, that the Durbar at Gwalior had been thrown into a state of consternation by a demand on the part of the Governor-General of the cession of Boorhampore, a town of great manufacturing importance, the former capital of Candeish. While they were debating what reply should be given, information was brought that the town had already been seized. This intelligence is confirmed by letters from the neighbourhood.

MONDAY, JUNE 2.

The last Delhi Gazette gives us no news of any importance from the Punjab; but the Englishman has a letter from Ferozepore, which states the report brought by a European, formerly in the British service, who, after obtaining his discharge, took service with Shere Sing. He has just escaped from Lahore, which he reports to be in a state of the most perfect anarchy from the weakness of the Government and the insolence of the soldiery. His statement corresponds with all the original reports received by our contemporaries, the Hurkarn, the Delhi Gazette, and the Agra Shikhar, direct from Lahore and appears therefore fully entitled to credit.

The Insolvent Court on Saturday discharged more than half a dozen detenues. In the matter of Bruce, Shand and Co., Mr. W. Limond, who was recently appointed arbitrator to examine the accounts filed by the Assignees Mr. Hufnagle and Mr. Alexander, with a view to ascertain whether commission had been twice charged by them, has reported that in three instances double commission has been charged on the same sum. As this is rather a serious question, Mr. O'Dowda, the official Assignee, who has been holding Mr. Alexander's appointment during his absence for more than a twelvemonth, asked whether the Assignees might not put in an affidavit to show that the principle on which Mr. Limond had proceeded was erroneous. Sir H. W. Seton suggested that it would be better for Mr. Leith to put in a short petition setting forth explicitly what he applied for.

The Government of Bengal has just published the names of twenty-seven emigrants, who died on a single vessel, the Louisa Buillie, on their way from Demarara to Calcutta; and has requested claimants to appear and prove their right to the sums deposited with it. These men accumulated an aggregate sum of Rs. 6,216 during their residence in British Guiana, and though every inducement was offered them to remain, they sighed for their native land and resolved to return to it, but fell a prey to disease on the passage.

A flood in Jessore has done some injury to the plant, but the accounts from all the other important indigo districts are favourable, and as the river does not appear to have risen as yet, and the country has been abundantly blessed with rain, it is possible that, for the first time, we may have two abundant crops in succession.

A letter signed Dacker published in the Bombay Courier has some sensible observations on the state of the military, but they smell so rank of the spirit of the Presidency that we content ourselves with giving the facts. He states that money rations were unknown in Scinde till it became necessary to send Bengal troops thither; that what had been withheld from the hard working, steady Ducks was granted to the mutinous Bengalees; that the circumstances of the country do not demand that any such addition should be made to the men's pay, and that the assertion of the high price of provisions is an untruth. As far as the sepoy's wants are concerned, he says that Scinde is one of the cheapest countries on the Western side; the men live in good and robust health in the worst parts of the country, on three Rupees a month, and the Sepoys are ridiculously—perhaps dangerously—overpaid.

TUESDAY, JUNE 4.

The Hurkarn publishes a letter from the Government of Bengal permitting Collectors to receive Company's paper as a deposit for the payment of the Government Land Revenue. This concession to the wishes of the public has been received with much gratitude. It will relieve the merchants, capitalists, and traders from a severe inconvenience, without impairing the integrity of the public revenue.

From the Englishman we learn that a still more important concession to the public is about to be made by an Act of the Legislative Council, and that fifteen days will be allowed between the occurrence of default and the sale of the estate. This will enable mortgagees to defeat the villany of mortgagors who may choose to withhold the revenue on the last day, and thus ~~arrest~~ on the sale of the estate before it can be arrested.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 5.

We are happy to learn, that Government has appointed Mr. Ireland, Principal of the Dacca College, Inspector General of Schools under the Bengal division of the Presidency, upon a salary of 700 Rupees a month. This is one of the most important and at the same time necessary measures which Government has adopted in the cause of education for many years.—Friend of India.

JUST RECEIVED.

Holy Readings, 24mo. cloth, 1 Rupee 8 Annas. The Archconfraternity of the Immaculate Heart of Mary—its Origin and Progress, with some of the most remarkable conversions obtained through its Prayers, 10 Annas.

Gother's Papist Misrepresented and Represented, new edition, with Notes and Appendix, 8 Annas.

O'Connell's Ireland, vol. I. 8vo. cloth, 6 Rs.

JUST REPRINTED:

Baddeley's Sure Way to find out the True Religion, 2 Annas.

P. S. D'ROZARIO & Co.

Printed and Published by P. S. D'ROZARIO and Co.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 24.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JUNE 15, 1844.

[VOL. VI.]

THURSDAY, JUNE 6.

The papers state that Lord Ellenborough has taken a House at Garden Reach, five miles to the South of Government House, Calcutta. The Hurkaru supposes that this movement arises from the repairs which are to be given to the House at Barrackpore. We believe he is mistaken; Barrackpore Park needs no repairs at present. There is every reason to suppose that it arises from his Lordship's desire to be nearer his Council. Barrackpore is fifteen miles from town.

The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette affirms that a large gang of robbers has been committing depredations. Two villages have been plundered; some houses burnt. Some individuals have had their noses cut off, and two bankers have been carried off into the jungles.

A pamphlet has just issued from the Agra Press, entitled "The annexation of Scinde to British India; a measure just, politic, and righteous." It consists of a series of papers which appeared in the Agra Ukhbar, and which are said to have excited such interest that the writer has been induced to give them in a more permanent form to the world.

Some little time ago, the Court of Directors issued orders that no officer should obtain the command of a Company until he had attained a sufficient knowledge of the colloquial and written language of the country. The test of qualification has now been published. Candidates will be required to read and translate correctly the Bagho Buhar, and the Bytal Pucheesee, the former in Persian, the latter in the Deva Nagree character and to translate into Hindoostance, in an easy narrative style, some passages from English; the translation to be written legibly both in Persian and Deva Nagree. The colloquial knowledge of the language will be tested by the examiners.

Mr. Cowell, the Father of the Civil Service, has at length resigned it after a service of more than fifty-one years, during which period he has never visited England. Mr. Wemyss, who is also near the head of the list, has likewise resigned the service.

The Hurkaru says, it is currently reported that the Deputy-Governor proceeds to England by an early steamer; that the Commander-in-Chief does not come to Calcutta; that Mr. Madock will succeed to the Deputy-Governorship; and that Sir George Pollock will be called to take a seat in Council, if no one else be appointed from home. Those who live longest will see most. As to an early steamer, there are but two more opportunities this year, one on the 15th July the other on the 15th September. As the Deputy-Governor's time is not up before the 15th October, it is not to be supposed that he will go before the 15th September; and before that time, we shall hear the determination of the Court, as to filling up the vacancy occasioned by the death of Sir W. Casement.

FRIDAY, JUNE 7.

The following very loyal effusion appears in one of the late numbers of the Prubhakur, a native paper, in some remarks directed against the Editor of the Star :—

"What shall we say of our rulers, the betrayers of the awful trust which God has placed in their hands, who, not content with robbing the sons of the soil of twenty crores per annum, and fattening their minions, most of whom have nothing but their pale faces to recommend them, on the golden ribs of India, are so ungenerous as to reject a reasonable request of the Society. But take courage, countrymen, the time is fast approaching when you will have to co-operate with the kind hearted John Bull, not of India but of England, in exacting your just rights from the reigning tyrants, or wrenching from their grasp the rule of your country. Never falter and you will never fall."—Translated from the Prubhakur.

The Hurkaru publishes a report that, on the recall of the Whigs to office, the Marquis of Clanricarde will come out to India. The son-in-law of George Canning will be most welcome on the shores of India, but when are the Whigs to return to the sweets of office?

A third duel has just been fought in the neighbourhood of the Hills in the North West. The first took place at Simlah, the other at Mussoorie, and we now hear of one at Meerut between Major S. of the Lancers and Mr. George B. of the Civil Service. The latter was wounded, in the thigh. The dispute arose out of a little contre temps at a Ball. Three duels in a month or so, immediately after the practise has been openly reprobated by the Prime Minister! Would it not be beneficial to the public interests if the Governor-General were to take up the matter here as his own Colleagues have done at home, and fix some mark of official reprobation on it?

The Englishman states that five Assistant-Surgeons have been ordered for immediate service in Scinde and will proceed thither immediately, either in the Queen or Tenasserim Steamer.

SATURDAY, JUNE 8.

The Englishman of this morning publishes a letter from Government to the Chamber of Commerce, in reply to a request from that body, that the influence of the Governor-General might be employed with the Home authorities to procure the transmission of the mails from England, which are destined for Calcutta and Madras, by the Hindoostan and the Bentinck. His Lordship has promised to send the memorial home, and to give it his fullest support. This is an instance of the wisdom with which public affairs are managed. The Government at home has actually discouraged the despatch of letters direct to Calcutta, and threatened with fines those who may attempt to send them, and now require a memorial from the merchants and the entreaty of the local authorities here to do that which common sense of itself would have dictated to them long since.

The Agra Ukhar states that Lord Ellenborough has reversed his decision and agreed to restore the city of Boorhanpore to the Gwalior Durbar. Why it was ever seized, it is difficult to divine. It certainly was not mentioned among the places which were to be transferred to the British Government for the payment of the debt. We had therefore no right apparently to seize it. It is now said that the seizure of the city was ordered by His Lordship on certain representation hastily made against the Amil by Mr. Bell, the Collector.

The Hurkaru has news from Lahore to the 22d instant. Every thing is quiet. We were told not ten days ago that there were 100,000 troops at the Capital, threatening to demolish the Government; now we are informed that they are gone to their respective homes on furlough for four months, and that there are not five thousand troops at Lahore. The Hurkaru recommends the information to the attention of the Governor-General, but we fancy it will not induce his Lordship to alter his pacific policy. It was confidently averred the other day that his Lordship would leave Calcutta as soon after the fireworks as possible; now we learn that so far from going to the North, he has taken a House at Garden Reach, six miles South of Calcutta.

We have copied from the Bombay Times an account of the total anarchy which seems to reign in Guzerat, in which property has ceased any longer to be safe. Such a catalogue of barefaced depredations has seldom been presented to the reader.

Lord Ellenborough has presented Captain Wall, of the Tenasserim, with 1000 Rupees for having brought the Ameers of Scinde safe and sound to Calcutta. It is said that they are shortly to quit Dum-Dum and proceed to the solitary residence selected for them in the Hills at Hazareebaugh. The fat-boy would much rather remain in Calcutta.

MONDAY, JUNE 10.

A daring dacoity has been committed at Goruckpore. A gang of eight men, taking advantage of the absence of a proprietor of one of the grants, attacked the banker's house, plundered him of money to a very large amount, and stripped his wife of all her jewels. Six of the villagers were cut down. Two are dead, and the rest in a dangerous state.

The papers have repeatedly stated of late that Lena Singh Majettea, perhaps the ablest man of the Punjab and the rival of Ilera Singh, was coming down to Benares to meet the Governor-General. Our contemporaries do not seem to calculate the probabilities which lie against this story. There is in the first place no sign or appearance of the Governor-General's going to the West. He has just taken a house at Garden Reach, which looks as though he was going to pitch his tabernacle near Calcutta for some time; and secondly, an interview between Lena Singh, the rival of the Prime Minister, and the Governor-General, would be considered as little short of a declaration of war, for which it does not appear that this Government is anxious.

TUESDAY, JUNE 11.

The Assam Steamer appears to have made a singularly fortunate trip to Allahabad. Including two days in which she was detained by a gale, she has performed the voyage in twenty-one days. She arrived at Allahabad on the 30th. On the 2d, she was on her return at Mirzapore, taking in a cargo of Sugar and Lac dye. These are certainly encouraging circumstances for the Inland Steam Navigation Company. There can be no doubt, that as soon as a system is established, of which the great principles shall be progressive improvement, there will be a degree of liveliness and activity imparted to the internal trade of the country, of which we can now have no conception. The present is the first instance in which a Steamer has brought a return cargo of produce from the Upper Provinces.

The Agra Ukhar of the 1st, states that the Duke of Wellington has conveyed to Sir Hugh Gough "his most unqualified approbation of the measures adopted at Maharajpore, couched in the most gratifying language." This information is very likely to be true. Let us see how it bears on existing rumours. It is said that the Governor-General has resolved to invite the Commander-in-Chief to the Council Board, and to place Sir Charles Napier in command in the North West, in anticipation of a winter campaign against the Sikhs. The arrangement can only arise from a mistrust of Sir Hugh Gough's abilities as a General, founded upon the strategies of Maharajpore. This public expression of mistrust, would of course lead a high-spirited man like Sir Hugh to throw up his Commission as Commander-in-Chief; and Lord Ellenborough would thus compromise himself with the Duke, which he will not do. Therefore, Lord Ellenborough has not invited Sir Hugh to quit the scene of danger and honor, and sepulchre himself in the Council Chamber, or, if he ever dreamt of such a movement, the Duke's letter has dispelled the dream.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 12.

The United Service Journal of Madras states on the 31st of May, that Lieut.-Colonel Underwood of the Engineers has signified his willingness to retire on receiving a bonus of 50,000. Our contemporary expresses his astonishment by a note of admiration, but we believe the man he has mentioned is generally considered, even at this Presidency, as a reasonable bonus for relinquishing so valuable a position in that corps.

The only intelligence from Afghanistan, of any value is that Mahmud Ukhar Khan has been successful at Pushoot, where he failed, and Lieut. Pigou of the Engineers fell. The chief whom we fixed in authority there in 1840, has been expelled by Ukhar.

We beg to state that the rates of Exchange on England of the Agra Bank have risen a farthing since our last issue. The notice reached too late to admit of an alteration in the Advertisement.—Friend of India.

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 25.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JUNE 22, 1844.

[VOL. VI.

THURSDAY, JUNE 13.

The Star states that a junction has taken place between certain proprietors of Collieries in the district of Burdwan. It is said that the Company has a capital of eleven lakhs of Rupees. We mentioned this circumstance several months ago. The Collieries belonging to the house of Messrs. Carr, Tagore and Co., and those which were recently under the charge of Messrs. Gilmore and Co., have been united; and the new Company has thus obtained a complete control over the supply of Coal in Bengal.

A correspondent of the Bengal Hurkaru has endeavoured to persuade the public that the present indigo season is likely to be a failure. He says, Jessore, Dacca, and the adjacent districts have been destroyed by a gale, Kishnagur partially so; on the line of the Bhageruttee, there have been late rains, on the Jilinghee and in Moorshedabad there have been locusts, in Malda, drought, till lately; in Rungpore, overflowing rain. The result, we suppose, is to be a crop of some 30,000 maunds for Bengal! Such statements are always put forth whenever the crop is likely to be abundant, and prices to fall.

FRIDAY, JUNE 14.

A statement appeared some little time ago in the Agra Ukhbar, on the assertion of a correspondent, that a duel had been fought at Simlah, under circumstances which compromised the domestic peace and honour of a distinguished officer. It now appears that the statement was totally and entirely false, the fabrication of some unprincipled fellow. The Editor of that paper has offered an ample and honourable apology to the parties, through the medium of his own columns.

The Sikh troops at Peshawur have proved mutinous and left that place. Tej-sing, the Commander, managed by some means to keep back five guns and some artillery men. They subsequently became infected with the spirit of mutiny, and set off to join the other troops. They were recalled, but instead of obeying orders, attacked the messengers of peace, and a conflict ensued, in which twenty men were killed on both sides.

The case of the Raja of Tipperah versus Mr. Courjon, which has been re-tried in the Sudder Court, and in which the pleaders on both sides, though Englishmen, were, by the practice of the Court, obliged to use the native language, has been the subject of repeated remarks in the papers. But why are we not informed of the final decision of the Court, of the exact sum which was decreed, and of the principle on which the decree was founded?

The glad tidings have been received at Gwalior, that the Governor-General has restored the city of Moorhannpore, which had been so unaccountably seized, and that the father of the Bae regent, Goreparah, had been pardoned. All the members of the Council of Regency, went in solemn procession to the palace to hear Lord Ellenborough's gracious despatch read.

SATURDAY, JUNE 15.

From the Star we learn that Mr. Greenlaw, who has so long and ably filled the office of Secretary to the Marine Board, is obliged finally to retire from the service owing to his advancing years and feeble health. Mr. Sutherland, now Principal of Hoogly College is to be his successor. His practical acquaintance with maritime affairs, and his general knowledge of men and things, combined with his habits of industry, eminently fit him for this post; and we scarcely think Government could have made a happier choice.

The Ex-Ameers of Scinde are about to take their departure for Hazareebaugh under the medical care of Dr. Collins. Captain Gordon, who came round with them from Bombay, returns to that Presidency.

MONDAY, JUNE 17.

The Overland Mail of May arrived on Saturday morning about 10 o'clock, several days before it was expected. It brought intelligence of the recall of Lord Ellenborough. Before the evening, Mr. Bird had assumed the office of Governor-General, according to the provisions of the Act, and reappointed all the members of the late Governor-General's staff to the posts they respectively held under His Lordship. It does not appear that the appointment of Sir Henry Hardinge to succeed Lord Ellenborough, was determined on much before the 6th of May, the day on which the mail left London. We have, therefore, no certain information of the route he intended to take, or of the period when he proposed to embark. Some speak of his coming in the Hindoostan; others of the despatch of a Steamer from Bombay to wait his arrival at Suez on the 27th of July. Lord Ellenborough has retired to the House at Allipore which he had previously engaged, doubtless in anticipation of the event, of the probability of which intimation must have been given him, in the letters sent from England on the 6th of April, nine days before the Court of Directors made up their minds to depose him.

We regret to state that Mr. C. B. Greenlaw, the Secretary to the Superintendent of Marine, died on Saturday, of a lingering illness, at the age of sixty. He was from the beginning the steady and untiring advocate of the comprehensive plan of Steam communication, and to no single individual is the community under deeper obligations in this respect than to him. It is singular that he should have died on the very day on which intelligence arrived from England that the object of his public exertions had been accomplished, and that Her Majesty's Ministers had resolved to sanction a monthly intercourse between Calcutta, Madras, Ceylon, and Suez.

The Englishman states that Heera Singh had induced 8 or 10,000 of his turbulent soldiers to quit the capital, and retire on furlough to their homes, but that their place had been immediately filled with others; and that the Sikhs never will forgive him the death of the Gooroo, whom, however, they slew themselves. It is impossible to conjecture what effect the recall of Lord Ellenborough may have on the councils of Lahore.

The notorious Joychunder Pal Chondree, the Rana Ghat Zemindar, was in April last tried and convicted of an assault and false imprisonment in the Supreme Court of Calcutta, and entered into recognizances to appear and receive sentence. But he was soon after seized, under a warrant from the Magistrate of Nuddea, for the same offence, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment. He was, therefore, unable to appear, and his recognizances were respited. It is singular that after the lapse of seventy years since the establishment of our legal institutions in Bengal, they should continue to be so defective, that a man is liable to be punished in two tribunals for the same offence.

TUESDAY, JUNE 18.

The last Mail brings out Sir George Pollock's appointment to the Supreme Council, a natural result of his brother's influence in Downing Street, and of his own success in Afghanistan. It also announces Mr. Maddock's having been invested with a title of Knighthood, which is the most inexplicable news of the whole batch. Not that we begrudge this honourable distinction to a public servant of thirty-two years' standing. Indeed, we think that a larger distribution of honours among the distinguished members of the Civil Service, would do credit to the justice and wisdom of the Ministry. But—Lord Ellenborough's administration belongs now to the province of History, and we may speak of it with freedom—it seems strange, that the Ministry who have been fighting the Directors with the utmost fury, on Lord Ellenborough's behalf, should, as their last act in connection with his administration, have conferred such a distinction on one who was anything but the friend of the Governor-General; at the same time that they so ceremoniously overlooked his recommendation in another respect.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 19

The Englishman states that the Hindoostan Steamer, which was expected to leave Suez on the 24th of the present month, and to reach Calcutta about the 15th of July, would be detained at Suez till the first of July to bring out Sir Henry Hardinge, our new Governor-General. As he would leave England by an express steamer, we may expect to receive intelligence by the Hindoostan a week later than that brought by the monthly mail.

The meeting of the Scinde chiefs, at Hyderabad, has been the cause of no little anxiety, and passed off without any commotion. The number of Jaygeerdars and their followers, it is said, is said to have amounted to 15,000. Charles Napier is said to have reminded them of the inestimable blessings conferred on them by the British Government—at which some of them shrugged up their shoulders—and to have enforced the duties of obedience and loyalty towards the British Government,—which they will endeavour to subvert the moment they see an opening. After all, the object of the meeting is inexplicable, or rather it admits of no other explanation than that it was ordered by the late Government.

The Madras Athenæum states that since the arrival of the Editor in India,—many years since—he never remembers cholera to have produced, even in the worst seasons, the havoc it has done this year. It has carried off thousands of camp followers, hundreds of Sepoys, and not a few gallant Officers. The mortality in the regiments is generally attributed to the extremely injudicious manner in which the relief of corps has been arranged, and the necessary exposure to which they have been subjected.—Friend of India.

A letter from Sheebpore, dated 12th instant, states—"We had on the 22d last an awful gale. Your servant met with it in his way from Dacca to Burrisal but, thank God, he was safe. The gale began at 6 o'clock in the morning and lasted all day and night till 3 or 4 o'clock in the next morning—that was about 24 hours. You cannot imagine the devastation which it has produced from Dacca to Sheebpore—for the other parts of the country I cannot say anything. The loss of Indigo is great. I have seen villages entirely swept away with loss of trees, crops, &c. This gale recalled to my mind the one we met at the Cape in our way from England with Dr. St. Leger."

ST. XAVIER'S COLLEGE.

No. 20, Chowringhee Road.

Day Scholars, at..... 8 Rs. per month.

Day Boarders..... 16 " ditto

Boarders..... 25 " ditto

For further particulars apply to the Rector.

JUST RECEIVED.

Manual of the Living Rosary, with a series of 16 Plates, 1 Rupee.

Gahan's Catholic Piety, 18mo. embossed roan, 2 Rupees.

Path to Paradise, 32mo. do. 1 Rupee 4 As.

LATELY RECEIVED.

Holy Readings, 24mo. cloth, 1 Rupee 8 Annas. The Archconfraternity of the Immaculate Heart of Mary—its Origin and Progress, with some of the most remarkable conversions obtained through its Prayers, 10 Annas.

Gother's Papist misrepresented and Represented, new edition, with Notes and Appendix, 8 Annas.

O'Connell's Ireland, vol. I. 8vo. cloth, 6 Rs.

LATELY REPRINTED.

Baddoley's Sure Way to find out the True Religion, 119 pages 32mo. 2 Annas.

P. S. D'ROZARIO & Co.

Printed and Published by P. S. D'ROZARIO and Co

SUMMARY OF INTELLIGENCE.

No. 26.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JUNE 29, 1844.

[Vol. VI.]

THURSDAY, JUNE 20.

None of our contemporaries appear to have noticed the recent docking of the Bentinck steamer, or the great credit due to Mr. Reeves for his successful efforts to accommodate this leviathan of a vessel. He was obliged to lengthen his dock to admit her, and this was not accomplished without great labour, but it was effected completely. The Bentinck went into dock one day, and after having been duly examined, was floated out the next. Such an event ought not to pass without distinct notice. The only inconvenience experienced was in the necessity of taking off the lower segment of the wheels, but we hear that arrangements are in progress which will enable the vessel to move in without disturbing any of her machinery.

The Calcutta Star states that Lady Emily Hardinge will accompany Sir Henry Hardinge to India.

The intelligence from the Punjab has somehow or other lost its interest since the news of Lord Ellenborough's recall reached India. It was chiefly from the supposed intention of his Lordship to make a winter campaign beyond the Sutledge, if a sufficient opportunity should offer, that we watched with interest the rise and fall of these opportunities in the varied politics of Lahore. Now that a pacific policy, for the present, is all but certain, there is comparatively little interest in the movements at that capital. It is said that Heera Singh, from some unknown cause, has regained the superiority he had lost, and was again master of the troops who were lately his master.

FRIDAY, JUNE 21.

There has been a most awful visitation of locusts in the district of Monghyr. They came like a thundercloud, with a noise as the rushing of waters, and squatted on the young Indigo plants, which they instantly annihilated. The next morning nothing but the pole of the plant was visible. Wherever they descended they extinguished vegetation. But the remarkable phenomenon on this occasion was, that some of the branches of mango trees on which they sat broke down with their weight! We do not think this can be surpassed even in America. We hear that the natives attribute the calamity to the recall of the Governor-General.

The Englishman says that private letters, we suppose from Malta, state that Sir Thomas Turton's health has been so much improved that he intends to return in March next. But he had leave of absence for a whole twelvemonth, and it expires in March next.

The "greatest scoundrel in Central Asia," the Vizier Yar Mahomed, having made away with his master Shah Khanran, and usurped the power himself, the sons of Shah Khanran have been seeking support from the neighbouring sovereigns; one has gone to Cabul, another to Candahar, and a third to Persia. The Persian monarch is said to have sent an army to besiege Herat. Six years ago the investment of Herat by the Persians, induced us to cross the Indus, and enter on the Affghan War; now we hear of the event with perfect unconcern; and we question whether the intelligence will create the smallest sensation at the Council chamber, so entirely has the aspect of circumstances been changed, by the unsuccessful attempts made on the one hand by Russia, and on the other hand by England to establish that influence in these regions which "naturally belonged to them."

The Hurkaru states, on the authority of private letters from England, that no intention exists on the part of the Court of Directors to sanction any increase of officers to the Indian army, though the proposal is popular at the India Board.

SATURDAY, JUNE 22.

We have often had reason to complain of the tardiness of the Bombay Post Office; but on the occasion of the present Mail it has exceeded all its former transgressions. It is now a week since the express came in, and as yet we have received only a fifth or a sixth of our papers. Yesterday passed over without the arrival of a single paper. We note this disgraceful neglect, not for the purpose of censure, but simply that our Bombay contemporaries may understand the reason of our exultation when a regular monthly communication is established between Suez and Calcutta.

The report given yesterday that there was some hitch in the project of giving a grand entertainment by the officers of the army at Barrackpore, Calcutta, and Dum-Dum, to the late Governor-General is contradicted to-day, and it is said that it will come off at an early day. Of the courage and disinterestedness of such a movement there can be no question. It will be the first instance in which the Bengal Army has so publicly and unequivocally demonstrated its disapproval of a measure which has been unanimously adopted by its Honourable Masters.

From a notice in the Hurkaru it would appear that the practise of picking pockets has been introduced into Calcutta. A gentleman in one of the narrow passages of the market, saw a number of men in great confusion rushing by him, and soon after missed his watch.

Seven of the mutineers of the Madras 47th Native Infantry have been found guilty of mutiny by a Native Court Martial, and sentenced to be shot to death with musquetry. The Marquis of Tweeddale has ordered the sentence to be commuted into transportation in the case of six. Only one man, Veeraswamy will, therefore, suffer the extreme penalty of the law. The address of the Marquis of Tweeddale we give below :—

"Sepoys of the Madras Army,—I will always be your friend,—I will see that justice is done to you upon every occasion;—and while you conduct yourselves as faithful and obedient Soldiers, I shall always have pleasure in attending to your comforts, and in listening to your complaints;—but if you neglect your duty, and are disobedient to your Officers, you will find me determined to punish you with the utmost severity of Military Law."

(Signed) TWEEDDALE, Lt. General.
Commander-in-Chief.

MONDAY, JUNE 24.

The Bombay Courier states that the Steamer Auckland was to leave Bombay for Calcutta, on the 12th or 13th of the month, having been placed at the disposal of Lord Ellenborough to convey his Lordship to Suez, where she will be at the disposal of Sir Henry Hardinge, if he should have arrived in Egypt on his way to India. The vessel may therefore be daily expected.

The Lord Hungerford has arrived at Madras with Dr. Wallich on board.

TUESDAY, JUNE 25.

The Bombay Times contradicts the report that the Auckland Steamer is coming round from Bombay to take Lord Ellenborough, and says she is coming round with treasure. The Courier reconciles both statements by saying that she brings treasure from Hyderabad, and will carry treasure to Suez.

The result of yesterday's Opium sale, the last of the season, was very satisfactory. The number of chests put up was 3495; and the entire amount of the proceeds Rs. 52,45,935, more than half a million sterling.

The Bombay Gentleman's Gazette gives us the following extract from the Army list in reference to our expected Governor-General:

"Right, Honourable Sir Henry Hardinge, K. C. B., Ensign 8th Oct., 1798; Lt. 25th March, 1802; Capt. 7th April, 1804; Major, 13th April, 1809; Lieut.-Col. 30th May, 1811; Col. 19th July, 1821; Maj.-Gen. 22d July, 1830; Col. 97th Regiment 4th March, 1838, served throughout the whole of the Peninsular war; nearly the whole of the time as Deputy Quarter-Master-General of the Portuguese army; and was present at the battles of Rolicca and Vimiera (wounded), retreat to, and battle of Corunna, passage of the Douro, battle of Busaco, lines of Torres Vedras, battle of Albuhera, 1st and 2d sieges of Badajos, siege and capture of Ciudad Rodrigo, 3d siege of Badajos, battles of Salamanca, Vittoria (severely wounded); Pampeluna, the Pyrenees, Nivelle, Nive, and Orthes—served also the campaign of 1815, and was severely wounded at Ligny, 16th June,—left hand amputated. Sir Henry has received a cross and five clasps."

To this account he adds the information that Sir Henry Hardinge was born on the 30th March 1785, and is, consequently, in his 60th year.

At the age at which Sir Henry Hardinge's predecessors have assumed the office of General.

Mr. Hastings,	40
Lord Cornwallis, first time.	48
Lord Teignmouth,	42
Marquis Wellesley.	38
Lord Minto,	?
Marquis Hastings,	59
Lord Amherst,	50
Lord W. Bentinck,	54
Lord Auckland,	52
Lord Ellenborough,	51
Sir Henry Hardinge,	59

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 26.

The Delhi Gazette has letters from Upper Scinde to the 6th of June. The troops were exceedingly healthy. The Natives and Sepoys were uncommonly well pleased with the plenty and cheapness of provisions, and especially with the splendid barracks which Government is erecting for the troops at Shikarpore. It is said that the fugitive Shere Mahomed, is at Lheree or Bhaug, and offers 8 as. a-day for every horse soldier, and 4 as. for every foot soldier willing to join him. His followers are by some stated at 4000, by others at only 500.

Heera Sing has persuaded some 10 or 12,000 of his disorderly troops to accept of the furlough, and even to leave their arms behind them. Lahore is nearly denuded of troops, and every thing wears the aspect of tranquillity.—Friend of India.

JULY OVERLAND MAIL.

The latest safe day for the transmission of letters from Calcutta per Steamer to leave Bombay on the 19th of July will be Saturday the 6th proximo.

The steamer Bentinck is appointed to leave town on Monday, the 15th July next, at daylight,—the principal Mail will be closed at the General Post Office on Saturday the 13th idem, but an after packet will remain open till the evening of Saturday the 14th.

JUST RECEIVED.

Manual of the Living Rosary, with a series of 16 Plates, 1 Rupee.

Gahan's Catholic Piety, 18mo. embossed roan, 2 Rupees.

Path to Paradise, 32mo. do. 1 Rupee 4 As.

LATELY REPRINTED.

Holy Readings, 24mo. cloth, 1 Rupee 8 Annas.

The Archconfraternity of the Immaculate Heart of Mary—its Origin and Progress, with some of the most remarkable conversions obtained through its Prayers, 10 Annas.

Gother's Papist Misrepresented and Represented, new edition, with Notes and Appendix, 8 Annas.

O'Connell's Ireland, vol I. 8vo. cloth, 6 Rs.

LATELY REPRINTED.

Baddley's Sure Way to find out the True Religion, 119 pages 32mo. 2 Annas.

P. S. D'ROZARIO & Co.

THE
BENGAL
CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit— one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism."

VOLUME VII.

CALCUTTA :
PRINTED BY P. S. D'ROZARIO AND CO.
1844.

Uttarpore Jaitrishna Public Library
Acq. No...10160..Date 22.5.76

CONTENTS.

ORIGINAL.

	Page.		Page.
INTRODUCTION...		Moulmem,	198
Antiquity of Popery,	65, 116	Murphy, Rev. C.	239
Agra Mission,	143, 157	Mooteeharee,	311
Apostolic See, and Bengal Vicariate,	226
Borghì, Right Rev. Dr.	48, 282, 313	Nuns,	16
Bombay Mission,	75	Neale's Tour to the Ancient Churches of England,	225
Bengal Mission,	78, 135	O'Connell, Incarceration of,	47, 101
Bow Bazar Chapel,	172, 245, 302	— Liberation of,	226
— School,	188	— Testimonial Fund, 67, 78, 93, 108, 120,	356
Breen, The Rev. John, Obituary of,	187	176, 188, 245, 339,	356
Buckingham's Lectures,	229	O'Hiffe, Right Rev. Dr.	48
Boulogne, The Rev. Mr.	255	— and party, Arrival of,	100, 127, 133
Conversions,	3, 17, 49, 158	— Apostolic Brief constituting Coadju-	tor V. A. Bengal,
Calcutta Christian Advocate, 3, 30, 44, 58, 60, 64,	183	72, 86, 91, 303, 113,	156
Catholic Orphanage, 6, 32, 50, 67, 78, 93, 108, 120,	356	Orland News,	74
134, 160, 176, 188, 220, 226, 234, 242, 245, 256, 273,	356	Ordination at St. John's College,	241
Chandernagore,	93, 188, 356	— at the Catholic Cathedral,	324
Cowcolly, Native Mission at,	6, 32, 120	Propagation of the Faith, 6, 32, 53, 108, 120, 135, 160,	356
Charitable Donations,	17	188, 245, 273, 302, 311, 315, 329, 338, 354,	356
Calvin, Luther and other heretics had no Mission &c &c,	29, 43, 57, 71, 85, 99	Popery Antiquity of,	30
Cairo to Malta, Journey from,	45	Protestant Confessors,	133
Catholic Officer, Letters from a, in India, to his Protestant Friends in Europe, 61, 75, 88, 105, 158,	313	Protestant Mission Tahiti,	157, 282
185, 198, 217, 232, 300,	170	Protestantism, Reasons for renouncing,	253, 351
Catholic Schools in Calcutta and its vicinity,	198
Court, General,	227	Rome, Churches at,	48
China, Missions in,	228	Rabascall, The Rev. Mr.	157, 171, 198
Cape of Good Hope Mission,	3, 240, 328	Rustomjee Cowasjee, Esq.,	226
Chinsurah,	241	Religious Profession of Novices and Postulants, St. Thomas' Church,	309
Cachar, Hill tribes at,	242, 354	St. Thomas' Church, 3, 93, 108, 121, 160, 176, 234,	356
Carew, Address to the Most Rev. Dr.	281	245, 300, 315, 338,	3
— Letter from Dr. Backhaus to,	295	St. Patrick's Chapel, — Dum-Dum,	15
— Bishop Borghi to,	290	St. Stephen, Life of, by Rev. Mr. Newman,	48, 245
Clapperton, Colonel Law de, Governor of Chandernagore,	327	St. John's College,	157
Catholic Cathedral,	338	St. Xavier's College,	184
Dum-Dum Catholics,	172	— annual exhibition at,	74
Dwarkanath Tagore,	311	Sirdhana,	120
Dinapore,	355	Serampore Catholic School,	197
Festivals, 50, 67, 108, 176, 188, 234, 256, 284, 315,	356	Spiritual wants of the Catholics who are dispersed in small numbers throughout several parts of Bengal,	198, 315
Freyceonon, the Rev. Mr.	74	Schism in the Papacy,	213
Free Churchman,	91	St. John's Church, Circular Road, 227, 245, 256, 302, 326,	338
Fever Hospital, 211, 240, 273, 284, 302, 315, 329, 339,	356	St. Francis Xavier's Convent Chapel, 227, 313, 324, 338,	273, 302
Fort William,	240	St. Joseph's Orphanage and House of Industry, 234,	243
Gwalior, suffering Catholics at, 5, 32, 49, 74, 92, 93,	172	Switzerland—Strasbourg,	326
108, 120,	156	Sirdhana College,	338
Gerald Griffin,	169	Sacred Heart of Jesus, Church of the,	6, 17, 32
Goa, the Archbishop of,	198	Transubstantiation,	44, 58, 72, 86, 103
Havers, The Rev. Mr., S. J.	240	— Vindication of our proofs of,	141
Howrah Burial Ground and Free School Church,	311	Traveller, Letter of a,	172
Howrah Church,	356, 311
Impious Forgery, the,	104	Voss, Tribute to Capt. of the Seringapatam, 143,	160, 176, 312
Kookees Tribe, on the habits and customs of the, 267		Vicars of the Church of N.S. D'Rozario, of Calcutta, 171
Loretto House, Serampore,	3	Woman, The, condemned to death for renouncing Popery at Madeira,	115
Landour,	74	Widows' Asylum, Italy,	226
Lackenstren, John, Count,	290	Waller, J. G.	227
Loughnan, R. J. Esq. C. S.	311	Wilson, Lord Bishop of Calcutta and the Roman Catholics,	323
Monks,	16	— and Cheap education,	337
		Zubiburn, The Rev. Mr. and the Nonkolly Mission, 326

ORIGINAL POETRY.

	Page.		Page.
The Missionaries—Farewell—Welcome,	77	Lines composed on the occasion of the profession of Nuns in Calcutta,	328

SELECTIONS.

Anti-Catholic Penal Code,	81	Maria, Joaquina, condemned to death for embracing the Protestant Faith,	135
Bernard, The great St,	79	Monastery of Einsiedeln,	153
Bishop's zeal and Chapter's practice,	138	Military & Divine Service,	179
Birmingham Protest, the,	152	May Meetings,	194
Breen, The late Mr.,	245	Marvellous Story,	220
Bible, On the use of the,	246, 262, 275	Mount St Bernard, Consecration of, a Romish Monastery at Leicestershire,	258
Cropley, Mr. of the Madras Examiner ,	21	Maryland, Pilgrims of,	287, 306
Catholic Foreign Missions,	69	Mount Mellcray, The Abbey of,	293
Catholic Church, The erection of a new, in Liverpool,	80	National Anthem, The,	8
Catholic Literature,	94	New South Wales, Admission of Attorneys,	25
Catholic Clergy, Endowment of the,	151	— Oaths to Magistrates,	27
Church temporalities, Ireland,	164	Newman's Sermons,	35, 55
Converts and Apostates,	170	Nano Nagle, The Life of Miss, 95, 109, 122, 137
Curiosities of the Church establishment in Great Britain,	181	O'Connell's Freedom,	285
Conversions,	196, 357	— Gold Crucifix presented to,	316
Catholics and the Bible,	206	— Mass and thanksgiving, for the liberation of,	316
Christian Advocate, The,	234	— In the Conciliation Hall,	331, 340, 358
Chirvaux,	251	Protestant Conquests,	8
Christianity,	259	Papiets to Protestantism, The way to convert,	10
Catholic Principle, The,	265	Protestant Testimony,	20
Catholic Charities Bill (Ireland,)	288	Puseyite innovation at Madras,	22
Catholicity and Botany,	291	Puseyites, Anglicans, &c.,	67, 195, 339
Chisholm, Mrs.,	314	Puseyism in Newcastle,	70
Chelsea,	340	Protestant Evidences of Catholicity, ...	118, 203, 221
Dublin Review, The,	12	Protestant Rule of Belief, ...	191
Death, A Chapter of, ...	22, 33, 138, 356	Protestant Persecution,	252
Efforts of Bible Societies,	161	Popery, Progress of,	256
French Correspondence,	37	Propagation of the Faith, Annals for the, ...	291
Ferguson, Conversion of Mrs.,	70	Papacy, Schism in the, in Bavaria,	303
Fontevrault, The Abbey of,	259	Repeal Association, Loyal National, ...	40
Fever Hospital,	260, 278, 285	Rome,	93, 322
Gwalior Christians,	21, 200	Roman Catholic Societies at Boston,	98
Hierologus, or the Church Tourists,	235, 248	Religious Profession of a Nun,	112
Howrah Catholic Church, The,	339	Repeal Bill, Lord Beaumont's Penal Code,	121
Hobart Town, The Bishop of, and the Vicar General, 339		Raffaello's Paintings, ...	152
Inquisition, The, ...	25	Sacerdos Hibernicus, ...	13
Ireland,	51, 109	Self, ...	18
Imaginative Literature, the influence of religion on, 52		Spain,	22
Irish Church, The unbought loyalty of the,	68	Sacro Monte de Varallo,	79, 302
Immorality more tolerated than Dissent,	193	St. John's Cathedral service (Protestant,) ...	150
La Sainte Baume, Church of,	252	Sydney, ...	150
Licentiousness. Excuse for,	259	Seal's College and the Jesuits, ...	177, 200
Lord Bishop of Calcutta and the Roman Catholic, 320		State Prisoners,	251
Missionary Church, the,	9	Secularity of Missions,	280
Miscellaneous, 14, 27, 31, 42, 50, 56, 78, 82, 124, 140, 154, 168, 182, 188, 196, 200, 208, 238, 266, 286, 294, 302, 307, 336, ...	364	St. Carlo Borromeo, the tomb of,	293
Matthew, Intended visit of Father, to America,	14	Sabbath, The, ...	340
		Temperance, Progress of,	82
		Times, oh! Temporal, ...	97
		True Religion, Cf. in method of finding out the, 274
		Tradition, Qu., ...	304
		Ursuline and Presentation orders,	95

POETRY.

The Scottish Christmas,	14	The Norman Peasant's Hymn to the Virgin,	210
Prayer for the Novice,	196

THE
BENGAL
CATHOLIC HERALD.

'One body and one spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism.'

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JULY 6, 1844.

[VOL. VII.]

IN entering on the seventh volume of the Bengal Catholic Herald, it will be useful for the numerous Christian community to whose advantage our Journal is devoted, to rehearse briefly, the chief religious events which occurred, particularly in Bengal, during the publication of the sixth volume of our periodical. If we dwell more in detail, on what we may term the religious statistics of the Church of Bengal, than on those of neighbouring or remote Churches, it is not, that we are indifferent to the welfare of either, but that, in accordance with the order which charity itself dictates, it is our duty to give a precedence or preference to whatever concerns the spiritual welfare of those, with whom we happen to be more immediately connected, by the double tie of religion and country. That we are not indifferent to the wants even of our more distant brethren, the earnestness with which we advocated the appeals, made by several Churches, not unfrequently, this time back, to the charity of the Catholics of Bengal, bears abundant testimony. These appeals have been, we rejoice, wonderfully successful, when we consider the general poverty of our brethren here, and the numerous demands made on them, for the support of their own Churches and institutions. We have been particularly gratified, to witness the cordial and unanimous concurrence of all classes of our brethren, in responding to the earnest exhortation of our venerated Archbishop, to come forward promptly to rescue from starvation the suffering Christians at Gwalior. Yes, we are proud to say, that since the day, on which our Chief Pastor's holy invitation on this subject was first heard by his attached flock, up to the present, not only the adult, rich and poor, but even the very children seemed emulous to send in their contributions, in order to participate in the good work. Oh! it is this happy union of all ranks and ages, in deeds of piety and benevolence, that supplies the best and most glorious proof, that our faith is not a dead faith, but a faith which worketh by charity, a faith which will not slumber or repose, until its happy possessors shall be united to that God, who is its author and origin here, and will be its everlasting reward hereafter.

NOTION.

We noticed some time ago, the laudable exertions made to establish schools in conjunction with the Burial Ground, or St. John's Church, Boitaconnah. Already the arrangements for that purpose are nearly completed, and the Church will be so much improved, enlarged and adorned by the works now in progress, that it will be a very convenient temple for public worship. We understand that the Archbishop has in view, to fix certain days in each week for the oblation of the divine mysteries in St. John's Church, in order to afford the several families whose friends are interred in the adjoining cemetery, the consolation of assisting there, at the celebration of the Holy Sacrifice and offices of religion, for the eternal repose of their deceased relations. We are confident that the youth of that vicinity will derive important educational and religious benefits from the schools to be annexed to St. John's Church.

The Bow Bazar is another district, which, on account of its numerous Catholic inhabitants, is well entitled to the earnest attention of the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic. Judging from the inquiries we have set on foot, we think that there are about one thousand Catholics residing in that locality. To minister efficiently to their spiritual wants, it would be necessary that a priest should reside in a central part of that district, and that there should be erected there a suitable parish Church. We have learned with joy that arrangements are in progress to secure these blessings for the Catholics of Bow Bazar. Already one or two benefactors to religion have promised their co-operation in this good work. We are confident that to bring this auspicious commencement to a speedy and successful termination, nothing is now required, but that all the Catholics of Bow Bazar should unite together, in contributing weekly or monthly some small sum, such as their respective circumstances will permit, towards the erection of a decent and commodious place of worship. By adopting this plan, none, not even the poorest, will be inconvenienced, whilst, on the other hand, such unanimity in the cause of religion will bring down a copious benediction on the undertaking. We are justly anxious to see accomplished that sacred enterprise, because, then, our fellow Catholics in every quarter of this extensive city, will have within their reach, a place of worship and schools, to which they and their children can walk, without any serious inconvenience, at all seasons of the year. We cannot appreciate too highly such an advantage, when we consider how numerous the poor Catholics are, who, not being able to pay for a conveyance, are obliged often to absent themselves from divine service on Sundays, and Festivals of obligation. We exhort our poorer brethren to profit, for themselves, and their children of the invaluable opportunities thus afforded, to provide for their respective religious and educational wants. It is only by persevering assiduity in this salutary course of conduct, that the poor of our community can be raised in the social and moral order, and delivered from the evils which now depress them in both these relations.

It is consoling to reflect, that the blessings of religion and education are being extended to several parts of Bengal, which had been hitherto destitute of them. The Mission at Noacolly is advancing to maturity by the pious labors of the Rev. Mr. Zubiburne. In the new Mission at Cowcolly 18 children have been baptized within the last few days. The erection of the Church and schools at Backergunge will be commenced, as soon as the title deeds for the ground on which they are to be built shall be duly secured. Including the Neophytes above referred to, more than 200 persons have been admitted into the Catholic communion in the Bengal Vicariate since last January. Even since our last publication, an entire family of seven persons, the 1. Englishman, and hitherto a Protestant establishment, have announced their intention to embrace the Catholic Faith, and now preparing to be received into the Church.

We may here remark, that the general welfare of religion in this Vicariate, as well as the charity due to our dispersed and oftentimes poor brethren, who live in places where the Catholics are few in number and at a great distance from a priest, demand, that, as soon as practicable, one or two holy and zealous priests be constantly employed in travelling from one district to another of Bengal, in order to administer the consolations of religion to the scattered sheep of the house of Israel. Within the preceding week we are assured that the Archbishop received two letters, which fully demonstrate the necessity of such an arrangement. One of these came from a poor Catholic near Chirrapoongee, who stated that he had now five children unbaptized, because no priest ever visited that locality, and his means were so limited, that he could not afford to pay for his wife and children to come to Calcutta to procure baptism for them. The second letter came from a family of respectability in a still more remote part of the country. The head of this family, an English gentleman and a convert, just after recovering from fever, met with a severe accident, by which, at the time his lady was writing to the Archbishop, he was rendered almost wholly insensible. Of course, in these trying circumstances, she became naturally much alarmed at the consequences, that might be apprehended, and, as she had no Catholic clergyman near her to minister to her beloved husband, her only resource was, after she had by prayer recommended him to the mercy of God, to write to Calcutta and implore the prayers of the faithful there in his favor.

We could mention other instances, where several native and East Indian Catholic families are exposed to the loss of faith and piety, because whilst they are daily beset by non-descript Missionaries, whose religious jargon can be assimilated only to the confusion of Babel, one point alone excepted, viz. their calumnies against the Catholic faith, they are destitute of all the support and enlightened encouragement by which a holy priest could so easily enable them to defeat their adversaries, and even to gain over many of their opponents to the fold of Christ.

Since the opening of our sixth volume, it has pleased God, amidst the many benedictions so plentifully bestowed upon us, to us also by the premature death of exalted and holy souls, who laboured fully in the cause of religion and education. But we are not, as though we had not hope; believing as we do, not only theoretically but practically, in the communion of Saints, having every reason to hope, that they who have just gone before us, died in the Lord, we trust, that, through Christ, the consoling assurance of the Holy Ghost is verified in their regard, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord. From henceforth now, saith the spirit: that they may rest from their labours; for their works follow them."

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

On last Sunday week, the Archbishop administered Confirmation to about twenty persons in St. Thomas' Church. The Very Rev. Mr. Johnson and the Rev. Mr. Cuvelier assisting on the occasion as Deacon and Sub-deacon. Several of those confirmed, consisted of the pupils of the Loretto House, and of St. Xavier's College. From the very edifying manner in which these children received the Holy Sacrament of Confirmation, all present must have felt assured of the great care with which they were prepared for this solemn ordinance by their respective superiors, and have entertained also the cheering anticipation, that, in due time, they would become useful and exemplary members of society.

ST. PATRICK'S CHAPEL,—DUM-DUM.

On last Wednesday week, the Archbishop administered the Holy Communion, to about fourteen of the congregation at Dum-Dum and the Sacrament of Confirmation to twelve of the same community. We understand that the Choir was admirably conducted, and that the excellent organ which the Soldiers, by their joint contributions, have erected lately in the Dum-Dum Chapel, was performed upon with great effect by one of their comrades. Captain Gordon of the Bombay Service has generously subscribed fifty Rupees towards defraying the cost of the new Organ.

LORETTO HOUSE—SERAMPORE.

A beautiful engraving of the Mater Dolorosa, in a richly gilt frame, has been presented to the Loretto Convent, Serampore, by G. Casella, Esq. Consul of Sardinia.

CHINSURAH.

On last Thursday week, the Archbishop administered the Holy Communion to fifty persons, and the Sacrament of Confirmation to forty, at Chinsurah. By the kind indulgence of Major Frank, the Commanding Officer of H. M. 10th Regiment, at that Station, all the Catholic Soldiers were exempted on this occasion from duty, and allowed to assist at the sacred offices of religion. The Congregation in attendance was in consequence so numerous, that more than a hundred of the Soldiers could get a view of the interesting ceremony only through the Chapel windows. The conduct of all present was worthy of their Holy Religion; their earnest attention and recollection, displayed by their deportment, clearly indicated, that they were deeply impressed with religious feelings. During the Archbishop's instruction, the most profound and respectful silence prevailed, and each one present seemed straining with eagerness to catch every word which fell from his Chief Pastor's lips, and profit by the salutary advice it contained. As soon as divine service had concluded, some of the non-commissioned Officers and Soldiers waited on the Archbishop and presented his Grace with the munificent donation of two hundred and fifty Rupees for the Orphanage, and forty five Rupees, ten Annas, for the relief of the Gwalior Christians. We should not omit to notice that during Mass, a few of the Band, played with great taste some of the sublime and beautiful anthems, which render the Catholic worship so attractive even to Protestants, and excite such tender sentiments of piety in the minds of the Faithful.

CONVERSION.

Within the last few days, in the Bengal Vicariate, a respectable young man, an East Indian, renounced Protestantism and embraced the Catholic faith.

THE CALCUTTA CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

DEAR SIR,—Although I acknowledge that the Christian Advocate is totally unworthy of any notice in the pages of your widely circulated journal, nevertheless some extracts from it occasionally would greatly oblige your Mofussil admirers who have not an opportunity of seeing this canting journal. We read with great attention and edification the learned articles which appear in the Herald expounding the truths of our holy

Maria Surita,	0	8
A Friend,	2	0
Hannah Measures,	1	0
Ann Stopford,	1	0
M. E. Wilcox,	1	0
S. James,	1	0
A Widow's Mite,	1	0
A. C. Gantzer,	1	0
D. A. Gantzer,	1	0
J. B. Gantzer,	1	0
D. M. Gantzer,	1	0
F. J. Gantzer,	1	0
V. F. P's mite,	2	0
Maria Belgard,	0	4
A. Baptist,	0	4
J. J. Bird,	1	0
J. D'Mello,	1	0
E. Creighton,	2	0
Madam Nikos,	0	4
W. Peter,	1	0
D. Francis,	0	2
G. B.,	0	4
J. Lewis,	0	4
A Protestant,	3	0
C. Annosett,	1	0
N. Frizer,	1	0
W. Bill,	0	4
— Manuel,	1	0
M. D'Cruze,	0	4

THROUGH N. O'BRIEN.

Mrs. P. Garvy,	5	0
A Friend to the Poor,	2	0

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

Mrs. Daly,	1	0
Mary Daly,	1	0
John Daly,	1	0
Patrick Daly,	1	0
Mathew Daly,	1	0
Soldiers at Chinsurah through the Rev. Father Boulogne,	250	0
W. G.,	10	0

THROUGH THE REV. MR. STORCK.

D. T. C. R.,	6	0
M. Carthy,	0	8
Rennehan,	0	4
Wm. Butler,	0	8
A Friend,	0	4
Gallahar,	0	4
G. Byrnes,	0	8
Tallan,	0	2
Hyland,	0	4
T. Casey,	0	4
M'Donough,	0	4

THROUGH MR. N. O'BRIEN.

A Friend to the Poor,	5	0
George Massey,	16	0
H. Crooke,	16	0
Gorachand Dutt,	2	0
P. Vanderbeek,	2	0
W. Maffin,	1	0

NATIVE MISSION AT COWCOLLY.

By collections at Chandernagore through the Rev. Father Boulogne in addition to the amount last inserted, .. 5

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

Through the Rev. Dr. Kennedy,	12
Through the Rector of St. Xavier's College,	13 12

ON TRUE COMPUNCTION OF HEART.

(Continued from p. 359 vol. vi.)

But how can I, who am a sinner, and pressed down by the weight of my sins, how can I presume to lift up mine eyes unto those exalted mountains of piety,— even thy saints and perfect men, who, in their earthly habitation in this valley of tears, have raised themselves up so as to touch the very heavens, by the sublimity of their conversation, and by the height of contemplation?

“Woe, woe, woe,” says the Apostle John, “to the inhabitants of the earth.” (Apoc. viii. 13.) Woe unto the carnal-minded, and to those whose desires dwell upon the earth; and woe unto those who are girt about by the excitement of many passions!

And woe unto those that stray far away from the path of the just; who weep not; who vainly laugh; yea, and worse than that, who do evil in the sight of God; who fear not evil, and hold it of little moment!

What wonder is it, if I mourn, and as I meet, truly mourn? for inward sorrow changes the affection of man, so that I will take no pleasure in gladness, nor seek for any consolation in worldly things.

See, then, why you should mourn and weep. For the soul is rarely sufficiently recollected in itself; and at times the light of truth scarcely shines upon it from on high; and rarely does the soul enjoy even but a very little share of its celestial food. And, therefore, while it is so weighed down by the love of earthly things, it may well mourn because it is become so unknown both to God and to itself.

Therefore, let him who has a heart within him, mourn and weep, and say; “For I did eat ashes, like bread, and mingled my drink with weeping.” (Ps. ci. 10.) This I say, and I meditate within me, and weep; and, oh! sorrow, it is because I am so often entangled, without necessity, in earthly things; so oftentimes feel pleasure in the same; and oh! worse than all, feel such reluctance and difficulty in tearing myself away. Woe is me, that I am with difficulty drawn away from such things as are hurtful to me, and which I often detest and hate, and yet nevertheless am again led captive by them.

O! clay, clay, how long wilt thou cleave unto me! O darkness and slippery mire, how long shall I roll in thee? How long shall I suffer you? how long shall I dwell with you?

mine infirmity is so great, that I can scarcely stand; moreover, I am most prone to bend under my vicious inclinations, and the evil propensities of my heart. For I am but earth, and formed of the dust of the earth; and thereby, by natural frailty, I feel that I am more moved by earthly than by heavenly thoughts.

I seek after eternal good things less anxiously than for such as are temporal. I relish not the sweetness of that food which cometh down from above, and "my strength is dried up like a potsherd." (Ps. xxi. 6.) "I have forgotten to eat my bread" (Ps. ci. 5;) yea, that bread which God the Father has given unto me, and which has now become unto me earthly; and I eat ashes, who might have been fulfilled with heavenly food.

Woe is me, for I am wretched and very unhappy, in that I am come unto such hunger, that not knowing and neglecting things above, I should turn my thoughts to things below!

I was created, that I might eat of perpetual delights, sweeter than the honey and the honeycomb; but, sinning against my God, I have been struck blind; and I have lost the heavenly banquet, and am now fed on the lusts of this world. Yea, and the more lustful is my heart in its pursuit of earthly things, the longer is it cast out from the enjoyment of interior comforts.

And yet, when at times I look within, my heart tells me that I have no happiness in earthly things; for I am girt about and fulfilled with many adversities, and much anguish; and while I am straitened on every side, I am often sad, and know not what to choose.

For I am straitened between the two, and can hardly tell whither to turn me unto. For I pray that those things which are above may come, and yet they do not always answer to my call; and I implore that God would take away from me those that are beneath, and yet they tarry, and uninvited stay!

They come flocking towards me and in their train a tumult of strange thoughts, and some from this world, some from the flesh, and many from the devil, gird me round on every side, and say: "We are bone of thy bones, and flesh of thy flesh." (Gen. ii. 23.)

12. Let us tarry a little while with thee; consent unto us; be thou our friend, and sit thee down amongst us

By soothing words and mighty promises they craftily lay snares for me; by threats and fears, and sundry chances of evils, they strive to weigh down by soul.

But I, though I am but a mortal man, and feeble to withstand their assault, yet do I not withstand their persuasions and importunities as I ought.

And yet it is certain that if I will do as they persuade me, that I shall be deceived, since their language is deceit, and their persuasion is not of God, but of malignity.

But they that are born of God, "resist the devil, and he will fly from them" (St. Jac. iv. 7), and they that hate the world, and the things that are in the world, shall not be held back by their vain illusions.

They that are wise unto God, "believe not every spirit; but try the spirits if they be of God" (1 Johan. iv. 1), or of the world.

They hear, indeed, but they consent not; and say, "We know you not, whence you are; depart from me, for ye are of your father the Devil; and the truth is not in you." (St. John viii. 44.)

Such is the conflict of the godly; and how great the labour of their temptations is, the Lord who seeth all things, knoweth: for this life is full of sorrow and tribulation, and this they know full well who have drank of the chalice of its bitterness.

Wherefore, the soul of man looketh whence it may draw refreshment; and finds all consolation vain but what is divine. Daily experience teacheth it, that all earthly hope is deceitful; and that whatever it seeketh in its earthly pilgrimage out of God, only comes to bitterness.

"Woe is me, that my sojourning is prolonged" (Ps. cxix. 5) and that in very deed there is nowhere for my soul to rest in safety in this life!

My members severally speak to me and say, "Weary not thyself for nothing; for thou shalt melt away before thou canst find satisfaction in earthly things.

Then my spirit answering saith: I long after sweet and delicious food, and such as shall be good for ever; I shall return unto my house, whence I went out; for I fared better there than now I do; and I am weary with sickness for those things which have been offered to me abroad.

But, O my flesh! would that thou wouldst hear this voice, and laying aside thine own wisdom, seek after the spiritual things, for by so doing thou shalt doubtless find life, and escape eternal death. Thou must pay thy temporal debt, for to such wert thou condemned in the first prevarication. And wisely wilt thou so do, if thou bow with meekness to the Spirit, and rebel not; that so the second death may not touch thee, but that thou mayest enter into everlasting rest, even that rest which above all things thou lovest.

(To be continued.)

PROTESTANT CONQUESTS.

To the Editor of the Madras Examiner.

SIR,—Having been at Pondicherry at Easter I received a letter from Madras, requesting information as to the great conquest of Protestantism in the district of Tinnevely, where, according to announcements made in the public journals, ninety-six heathen villages, of high caste, were preparing to embrace Protestantism in a body, after the example of several others who had already actually embraced it. I have since made all necessary enquiries; the information I received is as follows.

For several years there has been unremitting war between the Zemindar and those who are subject to his authority in the ninety-six villages in question. Mr. Montgomery appeared to judge in favor of the inhabitants, and the Zemindar was obliged to deal with them more favorably. The successor of Mr. Montgomery now declares in favor of the Zemindar, and the inhabitants are very much disappointed. The Protestant Missionaries did not neglect to avail themselves of so beautiful an occasion. They promised their services in the Cutcheries on condition that all the inhabitants would become Protestants. Seven villages actually gave their signatures, the others promised to give them. It is four months since all the inhabitants except those seven villages have become reconciled to the Zemindar and there is now no question of their becoming Protestants. There no longer remains but these seven villages and of these seven villages, only the Pariahs and Coolies, to the number of fifty families. All the rest have contented themselves with barely giving in their names. Report says that these seven villages also are about to submit themselves to the Zemindar, and then the great victory of Protestantism will be reduced to the mountain in labour.

This is the whole affair just as it happened, it made no noise except in the papers.

As to the Protestants of the south in general, I may say that, with the exception of a very small number of villages, all the rest have become Protestants for the sole purpose of finding support in the law suits to which they have been instigated. The time of the tempest being passed they find themselves bound by their signatures and by the fear of forged accusations. Protestants in name they are Pagans in reality. Nevertheless, notwithstanding their fears, more than four thousand of those so called Protestants have escaped from the meshes of Protestantism and have returned to Paganism. The gentlemen Parsons have not made this a boast in the public papers. I will relate an anecdote which will give an insight into the tactics of Protestants. One of our Christians became a Protestant about twenty years ago. The missionary who converted him made him sign a deed by which he declared that if he abandoned Protestantism he would lose his house and his effects. After his death his children came to me to demand admittance into the bosom of the Catholic Church. I received them. They went immediately to remove their house and they carried it to the distance of about one hundred yards into a village where our Christians were. Immediately law proceedings were instituted against them.

The poor unfortunate creatures with fifteen others of our Christians were accused of having gone during the night to plunder the village, &c. &c. and this was proved by false witnesses. The evidence however was rejected as false by the Thasildar, a thing unfortunately which seldom occurs: for the cause of Protestantism invariably triumphs in the Collector's Cutchery. So that the Pagans call the Collectors the vile slaves of the Padri.

As the information now given was demanded by one of your subscribers who is not now in Madras, I have taken the liberty of addressing this epistle to you, thinking that many of your subscribers will be amused, if not instructed, by its contents.

I remain, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

A FRENCH MISSIONARY.

Negapatam, }
16th June, 1844. }

THE NATIONAL ANTHEM.

No nation possesses such saturnine, haughty, self-important vanity as the English. They talk of liberty, while nine-tenths of their own people are slaves,—shut out by the wall of the franchise to political death: they stun us with statements of England's wealth, while millions of her subjects are pining in penury and half-starvation, or in work-houses: they are sending bishops, priests, and deacons, to diffuse their 39 articles from Jerusalem, through the wide east, to Calcutta, Canada, New Zealand—whilst in every town, village, hamlet—nay almost street, there is a preacher in a church, chapel, conventicle, or tub, abusing their religion as harlotry; and they own not one-fourth of the people of England as disciples. They go to France and Italy, and bring second-hand copies of pictures—nay copies off copies of copies of pictures—as originals of Corregio, Paul Veronese, Salvator Rosa, Titian or of Raphael—or lamps cast in Rome, by Italian tinkers, as antiques from Pompeii, or Herculaneum; and then fancy themselves cognoscitori in the fine arts and sciences.

John Bull may understand eating, and steam engines, and cotton spinning; but as to the fine arts, they are not his forte: yet (as we said,) he is quite anxious to be regarded as a man of virtù. Nothing is more common than to hear "God save the King" called the national anthem, &c., and many by its continual repetition, think it is an English national piece; nobody, therefore, in England tells them it is not. But, it is only not English, but was for years sung and performed not only by the French, but by the adherents of James II. in Paris, as a loyal air, in contradistinction to the Dutch King William III., who then reigned. We give from the Cabinet de Lecture, the following, merely observing that there is some mistake in the name of the author, who was not Sieur de Sully, but Giambattista Lulli, first musician to Louis XIV.

"GOD SAVE THE KING."

They write from Edinburgh (says the Cabinet de Lecture in Paris) that the Manuscript Memoirs of the Duchesse of Perth have been sold in London for £3,000 sterling. Among them are to be found a number of interesting details relative to the Court of Louis the XIV., as well as of James II., during the sojourn of the King and Queen of England at St Germain en Laye. In giving an account of the establishment of St. Cyr, she bears testimony to a fact not quite unknown in France, but which hitherto rested on that of the ancient nuns of this house—namely, that the air and words of “God save the King” are of French origin. She says, “When the most Christian King entered the chapel, all the choir of the aforesaid noble damsels sung each time the following words to a very fine air by Sieur de Sully:—

Grand Dieu, sauvez le roy !
Grand Dieu, vengez le roy !
Vive le roy !
Que toujours glorieux,
Louis Victorieux,
Voyez ses ennemis,
Toujours soumis !
Grand Dieu, sauvez le roy !
Grand Dieu, vengez le roy !
Vive le roy !

The tradition (proceeds the Duchess) at St. Cyr is, that the composer Handel* during his visit to the superior of this royal house, obtained leave to copy the air and words, which he submitted to George I. as his own composition. Madame de Crequi, in her recollections, relates the anecdote in the same manner, and adds that the words were written by Madame Briannon. Two English journals and the Gazette de France have published several documents attesting the origin of this song; but in spite of all these authorities it may be doubted that a composer of such genius as Handel could have lent himself to a step so vile. The fact of the importation of the music of “God save the King” appears undeniable; but there is nothing to show that Handel passed it off as his own composition.” This is, indeed, a very curious anecdote. The rhyme of the French words corresponds exactly to the air of “God save the King” that it is impossible to doubt that they must have been sung to that very air. There is no occasion, however, for bringing Handel’s name into the matter: he never pretended to the authorship of “God save the King.”—Sydney Morning Chronicle, March 30, 1844.

“THE MISSIONARY CHURCH!”

We beg to direct the especial attention of our dear friend of the Mail to the report we give in to-night’s Pilot of the results of the “gatherings in the vineyard” of the pioneers of his missionary church, as elucidated in the edifying proceedings at the Tralee Quarter Sessions.

Well, well, how the times are changed, to be sure! We had lately the organ of the saintly thane of Tollymore—him of the venerable nommen—rejoicing in the wondrous conversions wrought amongst the scape-grace younger sons of big “Irish chiefs,” who were taught by the gentle penal laws—at one time the most effective gospel teachings of the Irish Church militant—the “saving truth,” that by apostasy they could rob their rightful coheirs of their substance, and make their paternal parents tenants for life; or, in the equally notable perversion of some “Irish chieftains” themselves, who yielded the old faith to the persuasions of the hangman, or the ghostly remonstrances of that favourite conventicle of the Law Church, provided in days gone by for the special cure of recusant Popish souls—the transport ship!

Yes the times are changed! Instead of the “dread artillery of the law,” as a recent blunderer in Blackwood calls it, and which is only dreadful when in the hands of injustice, we have now the “soft sawder” of Ned Norman, and the more tangible persuasives of four pounds per annum (for a whole family,) and musty meal and measley bacon ad libitum, to coax the wandering con-sciences of starving Papists into the bosom of the Establishment!

“What a falling off is here my countrymen!” we think we hear the slipped, but not lean, pantaloons of Parliament-street exclaim, with all the fervent zeal of a neophyte—“Formerly we could catch in halter, transport ship, or jail the Popish possessors of property (when my own ancestors had none,) or fish from the troubled waters of Papacy any beardless profligate, by throwing to him the bait of the reversion of his parents and kindred’s possessions; but now, name it not in Gath, we are forced to lure mere low-bred Popish rats into the trap of Anglican evangelism with the strong smell of Protestant meal and bacon!”

But we must let our readers into a little secret, shared in only by the Statesman, Saunders’ Mail, Warder, and other broadsheet abettors of the saintly swindle, always excepting the actors, clerical and unclerical. Be it known, then, that the Irish Bible Society has been set on foot for the ostensible purpose of converting the benighted Papists, but in reality for raising the wind for certain needy clerics of the unbeneficed class, who might prove troublesome, or bring disgrace upon the “cloth,” by turning their hands to any business whose morality or honesty might be questioned by the law. These are of the second class of Irish missionaries, and under them are the teachers, readers, monitors—their poor relations, or other stray converts—who act as shepherds’ dogs to the flock. The higher class of missionaries are Rectors, Vicars, et hoc genus omne, who, either from mistaken zeal, or for the retaining fee, rendered useful by perhaps a scanty benefice, act as agents to the chief concern, whose head-quarters are in London and Dublin. As to Ned Norman, of Brosna, the smallness of his cure decides, according to Mr. Supple, the question between his zeal and his interest.

Now as to the assets and liabilities of this company. The former are made up by periodical meetings in the Rotundo—that chosen arena of dancers, musicians, buffoons (such as Gregg), magicians, Methodists, and—Protestant Evangelists! Here the tocsin of bigotry is sounded, and old women in pantaloons and petticoats, and lisping dandies and simpering dandizettes, dole out their offerings, more to annoy those “horrid Priests,” who have so many followers, than for any possible interest they could take in the spiritual welfare of Paddy Forehan, Phil. Cunneneen, or other low creatures, with names so plebeian. The meetings with which we are from time to time disgusted in the Rotundo form a fair specimen of all these religious “reunions.” Untiring malevolence, virulent bigotry, barefaced calumny, a thousand times refuted—in fine all uncharitableness—are the only commodities exhibited for sale at that shop, because they are the only commodities which sell. The outscouts who make the grand tour of the three kingdoms are chosen from those who have the greatest glibness of tongue; and in no place within this broad realm do they succeed so well as in those lazar-houses, where every disease in the phar-macopœia has a male or female representative amongst their aristocratic denizens—the watering places of England. Here, when no itinerant rivals, like Hugh McNeile, of Liverpool, or Hugh Stowell, of Manchester, intervene to poach upon the preserves of ignorance and bigotry, the "chickens of grace" in the interest of our Irish apostles succeed in filling themselves neck and crop with the plunder of their dupes. They read of numberless Papists brought to see the error of their ways: they safely read the names, and sometimes venture on the whereabouts, and give some unpronounceable names of localities existent and non-existent—Bugoughagour, Teernamuckfaughalunkishla beg, and so forth—and who dare say them nay? Any one rash enough to do so—supposing such a marvel as a lover of truth could be found in such a place—would quickly be ejected by a well-fattened beadle, or a well-batoned policeman.

As to the liabilities, when the cash is forthcoming, as it is necessary to show some fruits to those who supplied it, a portion of it is distributed amongst the apostolic labourers, who, like the police force, being eternally on the watch to catch one another tripping, in order to commend the spy to the higher powers, no means are left untried, no expense spared, as far as their ability extends, "to show something for their money." Thus we have the disinterested conversions of the Dan and Pat Forehans; and, when even they fail, why fiction does the rest.

But enough of them. What we can't help condoling with the Mail upon is the woeful change which has been evolved in the article of conversion, by the ever-turning wheel of time! What a sad descent from ropes and convict ships to bribes, falsehoods, and persuasions! We would not be so uncharitable as to say that the present race of Parsons—we speak of the M'Ghec, Gregg Forgery Todd and Norman tribe—regret that they cannot recur to the olden mode of converting Papists: no, that would spoil trade, for bribery can't be managed without money, and in former days no rich gulls were required to "fork out" the means of fertilizing the vineyard. No, we exonerate them from entertaining any such exploded notions; but not so the apostates or bigots who work at the Protestant press. Not satisfied with their own bloody-mindedness, they would fain make us believe that all the clergy of the Protestant Church—their patrons and readers—participate in their own sanguinary feelings, and claim for them credit for the will, if the power remain no longer—

"Ut desint vires tamen est laus et voluntas."
Verily—we say again—the times are changed!
—Dublin Pilot, April 8, 1844.

TRALEE QUARTER SESSIONS—THURSDAY.

EXTRAORDINARY CASE—THE WAY TO CONVERT PAPISTS TO PROTESTANTISM.

(Before William M'Dermott, Esq., Assistant Rister.)

His Worship, after having disposed of a number of civil bills, commenced hearing the following case in which Daniel Forehan, of Bugoughagour in this county, labourer, was the plaintiff, and the Rev. Edward Norman, of same place, Clerk, was the defendant.

This was an action for the sum of 2l. 5s., being so much remainder due which the plaintiff ought to have and recover from defendant, by reason of defendant having in the year 1842 promised and agreed to pay the sum of four pounds yearly in consideration that plaintiff, with his wife and children, would go to church, attend meetings, and that plaintiff would send his children to the Protestant school, and which agreement the plaintiff fulfilled for a space of eighteen months from said year, as also so much due by account stated and settled between plaintiff and defendant in 1842 and 1843.

Mr. Justin Supple appeared for the plaintiff. Mr. Huggard for the defendant.

Mr. Justin Supple then addressed the court.—Your worship, here is an intelligent and clever gentleman, not long residing in that part of the country, who, taking into consideration the unenlightened state of that district without either church or school, or endowment, up to the time of his arrival, instantly sets about enlightening the darkness in which he found them involved. He enters on his holy mission, on a crusade against the religion of the people—he sets about appointing Bible-readers, inspectors of schools, and other worthies to assist in the good work, and, aided by the funds received from the English dupes, he at length succeeds in establishing for himself a pretty house, and a neat little church where there was never one before. He then takes the next step—he goes amongst the illiterate creatures in the neighbourhood, and succeeds in inducing by every means the children of the unsuspecting parents, and some of the parents themselves, to leave the places they were accustomed to frequent, and go to those places where there might be a chance of making them converts. The plaintiff in this action was one of those who, for the consideration of 4l. a year, consented to act in this manner, and for that consideration continued with his wife and children to frequent the church and meetings, as directed and agreed on, for a space of eighteen months; but at length, regretting that he had changed from the ancient faith, he changes his note, when the soup got slack, embraces the course he had before gone over (as all these creatures will ultimately do,) and comes back again to the old ivy. Mr. Norman, finding that the flock which he fancied would daily increase, was daily declining, thought it full time to stop the supplies, and plaintiff has again come back to the old religion, and I now submit that the grounds which I have stated are a sufficient consideration for bringing the present action.

Mr. Huggard.—Your worship, we will produce evidence quite to the contrary. The reasons now stated are inconsistent with the principles of the Irish Society.

Mr. Supple.—We will shortly hear a different story.

Patrick Forehan, sworn and examined by Mr. J. Supple.—Is a relative of Daniel Forehan; knows Parson Norman; myself and my family used to go to mass when Parson Norman came, but there was no church at Abbeyfeale Bridge when he came, but there was one there after that; Parson Norman came in 1842; was present when a conversation took place between the parson and my brother; the conversation took place between Feal-bridge and Abbeyfeale; Parson Norman said if Daniel and his wife attended the meetings in the church, and sent his children to school, where the Bible readers used to be, he would give him 4*l.* a year; Daniel accordingly did so for a year and a half; knows he received money; was present when Parson Norman came and gave 17*l.* 10*s.* to pay for the rent of a garden; that was twelve months ago last November; Parson Norman made me change, also, but we changed back since (laughter.)

Mr. Daniel Supple—The soup badly agreed with you.

Court—I suppose if you got some money now you'd change again?

Mr. Huggard—If he succeed in this action against Mr. Norman, won't you bring another action at the sessions?

Witness—I would not bring an action because I was paid all before, by him, except five shillings (laughter).

The Court—A pretty return you gave.

To Mr. Huggard—Cannot tell how long Mr. Norman is in the country or out of it; there was no person present at the conversation on the Abbeyfeale road but Parson Norman, my brother, God, and myself.

Court—It is hard to say if He were with you while selling your soul for money.

Mr. J. Supple—That was often done.

Examined by Mr. Huggard—Dowling was present and so was Counihan; not at the conversation, but when I got the money first; Mr. Norman met my brother on the road, and in conversation asked why he did not go to church? he said he would give his brother four pounds a year if he did so, and to send his wife and children to the meetings; does not know if his brother ever before went to church.

To the Court—Does not know if his brother went to church before Mr. Norman came to that parish.

To Mr. Huggard—Does not say but he went to Protestant prayers; never went there myself; he never told me he went there; can't say if his brother went to Connor's house, where they met for prayers; does not know if his brother ever went to church; was present when the school was opened; sent my children to it; was not present when Mr. Norman made a speech; Mr. Norman asked him to send the children there.

Mr. D. Supple—A new system of kidnapping.

Examination continued—Mr. Norman promised me 3*l.*; paid me 2*l.* 15*s.*; went to church for that honestly for eleven months.

The Court—Were you not sincere when going to church?

Witness—I knew I was doing wrong, but strove to keep my family together.

Examination resumed by Mr. Huggard—took the money and went to church; knew nothing about the church.

To the Court—Stopped going to church last July; even if the money were kept up I would not continue going; I would rather beg the world.

Mr. Huggard addressing the witness—Do you think it right to take a person's money, and—

Mr. D. Supple—A parson's money (laughter).

Mr. Huggard, calling on the witness—Do you know the difference between the two churches?

Mr. D. Supple—Perhaps you don't know that yourself, Mr. Huggard (laughter.)

To Mr. J. Supple—Said my own prayers while I was in the church; used to put up my hand to bless myself unknown to anybody; did not do it in presence of Mr. Norman; did not engage to say Mr. Norman's prayers; knew nothing about his prayers; did not attend to them.

The witness was here requested by Mr. Supple to say one of his own prayers in Irish, he repeated the "Hail Mary."

Mr. J. Supple—Mr. Norman would not like to hear that.

Witness next repeated the Lord's Prayer.

To Mr. Huggard—Knows nothing about Mr. Norman's prayers; does not know if it was out of an Irish book he read prayers; heard him pray in church; does not know whether he read them in English, Irish, or Latin, as he did not mind them.

To Mr. J. Supple—My brother got 4*l.* a year because he had six children; I got but 3*l.* myself; I had but one child.

Mr. Huggard said—Mr. Norman is present and can be examined, and then it will be seen that in periods of distress or scarcity, Mr. Norman bought up large quantities of potatoes and meal, which he was thus enabled to purchase at a cheap rate, and gave them out on 1*l.* 0*s.* U's, for which he was afterwards paid. He also employed those persons in making a ditch, and here now he is turned on. The witness who has just gone down has been guilty of such deception and hypocrisy that I would consider his evidence ought not to be received. In point of law if the case were even made out I would show there was no consideration for bringing his action.

Mr. T. B. Hurley—It appears to me that there is a good and valid consideration for this promise and agreement. The retainment of Mr. Norman by the Irish Society must depend on his getting followers by such means.

The Rev. Mr. Denny—No such thing; that is a mistake, Mr. Norman is the clergyman of Brosna.

The Court—I do not think it necessary to go farther with this case; I do not say that there has been perjury, but even if the action were sustainable in point of law, I would be guilty of justifying those acts of the plaintiff, were I to admit the evidence of a witness whose character has been tainted by his acts of hypocrisy; for a man that has sold his God, that is, who has left the church he conscientiously believed in to embrace one which he says, he did not believe in, is not a witness whose evidence deserves to be credited, and therefore in the double capacity of judge and jury I could not think of sanctioning such a course.

The case was then dismissed.—Kerry Examiner.

Hath any wronged thee? be bravely revenged: slight it, and the work is begun; forgive it, and it is finished. He is below himself that is not above an injury.

The Dublin Review. No. XXXI. March, 1844.
London: Dolman.

The March number of this Review appears, as yet able to bestow upon it, to be of a very interesting character. We intend to notice it more fully next week. In the meantime, we think it right to lay before our readers the following circular, which we find in the advertising sheets:—"When first the project was formed and carried into execution, of publishing a quarterly journal, conducted upon Catholic principles, it was treated by many as a rash undertaking: and even those who most cordially wished it success, scarcely dared to hope that its existence would be prolonged beyond a few years. The fate of every other Catholic literary periodical was confidently foretold to it. Those who undertook the work, however, judged more hopefully. They had a stronger faith in the resources of our body, in its earning, that is, its increasing literature, its growing importance, its expanding knowledge of its own interests, and its rising position in the unsocial scale; and they trusted that an organ which should fitly represent its feelings, its principles, and its legitimate aims, could not fail to be adequately encouraged. Still it was an expectation, requiring some resolution; and, with one exception, they who made it could not have advanced with the confidence of the Catholic public, beyond their upright motives and zealous intentions."

But now that the Dublin Review has passed its thirtieth number, and has reached the eighth year of its existence, its conductors appeal to their Catholic brethren, for encouragement and support. The object of their appeal, Mr. O'Connell and suppliant, not pecuniary assistance, but, however, is to increase the circulation of the work, by such as already subscribe to it, and subscription from such as till now have not done so. The clergy, in particular, are urged to use their power to advance its prospects, by recommending it among their flocks, by giving it a place in their libraries, and by inducing secular persons to unite in one subscription. Nor even

"It will not be out of place to enumerate some of the grounds on which the Review lays claim to the general interest of Catholics in Great Britain and Ireland, and may seem not unworthy of their support:—

1. It pleased Divine Providence that

Review should first appear at a time when important controversies were springing up in the English Church, controversies of which the Review was then only cast, the germ had hardly been sown, but which were by degrees to grow and expand, and form most interesting features in the history of our age. The Review was an early instrument in this movement, and Catholics in this great movement, its attention was steadily in sight through every change; it has kept it before the advantages to be derived from its progress, and perhaps alone, has discussed its new questions, and proposed arguments to meet its fallacies. It may not be presumptuous to say, that without such a channel, much interesting religious information would not have easily reached the great body of Catholics.

2. Nor has the Review been wanting in attention to other great topics of the day, connected with the progress of Catholicity. The revival of Christian art, and the excitement of its kindred feelings, have not been merely recorded, but promoted and illustrated in its pages.

3. Many important questions, too, relative specifically to Ireland, have been treated in it, by writers intimately acquainted with her wants and her sufferings.

4. The principal religious discussions of other countries have likewise been attended to; while literary and scientific subjects have been handled as fully as in the ordinary reviews.

Such are some of the principal claims which the conductors of the Dublin Review think themselves justified in respectfully advancing to the support of their Catholic brethren. They might add, that its pages have been useful in removing prejudice from the minds of persons separated from them in religion; and that in this respect it has had the advantage (from its quarterly form) of being admitted among a class of readers not usually favourable to Catholic literature.

It would be unbecoming, and it is unnecessary, to urge upon their Catholic friends claims of another character, or relative to the manner in which the Review has been supported till now. That for a time most generous assistance was afforded it by several of the Catholic nobility and gentry, is sufficiently known. But, since the period originally fixed for its continuance expired, the conductors of the Review have continued it at their own risk; nor could they have done so but for the truly Catholic spirit in which its contributors have acted, putting aside all idea of profit, and seeking no reward for their zealous co-operation, beyond the satisfaction of aiding in the holy cause of their religion. Among the Irish clergy in particular, this noble disinterestedness has been manifested; and to it many of the most valuable articles of the Review are owing. It is the duty of making this acknowledgment, and of so performing an act of justice, and not the desire of giving value to their own personal sacrifices, that suggests to the conductors of the Review the introduction of this topic. They have continued their labours, as they hope through higher and better motives than the applause of men or the recompenses of earth; and they will not be deterred from continuing them by partial disapprobation or by personal inconvenience.

But they feel it due to Catholic interests, to call now upon every member of the true Church, and upon its clergy in particular, to co-operate with them, in the spirit of kindness which religious charity must inspire, as brethren, firmly, because lovingly, combined in a common, and most sacred, cause. They entreat them generally, and individually, to consider this publication as the common property of the entire body, not as a private speculation; and to exert themselves, in this view, to secure its continuance and extend its usefulness by greater efforts to uphold it and increase its circulation. Mr. O'Connell, even while engaged in the harassing duty of attending to the late important trial, was good enough to address a circular to all the Irish clergy, strongly recommending the Review to their notice and patronage, and of which we subjoin a copy. For this—but one of many proofs of his warm interest in the publication—its conductors feel that they owe him sincere gratitude, which they are glad of this opportunity openly and cordially to express; the more so as his example has suggested to them the propriety of similarly appealing to the Catholic clergy and laity of Great Britain.

"In concluding this their address, they respectfully beg that it may not be construed into an intimation of any insecurity in the Review, which they believe never had better prospects than at present. These, in fact, have encouraged them to come forward thus boldly, and solicit the kind support of their brethren.

("CIRCULAR")

"Court of Queen's Bench, Dublin, January, 1844.

"Sir—Notwithstanding the pressure of other matters on my attention, I feel so anxiously the importance of the subject on which I now address you, that I give it a preference to everything else—I refer to the Dublin Review. I verily believe that publication to be of the utmost value to the cause of Catholicity and genuine liberty. It is the only quarterly periodical that vindicates the character of the Irish and the interests of their religion.

"It is, especially, the only such publication that has full access to the various fashionable clubs, as well as the public reading rooms. It also circulates extensively amongst the clergy, and in the colleges of the Established Church in England—and it is of incalculable value to preserve an organ of religious and liberal sentiment, whose voice is heard in places, and by persons, whose attention has hitherto been closely confined to the misrepresentations and calumnies of the enemies of the Catholic religion and of the Irish nation.

"It is of the utmost importance that we should have our case fairly stated—all we desire is, to be known as we really and in truth are—all we desire is, that our tenets should be freed from misrepresentation, and our religious practices should be rescued from false glosses and calumnious imputations.

"It is impossible to place all these vital interests in better hands than in the Dublin Review. We owe to ourselves and to our religion, to sustain that journal—we owe it in Christian charity to our Protestant fellow-countrymen, to clear away the mist so foully raised around our faith, and to show forth to them our holy religion, our apostolic faith, in its genuine brightness and simple truth.

"Impressed with these sentiments, I take the liberty of recommending to you the present, and every future, number of the Dublin Review.—I have the honour to be, respectfully, your very faithful servant,

"DANIEL O'CONNELL."

From the same source we gather two facts, in which we are sure our readers will take much interest. The first is, that Dr. Lingard's "Antiquities and History of the Anglo-Saxon Church"—the old work re-written and enlarged—is actually in the press, and is to be ready in the autumn, in two octavo volumes. The second is, that we are to have a re-issue, in both monthly and weekly parts, of the same venerable writer's "History of England."—Tablet.

"SACERDOS HIBERNICUS."

A tissue of most barefaced misrepresentation bearing this title was lately published in the Evening Mail, and we find it has been carefully transferred to the columns of the Times. It professes to be an exposition of the revenues and wealth (!!!) of the Catholic Hierarchy and Priesthood of Ireland, and it is coolly put forward in both these publications as a "genuine production of a Roman Catholic Priest." There is not a syllable that does it—now it is forgery—and one of the clumsiest that ever issued from the Todd-Magee manufactory. We the following passages as a sample:—

"Let us review their income in its manifold forms.—(1.) In the first place, parish priests charge every householder, rich and poor, 2s. 2d. a year as their confession dues, and a day is set apart for every village twice a year, at Christmas and Easter, to receive the people's confessions, and to collect the 2s. 2d. from every head of a family.—(2.) It is also a matter of course, whether rich or poor, to have a good dinner or breakfast, with wine or spirits, for the clergy and their clerk on that day.

"I know it is often very necessary for clergymen, who are far from their own houses, and sitting in the confessional from morning until night, to get some refreshment in the shape of a dinner, after the fatigue and labour of the day. But, I saw, and deplored it, several instances in which this good and hospitable usage was grossly abused.—(3.) The parish priests charge 2s. 6d. for every baptism, and some parish priests refuse even to christen the child without the money, and often leave infants without baptism for a year; but it is the invariable rule with every parish priest in Ireland to leave the woman unchurched until the baptism money, and every farthing of every other debt, is fully liquidated. Some women remain years without being churched, and often are allowed to die by the parish priests without the benefit of that ceremony (if it has any benefit more than once after the first birth).—(4.) The parish priests get 12. 10s. or 2l. for every marriage, they perform, and, if they have not the cash, they are allowed to cohabit in sin until they make it out. I know parties to be living in sin for fifteen years for want of the marriage money, as the parish priest would not marry them without his fee. There are thousands of cases of this nature in every diocese in Ireland."

"The benefit of that ceremony—(if it has any benefit)"!!! Only think of such an observation coming from a "genuine Roman Catholic Priest!"

Liars, they say, ought to have a good memorial—forgers should certainly pay some regard to the consideration of resemblance to give their imposture the chance of escaping the detection, at least, of the purblind and unobservant. "Sacerdos Hibernicus" would, we have not the least doubt, undertake very readily to pick a pocket, but he would be so utterly deficient in the tact of his trade that he would be his own betrayer, unless, indeed, he practised upon an unfortunate victim who could neither see nor feel!—Pilot.

Humanity is the particular characteristic of great minds; little, vicious minds abound with anger and revenge, and are incapable of feeling the exalted pleasure of forgiving their enemies.

MISCELLANEA.

CONVERSION.—On Tuesday last Dr. Swiney, M.D., his lady and their seven children were received into the bosom of the Catholic Church at their house in Bruff, by the Very Rev. R. Cusack, P.P. and V.G., assisted by one of his curates, the Rev. Mr. Blake. The ceremony was most imposing and truly affecting. All read aloud and distinctly their profession of the holy Roman Catholic faith, after which they received the Sacrament of Baptism according to the rites of the Catholic Church. Doctor Swiney is well known as a most respectable, exemplary, and patriotic Irishman. He is a volunteer, and is a special inspector of the Bruff districts. His father was one of the Volunteers of '82, and is still alive at Charleville. —Limerick Reporter.

BANAGHAR.—On Saturday we were blessed by a visit from our venerable and patriotic bishop, the Right Rev. Dr. Higgins, who came hither specially to instal into this parish, in the room of the late Rev. John Kenny, the Rev. John Kiran, as parish priest. After the holy offices of the day had terminated, his lordship adverted to the present perilous conjuncture, the dangers which threatened the great leader of the Irish nation, and the absolute necessity of pursuing, under every provocation, the instructions which that distinguished man, the modern Moses, gave to guard against even the appearance of tumult or riot. His lordship completely vindicated the interference of the Catholic prelates and clergy in the present struggle, proved that it was their duty to aid the people in finding remedies for their social evils, and pledged himself, the most zealous of them, to redouble his exertions. This day, he said, the holy sacrifice of the Mass was offered up for Dr. O'Connell's preservation on every altar in this diocese, the largest in Ireland, and concluded by requesting that the congregation would join in prayer to the Giver of all good gifts, to invoke his blessing and protection on their sanguine leader. Never was a request more cordially complied with, and while the fervent prayer was poured from every tongue, the bursting tears of every burning cheek told how intensely the people felt for the patriot, and how every hope of themselves and Ireland were centred, in the convicted conspirator." —Correspondent of Freeman.

"REBECCA AND HER DAUGHTERS."—In answer to a correspondent, who requests to be informed the origin of the above title, we beg to state that the term was taken from the 60th verse of the 24th chapter of Genesis, which, having reference to gates and their destruction, was adopted as the watchword of the first adventurous adventurers of toll-gates. The verse is as follows:—"And they blessed Rebecca, and said unto her, thou shalt be the mother of hundreds of millions, and thy children shall possess the gates of them which hate them." —Welshman.

DEATH OF THE REV. JOHN O'REILLY, CATHOLIC RECTOR OF VIRGINIA.—Departed this life, at residence, Virginia, after a very long and borne with Christian resignation, 3d April, 1844, the Rev. John of Lurgan, in the diocese of Kil-

INTENDED VISIT OF FATHER MATHEW TO AMERICA.

It is reported that this distinguished philanthropist has signified his intention to visit this country in June next. A free passage has been very generously offered him by Messrs. Grinnell, Minturn, and Co. proprietors of a London and Liverpool line of packet ships, which he has accepted. —New York Evangelist.

ORDINATION.—The Rev. Daniel Meara, brother of Mr. Patrick Meara, of Nenagh, merchant, was ordained priest, with many others, in the chapel of the Roman College at Rome, by Cardinal Franzoni, on the 4th instant.

THE SCOTTISH CHRISTMAS.

From Bon Gaultier and his Friends.

In truth it was a solemn show,
The ancient Scottish Christmas tide;
The holly and the misletoe;
With other boughs as green beside;
Within the altar and the rail:
The offering of the stainless flowers,
And all the grateful heart's avail,
For hope and promise such as ours.
But these have long since pass'd away
Beneath the cold Geneva ban;
No message brings that sacred day
Of what was done and wrought for man.
A cheerless day!—A gloomy time!
Whereon no grateful thanks are given;
Unhallow'd by the holy chime
Thought ought to rise and welcome heaven.

A frost more deep than winter brings,
Hath fallen on the Northern moor,
And no glad voice the Christmas brings,
To stay the labours of the poor.
No anthem, in the dead of night,
Awakes the shepherd from afar,
Nor can he see the radiant light
That flashes from the promised Star.

Alone upon the wintry hill,
The banish'd Angel sits and sighs,
Yet scans the weary midnight still
With eager looks and fearful eyes.
The winds around are wailing low;
They moan amidst the leafless tree;
And in the hollow cave below
Is heard the washing of the sea.

The morning comes!—O, joy to those Who know the wherefore of the dawn;
Why yonder East so brightly glows,
And why the veil of Night's withdrawn!
Old man, thy cheek is wan and pale;
The load of years is hard on thee;
Look up above!—"Of what avail
Is any morning light to me?"

Around the girdle of the earth,
Where'er the Cross hath ta'en its stand,
Arise the tidings of the Birth
That made the world one Holy Land!
Save where the faith is cold and faint
As are the Northern rocks and snow,
Where secret lane and honour'd saint
Have dwelt with thee long ago!

CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

No. 2.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JULY 13, 1844.

[Vol. VII.

THE LIFE OF ST. STEPHEN, ABBOT, FOUNDER OF THE CISTERCIAN ORDER. By the Rev. Mr. Newman. London, 1844.

So much has been said and written about the interesting volume which bears this title, that, while we cannot refrain from adding a word of our own, we know that a few extracts from the work itself will be more acceptable to our readers than anything we could say to recommend it. In truth, the Rev. Mr. Newman's book sufficiently recommends itself to all classes of readers and religionists, and needs not the good offices of a commentator to procure for it a reception with the public. The name and the religion of the author recommend it to the favourable attention of Protestants; his well-known erudition and candour claim the favour and respect of the learned and unprejudiced reader, while the Catholic truths he announces, and the subject on which he writes, will give his work an undying interest in the judgment of every good Catholic.

It is, therefore, enough to know that such a work has been written by such an author, in order to be generally read, and it cannot be read without being universally admired. It is for sale, we understand, in Calcutta, at the British Library, and we shall not be therefore so copious in our extracts as we should otherwise be disposed to be. For the present, we shall confine ourselves to the first chapter, and to a few of those topics in it, which have been long the theme of vituperation and invective with Protestant writers.

It is a favourite fancy with Protestant historians and controversialists to brand the lives of the saints, as well of antiquity as of modern times, as fabulous legends, to which it would be unworthy of an enlightened Christian in our days, to give the smallest credit; and to this desperate shift they were forced, in order to screen Protestantism from the reproach of having given no saints to the world, such as were the glory and the ornament of the Mother Church, as well as the sure witnesses of the truth and sanctity of her doctrines. Let us hear Mr. Newman on this subject.

"Holy men of old who have written the lives of the saints, universally begin by professing their unworthiness to be the historians of the marvellous deeds which the Holy Spirit has wrought in the Church. What then should we say, who, in these miserable times, from the bosom of our quiet homes, or in the midst of our literary ease, venture to celebrate the glories of the saints? We have much that is amiable and domestic amongst us, but saints, the genuine creation of the cross, with their supernatural virtues, are now to us a matter of history."—"Yet while we wait for better days, we may comfort ourselves with the contemplation of what her (the Church's) sons once were, and admire their virtues, though we have not the power, even though we had the will, to imitate them."

Such is the testimony of a Protestant clergyman, educated in the prejudices and principles of the Protestant religion from his birth, but a man who has read extensively and decided impartially. We all know what has been written by Protestants against the principles and usages of the monastic state, and against the results of its discipline; and if we were disposed to forget it, the Calcutta Christian Advocate, the Bengal Hurkaru and the Agra Ukhbar do not fail to answer each other, like "echoes from the caverns of the deep recess," in repeating the old story, lest it should seem "a singular opinion." We think we see the worthy trio shake hands, and shudder, and encourage one another to stand firm, while we hear Mr. Newman declare, that the monastic state is the most perfect way, and that the conventual education of youth is altogether heavenly. Let us hear the Rev gentleman say it in his own words:

"The English character has an earnestness and reality about it, capable of appreciating and of following out the most perfect way. Not only was the whole island once covered with fair monasteries, but it sent forth into foreign lands men who became the light of foreign monastic orders. Thus the saint whose life we have undertaken to write, was one of the first founders of the Cistercian order and the spiritual father of St. Bernard. "He was born rather before than after the Norman Conquest, and he first appears as a boy brought up from his earliest years in the monastery of Sherborne, in Dorsetshire"—"In those lawless times when temptation to acts of violence and rapine and reckless profligacy were so great, holy parents thought that they could not better protect the purity of their children than by placing them at once under the shadow of a monastery. Just as they had already in their name taken the solemn vows of baptism at the font, so they brought their children into the church of the convent, led them up into the sanctuary, and wrapping their hands in the linen cloth which covered the altar, gave them up solemnly to the service of God."—"The discipline to which St. Stephen was thus subjected from his earliest years was of the most careful kind. No prince could be brought up with greater care in a king's palace, than were these children offered up in the monastery, whether they were noble or low-born. The greatest pains were taken that the sight and even the knowledge of evil should be kept from them; they were instructed in reading, writing, and religious learning, but above all in music and psalmody. Stephen thus spent his childhood, like Samuel, in the courts of the Lord's house, amidst the beauty and variety of the ceremonies with which the peaceful round of monastic life was diversified."

The following extract will be read with interest by every Englishman whatever may be his creed, and it cannot fail to cause the sincere Protestant to sigh over the day that saw England separated by schism from the centre of unity and the arc of truth.

"Rome was the bourn to which the heart of all Englishmen naturally turned, at that day, across the wide tract of land and sea which separated them. Stephen had the thoughts of many illustrious examples before him to cheer him on his way; many a Saxon king had laid aside his crown and gone to assume the monastic habit in Rome. The venerable Bede, in relating one of these events, says, that it was only what many of the English, noble and low-born, clerks and laymen, men and women, vied with each other in doing, and their enthusiastic feelings are recorded in that saying which occurs so strangely in Bede's Collectanea, or Common-place Book, "when the Coliseum falls, Rome shall fall; when Rome falls, the world shall fall." England had never forgotten that whatever Rome might be to the rest of the world, it was her mother Church; from the earliest times there was an English school in Rome, and some Saxon king, tradition said Ina, had built a church, dedicated to the Blessed Virgin, which belonged to the English, and where Saxon pilgrims who died at Rome were buried. Stephen, was therefore, as much at home in St. Peter's when once he got to Rome, as he would have been in Westminster Abbey, recollections of his native kings would meet him wherever he went: there he might see the place where Alfred, when a boy of seven years old, was anointed king by Leo IV.; and in the street of the Saxons, where the English pilgrims lived, stood St. Mary's Church, in which was the tomb of Burghed, the last of the Mercian princes. Stephen on his way to Rome, never forgot that he was a monk; it was, no idle curiosity which led him so far over the sea and across the Alps. It was to imitate to the letter the life of him who came down from heaven to be a poor man, and who had not where to lay his head; he thus courted cold and hunger and nakedness, that he might follow step by step the Virgin Lamb, as a stranger and pilgrim upon earth. In these times, an Englishman in quitting his country finds instead of the one home everywhere, altars at which he can only kneel as an alien, and travelling is, therefore, to us generally a source of dissipation. Stephen however found brethren wherever he went, from the parish church and the way-side chapel to the Cathedral of the metropolian city."

What Protestant can reflect on this truth and not regret the change which Protestantism has brought over the face of Christendom; a Protestant is an alien Christian at every altar in the world, except at the altar, or rather at the ignoble table, of his own little isolated sect, but Stephen, because he was a Catholic, found brethren wherever he went, though a monk and an Englishman.

MONKS AND NUNS.

We earnestly recommend to the especial notice of our cotemporaries of the Bengal Hurkaru and Agra Ukhbar, the following extract from a sermon entitled THE APOSTOLICAL CHRISTIAN, delivered and published by that celebrated Divine of the Anglican Church, the Rev. Mr. Newman. It will, perhaps, be urged that the evidence of a Puseyite is of no value to the orthodox Church-of-England-man, but, on the other hand, it must be admitted that what Mr. Newman endeavors to inculcate arises from no nursery prejudices or ignorance of the subjects mooted by him. He does not abuse, much less vilify the doctrines he differs from. He does not calumniate those whose faith does not correspond with the "faith that is in him;" but his object is to give to the world the truth he has acquired after deep and searching study, and when his mind is struck with the beauties of some pure and holy institution raised and animated by the Catholic Church, for the glory of God and the salvation of his people, Mr. Newman does not hesitate, from any Protestant prejudice, to bear witness to its purity and holiness. He does not attempt from any feeling of malice, to blacken what he knows to be fair, or to abuse, when praise is due. At all events our cotemporaries may so far overcome their animosity as to admit that Mr. Newman is sincere, and above the cant which a superficial knowledge of the history of the Church of Christ combined with ignorance, engenders in prejudiced and illiberal minds. It must also be remembered that Mr. Newman is still opposed to us on several essential points, and therefore his voluntary testimony in favor of the institutions and members of the Catholic Church must proceed from a sincere and honest conviction of the truths he asserts, and from a candour emanating from a generous and noble mind.

Mr. Newman asks "if the truth must be spoken, what are the humble monk and the holy nun and other regulars, but Christians after the very pattern given us in Scripture? Did our Saviour come on earth suddenly, as He will one day visit, in whom would he see the features of the Christians He and His Apostles left behind them, but in them." But we are anticipating Mr. Newman's sermon. Let our readers hear him on the subject.

"And next ask yourself this question, and be honest in your answer. This model of a Christian, though not commanding your literal imitation, still is it not the very model which has been fulfilled in others in every age since the New Testament was written? You will ask me in whom? I am loth to say; I have reason to ask you to be honest and candid; for so it is, as if from consciousness of the fact, and dislike to have it urged upon us, we and our forefathers have been accustomed to scorn and ridicule these faithful obedient persons, and, in our Saviour's very words, to 'cast out their name as evil, for the Son of man's sake.' But, if the truth must be spoken, what are the humble monk, and the holy nun, and other regulars, as they are called, but Christians after the very pattern given us in Scripture? What have they done but this, - continue in the world the Christianity of the Bible? Did our Saviour come on earth suddenly, as He will one day visit, in whom would He see the features of the Christians He and His apostles left behind them, but in them? Who but these give up home and friends, wealth and ease, good name and liberty of will, for the kingdom of heaven? Where shall we find the image of St. Paul, or St. Peter, or St. John, or of Mary, the mother of Mark, or of Philip's daughters, but in those who, whether they remain in seclusion, or are sent over the earth, have calm faces, and sweet plaintive voices, and spare frames, and gentle manners, and hearts weaned from the world, and wills subdued; and for their meekness meet with insult, and for their purity with slander, and for their gravity with suspicion, and for their courage with cruelty; yet meet with Christ everywhere,—Christ, their all-sufficient, everlasting portion, to make up to them, both here and hereafter, all they suffer, all they dare, for His Name's sake!"—pp. 327-329.

CHARITABLE DONATIONS

We understand that an excellent sweet-toned Bell was presented within the last week to the Chapel attached to St. John's College, Intally, by Chevalier W. R. Lackersteen, and that the most Rev. the Archbishop, Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, has just received from a Protestant gentleman a donation of 500 Rs. for the enlargement of St. Thomas' Church, with instructions to have particular attention paid to the decoration of the little Altar dedicated to the Blessed Virgin.

We have to apologise for having omitted to notice sooner, the donation of a splendid Chandelier, presented some months ago to St. Thomas' Church, by a respectable Armenian Lady of Calcutta, who does not wish to have her name mentioned in connection with her charities. This valuable present, which was originally purchased for 1,400 Rs. is seen to great advantage when the Church is lighted for evening service on Sundays, and is probably the finest one of the kind in Calcutta.

CONVERSIONS.

A few days ago a Hindoo young woman, after having been duly instructed, was baptized by the Rev. Mr. Veralli.

Two young men, Hindoos, who received a tolerably good education, applied during last week to one of the Catholic Clergy to be instructed in the true Faith.

At Comila, Rev. Mr. Zubiburn baptized a Mussulman girl, Mr. Lecolier and Madame Delauney standing sponsors.

At the same place, a Native, aged 30 years, applied for instruction in order to be prepared for baptism.

Selections,

ON TRUE COMPUNCTION OF HEART.

(Continued from page 7.)

Wherefore follow thou me, and vex not thy spirit, by lusting against the spirit; but rather be more ready, for all that it commands. "Knowing that as thou art partakers of the sufferings, so shalt thou be also of the consolation." (2 Cor. i. 7.) "Gird thee with sackcloth, and sprinkle thee with ashes; come down and sit thee in the dust, O daughter of Sion." (Jer. vi. 26.) Weep with me, for it is not well with me, nor is my grief moderate, nor a passing sorrow. My LORD and my GOD is angry with his servant, and hath cursed me in his works and said. "In the sweat of thy brow, shalt thou eat bread." (Gen. iii. 19.) And I confess, that I have justly lost the desirable land, because I have not kept the commandments of God.

Before I fell, my food was not fleshly, earthly, corporeal, but heavenly, angelical, spiritual. The bread prepared for me by God was of fine wheat, delicately ground; but now it is of barley, mouldy and coarse;—yea, in truth, baked under the ashes and never turned.—(To be continued.)

SELF.

Catholicity—fairest daughter of Zion; herald of God's mercy to man; soother of the troubled mind; groundwork of future hopes; how art thou deformed in this land of Reformation!

There is a principle in human nature which, perhaps, may be called selfishness, or self-seeking, which teaches us to aim at procuring what we consider the greatest possible good by submitting to the least possible evil. This principle is good when properly directed. This principle, under the rule of reason and religion, would teach us to prefer our eternal to our temporal interest. Now, are we Catholics guided by this principle of Self under the rule of reason and religion, or Self under the misrule of the passions? Is the great moving, ruling principle of our solitudes, or our anxieties, and our actions—our eternal, or our temporal interest? Never was there a period of our history when greater prudence, greater foresight, greater energy, greater dignified, firm, and sterling worth were required, in our acting powers, than at the present moment. One false step may lead to irreparable consequences; one opportunity neglected may never return. Nor is this awful responsibility resting exclusively upon those in authority; it devolves, and is attached to every member of Catholicity precisely according to the station which he holds in society. We are standing upon the brink of a crater; the columns of vapour are ascending around us; step forward in the wrong direction and we are enveloped in flames. For some centuries we have been placed in a false position. When the enemy surrounds the camp, and all is alarm and confusion, the common soldier may hurry with impunity into the tent of his general. Such has recently been our situation; we have long been the children of captivity and bondage; we are now in a state of transition from slavery to liberty; from persecution and oppression to justice and right. We have seen the minister of religion dragged from the altar for teaching—our people from their domestic circles for adhering to, those very doctrines which our persecutors are now inculcating! We have been deprived of our property, our liberty, and our lives because we loved the Catholic faith; and the persons now in possession of our spoils are themselves claiming to be Catholics! To what a state of anomaly are we arrived! But nothing is too dark for "the glorious light," nothing too unjust or absurd for the capacious swallow of the Reformation. Do not these parsons belong to the same law-established Church as their female head? By the law of the land, the land of liberty and freedom of of conscience! the land where it is the privilege of each one to interpret the word of God according to his own private views, and form his own creed—were she to be a Catholic, she would forfeit her crown; by what title, then, do these Catholic parsons retain their Church livings? When a man becomes a convert to Catholicity the first thing we require is the restitution of ill-gotten property to its rightful owner. It is not this, however, that we regard, but the souls of the people. But, stop, Self! religion ought to be thy guide, and religion is the parent of peace. We will forgive, then, and forget. The priest has been in the habit of stealing like a culprit from the place of his concealment under the floor or in the wall; first protruding his head and looking around for the blood-hound before he ventured to step forth. Thank Heaven! these places of concealment, still existing in some other ancient mansions of our Catholic gentry, are now exhibited only as curiosities; but their effects upon individual feeling can only die away by degrees. To many of the Catholic gentry religion owes much, the clergy a debt of gratitude; and base must be that heart from which gratitude has taken her flight—but even amongst these hallowed feelings, has not, is not Self under misrule, too often mistaken for gratitude? Let gratitude do her duty and study the real welfare of the object, not be insulted by being made to degenerate into fawning and flattery, and by being thrown, as a cloak, over the foibles of the great. If the great have expended a portion of their worldly goods in the protection of the priest, the priest has expended his blood for the salvation of the great. Whilst the pious and prudent priest will studiously avoid everything that can merit the displeasure of his neighbour, by yielding to self-love; he will, not less studiously, avoid the displeasure of Heaven, by yielding to human respect, and flattering the passions; and thus, in every action, his ambition will be, rather to deserve the good-will of another than to have it.

The priest has, not unfrequently, been compelled to appear as a menial, and in the attire of a menial; and has not that which—in the sight of Heaven—has been the source of his merit in the eyes of some men—been the cause of his degradation? Are not the finest feelings of the chaplain, even yet, too often wounded by the remnants of such impressions? These, however, I trust, are isolated cases. I wish not to appear invidious by drawing attention to individuals; but we have amongst our Catholic nobility and gentry men of the finest feelings—men, whose character and conduct chases away the shade from everything around them; men of whose virtues religion is proud, and who would be esteemed an ornament in any cline or age. Do not the laws of fashionable society entitle the priest to be treated as a gentleman; or does mistaken liberality require religion to be insulted in her minister? In every Christian country with which I am acquainted, in civilised society, the priest is entitled to precedence, or it is conceded to him by every gentleman. In the infancy of religion, when, under the fostering hand of Omnipotence she first assumed a form, we find her ministers separated from the rest of men, and placed, as it were, between God and His people; and thus a halo of mystery was thrown around them. The priest is strictly forbidden to engage in any worldly business. He belongs to God, and is, even himself, obliged to respect the character which resides within him. But should he at any time forget that which is due to himself, no wonder that others should be tempted to imitate his example. Shame is the child of fear; we have been afraid to appear before the public as Catholics, and hence that shame towards everything Catholic which still seems to occupy the breasts and appear in the actions of the weak, under the borrowed guise of liberality.

Catholicity, in England, is confined within a small compass. Just emerging from our Egyptian bondage, our number is small. We are still in the desert, but we are on our way to the promised land; and nothing but our own torpor, indifference, or imprudence can retard our progress. Let our march be onward under the guidance of Heaven; and let us not stain our hope with presumption, or frustrate our prospects by apathy or neglect. The maxim of St. Ignatius has already been placed before us, and let it be our watchword, "Labour as if our success depended entirely upon our exertions, and pray as if it could come only from God." Let each one study his relative situation, and each one be true to his part. The evils existing amongst us are not few, but we hold the remedy in our hands. These evils are of two kinds, spiritual and temporal. Amongst the first is a want of solid faith; and this is the source from which all our other evils spring. I speak not of that faith which teaches us merely to believe in the doctrines of Catholicity; for having once been well-grounded in this, it is not easy to divest ourselves of it; but I speak of that lively, active faith which shows itself in our words and actions; and which diverts the eye from time to eternity. The faith of too many, I fear, is, as described by St. James, "dead" and hence that indolence in learning, and unwillingness even to hear sound doctrine; hence those frowns, and that alienation of friendship and affection from the sincere and friendly monitor who would fain conduct us to heaven. Hence that disposition, which, when we hear some sacred truth inculcated by one priest which disturbs our favourite inclinations and passions, induces us to question another and another, till one be found, who, in some unlucky or unguarded moment—perhaps to get rid of our importunity, or unwilling to wound our self-love—lets slip a dubious expression, tainted with human respect, which we torture into a lullaby for the stings of conscience, and a palliative for our career of guilt. Is this seeking the way to Heaven, or not, rather, the way to avoid it? "Seek ye first the kingdom of God," &c. Oh, if there be amongst us one, who, hearing the sacred name of minister of the God of Truth, dares, either under the influence of human respect, or to excuse his own remissness, thus to neutralise the efforts of his brethren, who, in compliance with duty and St. Paul's injunctions to Timothy, "Hold the form of sound words"—let him weigh well the consequences of his conduct on the eternal interests of his neighbours, and, before he ventures to attribute the conduct of others to imprudent zeal, let him, at least, be certain that he is not in error; and, if there be a doubt, let him remember that there cannot be too great security where ETERNITY is concerned. Are we in these times to claim a privilege of being allowed to walk to destruction without a faithful friend to whisper into our ear the glad tidings of salvation, or stretch forth a hand to rescue us from impending ruin? or may we be permitted to entertain a fond hope that the race of Nathan is not yet quite extinct? that there are still prophets to be found in Israel? that an Ambrose and a Thomas of Canterbury may yet reside amongst us? that the "salt of the earth" has not quite lost "its savour"?

The doctrine taught by our sound divines is either true or false. If true, why is it not to be inculcated? Does not the salvation of both priest and people depend upon it? If false, then let it be authoritatively pronounced as such, and the minister of religion is freed from the responsibility. But it is said, people are not disposed to hear the whole truth. I ask, what then? In proportion to the love I bear for prudence, I hate, in an affair of such importance, every palliative for apathy and neglect. St. Paul says, "that the law is not made for the just man but for the unjust and disobedient." His address to Timothy on this subject is strikingly appropriate—"Know also this, that in the last days shall come dangerous times: men shall be lovers of themselves, covetous, haughty, proud, blasphemous, disobedient to parents, ungrateful, wicked, without affection, without peace, slanderers, incontinent, unmerciful, without kindness. Traitors, stubborn, puffed up, and lovers of pleasures more than of God." Really, is not this a prophetic description of the times in which we live? And yet, what are the forcible injunctions of the same Apostle to his beloved Timothy? That because people are not disposed to hear, he must refrain from teaching sound doctrine? No. "I charge thee before God and Jesus Christ, who shall judge the living and the dead, by his coming and his kingdom: preach the word: be instant, in season out of season: reprove, entreat, rebuke with all patience and doctrine. For there shall be a time when they will not hear sound doctrine, but, according to their own desires, they will heap to themselves teachers having itching ears: and will turn away indeed their hearing from the truth and will be turned to fables. But, be thou vigilant, labour in all things, do the work of an Evangelist, fulfil thy ministry." Nor are these instructions anything more than an echo of those previously given by the Saviour, as recorded by St. Matt. chap. x. "And whosoever shall not receive you nor hear your words: going forth out of that house or city shake off the dust from your feet. Amen: I say to you it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment than for that city. Behold, I send you as sheep in the midst of wolves." Is this disposition of the hearers, or fear and servility on the part of God's ministers, to induce them to soften down the rigid doctrines of gospel morality to the standard of human frailty and passion? No. "And when they shall persecute you in this city, flee into another.... And fear not those that kill the body and cannot kill the soul: but rather fear Him that can destroy both soul and body in hell." But were I to transcribe all the passages breathing this spirit, I might copy a great portion of the Testament. Have we not too much reason to fear that as lively faith has almost disappeared from amongst us, "the salt of the earth" also has lost, at least, a portion of "its savour?"—Tablet, April 6th.

PROTESTANT TESTIMONY.

THE FRENCH CATHOLIC BISHOPS IN THE EYES OF A SCOTCH PROTESTANT—The clever correspondent, at Paris, of the Edinburgh Weekly Register, thus speaks of the Noli Episcopari of the clergy of France:—"Some time ago the archbishopric of Rouen became vacant by the death of the Prince de Croi, a Cardinal who had held it for many years. Rouen, as you know, is one of the most ancient and largest cities in France, and the diocese, of which it is the chief place, is one of the most extensive, most influential, and wealthy of any among the many into which this kingdom is divided. Moreover, the archbishop is, generally speaking, sooner or later elevated to the dignity of the sacred purple,—in other words, he is made a Cardinal. All these circumstances would, one would think, make the archbishopric of Rouen an object of ambition to every bishop and clergyman in France. But the fact is, that the Government has had great difficulty in filling it up. First of all it was offered to the Bishop of Versailles, and declined; then to the Bishop of Mantes, and declined; then to another provincial bishop, but declined; then to another, the fourth, with the same result. Four bishops, one after another, declined this arch-diocese,—four bishops in succession refused to accept the archiepiscopal mitre—four several bishops refused to increase their personal importance and their wealth by abandoning their more humble and worse-paid charges in the Church of God. To the honour of our common Christianity let this fact be stated. Presbyterians though the great majority of your readers be—haters of Episcopacy—holding almost in abhorrence the Church of Rome—they will not, I am sure, refuse the tribute of their admiration to these noble instances of disinterestedness—to these noble sacrifices of self at the shrine of duty to God and his Church. We Protestants talk of the grasping ambition of the Romish clergy, but I fear that the Protestant Church, at all events the Episcopal branch of it (of which alone I feel warranted to speak) cannot show an instance in which four of its prelates have refused ecclesiastical advancement bringing with it increased worldly pomp and state, and increased worldly wealth."

SPAIN.

ANDALUSIA.—The Association of Ladies for the support of Religious persons dispersed by the revolution, collected in five months 16,790 reals, and disposed of it with admirable judgment among poor nuns driven from their convents, plundered, and left on the wide world without support or hope but in these truly charitable, fair and noble ladies, whose names we ought to publish. The president is the Marchioness of Guadalupe Real; the vice-president, Luisa Cordova de Mora; the treasurer, Manuela Lopez Barajas, the secretary, A. Josefa Maza de Crooke.—Catholic, March 22.

The Madrid correspondent of the Univers, under date of the 22d ult., writes:—"You have learned from the journals that the Bishops of Palencia and Calahorra have arrived in this capital. I have had the honour to visit them. I assure you their peaceful and angelic faces sufficiently reveal the candour of their souls, the sincerity of their love of country, and the rectitude of their intentions. They received me with an amiability and frankness which render them agreeable, even to minds imbued with the prejudices of this age. Everybody knows that these noble prelates left the place of their exile in the midst of a public triumph; it is also known that shouts of joy resounded at every point of their journey, while they advanced towards their flocks, to bless them and to nourish them with the fruits of doctrine. Here, then, are two bishops recalled by the temporal power to authorise and sanction by their presence the installation of a new order of things, entirely different from the revolutionary chaos from which we are just escaping. Here, I say, is a Government, a social restoration which has need of the support of religion, of the presence of the episcopate, of the sacerdotal ministry, feeling that these are necessary to give the character of order, stability, and strength to its new projects. These qualities might be sought for in vain beyond the sphere of which the sanctuary is the centre. The bishops pray that the Spanish Ministry may comprehend the extent of the abyss, the immensity of the chaos, in which are buried together, and pell-mell, the interests of religion and those of society; they hope, that in order to the exposure of this horrible mixture of usurpations and overthrowings, they may be consulted with frankness and loyalty. It is impossible to doubt their vivid desire to accelerate reparatory measures in favour of the Church, and to lend the strongest support to Government in the paths of justice. I may assure you that the Queen mother has most solemnly declared her resolution to employ all her influence to restore the relations of Spain with the Holy See. It is to be hoped that by her counsel to her daughter this princess will drive away each day one stone from the wall of separation built up by the revolution, and which the Anglo-Esperterist Government sought to crown. May this edifice of sacrilegious invasions totter to its base! Maria Christiana, as a Catholic, has confessed and has sought absolution. She, better, perhaps, than any other person, has learned that God is above all. Who better than she can labour at the great work which we demand? It may be hoped, from the coincidence of the return of this princess at the same time with the restoration of the bishops that the affair of the Concordat, so urgent and so needful, will make rapid progress. Be sure of this, that if the mission of M. Hoyos be paralysed at Rome, it is because the Government, in the midst of a thousand protestations of sincerity, and of some restorative measures, is endeavouring to conduct to its original end the plan of spoliation which the Anglo-Esperterist revolution had decreed against the Church."—Tablet.

Gwalior.

(From the Calcutta Star.)

Notices respecting the destitute condition of the Christians who have been dismissed from the Gwalior service, since the late battles have from time to time appeared in the columns of our contemporaries; but we had no suspicion that the misery and helplessness of these discarded men and their families were so great, till we were favoured with the accompanying paper, to which we give prominent publicity, and which we earnestly commend to the attention of our readers. Fitter objects of charity than these victims of political convulsion could not be found, and we trust they will be liberally relieved. Subscriptions, we may add, will be received by Captain Kirke at Deyrah, and at Gwalior, by Captain Eyre, who will see that funds are judiciously applied.

We are sure the excellent and humane Lieutenant Governor will give these men grants in the Dhoon on the most favourable terms, and we may cherish the hope of shortly seeing a Christian town of his fostering, rising in the beautiful valley, and presenting one of the most interesting objects that can be conceived. Four families of Ghoorka Christians, most ingenious and industrious artisans, are expected shortly in the Dhoon,—we are happy to add, in connection with this subject; and, doubtless all we want is a good beginning.

Memorandum regarding the destitute Christians at Gwalior.

These unfortunates, including men, women and children, amount to about 309, as stated in the detailed list furnished by me to Captain Graham, Engineers. They were for the most part, Serjeants, Gunners, Buglers and Drummers, with their families, attached to the army of the Maharajah, the disbandment of a large portion of whose force consequent to the late hostilities has thrown them out of employ; and unless some provision shall be made for their future subsistence, they must soon sink into a deplorable state of destitution.

I have ascertained that none of these people fought against our armies at Maharajpore and Punniar, but remained aloof under the orders of Cols. Jacob, and Alexander, and other Christian Officers in the service of Scindia. Colonel Sleeman has made several benevolent efforts to induce the present Gwalior government to settle a pension on the old and infirm amongst them; but hitherto without success; and there seems to be no hope of any assistance being given to the mass of able-bodied men, with their families, who are at an utter loss where to look for employment.

They seem to be for the most part of Portuguese origin, and profess the Catholic faith. Amidst all their distresses, their excellent pastor, the Revd. Mr. Felix, stands firmly by his flock as their advocate, adviser and comforter; and to his unwearied exertions it is chiefly owing that these poor people have been hitherto kept from absolute beggary. But this suspension of misery cannot last much longer, if we, their more wealthy brethren of the Christian faith, (whether Protestant or Catholic) do not in good and charitable earnest take up their cause, and contribute not only our pecuniary mite, but a portion of our worldly wisdom towards some well devised plan for their effectual relief.

In writing to Colonel Sleeman on this subject, I lately suggested that a grant of land should be obtained, and that they should be established thereupon as a separate little community, to earn an honest livelihood by the labour of their own hands, either by cultivating the ground or otherwise, according to their several abilities. In his reply the Colonel mentioned a very encouraging fact, of which I had till then been ignorant, viz., that a Christian colony of this nature has actually been established, in the province of Oude, and has been attended with entire success. I have been at some pains to ascertain the feelings of the Gwalior Christians with reference to this proposal, and they seemed to enter into it much more readily than I could have expected. I have now by me a list of 72 able bodied men, who have declared their willingness to work at the plough. Now it has occurred to me that no finer field can possibly present itself for the formation of a colony of this nature, than the Deyrah-Dhooon. For the present I content myself with the simple suggestion, feeling well assured, that it will be duly weighed in all its bearings by one in every way fitter to judge of its practicability and expediency than myself, who have no experience in matters of this nature. I allude to Captain Kirke—and if he on consideration, should think the suggestion a good one, I shall be happy to hear from him on the subject and to aid in bringing to pass a scheme of so interesting a nature.

VINCENT EYRE, Capt. Arty.

Gwalior, 20th June, 1844.

Hills, June 20.

MR. CROPLEY.

The Madras Papers mention the death of a member of their body, Mr. Cropley of the Examiner. We extract the following notice, written in a very proper spirit, from the Athenaeum:

"Since we last went to press, death has made a chasm in the ranks of its members—Mr. Cropley, Editor and Proprietor of the Madras Examiner, having been taken from the scene of his labours. This mournful event took place from a stroke of paralysis on Tuesday last. Though the departed seldom lost an opportunity of speaking unkindly of ourselves, and the Journal under our care, we are inclined to think he was in reality less hostile to us than he appeared to be. Be this as it may, we have one satisfaction in reviewing the past, viz. that we never penned a line in reply to the numerous offences charged to our account. In the removal of one of our number, we are strongly reminded of our own mortality, and of the certainty of the same event befalling us sooner or later. If the deceased had his defects, it must not be forgotten that he had also his excellencies. As a journalist he was an uncompromising friend to civil and religious liberty; to the extent of his ability he always stood up for the oppressed against the oppressor; and never refused his aid to any cause in which the advocacy of the Press was deemed essential to its success.

From our first arrival in the country we became known to the deceased, and can testify to his uniform desire to use his talents towards some beneficial purpose. "He was eminently efficient as an instructor of youth, in which calling he continued for many years, and in the capacity of a Journalist, he would have been no less so, had his position been different from what it was. In the affliction of his widow and family we sincerely sympathise, and trust that he who is God of the widow and Father of the fatherless, will be their stay and support throughout the whole of their future pilgrimage on earth."—Calc. Star.

PUSEYITE INNOVATION AT MADRAS.

Some unpleasant remark has been caused lately among the members of the Congregation attending Divine Service at St. George's Cathedral, by the (as regards Madras) novel practice of wearing their surplices instead of the usual black Genevan gown, during their pulpit ministrations; an attire episcopally enjoined, we understand, upon its Chaplains. By most, this change of vestments is considered to savor of Tractarian partialities on the part of our Bishop, whose previous conduct occasionally gave rise to similar suspicions concerning his Church of England orthodoxy. How far these surmises are correct we do not undertake to say, but assuredly the innovation on established custom, thought possessing no abstract importance, is calculated, by its evil conformity with the opinion and custom of the Oxford semi-papists, to awaken most disagreeable forebodings in the public mind. We regard all variations from old and sanctioned order in the services of the Sanctuary, as something more than questionable, even where the change is in itself harmless; because when once the entrance of novelties is permitted, none can tell how far their influx may extend. One departure from time hallowed and reverential custom, leads generally to another, and the substitution of a white garment for a black on the shoulders of the preacher, is pretty sure to be followed up by some other act of conformity with the practice of the retrograde theologians in the English Church: and even should it not so turn out, the fear that such results will follow, awakened among members of the establishment at Madras, is calculated to operate most unfavorably upon her concord, and to excite against the Bishop prepossessions fatal to a large measure of his usefulness. Even had the use of surplices in their pulpits not formed a distinguishing badge of the Tractarian party, his Lordship would have betrayed a singular deficiency of judgment in directing an adoption which has no conceivable propriety or advantage to recommend it, and which could not but offend by its singularity if by its signification. As the case stands, however, he is chargeable with something graver than a mere lapse of judgment, for the course pursued is so suspiciously answerable to that taken by the English innovators on Protestant integrity, as to prove his Lordship—or, which is little better, to make him appear—not ill disposed towards them. He must have known that the vestments would provoke animadversion, since it forms one of the most ostentatious and obnoxious ceremonial distinctions of the Newman sect. Whether he determined to effect it in conformity with their views, or for some other reason, but regardless of the ill consequences certain to flow from the apparent conclusion, is, as regards the effect of his measure, of but little moment; he has in either case given just cause of sorrow to his friends, and to his enemies of reproach.—Madras Spectator, June 22.

A CHAPTER OF DEATH.

(From the Catholic Magazine.)

The sayings and doings of men, during the last moments of their mortal career, have always furnished abundant material for curious speculation and moral reflection. Whether as inspiring a salutary terror in the living, or for purposes of comfort and edification, the memories of such scenes must ever be fraught with deep interest for the philosopher and the Christian. We propose, in desultory and discursive mood, to recal and record in these pages the dying hours of many a remarkable or eminent personage, gleaned from their observations or demeanour at that eventful crisis, matter for remark, warning, or instruction. Such obiter dicta may be ranked amongst the curiosities of metaphysical experience, as exhibiting the tendencies and capabilities of the soul on the brink of its separation from the body, and on many occasions strikingly illustrating the poet's theory, that the "ruling passion is strong in death." The instances we may find occasion to notice, by turns characteristic, or edifying, whimsical, mournful, or horrific, will all possess that value which must attach to faithful transcripts from the great and varied book of human nature.

We place foremost in our category of mortuary retrospects, the memorable address of Cardinal Wolsey to Kyngston, the lieutenant of the Tower, after the monks of Leicester had received the half-expiring statesman within their monastery, because it has always appeared to us to embody a most notable illustration of that vivid sense of the utter nothingness of earthly greatness which breaks upon a mind suddenly and painfully awakened to the consciousness of long neglected duties:—

"Had I served my God as diligently as I have served my king, He would not have given me over in my grey hairs!"

How noble was the demeanour on the scaffold of the illustrious Sir Thomas More! the calm, yet intrepid, martyr to the loftiest sense of conscientious duty. When the headsman craved forgiveness for the compulsory part he was about to enact in the foul tragedy, Sir Thomas embraced him, saying, "Thou wilt render me to-day the greatest service in the power of any mortal; but my neck is so short that I fear thou wilt gain little credit in the way of thy profession."

The venerable Countess of Salisbury, mother of Cardinal Pole, when summoned to execution, refused to lay her head upon the block: "So should traitors do," she said, "but I am none; and if you will have my head, you must win it as you can!" A horrible scene ensued, which terminated in the executioner's dragging the aged lady to the block by her hoary hair, and butchering her as he best could!

Of the unfortunate queen Anne Boleyn, the very last words she uttered upon the scaffold, addressed to her weeping attendants, were, "In your prayers to the Lord Jesus, forget not to pray for my soul!" Coupling this mode of expression with the fact, that on the morning of her execution she desired the consecrated elements might remain in her closet, that she might adore "the good Lord," whose real presence she recognized in them, it is evident that this injured and unhappy lady died in the ancient faith, however current may be the general impression of her Protestantism.

Jane Seymour, again, the mother of that arch little Protestant saint, Edward the Sixth (who with all his sanctity, consigned, with genuine Tudor sang froid, his uncles, Lord Seymour and the Duke of Somerset, to the scaffold), and herself ordinarily spoken of as a partizan of the so-called Reformation, nevertheless, lived and died a Catholic,—so far at least as related to the articles of faith and ritual observances which distinguish our religion from Protestantism. Upon the novel dogma of her ruffianly husband's spiritual supremacy, whatever might have been her abstract opinions, womanly weakness may reasonably enough be pleaded in her behalf, if she withheld or qualified them, placed as she was within the immediate grasp of a tyrant who held the heads of his subjects so cheap,—including those of his wives.

Anne of Cleves, who had come to this country a Lutheran, also died a Catholic.

Of Henry the Eighth's last moments there are three separate accounts. According to one of them, he died the death of a despairing sinner; according to another, the only sign he manifested of attention to religious ministrations, was given by squeezing the hand of the apostate Cranmer while one story is current of his having exhibited, during the illness immediately preceding his decease, sentiments of penitence and piety. Assuming the last of these statements to have any foundation, the former ones appearing to us more probable, it seems difficult to reconcile the sincerity of such a death-bed repentance with the fact, that at the very hour the king breathed his last, the guiltless Duke of Norfolk lay under sentence of death in the Tower, and his judicial murder, which was to have taken place in a few hours, was only stayed by the welcome intelligence of the tyrant's death.

The last words of the ill-fated Lady Jane Grey were in relation to the hapless claims to the crown which had been preferred rather in her name, than by herself:—"As to the procurement or desire of such dignity by me, I wash my hands thereof, before God and all you Christian people this day."

Cranmer, the arch-apostle of political and religious tergiversation, exhibited, at the extremity of his flagitious career, a firmness and constancy worthy a more honourable cause. Condemned by the barbarous severity of those iron times to the most dreadful of deaths, he cherished to the last the hope of averting his fate, and, with that purpose, submitted to the most humiliating retractations. Finding these unavailable to save him, he may be said most emphatically to have made a virtue of necessity, by declaring at the stake that "the hand which had offended contrary to his heart should be the first to receive punishment," and by subsequently thrusting it into the flame, exclaiming, "This hath offended!"

Of the unfortunate Mary Stuart it is related, that on the fatal morning of her execution, "holding up the crucifix, she exclaimed, 'As thy arms, O God, were stretched out upon the cross, so receive me into the arms of thy mercy, and forgive me my sins!' 'Madam,' said the Earl of Kent, 'you had better leave such Popish mummeries, and bear Him in heart.' She replied: 'I cannot hold in my hand the representation of His sufferings but I must at the same time bear Him in my heart.'"

The executioners interfered to prevent her female attendants from disrobing their ill-fated mistress, out of a sordid apprehension of not securing their own odious perquisites; upon which Mary remarked, with a smile, that she was not accustomed to the offices of such rough grooms, but at the same time silenced the remonstrances of her handmaidens. Up to the moment of receiving the headsman's stroke, the murdered queen kept continually repeating, "Into thy hands, O Lord, I commend my spirit."

The natural death of Queen Elizabeth was more morally appalling than the tragical end of her beautiful rival and victim! "Days and nights were passed by her in sighs and tears. Her imagination conjured up the most frightful phantoms. At length she refused to go to bed, sitting day and night on a stool, bolstered up by cushions, seldom opening her lips, and declining all sustenance. For the Bishops and Lords of her council, with the exception of the Lord Admiral, she expressed the most profound contempt. He was of her own blood; from him she consented to accept a basin of broth, but when he urged her to return to her bed, she replied that if he had seen what she saw there, he would never make the request.* To Cecil, who asked if she had seen spirits, she answered, that it was an idle question beneath her notice. He insisted that she must go to bed, if it were only to satisfy her people. 'Must!' she exclaimed, 'is must a word to be addressed to princes? Little man little man, thy father, if he had been alive, durst not have used that word, but thou art grown presumptuous because thou knowest that I shall die.' Ordering the others to depart, she called the Lord Admiral to her, saying in a piteous tone, 'My Lord, I am tied with an iron collar about my neck.' He sought to console her, but she replied, 'No, I am tied, and the case is altered with me.' Her very last words, in reply to the applications made to her respecting the choice of a successor to the throne, were, 'I will have no rascal's son in my seat,' alluding to Lord Beauchamp, the son of Lord Hertford and Lady Catherine Grey."

Sir Walter Raleigh comforted himself on the scaffold with undaunted composure. He asked for the axe, and feeling the edge, observed with a smile that it was a sharp medicine, but physician for all diseases. Having laid his head upon the block, he gave the signal, but the slowness of the executioner provoked him to exclaim, "Why dost thou not strike? strike, man!"

* Was it the blood-stained form of Mary Stuart?

Charles the First, addressing himself immediately before his execution, to Dr. Juxon, thus expressed himself: "I die a Christian, according to the profession of the Church of England, as I found it left me by my father: I have on my side a good cause, and a gracious God." The monarch's last words were, "I go from a corruptible to an incorruptible crown!"

Oliver Cromwell appears to have departed this life under the pleasing conviction of assured salvation. "Tell me," he said to Sterry, one of his chaplains, "is it possible to fall from grace?" "It is not possible," replied the obsequious divine. "Then," said the dying man, "I am safe, for I know that I was once in grace." He then uttered a long prayer for the people, and expired in the course of a night rendered memorable in the superstitious imaginations of that epoch, by the violence of the storm which raged throughout its lapse. The Puritans discovered that nature herself had been convulsed at the death of their great protector; the Royalists believed, on the other hand, that on the wings of the whirlwind, demons had come to fetch his soul away!

The death-bed of Charles the Second, whose ~~ominous reign~~ had been fraught with such calamity to the Catholics, was rendered remarkable by the return of the dying monarch to that very religion which he had so bitterly persecuted. Kenn, Bishop of Bath and Wells, had pertinaciously proffered his ministrations, and proposed administering the sacrament, of which the elements were actually brought into the royal chamber: Charles, however, doubtingly said he would think about it. Availing himself of an opportunity to address his brother, the duke of York, who knelt by the bedside, asked if he might send for a Catholic priest. "For God's sake, do," replied the king: "but will it expose you to danger?" The duke answered that he cared not for that; and ordering all the attendants to leave the room, introduced Father Huddleston. To this Reverend Confessor, Charles expressed his desire to die in the communion of the Church of Rome; professed grievous sorrow for his past sins, and in particular for having deferred his reconciliation to that late hour; expressed his hope of salvation through the merits of our Saviour; and participated in the Sacraments of Penance, Holy Eucharist, and Extreme Unction. A night of great suffering ensued. The queen sent to crave pardon of her expiring lord: "Alas!" he exclaimed "poor woman, she beg my pardon! I beg hers, with all my heart; take back to her that answer."

Of Viscount Stafford, the victim of Titus Oates' infamous perjuries, it is related, that when brought to the scaffold, "he fell on his knees, pronounced aloud a prayer composed for the occasion. Then rising, he protested his innocence. The spectators listened with bare heads, answered with cries of 'We believe you, my lord! God bless you, my lord!' Having embraced his friends, he knelt down and stretched himself on the block. The executioner poised the axe, as if he were taking aim, but suddenly checking himself, brought it down again on his neck. Lord Stafford, raising his head, inquired the cause of the delay, and was told that he waited for a sign. 'Take your own time,' he replied, 'I shall make no sign.' 'Do you forgive me, sir?' said the executioner. 'I do,' was his reply. After this short dialogue, he resumed his former posture, and at one stroke his head was severed from his body."

The last moments of the ill-fated Duke of Monmouth were marked by circumstances of unusual horror. "He had warned the headsman not to mangle him, as he had mangled Lord Russell; and the very admonition seems to have unnerved the man for the execution of his task. He took his aim so unskillfully, or struck so feebly, that he inflicted but a slight gash, and the sufferer raising his body from the block, turned his head to the left side, as if he meant to complain. After two more strokes, life seemed to be extinct, and the executioner, alarmed at his own bloody work, threw down the axe, asserting with an oath that his heart failed him, and he would do no more!"

Lord Lovat, at the age of eighty-four, demeaned himself on the scaffold with stoical heroism; jested with the executioner, and when he laid his head on the block, exclaimed, with all the ardour of a Roman patriot: "Dulce et decorum est pro patriâ mori!"

The satirist Rabelais preserved to the last moment of his life the character he had always maintained for sneer and sarcasm. Although he had received all the rites of the Church, (of which, by the way, he was a minister,) it was impossible for those who surrounded his death-bed to ascertain whether he died a believer or an infidel. He dictated his will in these terms:—"Je n'ai rien vaillant, je dois beaucoup, je donne le reste aux pauvres." "I am nothing worth, owe a great deal, and give the residue to the poor."

Catherine of Medicis died of fever, brought on by violent rage: a fitting consummation, indeed, to the career of that bad, imperious woman.

The last hours of Cardinal Mazarin presented a remarkable contrast between his worldly cupidity, and dread of a future state. His confessor had enforced on him the necessity of restoring his ill-gotten wealth, an alternative he found much difficulty in subscribing to. At length it was suggested that he should make over all his riches whatsoever to the king, who, it was insinuated, would restore them, and thus absolutely legitimise the Cardinal's claim to their possession. The expedient was adopted, but for three days, passed by Mazarin in direful suspense, no such act of regal restitution as had been anticipated seemed forthcoming. At length the monarch took compassion of the expiring minister, and gave him back all his wealth, upon which the money-loving Cardinal made his will, and died in comparative happiness.

Louis XIV died in a very devotional frame of mind. To those who pressed round him with tears and lamentations, he addressed himself thus:—"Pourquoi pleurez-vous? m'avez-vous cru immortel?" "Why do you weep, did you suppose me to be immortal?" He frequently spoke of his successor as the "young king," and in speaking of himself, made use of the expression, "When I was king!"

The infamous Regent Orleans, who, on the majority of Louis the Fifteenth, had consented to become prime-minister, led a life of such mingled toil and profligacy, that he soon reduced himself to a state of health that inspired his attendants with serious apprehensions. To warnings of his probably speedy dissolution, he replied "C'est tout ce que je désire." "It is all I most wish." Yielding, however, to the solicitations of his friends, he promised to reform his conduct. But on the very day of such projected amendment, the attractions of a fresh intrigue forbade its execution, and in the criminal embraces of the Duchesse de Phalaris, he was stricken suddenly dead!

Molière expired while acting the part of his own "Malade imaginaire," and at that very period of the piece, in which Argan, to test the affection of his daughter, feigns death on the stage: an awful and remarkable kind of exit.

The comic poet and mad humorist, Scarron, was troubled during his last illness with an incessant and most exhausting hiccup. "Si j'en reviens, ô la belle satire que je ferai contre le hoquet!" "If I recover what a fine satire I will write against hiccup!" he exclaims in the midst of his sufferings. By his will, dictated from his death-bed, he bequeathed "five hundred pounds of patience to Corneille; and to his wife, liberty to marry again." Seeing every body around him in tears, he remarked to them, "Je ne vous ferai jamais autant pleurer que je vous ai fait rire," "I shall never make you weep as much as I have made you laugh." Just before he expired, he cried out "Par ma foi, je ne me serais jamais imaginé qu'il fut si facile de se moquer de la mort!" "By my faith, I should never have fancied it to have been so easy to laugh at death!"

The more accomplished than exemplary Abbé Prévost, author of "Manon Lescaut," and other ingenious works, met with a singularly tragical end. An apoplectic fit had laid him prostrate in the forest of Chantilly, where he was picked up and carried in a senseless state to an adjoining village. Here, it was deemed advisable by the local authorities to institute a post mortem examination of the body, previously to its sepulture. Upon a deep incision, however, being made in the supposed corpse, suspended animation was suddenly restored, and a piercing shriek, to the horror of the by-standers, revealed the agony which the knife had inflicted. L'Abbé Prévost had only awakened from the insensibility of disease, to expire almost immediately of the mortal wound.

Fontenelle, who died at the advanced age of nearly a hundred years, retaining his consciousness to the very last, went out of the world with so little suffering, that upon being asked, just before he expired, whether he experienced any pain, he replied, "Non, je sens seulement une difficulté d'être." "No, I only feel a difficulty of existing."

(To be continued.)

THE INQUISITION.

As the most extraordinary perversions of truth have been constantly put forth on the subject of the Inquisition, by persons who sought to blacken the Catholic faith and people, we just give the report of what it was in Spain in 1787, from Arthur Young, an Englishman—a Protestant, and son of a clergyman, who of course would, if his natural candour had not prevented him, have described it as others. He says, "The mention of the Inquisition, made us enquire into the present state of that holy office, and we were informed that it was now FORMIDABLE ONLY TO PERSONS OF VERY ILL-FAME, and that when it does act against offenders, an inquisitor comes down from Madrid to conduct the process; from the expressions, however, which were used, and the instances given, it appears they take cognizance of cases not at all connected with religion; and that if men or women were guilty of vices which made them notoriously offensive, this was the power which interposed."—Young's Tour, vol. 1. p. 636.

Such was this tribunal in 1787; and such the terrific account brought home by Young of all the tortures and autos da fe of this fer-fu-fum of anti-Catholic haranguers, with which they "split the ears" of the "long-eared rout" when they want to astonish and horrify them with the deeds of Popery.—Sydney, Morning Chronicle.

ADMISSION OF ATTORNIES IN NEW SOUTH WALES, IN 1844.

Press of matter has hitherto prevented our reprehension of the proceedings which took place in the Supreme Court, on the admission of six gentlemen as solicitors of that Court, on the 17th instant. During the last twenty-eight years, about ninety gentlemen have been admitted, without taking any oath but the following:—

"I, A. B. do swear, that I will truly and honestly demean myself in the practice of an attorney, according to the best of my knowledge and ability."

This oath was unexceptionable to mortal man, and (wonderful to relate!!!) the justice of the country has been excellently well administered allthrough, and allegiance firmly maintained by those solicitors, although (strange to say) they neither swore to bear allegiance, nor swore against Popery, nor made the false declaration, that no Foreign Prelate hath any ecclesiastical or spiritual jurisdiction, preeminence, or authority, within the realm of England. For the information of thousands who know not the oaths and declarations, we here insert them from the Act of Parliament—William and Mary, chap. 8.

"I, (A. B.) do sincerely promise and swear, that I will be faithful, and bear true allegiance to Her Majesty Queen Victoria. I, (A. B.) do swear, that I do from my heart, abhor, detest, and abjure as impious and heretical, that damnable doctrine and position, that Princes excommunicated or deprived by the Pope or any authority of the See of Rome, may be deposed or murdered by their subjects."

"I, (A. B.) do declare, that no Foreign Prince,

* No. had legacy as it turned out, for Madame Scarron became the wife of Louis XIV.

person, or Prelate, state, or Potentate, hath, or ought to have, any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence, or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within this realm."

The first oath (of allegiance) embraces a determination of mind, which subjects of the monarch of Great Britain and Ireland should feel.

The second oath (of abjuration) presumes a damnable doctrine to be held, which is not held, and the declaration against Popery is false.

But, why were those oaths, neither taken or made, or required of solicitors heretofore. Why?

Because the Act of Parliament, 7 and 8 of William the third, cap. 24, which enacts

"That for the better security of Her Majesty's Government, and the public peace of this Kingdom, serjeants at law, counsellors at law, barristers, advocates, attornies, solicitors, proctors, clerks in writing, who shall practise as such, not having first taken, in Her Majesty's Court of Chancery, King's Bench, or Quarter Sessions of the County where he lives, the oaths and declarations, &c. &c. (as required to be taken by certain other persons by the 7 and 8 of William and Mary, cap. 24, set forth above) shall incur certain pains, penalties, and forfeitures,"—why say, because that Act was only passed (as it states) "for the security of Her Majesty's Government, and the public peace of the Kingdom," and

Because that Act clearly related not to colonies, for none of the colonies ever had a Court of Chancery or King's Bench wherein to take and make the oaths and declarations, nor had the few that existed when that Act passed, any Courts of Quarter Sessions in Counties—which latter courts were only established in New South Wales in 1826. And, because none of the colonies were able either to disturb Her Majesty's Government or the public peace of the United Kingdom, and

Because to have required those oaths and declarations in the colonies, would have been illegal, and an unwarrantable act of power, without authority—and lastly

Because the statute of George IV., cap. 96, sec. 10, and the 21st rule of the Supreme Court, under which alone attornies have been, or are admitted here, require no such oaths or declarations.

But, readers, open your eyes with astonishment, to see, and your ears to hear it, whilst we proclaim to you, that those oaths and declarations, have been required of and administered to six gentlemen, who, on the 27th day of February, in the Year of our common Lord Jesus Christ, and century the 19th, applied for and obtained admission into the Supreme Court of the Colony of New South Wales, and were actually made by those gentlemen, who were taken by surprise on the occasion. But, why were those oaths and declarations, so new, required to be made and made?

Why? As it for the better security of Her Majesty's Government and the public peace of the Kingdom of England? Oh, no dear readers, impossible!!! We are unable and incapable of disturbing that security or that peace, nor would a bundle of such oaths and declarations secure either one or the other.

Then, if it were not to secure the objects contained in the Act of Parliament; what was the reason of their being now, fifty-six years after the foundation of a loyal colony, for the first time in this land required?

Was it to insult the Catholic community?

Was it to warn Catholics against applying for admission?

Was it to aid in the preservation of Church ascendancy? Or

Was it to irritate the feelings of Catholics, and to assist in fomenting sectarian strife and feuds amongst them and the other grand divisions of the great Christian Church?

Can it be supposed that the learned Judge (Stephen) who proposed and urged the oaths and declarations on the occasion, meant to insult or threaten the Catholics, or to widen the breach, or sow further dissension among the members of the great Christian family? Oh, no—forbid it, readers, that such motives should be imagined; we must put down the fault to error in the judgment of the learned Judge—error in the knowledge of the law, and error in practice. There could be no other justifiable reason, and no other cause for such an unwarrantable procedure.

We have simply adverted to the fact that the insult (though not intended as such) was given;

That the threat is taken (though not intended) and is disregarded;

That the irritation of feeling (though not intended) is provoked, although strife or feud shall not follow.

It is, however, but just to say, that the patriarchal Chief Justice (Dowling) appeared content, and so expressed himself, with the first and the usual oath being taken, "that of acting honestly and truly in the profession;" nor did Mr. Justice Burton, though a zealous anti-Catholic, interfere on the occasion. Yet, Mr. Justice Stephen, the junior of the three Judges, (in error, and barely excusable error,) required, nay, urged the taking and making the abominable oath, against an unknown abominable doctrine, and the false declaration, that no foreign prelate, hath ecclesiastical or spiritual authority within the realm of England (the contrary being the fact,) and the Prothonotary accordingly then put them to the six solicitors.

Attempts of this kind, at this late and enlightened age here, must not be silently tolerated or passed over.

We think that this statement must be printed in sheets, and sent to the liberal and enlightened Members, Catholic, Protestant, and dissenting, of the House of Commons, to prevent the recurrence of a scene, unfit for any Court of Justice, calculated to create enmity against a Government which would insist upon it; and calculated alone to create such enmity, and never to engender affection or allegiance.

One word to our readers before parting. Church ascendancy is at present well nigh abolished. It will be unknown in a very few years, nothing can stop its rapid progress to dissolution—natural equality will be established, natural right and justice alone, will have any ascendancy over mankind, freedom of thought and opinion, of speech and action, can no longer be trampled on. If legislative enactment do not, in a moment, disenfranchise the United Kingdom from Church ascendancy—the vox populi will, and perhaps will endanger the existence of the only law-made Church in the vortex of dissolution. Trusting, that for the first and last time, these oaths and declarations (not including, however, the oath of allegiance) have been put within the colony, and determined not to let a repetition of the same take place, without more severe criticism, and of a more determined kind, which will be keenly and bitterly felt, we take our leave of the subject.—Ibid.

OATHS TO MAGISTRATES.

Some short time ago, we heard in a Court of Justice, two new magistrates sworn in by a long string of oaths. One of them, which asserted the Catholic worship to be idolatrous, struck us with horror, especially as taken by men whose duty is to punish the very crime they committed—perjury! Another oath is as disgustingly impudent, as the other is atrocious and horrible; and that is the one which denies that allegiance is not due to princes excommunicated for heresy as if Catholics held such infamous doctrine.

Every Catholic knows that such is not our doctrine; we have authentically denied it again and again—but in vain! Still this solemn oath insinuates that we hold it.

The Catholic religion is supposed, in Spain, to be most exquisitely and intensely Catholic: therefore, although we could quote numberless works in English, Latin, and French, denying these persecuting and king-deposing doctrines; yet to show how grievously and foully they calumniate the Spaniards, we give a passage or two:—

“Los Ministros de la Religion deben derramar por ella su sangre, y no pueden derramar la de los enemigos, (Ecclesia nescit sanguinem; i. e., “the church knows not blood.) Su Señor y Maestro no les ha mandado rebatir la fuerza con la fuerza, o la espada con la espada, si solamente huir de una ciudad a otra, en caso de persecucion, por no exponerse, por una presuncion temeraria, al peligro de venderle, y negarle.”

“The ministers of religion ought to shed their own blood for it, and not that of its enemies; their Lord and master has not commanded them to repel force by force, or sword by sword: but only to flee from one city to another, in case of persecution, in order not to expose themselves by bold presumption to the danger of selling or denying it.—Janin. Pensam. Theol. p. 199, 12mo., Madrid, 1778.

“Maldita sea eternamente, y para siempre olvidada la maxima falsa, barbara y monstruosa de que es licito intentar quitar la vida a los Reyes con el pretexto de heregia, infidelidad, o tirania. Este monstruo ha nacido del fanatismo, pero le inhoga la Religion verdadera. Quién estenderá la mano contra el Christo del Señor, y quedará inocente? El Cristiano, decia un Padre antiguo que vivia baxo la dominacion de Príncipes per-está puesto por Dios; esta obligación a amar, honrar, respetar, y desear que Dios le conserve con todo el Imperio Romano?”

“Curse eternally, and for ever forgotten be the false, barbarous, and monstrous maxim, that it is lawful to take the life of kings, under pretext of heresy, infidelity, or tyranny. This monster has had its birth in fanaticism, but true religion stifles it. Who will stretch forth his hand against the anointed of the Lord, and be innocent? A Christian, says an ancient father, who lived under persecuting princes, is the ENEMY of NONE, how much less of the emperor, whom, knowing that he is appointed by God, he is obliged to love, to honour, respect, and desire that God would preserve with the whole Roman empire.”—Ibid.

MISCELLANEA.

RESTITUTION.—We are happy to learn that the right owner of the gold watch lately advertised in the Chronicle, has appeared to claim it, and has most satisfactorily identified the watch as being his property. Mr. Munn, ship-builder, of Darling Harbour, is the owner; he was accosted in the streets about ten o'clock of a moonlight night, in November last, by a Scotch lassie, who said, “Mr. Munn, will you treat me, or shall I treat you?” and instantly suiting the action to the word, snatched at his watch, and ran off with it: the watch had cost him £40 in London. He had her arrested, but the watch could not be found. She is now under punishment for that offence in the factory at Parramatta. Mr. Munn states this girl was no Catholic, but the watch must have somehow got into the possession of a Catholic, who, touched with remorse of conscience, having approached the tribunal of penance in sincerity, was (of course) obliged to seek out the right owner, in order to make restitution in the manner that has been related. Mr. Munn has got his watch.—Sydney Morning Chronicle.

FIFTY YEARS AGO.—A correspondent has sent us the following document:—“You shall inquire and truly present the names of all Popish recusants within your parish above the age of 14 years, who forbear to repair to church according to law, in this manner; distinctly you shall set down the names of the master, mistress, or dam of the family, and the names of the servants, by their sur-names, and the names of baptism and of sojourners, and above the rest, the names of the school-masters; you shall present the name of all such who do not resort to divine service every Sunday according to law, and certify whether the twelve-pence on Sunday forfeited, are received, and duly employed for the poor, or whom it hath been received and of whom neglected.” The other articles concern felons, robber vagabonds, rogues, inmates of cottages, hui against the statute of Elizabeth, frequenters of alehouses and tippling-houses, users of unlawful weights and measures, ingrossers, forestaller regrators, reputed fathers, swearers, curser rioters, and other fit company for “Popish recusants,” and the paper concludes thus:—“And all your presentments you are to set down till day (as near as you can), and the year, and the town when and where the said offences have been committed. At the Assizes and General Ga delivery held for the County of York, in the said county, the 15th day of March, 1794. By virtue of an order of his Majesty's Justices of the Assize, you the constables under-mentioned are required to make out a distinct answer in writt to the above mentioned articles at Brompton, on Friday the 17th day of March instant, or I must present you at the Assizes for neglect. Given under my hand the 6th day of March, 1794, Robert Drake, Chief Constable.—To the constable of Hatton Bushell."—Tablet.

SUNDERLAND.—THE CONVENT.—We are given to understand that early in May an addition to the number of the "Sisters of Mercy," living in Green-street, is to be made by two young ladies from Newcastle joining them.—Sunderland Herald.—The profession and public reception of two more sisters intended to be admitted into this establishment on the 8th of May, accompanied with the beautiful ceremonies of the Catholic Church, is already exciting considerable interest among Protestants as well as Catholics. The public celebration of such a ceremony in the midst of a district where fanaticism has revelled in all its horrid orgies for more than two centuries, where only sixty years ago the mob, excited by villains, rushed into the then humble Catholic chapel on the "Town Moor" and drove out the faithful and persecuted servants of Christ, demolished everything holy within its hallowed walls, and pursued the priest from the sacred altar into the town, while he narrowly escaped with his life, is indeed calculated to warm our hearts and inspire our bosom with the hope that this little family of holy sisters, located here by the zeal of the pastor of this congregation, is but the precursor to other similar establishments in Northumberland and Durham. Who can forget that for many centuries this very district (adjoining Monkwearmouth, so described from being the residence of the monks at Wearmouth), about to be honoured with this holy ceremony, was rendered sacred by the labours of the Venerable Bede, St. Oswald, and a long line of illustrious saints, whose holy lives adorned the Church? On the occasion of the expected ceremony, the Rev. S. Chadwick, of Ushaw, will preach a sermon. The Right Rev. Dr. Riddell, with a number of the clergy, will be present to take part in the services of the day. The public will be admitted by tickets, the proceeds arising from the sale of which will be set apart for the poor.

NEWCASTLE.—ST. MARY'S HOSPITAL.—This venerable ruin and interesting relic of religious architecture, of a very ancient date, is now totally demolished and level with the ground. We are reminded of the days when ignorant, fanatic, and infuriated, but not altogether ill-dressed mobs, burned papist chapels, and thundered forth hiccoughing anathemas against what, in their peculiar phraseology, was termed "the Hoore of Babylon!"—"there stands Antichrist! pull her down!" rings in the ears of our imagination; and Lord George Gordon, and his army of gin-drinking fanatics, irresistibly rise before our mental eye. How of our enlightened, erudite, and venerable, and (to put all in one word) Town Council. We cannot help it! but let us try to shuffe off the spectre, by enquiring what chance we have of a new St. Mary's Chapel, in the room of that now levelled with the ground, and to whom we are to look for act of common justice?—Tyne BERMONDSEY.—CONVENT OF MERCY.—On the 8th instant (Easter Monday,) Miss Georgiana Booker made her solemn profession in the order of our Blessed Lady of Mercy, and dedicated herself for ever to the service of Jesus Christ, in the persons of his poor representatives. On this occasion every thing combined to render the scene solemn and imposing. The early hour of the morning; the stillness which reigned in the spacious church; the awful ceremonies which accompanied the pronouncing of the vows, the silent presence of Jesus (her Spouse and her Judge,) in the sacrament of his love, all conspired in fixing the mind and thoughts of the new sister upon that Great Being to whom she has consecrated herself for ever.—Tablet.

PUSEYISM IN NEWCASTLE.—A gentleman of considerable literary reputation in this town has recently translated the Hymns of the Salisbury Breviary, for the use of the Puseyite body in Newcastle. He adds, "as anciently used by the Anglican Church." The latter designation no one knows better than the talented individual alluded to, cannot be read without a smile. For who ever heard of the ancient Anglican Church at Salisbury? till our ingenious friends, who have half-way between Geneva and Rome, made so wonderful a discovery. However, halt as they may on their good journey to Rome, their defences of our practices, and unbounded admiration for the principles of authority and Church government, are gradually breaking down the barriers which alone kept the multitude from coming within her borders, and beholding the beauty and true loveliness of the fair Spouse of Christ.—Ibid.

CHRISTIAN SEPULTURE.—It is stated that a number of Christian catacombs, supposed to be of the earliest age of that faith, and the first ever found in Greece, have been discovered near Mile.—Literary Gazette.

APHORISMS AND REFLECTIONS.—Ill-temper puts as many briefs into the lawyer's bag as injustice. A man of sense may be in haste, but never can be in a hurry. Time is precious, life is short, and consequently not a single moment should be thrown away. As shoes that have nail points projecting upwards through the heel, so is a peevish wife. Honesty does that from a sense of duty which honour does for reputation's sake. Wise sayings often fall on barren ground; but a kind word is never thrown away. Idleness is the Dead Sea, which swallows all virtues, and the self-made sepulchre of a living man. History tells us of illustrious villains, but there cannot be an illustrious miser. Worldly happiness is said to be the gay to-morrow of the mind, that never comes. A false friend is like a shadow on a dial-plate, which appears in fine weather, but vanishes at approach of a cloud. A steady assurance is too often styled impudence. Rowe observes—going into the company of great men, is like going into the other world—you ought to stay until you are called. He that cannot forgive others breaks the bridge over which he must pass himself, for every man hath need to be forgiven. Man, though born with faculties to search through the depth of time, and powers to flourish through the ages of eternity, seldom looks beyond the present hour.

THE

BENGAL

CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

No. 3.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JULY 20, 1844.

[Vol. VII.

CALVIN, LUTHER AND OTHER HERETICS HAD NO TRUE MISSION.

(Translated from St. Francis of Sales.)

We ought in the first place, to make you knowledge, that your first ministers and you also committed an inexcusable error, when you listened to those who were separated from the Church: for they were persons not at all qualified, as they ought have been, to preach the holy word. They acted of publishing a bill of divorce for the Son of God himself: but from whom? from his ancient spouse the Church: for what end? to unite himself to a new congregation, remade and reformed: but upon what grounds could you believe these novelties, without making the preachers produce well authenticated charge and commission? from the commencement you disowned this seen for your Princess and published every where that she was corrupted and an utter loss. Your reformers went here and there to propagate these false novelties; but whence did they get them? They could not roll themselves under a leader without the consent of the Prince with whom they lived: did how were you so willing to place yourselves under these false ministers, without knowing that your legitimate pastors, who were among you, renounced you? You were ignorant that these innovators removed you from the situation in which you were born and bred. They therefore are inexcusable for having, under the protection of the Magistrates, caused this rising of butchers, did you also for having followed them. You perceive, my Brethren, at what aim. It is at the want of mission and cation, which Luther, Zuinglius, Calvin and others never had. For it is certain, that whosoever wishes to teach and hold rank among the pastors of the Church must sent, Saint Paul says, "Quoties predicabunt nisi mittentur?" How shall they preach, if they be not sent. And Jeremiah says; these prophets falsely prophesied. I did not send them; "Mon mittebam prophetas et ipsi currebant." I did not send them and they went. Mission is then quite necessary, you will not deny it unless you know more than your Masters. I perceive you come forward in three divisions, in order to render yourselves more powerful. Some among you will tell me: The first reformers received their Mission from the people; others will say, from the secular and temporal magistrates; others, from the Church herself. How can this be? You answer, because Luther, Ecclampdinus, Bucer, Zuinglius and such as these were priests of the Roman Church as well as our own ministers; but the most artful among you pretend that they were sent by God through an extraordinary mission. Let us examine your first leaders. How think you did the people and the secular princes call Calvin, Brennus and Luther to teach a doctrine which they had never heard? In what age did they begin to propagate and preach this doctrine? Who obliged them to fabricate it? You say, the people must have called them; but what people? They were Catholics or were not. If Catholics, how could they send you to preach what they did not believe? Could those called by a small party of the people, who were then Catholics, stand against all the others who opposed them? How could one part of the people give you authority against the others as to enable you to go from people to people demanding as much as you could from their ancient allegiance. You well know that a people has only the right to grant authority for and over itself, not against itself; it was your business, therefore, to preach only where you were called by the people; which had you simply done, you would not have been so successful. Let us go into particulars; when Luther began, who called him? There were none at that time who thought of the opinions which he published. How could they then call him to preach to them? If they were not Catholics, what were they?—Lutherans? No! for I speak of the first preaching. What were they, then? Let him who can, tell me who it was that gave the first authority to assemble the people, to address separated parties? It could not have been the people, for they were not yet assembled. Would it not be confounding and perplexing all to permit each one to say what he pleased? Thus every one would have a commission, for there is none so mean but who could find followers, witness the Anabaptists, the Libertines, the Adamites, &c. in fine, if we must adhere to the scriptures, we shall never find in them that a people ever had power to choose for themselves evangelical pastors and preachers.

THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

We have been so much accustomed to see in the columns of the Calcutta Christian Advocate the grossest misrepresentations of the tenets of our holy religion, and the reckless and unchristian manner in which that Journal persists in reiterating misrepresentations, calumnies, and false charges, even after we had again and again repudiated them, that we have long ceased to notice the want of common honesty and candour or the shameless perversion of truth which disgrace the pages of the misnamed Advocate. So far from apprehending that that Journal can by such means seduce Catholics from the true faith, we are confident that nothing tends more strongly to confirm them in their faith than to see the dishonest expedients to which its enemies are compelled to resort in order to make out anything like a plausible case against it.

We are led to these brief remarks by the perusal of the following letter, in which we believe a clear case of imposition and deceit is made out against our Christian cotemporary.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—Nearly five years ago the Editor of the Englishman declared that for IMPUDENCE and FALSHOOD no journal, not calling itself Christian, surpassed the Calcutta Christian Advocate; and this memorable assertion I at that time brought to the notice of your readers.

Since that period how frequently the Englishman's character of the Advocate has been verified the Catholic readers of the self-styled Christian Journal can testify.

What, Sir, can exceed the impudence of the Advocate in publishing, in the last issue, under the head of "ROMISH RELIGIOUS LITERATURE IN CALCUTTA," a letter written by our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and which document is prefaced thus:

"Perhaps our readers may be surprised by the following specimen of a religious Tract, circulated in the North East of Calcutta during last Lent—and in the immediate neighbourhood of the Mass-House. It will show them what darkness may be found in the midst of light—what fearful lies in the midst of Christian truth."

Lies indeed! What impudence some people possess! Why, Sir, it is not very long ago you gave publicity to the self-same letter, which you justly designated An Impious Forgery, and attributed its authorship to some American Missionary.—Permit me to transcribe the following paragraph from your Journal:

"An American Missionary, hoping to convert the Catholics of Calcutta to some of the forms of Protestantism, lately sent them from New York some printed copies of a letter, said to have been written by our Saviour's own hand, and to have been found under a large stone some years after his death. It may seem strange, that men, who reject with horror the Deuterocanonical books of Scripture, and whose cry is the whole Bible and nothing but the Bible, should so readily receive and propagate, as an inspired writing, a letter which carries on the very face of it the clearest marks of forgery. It is an act of impiety and blasphemy to attribute to our Divine Master such an absurd composition. We will not take the trouble to criticize it, for its incongruities will instantly strike the intelligent reader. We need not say, that our Saviour's letter to King Agbarus is apocryphal."

After this, well may your Agra correspondent be surprised that even Protestants can be found to support such an Advocate of Christianity?

AU REVOIR.

ANTIQUITY OF POPERY.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

DEAR SIR,—Martin Luther, an Austin Friar, began his pretended reformation anno 1517. The Greek and Latin Churches, though they had been united in the General Council of Florence, were then again divided. Muscovy followed the fate of the Greek Church; the Spanish West Indies were, as they are now, in the Communion of the Church of Rome; and the Greeks, as I have already observed, differed from the Latins only in the article relating to the procession of the Holy Ghost, which necessarily drew after it that of the supremacy. In all other doctrinal points whatever, they agreed as perfectly with the Church of Rome as they do at present; in proof whereof, I beg to refer to a learned work, entitled: The Church of Christ showed &c. part 1, chap. 1, p. 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, where it is written that the Nestorians, Armenians, Copts, Syrians and Ethiopians, also reject the doctrine of the Reformation in every point, wherein it differs from the Roman Catholic Church.

As to the Latin Church, or Church in communion with the See of Rome, at the time Luther set up for a reformer, she was spread over all the principal Kingdoms of Europe: England, Scotland, Ireland, the whole empire, with the 17 provinces of the Netherlands; the large Kingdoms of France and Spain, all Italy, with the Kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, Sweden, Denmark, Poland, &c. were all united in the same faith, acknowledging the Pope for their common Father, the true Vicar of Jesus Christ, and Supreme Head of their Church: so that Luther had not, throughout the whole world, one person to communicate with. Was it not therefore, a presumption even to a degree of madness, for a private monk to set up his own private judgment in opposition to all Christendom, and stand single against the whole world? Truly, it would look like a dream rather than a serious truth, were it not attested by all writers, and even by Luther himself.

In the preface to his works Luther boasts that he was at first alone: Primo solus eram. And in his preface to the book de abroganda missa privata, he writes thus: "With how many medicines, and powerful evidence of Scripture have I scarce yet settled my conscience, to be able alone to contradict the Pope, and to believe him Antichrist, the Bishops his Apostles, and the universities his stewards? How oft did my heart tremble, and reprehend me, by objecting my strongest and only argument. Art thou alone wise—And do all err?"

It seems the good man had some terrible gripes of conscience before he could persuade himself that the successor of St. Peter was Antichrist; that all the Bishops in the world were the devil's Apostles, and the great nurseries of piety and learning, his stewards. How troublesome is it to have too tender a conscience! But Kate Boren cured him soon after of all his gripes and qualms.

Calvin owns the same truth, Epist. 141. "We have been forced," says he, "to break off from the communion of the whole world."

sumus." Nay, many Protestant writers glory in Luther's separation from the whole world. "If there had been right believers, says one who went before Luther in his office, there would have been no need of a Lutheran reformation." Georgius Billius, in Aug. Conf. Art. 7, p. 137. It is ridiculous, says another to think that in the time before Luther, any had the purity of doctrine, and that Luther should receive it from them. Bened. Margestern de Ecclesia, page 145. This gentleman, like a drag-net, sweeps all before him; fathers, councils, doctors, nay, I fear, the Apostles themselves will scarce escape.

It is then an incontestible proof that Luther did not only separate himself from his own Mother Church, but that there was not any pre-existent visible Church of Christians in the whole world, into which he could incorporate himself. But how long had the Roman Catholic Church, from whose communion he separated himself, a being before the Reformation? This is a point of great importance, and challenges a serious examination.

It is certain she was venerable for her antiquity, even at the time when Luther took upon him to reform her: for, first, all separate Christian communions then extant in the world, had either gone out immediately from her, or spawned from those that had, some of whom were very ancient; as Nestorians, Eutychians, &c. and secondly, the four first general councils were all in communion with the Bishop of Rome. The first of Nice, against Arius, was in the communion of Pope Silvester, whose legates, together with Osius, presided at it, anno 325. The second of Constantinople against the Macedonians, anno 381, was in communion with Pope Damasus, whom the Fathers of that Council in their synodical letter thank for calling them to a council as his members; and Damasus in his answer styles them, his own most honorable children. The third of Ephesus, against Nestorius, anno 431, was in the communion of Pope Celestin, whose legate told the council that his master was their head, and the successor of St. Peter, whose place and authority the Bishop of Rome held, Act 2, to 3, Conc. p. 619, Act 3, p. 626, against which not one of the council made the least exception, so that it even proves a great deal more than is necessary for my present purpose. The fourth of Chalcedon against Eutychius and Dioscorus, anno 451, was in communion with St. Leo, to whom the council wrote in this manner: Rogamus igitur, ut tui decretis honorem nostrum iudicium; et tui nos capiti in bonis adiectionem consequamur sic et summus tue illius quod deest adhibeat. This is, we desire you to honor our judgment with your decrees; and as we have agreed with our head in all good things, so may your highness grant to us your children that which is fitting. Conc. Calced. in Ep. at Sd. Leonem tom 4, p. 897, D. E. I only mention these four general councils, because they are allowed of by the Church of England, Act 1, Eliz. c. 1; and the times in which they were held witness their antiquity; for the first was held near 1200 years, and the last of the four above a thousand and fifty years before the reformation.

Hence it follows, first, that the Church in communion with the See of Rome, not only had a being, but was wholly uncorrupt and free from errors, both from the time of the Apostles to the first General Council, and in the interval of time between that and the fourth or last Council allowed of by the Church of England. The reason is evident because not one of the four first councils accused her of any errors; and had she been guilty of any it cannot be doubted but these Councils would have called her to an account, and condemned her, as they did the Arians, Macedonians, Nestorians, and Eutychians. Nay, it is manifest, that the faith of these Councils and that of the See of Rome were one and the same; for otherwise they would not have been in the same communion, and since the Church of England allows of those councils, it is no less manifest she believes their faith was orthodox.

Whence it follows, secondly, that the Church of England, which owns the authority of the four first Councils, must likewise acknowledge, that the Roman Catholic Church, or Church in communion with the See of Rome, was at least free from corruptions till the middle of the fifth century, in which the fourth general Council was held. Now, if we can but make the Popery which Luther reformed, shake hands with the religion of those times; or, in other words, if it can be clearly proved, that the very same doctrine, which was professed by the Church of Rome, when Luther began to reform, was likewise professed by the Catholic Church in those ancient times in which she is acknowledged to have been free from corruption, will it not be a demonstrative proof that the doctrine called Popery, and the Church which professes it are as ancient as Christianity itself? I will in my next endeavour to demonstrate how far Popery may be traced, even from the concessions of such Protestant writers as are beyond exception.

R

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

Sergeant Haslem of Dum-Dum,	10	0
J. G.	2	0
Mr. Davie, through Rev. Mr. Mascarenhas,	22	0
M. Crow, through ditto.	3	0
Captain J. F. de Senne	50	0

THROUGH MR. N. O'BRIEN.

R. L.	5	0
D. W. Fraser,	5	0
R. A. Dhur,	2	0
A Friend,	1	0
H. B.	1	0
S. B.	5	0
Mrs. Castello,	2	0
G. Higgins,	5	0
T. B. Swinhoe,	10	0
A Poor Friend,	1	0
A. Irvine,	16	0
J. H. Miller,	2	0
J. Hamlin,	2	0
A Poor Man,	1	0
A Friend,	1	0
J. Lafton,	5	0
William Irvin,	5	0
A Friend,	1	0
T. Callen,	10	0
Thomas Kemp,	2	0
T. S.	10	0

FOR THE SUFFERING CATHOLICS AT Gwalior.

J. M. S. through the Rev. Mr. Storck,	1	0
Sergeant Hamilton,	3	0
J. D. S.	1	0
J. A. S.	1	0

THROUGH THE REV. MR. MASCARENNAS FROM DUM-DUM.

A Friend,	16	0
Invalid Sergeant J. Smyth and family,	1	6
Mrs. Baldwin and family,	2	0
Through Rev. Mr. Rabascall,	6	0

NATIVE MISSION AT COWCOLLY.

Further collections at Chandernagore thro'
the Rev. Father Boulogne,	10	0
J. M. S. through the Rev. Mr. Storck,	3	0

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

J. Piaggio and Associates through His
Grace the Archbishop,	5	0
Through Rev. Mr. Rabascall, Serampore,	30	0

Selections

ON TRUE COMPUNCTION OF HEART (Concluded from page 12.)

Well then may I mourn over the wretchedness, which I have endured in the exile, in which I was born, and try how which I must bear in a foreign land.

Mourn ye together, all ye children of men!
 and weep over yourselves, ye sons of Adam!

who eat ashes for bread, and have changed a heavenly for an earthly food. And, oh! ye blind and unhappy sons, what have ye lost?

But because ye know it not, therefore ye weep little; and therefore is your wretchedness the more, because you see it, nor into what a depth of misery ye have fallen.

Look upon my fall; see ye what delights I have lost, behold what evils gird me about on every side. I labour in this present life, and day and night I sigh after the eternal banquet, where no one hungers, but all drink the wine of joy,—that wine that maketh the heart glad, that purifieth and effecteth not the understanding of the saints; and there is none to give me one drop thereof.

But a little of the water of salvation, which overflows in the Kingdom of Heaven, is given to him that asketh it. Heaven is shut against me, and the earth yieldeth not her fruits; thorns and briars spring up before me, and you say: Why dost thou weep? and why dost thou not eat and drink?

Ye children of men, how long will you be heavy at heart? how long will ye relish such things? how long will you afflict my heart, by speaking foolishness unto me? Ye have no part in the word of the Lord, and ye seek to subvert the just by false promises, saying "peace, peace, where there is no peace." (Jer. vi. 14). And what part have you with peace? "There is no peace to the wicked, saith the Lord." (Isa. xlviii. 22.)

I do not weep because I am not rich, because I abound not in wine and bread, in corn and oil, as ye seek to abound; but because I am still in this world, and do not yet see HIM, who is true Peace and Sovereign Beatitude.

Behold my stripes, and feel ye my wounds; and if you will not weep with me, send me away, that I may mourn a little over my sorrow, before I go hence out of this life, and return no more.

Meanwhile, I will sit in grief, and walk in sorrow, and will not go abroad. I will dig on my nest, and be buried in the grave which I have dug for myself.

I am overjoyed that I have found me a tomb, that I may sleep therein, and see not the evils that are committed on the earth.

My soul is weary of my life, and my sorrow is new every day!

Therefore, O Lord, my God, I beseech Thee to loose me from every bond of sin, yet, mercifully, to snatch me from the earth; for it is better for me to die than to live.

And what more can I do here? Day after day passeth away, and year after year, and yet Thy servant makes but little progress! Prolong not the days of Thine unworthy servant, nor suffer him to wander any longer after the vanity of this life. "Turn away mine eyes, that they may not behold vanity." (Ps. cxviii. 37.) "I have gone astray like a sheep that is lost; seek Thy servant" (Id. 176), for "It is time, O Lord, to do" (Id. 126). Not my justice, O Lord, nor my goodness; but Thy mercy, and Thy loving kindness, which cannot be measured.

According to that mercy, deal with Thy servant, and visit me in Thy salvation; that so I may see Thee in the goodness of Thine elect, and rejoice in the gladness of Thy people; that Thou mayest be praised in Thine heritage, which thou hast acquired by Thy blood. Who, with the FATHER and the HOLY GHOST, remaineth: GOD, blessed for ever. AMEN.

CHAPTER OF DEATH

(Continued from page 25.)

It is related of Restaud, a dialectician of some celebrity, that being in extremis, and having summoned his wife and children to receive his parting benediction, he addressed them in these words:—"Mes chers enfans, je m'en vas, car l'académie n'a pas encore décidé!" which may be translated—"My dear children, I am going, or I am ganging, for the academy has not yet decided the point."

The reformer Mélancthon, upon feeling conscious of the approaches of death, wrote down a list of considerations which appeared to him to render that event desirable; among which he enumerated, as one of the evils from which he was most anxious to escape—relief from theological controversy.

Locke expired in his arm-chair. Just before his death, he wrote a letter to his friend Collins, in which he declared that his only comfort was derivable from the recollection of the good he had been able to accomplish, and that two things alone could in this world yield any real satisfaction, the testimony of an approving conscience, and the hope of a future life.

Cardinal Richelieu died with as much seeming intrepidity as if he had felt his conscience utterly without reproach. Upon the holy viaticum being brought into his chamber, he exclaimed, "Voilà mon SEIGNEUR et mon DIEU, je proteste devant lui que dans tout ce que j'ai entrepris, je n'ai jamais eu en vue que le bien de la religion et de l'état."—"In the presence of my Lord and my God; I declare that in all my undertakings, I have never had any other object in view, but the welfare of religion and the state." Upon being asked whether he forgave his enemies, he replied, "Je n'ai d'ennemis que ceux de l'état."—"I have no enemies but those of the state."

The graceless Cardinal de Rohan was attended on his death-bed by a Revolted Confessor. After some minutes' conversation, the latter proposed administering the sacrament of extreme unction, to which the other rejoined, "Douxment doucement, on fait plus de façon avec un cardinal."—"Gently, gently, a little more ceremony with a Admon, when on the point of death, summoned his profligate son-in-law, and said to him, "I wished you to be present at my last moments, that you might see with what calmness a Christian dies."

The last words of Pope, were, "Nothing is praiseworthy but virtue and friendship; and friendship, indeed, is only part of virtue."

The death-bed of Voltaire, the great apostle of infidelity, is described as having been truly fearful. "The perturbation of his last days—as extreme," so writes the French author those words we quote: "Despair, insensibility, and hesitation alternately characterized the interviews which he held with the Curé of St. Sulpice and the Abbé Gauthier. Their united ministrations had been utterly ineffectual, when the latter observing the imminent danger of Voltaire, addressed one more stirring exhortation to the dying sinner. But the Curé of St. Sulpice, turning to his colleague, exclaimed in a tone of the deepest affliction, 'Alas, alas! he is lost all consciousness!' The infidel was no more."

Jean Jacques Rousseau, while pursuing his customary morning avocations, dropped down on the floor in a fit, fracturing his head in the fall and was awakened.

Madame de Pompadour, who expiated by coming conduct in her latter days, the frailties and scandal of her former life,—said to the priest, who was now taking leave of her, just after administering to her the last rites of the Church, "Un moment, Monsieur le Curé, nous nous irons ensemble."—"Wait a moment, M. le Curé, and we will go together."

Danton said to the executioner, just before his death, "Show my head to the people, it is well worth looking at."

One of the first victims of the French revolutionary phrensy was the notorious Madame Dubarry, the tenour of whose maturer life had in some measure atoned for the scandal of her earlier days. She uttered on the scaffold the most piercing and heart-rending cries for mercy: was pursued and dragged to her fate by the executioner; and at the very moment the knife fell, was exclaiming, "M. le bourreau, encore un moment!" It was remarked, that of all the female victims of that epoch of terror, she had, when brought to the block, displayed the least amount of moral courage.

Robespierre, on finding himself deserted by all his former friends, and to avoid being taken alive, placed the muzzle of a pistol in his mouth, and blew out part of his jaw. In this mangled state he was carried to the hall of the committee of public safety, and stretched upon the very table at which he had signed so many death-warrants. The wound was imperfectly bandaged, and he passed a whole day in a state of extreme torture, unable to express his wants, and exposed to the bitterest insults of his enemies. When attempting to staunch the blood that flowed in profusion from his face, a handkerchief, soaked in blood, was scoffingly offered him. He spat it aside. "It is only blood," said he, "the thing in which you delight." He cast a malignant look at the speaker, and calmly wiped his face. Robespierre was conducted in a cart to execution, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon of the 28th July, 1794, amidst the acclamations of thousands. The gendarmes that lined the streets, tauntingly pointed, with their outstretched sabres, at his ghastly blood-stained visage, and when the "cortège" reached Robespierre's dwelling house, it halted, in conformity with the cruel refinement of that day, and women danced round the cart! Upon the scaffold, the executioner rudely tore off the bandage from the criminal's face. The latter uttered a fearful scream, his jaw bones parted asunder, torrents of blood spouted forth, and his head presented a spectacle hideous indeed to behold. He was made to witness the execution of eleven of his accomplices, before his own turn, dismissed, unrepentant, from this world, as foul a demon as had ever been incarnate in man.

M. de Malesherbes, the able and chivalrous defender of Lewis XVI, and who, in due course of time, followed his unfortunate client to the scaffold, stumbled, as he walked forth from his prison to execution, and, righting himself, gaily observed, "A Roman would have regarded this mishap as a bad omen, and turned back again!"

(To be continued)

THE ASSOCIATION FOR THE PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.—The amount of the subscriptions for the past month, to Monday last, received by the Central Committee of the Association for the Propagation of the Faith in Dublin was 441l. This sum does not include the subscriptions of Cork, which generally are forwarded every second month. The next subscription, it is expected, will be upwards of six hundred pounds, as several other returns are expected in due time.—Tablet.

NEW SOUTH WALES.

Extract of a letter from Sydney, dated Sept. 4, 1843:—"The mission is in a flourishing state; the Catholics of the colony are most exemplary in the discharge of their religious duties, and I never knew a more edifying people than those of Sydney. The children seem to have received the Divine Spirit without measure. The Sisters of Charity and Christian Brothers are effecting wonders; and communion rails are crowded, and religion is loved and practised. We receive many converts every week; it is quite evident that the Almighty has great blessings in store for this country. The mission to the Aborigines is likely to succeed; the natives have a great affection for the Archbishop and the missionaries. The little girls in our school at Sydney have been busily employed in making calico chemises for the black children: you would have been charmed to see the emulation which existed amongst them in making dresses for their black heathen fellow-creatures."

MEXICO.—SISTERS OF CHARITY.—From a letter in the Catholic of 16th inst., it appears that the opening effected in Mexico for "Las Hermanas de la Caridad" is due to the Señora Donna Ana Gomez de la Cortina, Countess of Cortina, and a small committee of ladies, at whose expenses a gentleman with full powers has reached Spain, arranged with the new Directors of the Sisters of Charity, and obtained the sanction of her Catholic Majesty's Government, and immediately the Sisters will, under his guidance, depart for America.—Tablet.

NEWMAN'S SERMONS.

Sermons bearing on subjects of the day. By John H. Newman, 1838.

(FROM THE DUBLIN REVIEW.)

We have hitherto abstained from bringing before the notice of our readers, the sermons of this or any other divine, however celebrated, of the Anglican Church. In fact, except as engaged in controversy with them, we have not felt that we could consistently draw attention to their religious writings. The sermons of any one separated from the Church can never be safely recommended for perusal to her children, who find in her, and in her alone, rich and abundant pastures of grace and truth, refreshing streams of devotional exercises, and security moreover from all that can be hurtful. Only to God's holy mount is promise made of exemption from all such danger. If we depart from our custom in the present instance, it may require a reason by way of explanation. It is not that we are going to examine these sermons critically, and to discuss any of their views, or, in other words, to treat them controversially. Neither is it that they could be useful to Catholics as spiritual instruction. For, notwithstanding their great scriptural learning, their striking and original views on many points, their simple but powerful diction, their peculiar and often fascinating eloquence, they are not calculated to add to the knowledge or to the devotion of a well-instructed Catholic. But this is, in fact, not their object. "The day," to which the subjects refer, is not our day—the day of the Church Catholic—but "the day" of Anglicanism,—its day of crisis, its day of judgment.—God grant it may be its final day!

The reason, therefore, for which we lay before our readers these sermons rather than others, is, that they save us the trouble of doing in our own words, what we have repeatedly done already—exposing the confusion, the inconsistency, the rumbling, sinking, failing condition of the English Church. Till now we have endeavoured to show this by argument; we may henceforth be content to do it by confessions. We have endeavoured to keep pace with the phases of modern religious opinions, so that this Review may be considered a true record of the steps whereby the extraordinary movement in religion in these our strange days has proceeded; and we should cease to be faithful chroniclers of its march, were we to pass by this interesting volume, itself at once a self-registering move upon the scale of its advancement. For whatever Mr. Newman writes is not only on evidence but a cause, not merely a record but an event. His words may serve to inform us and posterity of the present state of opinion in his Church, or at least that portion of it whose standard he bears; but they will carry a conviction to the minds of many, and bring them to think as they have not before on the subject. How many, for instance, will feel far more keenly than we can possibly feel with increasing convictions, and a lamentable picture of the state of Anglicanism as it presented to us in the following passages:—

"But further, if we are not altogether in a position to see the words of the Father, if we are separated and severed, in the great distance and so much darkness, to be able to see them naturally, it is not possible that so far we really do lack a note of the Church? is there not a fear lest the world be friends with us, because we are friends with the world? This is no new or strange occurrence in the history of the Gospel. It is not peculiar to our age or country; it is the great disease of the Church in all ages. Whatever corruptions of doctrine there have been at particular times and places, no corruption has been so great as this particular corruption, which has existed in its measure in all times and places; the serving God for the sake of mammon! the loving religion from the love of the world. And as to ourselves, I fear, it is no declamatory statement to say, that there never was an age in which it existed more largely, never an age in which the Church contained so many untrue members; that is, so many persons who profess themselves her members, when they know little or nothing about the real meaning of membership, and remain within her pale for some reasons short of religious and right ones. For instance,—to put one question on the subject.—How many supporters of Christ's Holy Catholic Church do you think would be left among us, if her cause were found to be, not the cause of order, as it happens to be now, but the cause of disorder, as it was when Christ came and His Apostles preached? It was the cry of the Jews of Thessalonica against St. Paul and St. Silas, "These that have turned the world upside down, are come hither also." It is not as plain as the day, that the mass of persons who support the Church in her legal privileges, do so, not so much because they care for the Kingdom of the Saints, as because they think that the downfall of our civil institutions is involved in her downfall. I do not say that they have no love for the Church, but they have a greater love for worldly prosperity. They have just so much more love for the world than the Church, as would lead them, were the peace of the world and the welfare of the Church at variance with each other, to side with the world against the Church. As it is, they see that the influence of the Gospel is on the side of good order; that it tends to make men contented and obedient subjects; that it keeps the lower orders from outbreaks; that it makes a firm stand against rebellion, sedition, conspiracy, riot, and fanaticism; that it is the best guarantee for the security of private property. It does all these benefits; they are benefits; and we may rightly be thankful for them. But numbers of professing Churchmen consider them the special benefits of Christ's Kingdom, caring little for the unseen and spiritual blessings which are its true and proper gifts. Look round upon our political parties, our literature, our science, our periodical publications; is it not too plain to need a word of proof, that religion is in the main honoured because it tends to make this life happier, and is expedient for the preservation of our persons, property, advantages, and position in the world? Can a greater stigma be placed upon any doctrine in the judgment of the community, than that it is anti-social, or that it is idle, gloomy, or inconvenient?"

Again—

"And now I feel, and a solemn thought it is, that numbers among ourselves, though we profess the gospel, are in that restless state, ever seeking, never finding! Look around you, my brethren, on every side; what, on the whole, is the religion of England? it is restlessness. Look round, I say, and answer, why it is that there is so much change, so much strife, so many parties and sects, so many creeds? because men are unsatisfied and restless; and why restless, with every one his psalm, his doctrine, his tongue, his revelation, his interpretation? they are restless because they have not found. Alas! so it is, in this country called Christian, vast numbers have gained little from religion, beyond a thirst after what they have not, a thirst for their true peace, and the fever and restlessness of thirst. It has not yet brought them into the presence of Christ, in which 'is fulness of joy' and 'pleasure for evermore.' Had they been fed with the bread of life, and tasted of the honey of His word, like Jonathan's, had been enlightened, they would have acknowledged the Saviour of men; but they do not. They have such real apprehension of things unseen, that they do not seek, and are at the mercy of the world, without, which purports to bring them to the end of the place of His abode. I sought Him, but I found Him not. I will rise up, and seek Him, in the streets, and in the broad ways I will seek Him, whom my soul loveth; I sought Him, but I found Him not. I sought Him, but I could not find him; I called Him, but he gave me no answer. The watchmen that went about the city found me; they smote me, they wounded me; the keepers of the walls took away my veil from me. Mary wept because they had taken away her Lord, and she knew not where they had laid Him. She was in trouble because she sought Him yet in vain. Poor wanderers, hapless and ill-fated generation, who understand that Christ is on earth, yet do but seek Him in the desert, or in the secret chambers,—Lo here! and Lo, there! O sad and pitiable spectacle, when the people of Christ wander on the hills as 'sheep which have no shepherd,' and instead of seeking Him in His ancient haunts and His appointed home, busy themselves in human schemes, follow strange guides, are taken captive by new opinions, become the sport of chance, or of the humour of the hour, or the victims of self-will, are full of anxiety, and perplexity, and jealousy, and alarm, 'tossed to and fro, and carried about by every wind of doctrine, by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness whereby they lie in wait to deceive';—and all because they do not seek the 'one body' and the 'one spirit' and the 'one hope of their calling,' the 'one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all,' and find rest for their souls! O how different from that Apostolic state, when all that believed were together and had all things common: and...continuing daily with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread from house to house, did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart, praising God, and having favour with all the people! and whence this disorder, which we have lost? because of that inward Gift, which, being One, made them all one, according to our Saviour's prayer 'The glory which Thou gavest Me, I have given them; that they may be one, even as We are one; I in them, and Thou in Me, that they may be made perfect in one.'—pp. 357-359.

In still stronger terms does Mr. Newman eloquently describe the lamentable state of the Anglican system, its divisions, and other symptoms of decay:—

"Now it is plain how this doctrine applies to these times, and to us. Alas! I cannot deny that the outward notes of the Church are partly gone from us, and partly going; and a most fearful judgment it is. 'Behold, . . . the stars of heaven and the constellations thereof shall not give their light; the sun shall be darkened in his going forth, and the moon shall not cause her light to shine.' 'I will cause the sun to go down at noon, and I will darken the earth in the clear day. And I will turn your feasts into mourning, and all your songs into lamentation.' 'All the bright lights of heaven will I make dark over them, and set darkness upon thy land, saith the Lord God.'† This in good measure has fallen upon us. The Church of God is under eclipse among us. Where is our unity, for which Christ prayed? Where our charity, which he enjoined? where the faith once delivered, when each has his own doctrine? where our visibility, which was to be a light to the world? where that awful worship, which struck fear into every soul? And what is the consequence? 'We grope for the wall like the blind, and we grope as if we had no eyes; we stumble at noonday as in the night; we are in desolate places as dead men.'‡ And as the Jews, shortly before their own rejection, had two dark tokens,—the one, a bitter contempt of the whole world; and the other, multiplied divisions and furious quarrels at home,—so we English, as if some abomination of desolation were coming on us also, scorn almost all Christianity but our own; and yet have, not one, but a hundred gospels among ourselves, and each of them with its own hot defenders, till our very note and symbol is diacord, and we wrangle and denounce, and call it life; but peace we know not, nor faith, nor love. And this being so, what a temptation is it to those who read and understand the word of God, who perceive what it enjoins and promises, and also feel keenly what we are,—what a temptation is it to many such to be impatient under this visitation? Who indeed is there at all, who lets himself dwell upon the thought of it, but must at times be deeply troubled at it? and who can be startled, not I, if a person here or there, painfully sensitive of this fearful eclipse of the Sun of Truth, and hoping, if that be possible, to find something better elsewhere; and either not having cherished, or neglected to look for those true tokens of Christ's Presence in the Church, which are personal to himself; leaves us for some other communion? Alas! and we, instead of being led to reflect on our own share in his act, instead of dwelling on our own sin, are eloquent about his; instead of confessing our own most unchristian divisions, can but cry out against his dividing from us, in-

* Eph. iv. 5, 6; Acts ii. 44-47; John xvii. 21, 23.

† Is. xlii. 10; Amos viii. 9, 10; Ezek. xxxii. 8.

‡ Is. lxx. 10.

stead of repenting of our own profaneness which has shocked him, protest against his superstition; instead of calling to mind the lying and slandering, the false witness, the rejoicing in evil, the ungenerousness and unfairness which abound among us, our low standard of duty and scanty measures of holiness, our love of the world, and our dislike of the cross; instead of acknowledging that our brother has left us because we have left God, that we have lost him because we have lost our claim to keep him; we, forsooth, think we 'do well to be angry,' and can but enlarge on his impatience, or obstinacy, or wilfulness, or infatuation. Or if we are alarmed, as well as indignant, we dream of foes and traitors among us, when the foe and the traitor is within us; and we look any where but there; and we wonder, to be sure, that we cannot find what it implies so much address to conceal; and we are restless till we have traced the guilt some whither, to any one but ourselves,—like the prophet beating his ass because she saw, what from him was hidden, the angel with a drawn sword. 'Thou hypocrite; first cast out the beam out of thine own eye, and then thou shalt see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye.' 'Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat and swallow a camel!' 'Thou eatest and spakest against thy brother, yea, and hast slandered thine own mother's son.' 'Thou which teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? . . . thou that makest thy boast of the law, through breaking the law dishonorest thou God? for the Name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles through you, as it is written.*'

"For me, with these convictions, never will I shrink, through God's help, at fitting times, and in my place, from warning my brethren of that so great sin of the day, their disregard of the grievous judgment under which we lie. If it was promised to the Church that she should be 'the pillar and ground of the truth,' that her 'teachers should not be removed into a corner any more,' but that her 'ears should hear a voice behind her, saying, This is the way, walk ye in it,' and if, to us in this country, she is not such as this, surely we have forfeited something, surely we are under a judgment; and if we are under a judgment, how inexpressibly it must offend Almighty God, that we do not 'humble ourselves under His mighty hand!' This being so, it is a very light thing indeed for one whose eyes are in this measure opened to see it, to find himself opposed for speaking plainly about it; and, even though opposed, it must be more difficult for him to keep silence than to speak."—pp. 378-382.

The following is perhaps still more interesting:—

"And, again, what can be more incongruous than for the run of Christians of this age to call themselves Catholics! yet their calling themselves so may be the first step to their becoming so. And how little fitted are we to discharge ecclesiastical censures, or to enforce ecclesiastical discipline, or to live by rule! yet, by attempting to do so, we may learn our wants, and seek the supply of them. And how unlike are the best among us to the Saints and Martyrs of old time; to St. Cyprian, or St. Basil, or St. Ambrose, or St. Leo! and what an utter mockery it is to couple their names with modern names, and to compare their words with our words, as is sometimes done! yet, if true love be the tie that binds us to them, since they most certainly cannot move towards us, we through God's mercy perchance may be drawn to them. And in like manner, poor and mean and unworthy as may be our attempts at a ceremonial on days such as this, yet we trust He will accept it, as He did her offering, who 'did what she could,' and will vouchsafe to bless it, and to make it a means of teaching us a deeper reverence and a more constraining love, and will draw us on into the very bosom of Catholic sanctity, and the very heart of Catholic affection, by observances and usages which in themselves are little worth, and excite the jeer or the criticism of the worldly or the profane. In a word, if we claim to be the Church, let us act like the Church, and we shall become the Church. Here, as in other matters, to doubt is to fail, to go forward is to succeed."—pp. 441-442.

These views will not appear surprising after reading the strong manner in which Mr. Newman speaks elsewhere of the importance, or rather the necessity, of unity, and communion with the Universal Church. Take, for instance, the following passage:—

"This is a point much to be kept in view in this day, as it will moderate our expectations, and sober us: we cannot hope for peace at home, while we are at war abroad. We cannot hope for the recovery of dissenting bodies, while we are ourselves alienated from the great body of Christendom. We cannot hope for unity of faith, if we at our own private will make a faith for ourselves in this our small corner of the earth. We cannot hope for the success among the heathen of St. Augustine or St. Boniface, unless like them we go forth with the apostolical benediction. That we are thus at disadvantage may not be our fault; it may be our misfortune; but at any rate it is not, what we too often consider it, our boast. Break unity in one point, and the fault runs through the whole body. There is a jar and a dissonance throughout; from the sole of the foot even unto the head there is no soundness. The flood of God's grace keeps it level, and if it is low in one place it is low in another. Surely we have abundant evidence on all sides of us, that the division of Churches is the corruption of hearts."—pp. 149-50.

(To be continued.)

FRENCH CORRESPONDENCE.

Paris, April 1, 1844.

The important question which is now discussed in France has, of late, engrossed so much of our attention, that we have been obliged to leave in the shade many other topics no less weighty and worthy of observation. It is high time we should turn our eyes towards those objects, and amongst the most prominent we may certainly name the Jesuits. It is indeed a very singular as well as interesting feature of modern times, that hardly any serious debate can be carried forward, hardly one single social movement can be effected, without that celebrated order forcing itself upon our view. Whether the disciples of Ignatius are considered as a mere political association, or as one of the most potent agents of Catholic reformation ever since the sixteenth century, no true statesmen, but more particularly no true philosophical historians, would ever think of refusing a few short moments to study their organisation, or reflect upon the powerful means by which they rose to such extraordinary eminence in the brief space of half a century. When an institution is so interwoven with the whole existence of any religious or political system—and we might well say both together—as to form one of its constituent parts, would it not be downright folly to cast but a superficial glance at that institution? Would it not be literally shutting one's eyes to light, or volunteering to grope in utter darkness as to the main causes of civilization itself? Protestantism, with all its prejudices, has been recently forced to retract many of its errors concerning the Jesuits, and to recall many a stigma inflicted in an unguarded hour of passion. Still much, and very much remains to be done on that head; and had we here to expatiate at large, many a delightful page might be written, delightful at least to the penman, or rather to the man who is fond of truth alone. Others, however, must and will undertake such a task, our duty is more humble; we shall confine ourselves to the simple line of a Correspondent. But even in that line, my dear Sir, some good may be done; and as you have been kind enough to find some interest in my hasty sketches of the Education question, I trust you will be equally indulgent upon perusing this letter concerning the famous Father de Ravignan.

* Matt. vii. 5; xiii. 24; Ps. l. 20; Rom. ix. 21, 22, 24.

It would be useless to refer to his first years. Every one is aware that he rose at a very early period of his life to the highest ranks of the French courts of judicature, and how, when almost every professional honour was within his grasp, he suddenly withdrew from the public gaze to become a Jesuit. On the very day he entered the noviciate he signed a formal renunciation of his patrimonial inheritance in favour of his relatives, and then exclaimed, "Thank God! now, indeed, I am free!" Such is the personage who, from that period, has almost constantly attracted thousands of auditors round his pulpit, who has declared obstinate warfare (inexpiabile bellum) to infidelity. As one Lent passes after another, as years roll on, the mighty and impassionate orator continues his struggle, most frequently in the vast basilic of Notre Dame; at other times, passing through the provinces, like a prophet of old, to rescue the sons of Israel from the slavery of the arch-fiend, but never returning alone to the fold of the Good Shepherd. Ravignan's oratory may not please the tastes of all; but what is rhetoric in the long run, or, to speak more appropriately, does not true eloquence consist in touching our feelings, in carrying conviction to the understanding? If so, few can vie with the celebrated preacher I am speaking of. From the Abbé de Ravignan has come forward before the public as a writer the lately published pamphlet containing about 120 pages; well, the subject has already gone through three editions in about the month. You may now guess the reason why the Debats have not uttered one single word about the brochure. Their paltry spirit has not dared to encounter the Abbé's sound reasoning and powerful discussion, no more than they dared to insert Dr. Wiseman's letter concerning the Duke of Bordeaux's visit to Oscott. I believe George Sand never said a truer sentence than when, addressing the Ministerial paper, he branded them with the following reproach:—"Vous n'avez pas le courage de votre incrédulité."

It is now a long time since the Jesuits appeared before the public to defend the principles and conduct of their own order. But the despicable and even childish attacks of Michelet and Quinet last winter have prompted Father de Ravignan to expose the real organisation of the company. He has, therefore, entitled his very useful brochure, "On the Existence and the Institute of the Jesuits." In his preface he examines the right of the Jesuits, under their reigning charter, to have establishments in France as well as other orders and religious associations. The second part exposes the spiritual exercises of St. Ignatius and the Constitutions. A most consummate jurisconsult and former Minister of Justice, M. de Vatimesnil, has added a third part, in which he enters into much legal reasoning in order to make out the case that the Jesuits are entitled to the same protection as their brethren. Such a truism seems almost folly to prove; not so in France. As many of your readers are necessarily unacquainted with M. de Ravignan's style, I hope to give them pleasure by translating the most leading passages of his preface. He begins thus:—

"Prudence has its laws, it has likewise its limits,

"In the lives of men there are circumstances when the most explicit statements become a solemn duty which ought to be fulfilled.

"I must indeed confess the fact, since the influence of false ideas seems once more to usurp amongst us that empire one might have now thought extinct; since old feelings of hatred and obsolete fables are again endeavouring to corrupt the plain meaning of words and vitiate the stream of justice; since then I experience an irresistible impulse to say, I AM A JESUIT.

"I owe this declaration to myself; I owe it to my ministry, to my brethren engaged in the same sacerdoce; I owe it to youth, to all the faithful who honour me with their confidence; I owe it, in fine, to the Church, I owe it to God.

"To the far greater number I shall say nothing new; I am merely following the dictates of my conscience, of my station, of my liberty.

"Besides, under the prevailing circumstances, there is, indeed, a too large share of ignominy and insult to be reaped by the bearer of that appellation not to claim publicly my portion of such an inheritance.

"Yes, that name is my name; I profess it in the singleness of my heart; and the reminiscences of the Gospel will enable many to understand why I proclaim the fact with joy.

"A Jesuit I have not always been; during a certain number of years I followed another track, in which I left most precious remembrances and faithful friends; and here my journey ends, such is my glory.

"Before I became a priest and a Jesuit, I was a man of my times, as I am even now; a Frenchman I was, a Frenchman I am still.

"When I became a Religious, I intended neither to abjure my country, nor to violate its laws, nor to renounce my rights and duties as a citizen.

"I had my prejudices against the Company of Jesus; Pascal and the parliamentary traditions had deceived me, like many others.

"I am even obliged to confess that it was in spite of myself that I discovered the truth concerning the Jesuits. It is not incumbent upon me to relate in this book through what ways Divine Providence was pleased to lead me; the public has nothing to do with my particular story, nor with the internal labour of the conscience of which God alone possesses the secret, but which is deeply impressed upon my soul, and by bringing light to it, gave rise to a thorough change in my whole existence.

"However, one thing I may say: my conviction was established, and my determination taken, in a situation utterly free from any kind of influence; my own individual temper is so disposed as to bend before none whatsoever.

"Another thing I feel also at liberty to affirm; the very things so disfigured and attacked in the Jesuits, were precisely these which determined me to become one of them. I mean to offer a few explanations of such things.

"I repeat it, the genius which animates the Society of Jesus, the very obedience professed by its disciples, the apostleship held by its members, the doctrines embraced by that identical society, had an immense influence over my life.

"I felt that God called me there. I entered.

"And, now-a-days, when public opinion is so strangely led astray; when certain words uttered with a contemptuous sneer hold an incredible and despotical sway over the most enlightened minds, even now I shall endeavour to raise the free voice of truth.

"The blindness of prejudice does not flinch from the most glaring folly. According to the language held in a very deliberate manner by some, every zealous priest is a Jesuit, every sincere Catholic a Jesuit!

"This is verily a fortunate name for hatred; by virtue of this name truth and justice may be dispensed with.....

"But, after all, it is evident that the whole clergy together with religion and the Church are all attacked under our name: thus, it becomes my duty to disengage the positions of all.

"To look upon the Church of France as curbed under the despotism of the Jesuits is in itself such an absurdity that it can come from no man pretending to be serious.

"There is, however, something still more inconceivable than the bare hypothesis, I mean the credulity with which the absurdity is believed.

"This imputation is by no means new. Fenelon denounced it to his own times. After quoting this author and comparing his age with ours, the Abbé de Maignan concludes his preface in the following manner:-

"Has the charter granted our liberty of conscience, or has it not?

"Is evangelical perfection a right of the conscience, or is it not?

"Very well, then, a monastic life is nothing else but evangelical perfection: such is the solemn doctrine of the Church, just as much as liberty of conscience is a solemn promise held out by the Charter

"If I please, I, a Frenchman, to lead in France the life of a Benedictine, a Dominican, or a Jesuit, what right have you to prevent me?

"I do not ask you to acknowledge in me any public existence; I require not a single particle of the public monies; I only ask to breathe in freedom like yourselves the free air of my native country. I do pretend, in my own private life, in my own conscience, to make vows and to follow in company with my brethren, in one common peace and dwelling, such rules as are approved by the Catholic Church?

"And I beg of you to tell me in what my liberty encroaches on yours? Does it even inconvenience any liberty whatsoever?

"Why, in England, in Belgium, in the United States, where religious freedom is a downright, plain, matter-of-fact reality, the monks, Jesuits as well as others, hold public colleges and numerous establishments of all kinds: in those countries, would their banishment be deemed a just and lawful measure?

"On what grounds would that banishment be denounced against them in France, where they are certainly denied such an ample share of the common rights?.....

"What have we done, what have we said, we, who are priests belonging to the Society of Jesus? From whence emerge such tremendous storms? How have we once more become the object of so much hatred; the aim at which are levelled so many blows, the cause of so much apprehension?

"You who call down upon our heads, upon priests, upon Frenchmen, upon free and devoted citizens, the whole rigour of proscription, do you know us? Have you even seen us? Have you heard us?

"Tell me the word ever uttered by our mouth that brought public peace into jeopardy? And yet our two hundred voices have resounded in numbers of pulpits, from the most populous cities down to the modest hamlet.....

"We are supposed to be the enemies of the actual institutions and liberties of France: Who knows it? or why should we be such enemies?

"And when alone we are threatened, when alone we are excluded from the blessings of a liberal legislation, how is it possible to make oppressors of us?

"Here, in fact, all is of a piece; the preposterous goes hand in hand with iniquity.....

"But, then, if the sun shines on all, are good sense and justice to remain eclipsed only when we are spoken of? Yes, indeed, so it is for many people, and so it has gone on for years and years.

"In the present work I appeal to all reflecting men, in order that they may seriously solve in their own minds those questions which are constantly brought forward when our name is pronounced.

"These questions must be solved; we find it indispensable for ourselves, and for those young men who knock at our door to obtain admittance.

and share our lives. We ought to tell them, and they have a right to know, if our laws do really expel from their country those Frenchmen who embrace a religious life.

You must now lay your hand on your heart, of the Charter; no more of your declamation, no more insult; let us at last have something serious, even were it to be a solemn piece of injustice; we shall then pity the country, though we shall not complain. We shall know again how to rally forth in exile, and perhaps seek for rights of citizens and religious freedom amongst American savages, or in Pagan India and China.

"There are already three hundred and fifteen French Jesuits out of France; we may soon be still more numerous. The earth itself belongs to the Lord whom we serve."

No reader will, I believe, complain of this long quotation, for it is but doing justice to the man to show the bold and uncompromising spirit in which he undertakes to defend the rights of his slandered brethren. The effect has been astonishing, and was little anticipated by the enemies of the Jesuits. M. de Ravignan then enters upon his subject, exposing successively the constitutions, the doctrines, and the practices of the society in the same simple and masterly style. As I intend to send you the brochure, with two other productions on the same subject, I shall refrain from any other quotation, as you may hereafter make better use of the whole, according to your leisure. But I shall not close my letter without a few observations upon the appendix to the work, which comes from M. de Vatimesnil, a very high authority in French law. Upon being consulted by the celebrated preacher, the learned gentleman has made out the legal case, referring to the existence of the Jesuits in France, and his concise, sound logic has also proved an unexpected blow to their adversaries. Thus the question assumes a new appearance and at the same time a very interesting one to an attentive observer.

On making a serious and important review of the old French legislation, it becomes evident that the Jesuits were as lawfully established in the country as any other religious order, a fact which has been controverted by their opposers. But even supposing the contrary to be true, the whole fabric of the old system fell to the ground at the period of the revolution, and, of course, the clauses which concerned the Jesuits with the rest. The following dilemma is the consequence of the above remark:—

Either the laws that were enacted after 1789 for the suppression of religious associations, and more especially the decree of the twelfth year of the Republic (1802), continue to subsist, and then it becomes perfectly useless to conjure up old Parliamentary edicts about the Jesuits, because the Government would be fully empowered to dissolve their communities like any other similar to them;

Or those same laws were exploded by the articles of the penal code relative to illegal associations, and the fifth article of the present Charter, and then it becomes necessary to examine whether the old edicts have been revived or not. Now, facts evidently prove that the same has happened in both suppositions. The Jesuits, therefore, are merely considered by the existing law as individuals who live under the same roof, to follow what mode of occupations they please, just the same as any other Frenchmen. As a corporation, they are exactly as if they were not; they cannot possibly be expelled as long as they obey the laws of the country; as long, in particular, as no meeting of more than twenty persons living out of the Jesuit establishments takes place in their residence. Then alone would they be liable to police regulations. For you must know that no public meeting composed of more than the above number can be held without a police license.

M. de Vatimesnil then proceeds to prove his position by numerous instances taken from modern courts, and he substantiates the facts in such a way that he brings irresistible conviction to every honest mind.

It would be abusing your patience, my dear Sir, to dwell any further on the subject; but most certainly it is a very curious fact of the present struggle, that our antagonists are beaten with their own arms, they are driven back to their camp, and fired at with the very shot they intended to use against their foes. If any new measure—and I, for one, should not be astonished at it—if any new measure be adopted against the Jesuits, once more the stain of hard-hearted, profligate iniquity will be stamped upon the foreheads of those who will be its promoters; with their own hands they may write down, Mentita est iniquitas sibi.

C. F. A.

—Tablet.

LOYAL NATIONAL REPEAL ASSOCIATION.

At the Conciliation Hall, on Monday, (April 15) J. PRIMROSE, Esq., ex-J. P., presided.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF TUAM.

Mr. O'CONNELL—I have the honour to hand in 115*l*, received from the Most Rev. the Archbishop of Tuam. (Loud cheers.)—

St. Jarlath's, Tuam, April 11, 1844.

My dear Mr. O'Connell.—Each successive meeting of the Loyal National Repeal Association bears testimony that the clergy and people of Ireland are not unconcerned spectators of your position, or of the present crisis of their country. Of the continuous and increasing sympathy of the clergy of this diocese with you, and the just cause for which you are suffering, the present communication will, I trust, afford sufficient evidence. It conveys the sum of one hundred and fifteen pounds sterling—the pledges of the conviction of as many Catholic clergymen of the necessity of an Irish Parliament to do justice to Ireland, and of their resolves to labour peaceably, legally, and religiously for its reconstitution. Yes, it is the tribute of a body of men to their country's quiet when the laws, far from favouring, still mark out as subjects of bigoted aversion. They deny us the secure transmission to our successors of the humblest residence which the piety of the faithful would bestow, and yet objects of the cruel jealousy of its laws, the clergy do more for their country's peace by their moral influence than is done by so many stipendiary magistrates and military cohorts, on whom a large portion of the public revenue is so profusely expended.

The clergy of the different deaneries of this diocese have on Easter Tuesday assembled, according to ancient usage, conspiring to guard the deposit of the true faith in their theological conferences, and to carry with them for the spiritual consolation of their suffering flocks the oil consecrated on Holy Thursday, emblematic of that restoring virtue which was first infused into a corrupt world by our holy religion. They were not, however, aliens in their own land, nor heedless of the strange things that have been recently transacted in it, and of which the record, has excited the attention of distant nations. I need but refer to that eloquent document, addressed to you by the ecclesiastics of Germany, who confess with filial gratitude, that it is to Ireland their country is indebted for the blessings of its religion. It was in the sunshine of its civil and religious freedom, and in the enjoyment of that repose which freedom alone confers, our country was enabled to gladden the neighbouring nations with its light. And it is only under the tutelage of laws enacted by a native Parliament, with our gracious monarch, that it can hope to run again the same lofty career of beneficent science which still commands the gratitude of Europe after the lapse of eleven centuries. What wonder, then, that those who contrast the social and religious evils inflicted by oppression, with the social and religious happiness of which good government and wise laws are the parents, should be solicitous for the restoration of the legislative independence of Ireland. Cheering, however, as are such disinterested attestations from strangers to the obligations they owe us, there are some of its own unnatural children to be found, who are alike indifferent to the future Prospects of Ireland and to the monuments of its ancient fame. To them, slaves to the indulgence of the present hour, the past and the future are equally phantoms; and as they are incapable of being animated by historical recollections, it is not from such that future ages can draw any inspiration to lofty deeds. To such mere animal creatures your devotion to your country, and your suffering in its cause, is unintelligible, or becomes a theme of mockery and unhallowed triumph. But such triumph is, thank God, as ephemeral as the creatures who indulge in it.

As the post goes out this evening earlier than usual, and as the names and subscriptions of a few more of the remoter clergy had not time to arrive, I must defer for a few days the list of those who have commissioned me to forward their names and money to the Association. I have only to add, that should you be cast into prison, "prayers will be offered without ceasing by the Church to God for you," that a light, and virtue from on high may gild the darkness and undo the bars of your prison-house. Your brief captivity will in the meantime become the peaceful but powerful instrument of your country's permanent freedom, and you will, I trust, be long the happy witness of its prosperity springing from Ireland's legislative independence, of which you now stand forth the revered and admired confessor to the nations of the civilised world.

I have the honour to remain, my dear Mr. O'Connell, your ever devoted and faithful servant,

JOHN, ARCHBISHOP OF TUAM.
Daniel O'Connell, Esq., M.P.

It is unnecessary to say that I am utterly unable to express the gratitude of the association to this revered prelate for his timely and patriotic donation—for his admirable letter—for the subdued enthusiasm that pervades it—and, above all, for the example he has set, and the proof he has given that persecution or prosecution will never put a termination to the decided determination of the people of Ireland to obtain for their country legislative independence. (Cheers.) I have done everything for my country except suffer for her in my person, and I am glad our enemies have given me an opportunity of capping the climax, and as I have laboured upwards of forty years in her service, in the broad and open day, they will now lock me up in a prison that I may live to boast I am not only a confessor but a martyr in her cause. (Cheers.) We shall see whether our enemies or I better understand the people of Ireland. I trust that within one week after we are sent to prison not a man in Ireland who wishes well to Ireland that will not bear some mark about him that all the enemies of Repeal may know him. (Loud Cheers.) Let it be an incentive to them to continue the Repeal agitation. Let it be a caution to them to continue that struggle legally and within the bounds of constitutional rights. Let England and the world know that Ireland cannot be safe from foreign disturbance or the English throne as secure as we wish and desire it to be, until the people of Ireland obtain their just rights in the appointment of persons to make laws for them. If the people consent, the Government will succeed in their attack on Repeal: but if the people do not consent but rally again for Repeal—if they are, if possible, more anxious, and more determined, not to violate the law, and yet to persevere—let that be the result of the prosecution, and the last trick of our enemies is played. (Cheers.) They have played their Court cards—(laughter)—they have played out their "knaves"—they have played their "clubs"—"diamonds" they have none. (Laughter.) But they cannot get the game except we give it up. (Hear.) The way to prove you have not given it up is, for every man to pay his subscription for '44. (Hear, hear.) When I sing out, a bird from my cage, he who does not attend to my whistle from that cage does not deserve to be called an Irishman. All I want is peace. I have been long the apostle of that doctrine that the greatest possible ameliorations in human institutions are to be obtained by peaceable means alone, and look about and you will see the effect I have already made on the mind, I will say, of the civilised world. (Cheers.) I respectfully submit to the Catholic clergy of Ireland, and to the Liberals of every persuasion in Ireland, that this is the moment emphatically to come forward: this is the time to have the public verdict pronounced—to have the public judgment emphatically declared. (Hear and Cheers.) This is the time to have the public sentiment of liberty pronounced to the nations of the earth, and poured forth as a blessing upon our native land. (Cheers.) Yes, we have arrived at the period to try men's souls.

Mr. O'CONNELL moved and Mr. SMITH O'BRIEN seconded, that the Archbishop's letter be inserted on the minutes with the unanimous thanks of the members.—Tablet.

MISCELLANEA.

CROYDON.—I was delighted to see the way in which the services of Holy-Week were here performed, in a mission which has cost its pastor so much persecution. The decencies of the sacred building on Easter Sunday, the commodiousness and regularity of the sittings, the elegant arrangement of the altar, the venerable appearance of the priest coming from the sanctuary and preceded by four acolytes, the younger branches of Catholic families resident in Croydon before the date of the mission, I will not dwell on. Three converts were admitted to the sacred place, and made their profession of faith and renunciation of error. The solemn Mass was sung by a choir of friends, all Catholics of London or Croydon, and many of the congregation took the Sacrament. In the evening, vespers were sung and a sermon preached by the venerable missionary, followed by the benediction of the most holy Sacrament. Every Sunday evening this service will be repeated, preceded, however, by the Litany of the Blessed Virgin, the holy patroness of the Croydon mission, of whom a beautifully carved image embellishes the altar. For a fare of 1s. 6d. the omnibus from the Regent-street entrance into Oxford-street will take up the intended worshipper who would go to Croydon and set him down at the chapel. It would be well if many made this little pilgrimage, especially of the class who could assist the venerable missionary with means to increase the utility of his labours. The Rev. Mr. Moore is the first pastor who said Mass at Croydon since the "Reformation."—Tablet.

HEREFORD.—THE REV. MR. WATERWORTH. The following extract is given by the Christian Guardian, for this month, from the Record, on the Hereford controversy. Such a character, extorted from that most bitter anti-Catholic paper, is praise indeed; and must be highly gratifying, not merely to the reverend disputant himself, but to every Catholic.—"Of the talent displayed by Mr. Waterworth it would be hard to speak too highly. Eloquent, versatile, and master of his subject, he stood before the meeting an accomplished gladiator; and though labouring under severe indisposition, he never rested for a moment; always fluent, sometimes imaginative, and even lofty, and full of wisdom and earnestness, leaving the impression on the minds of those who heard him that his deficiencies were those of his system—his energies and skill were all his own."—Ibid.

PORTLAND.—PROFESSION OF MISS ELLEN LALIGAN.—Professed, on Sunday, 15th April, in the Presentation Convent of Portland, lately established by the Very Rev. Francis O'Connell, P.P., V.F., Miss Ellen Laligan, of the city. The Right Rev. Dr. Haly, R.C., Bishop of Kildare and Leighlin, officiated on the occasion, assisted by the Very Rev. Theobald Mathew, and the Rev. W. Harte, P.P., of Freshford. The young lady was presented at the altar by Mrs. Teresa Smithwick, sister to the worthy mayor of this city, Superior of the House, and Mother Magdalen Breen. The Apostle of Temperance preached the Profession Sermon in his usual style of clear and simple eloquence. The fineness of the day, the novelty of the ceremony, and the charm of Father Mathew's name, attracted great crowds, whose conduct was marked by the strongest religious feeling, and the strictest propriety.—Ibid.

The Most Rev. Dr. Murray, the venerable Archbishop of Dublin, preached in the cathedral in Marlborough-street, on Sunday last. His Grace delivered a most admirable discourse on the gospel of the day, which came home to the hearts and minds of a most respectable congregation, who felt delighted at seeing the aged and amiable Metropolitan in such excellent health and spirits. The beautiful manner in which he spoke on the peace of serving God, on the peace of a good conscience and upon that peace which the world cannot give nor take away, created a great sensation.—Ibid.

NEW ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH AND MONASTERY.—The foundation stones of a Roman Catholic Church and Monastery were last Thursday laid by Mr. V. Gandolfi, of the firm of Gandolfi and Co., Silkmerchants, Trockmorton-street, on the estate of Mr. T. Hornyold, Blackmoor-park, Worcestershire. There were present on the occasion—Dr. Wiseman, the Provincial of the Benedictines, with several other distinguished clergymen of the Roman Catholic creed; Messrs. Hornyold, F. Fitzherbert, Compton, Handford, H. Grant, &c.; Mrs. Hornyold, the Countess Boissiere, the Misses Hodges, &c.; all of whom joined in the procession. The buildings, which will be erected at the sole expense of Mr. V. Gandolfi, are expected to be completed in the course of three years, and 10,000*l.* will be expended upon them.—Times.

NEW CATHOLIC MISSIONARY COLLEGE, DRUMCONDRA, NEAR DUBLIN.—It is truly astonishing to find what noble support has been given to this admirable seminary for the benefit of the foreign missions. Already nearly 4,000*l.* have been subscribed, the greater part of which has been freely and generously bestowed by the poor and persecuted people of Ireland. The college is one of the greatest monuments of Irish devotion and pure Catholicism that was ever perhaps raised to the honour of the Most High God. Now that the Irishmen have done their duty towards distant climes, it is hoped that all out of Ireland will come forward to crown the work of sanctity and love by joining the cause of charity.—Tablet.

THE STRIKE.—A Methodist preacher, of the name of Mason, was dragged from his pulpit on Sunday last, and very roughly treated by the pitmen at Wingate Grange Colliery, on account of his opposition to the union. Fortunately, one of the rural policemen was near, and rescued the rev. gentleman from his unpleasant predicament.—Newcastle Journal.

BENGAL CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

No. 4.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, JULY 27, 1844.

[Vol. VII.]

ALL THE MINISTERS OF THE NEW AND PRETENDED CHURCH ARE, THROUGH DEFAULT OF MISSION, INEXCUSABLE, AS WELL AS THOSE WHO HAVE HEARD AND FOLLOWED THEM.

TRANSLATED FROM ST. FRANCIS OF SALES.

(Continued from our last.)

We must infer from what has been just advanced, that your ministers, not having had the conditions which could merit for them the rank which they wished to hold, and enable them to conduct the enterprise which they undertook, are inexcusable, as well as you who follow them, while you know, or ought to know, that you acted perfectly wrong in receiving them for what they pretended to be, on account of their default of Mission. The dignity which they assumed was that of Ambassadors of Jesus Christ our Lord; the enterprise which they projected was to declare a sworn divorce between the Spouse and the Ancient Church, his bride, to negotiate and contract, in words ~~the~~ present tense, as legitimate proxies, a second and a new marriage with this young damsel stranger, more comely, as they said, and more suitable than the other. In effect, to erect one-self into a preacher of the word of God and a pastor of souls, is the same thing as to declare one-self the Ambassador and Legate of our Lord, according to these words of the apostle.*—"For Christ, therefore, we are Ambassadors." And what is this but to say, that Christianity has entirely failed, that the entire Church has erred, and that truth has disappeared from the earth? What is it but to say, that our Lord has abandoned his Church, has broken the sacred bond of marriage he had contracted with her, to introduce a new Church?† Is it not imposing upon the sacred and holy Spouse, to make him take a second wife? In strict truth, this is what the ministers of the pretended Church have undertaken to accomplish; this is their boast, this pretension has been ever the aim of their preaching, of their schemes, and their writings; but what injustice have you not been guilty of in believing them so lightly? How have you been caught so simply by their words? How have you been able to give them such prompt credence? That you might receive them as legates and Ambassadors, they should have been sent,—they should have credential letters from him whose Ambassadors they boasted to be: the affair was of the very highest importance, there was question of a general revolution of the whole Church, and the persons who undertook a project so extraordinary, were private individuals of low rank. The ordinary pastors who opposed these extraordinary pretended teachers and protested that they had neither commission nor command from their avowed master, were men of note and of long established, authentic reputation. Tell me, then, in God's name, why did you listen to them and believe them, without having any assurance of their commission or voucher from our Lord, whose nuncios and apostles they proclaimed themselves? In one word, you cannot but know, that to give credit to preachers who had no commission from the legitimate master to preach, and could not possibly have it from themselves nor from you, is to have basely abandoned the Ancient Church in which you had been baptized.

If Jesus Christ had sent them, their mission would be necessarily, either mediate or immediate. We understand a mission to be mediate, when persons are sent by him who possesses delegated power from God, agreeably to the order which he has established in his Church. Such was the mission of St. Denis to France by Pope Clement, and of Timothy, by St. Paul.* An immediate commission is given when God himself in person gives a command, and gives charge for its execution without regard to the ordinary authority which he has entrusted to the prelates and pastors of his Church; and in this manner, St. Peter was sent, and the apostles who received this command from the lips of our Lord himself. "Go ye into the whole world, and preach the Gospel to every creature."* Such also was the mission of Moses† respecting Pharaoh and the people of Israel; but your ministers had not their mission either in one or the other of these ways: thus, with what license have they ventured to preach, contrary to the words of the Apostle:‡ "How shall they preach unless they be sent?" (To be continued.)

* 2 Cor. 5. 20.

† Ephes. 5. 25.

* 2 Timothy 6.

THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE ON TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

We have received a pamphlet, consisting of extracts from the Calcutta Christian Advocate, every way worthy of the Editor of that disreputable Journal. Press of business prevented us from noticing it sooner, and we are not quite sure that it is entitled to any notice from us though we should have nothing else to do.

The subject of the pamphlet being Transubstantiation, and the writer being a Baptist, and a Sailor, whose zeal for Puritan Protestantism procured him the double office of Preacher and Editor, our readers may easily anticipate the style and manner in which the work has been executed.

The author professes to write for the ignorant,—for such of his readers as are not sufficiently acquainted with the doctrines of the Catholic Church, and so far he displays prudence and sound policy, for it is only in the minds of such persons he could hope to pass calumny for truth, declamation for reasoning, and puerile sophistry for good arguments.

The jolly Tar of the Christian Advocate being about to write down Transubstantiation, as contrary to Scripture and reason, thought he could not better begin his task than by opening fire, in a broad-side preface, on the Jesuits; not doubting that after he had told the ignorant readers for whom he professes to write, that the Jesuits never hesitate to use any or every means to accomplish their ends, he would easily convince them that Transubstantiation was unscriptural and everything bad. It might puzzle an enlightened candid Christian to discover what connection there is between the truth of the doctrine of Transubstantiation and the conduct of the Jesuits; but the Editor of the Christian Advocate, calculating on the ignorance and prejudices of his readers, knows no better argument to lead the van against Transubstantiation, than the stale repetition of the stale calumny, that the Jesuits hesitate not to use any or every means to accomplish their ends.

The order of Jesuits did not exist before the 16th century, while Transubstantiation was always, as now, the doctrine of the Catholic Church; and yet the pamphleteer reasons with his usual recklessness;—The Jesuits teach Transubstantiation, therefore it is false doctrine. If this be not the meaning of the preface to the pamphlet, we do not know its drift or meaning. It is a species of reasoning well worthy of the Editor of the Christian Advocate, but after all, not conclusive, even in his own principles; for if the Jesuits use any, or every means, good and bad, to accomplish their ends, preaching the doctrine of Transubstantiation may possibly be one of the good means which they employ to accomplish those ends. So far for the Jesuits. We propose, on a future occasion to review the pamphleteer's arguments from Scripture and the Fathers; and here we should close our observations for the present, did not a tempting, interesting curiosity present itself, prominently, on the first page of the first chapter.

Let the queen of Ethiopia come from the south and hear the wisdom of this Solomon. "Transubstantiation," he says, "is one of the bulwarks of the Papal System. It has no foundation either in Scripture or reason; it is supported only by the assumed infallibility of the Romish Church." "The doctrine is so opposed to common sense, that were it not for the most indubitable evidence to the contrary, we should doubt that any man could believe it."

If this be not one of the Proverbs of Solomon, it certainly requires all the penetration of Solomon to explain it. Who ever heard of such a bulwark as that by which the Papal System is defended? There could not be a stronger illustration of the inconvenience of exalting persons of certain professions to the rank of preachers and Editors. If you translate a man who did not probably understand his first trade, from the quarter-deck to the pulpit, or to the chair of the Editor of a Religious Journal, you need not be surprised to hear him state, that a tenet of religious belief, which, has no foundation either in Scripture or reason, is the bulwark of the system to which it belongs. Oh! what a bulwark Protestantism has in the Editor of the Christian Advocate! We invite our Protestant friends to reflect well on this.—The doctrine of Transubstantiation is so opposed to common sense, in the judgment of the Editor of the Christian Advocate, that, had he not the most indubitable evidence to the contrary, he should doubt that any man could believe it; and yet it is the bulwark of the Papal System,—a system not only well defended, but which is daily supplanting all other systems of belief in enlightened England, so remarkable for common sense, not only in the minds of the ignorant and uneducated, but with the learned professors of Protestant Universities, with the Members of the House of Commons and the Peers of the realm, as well as with the sincere inquirers after truth in every walk of life, in every nation in Christendom. But why should we expect consistency from the advocate of falsehood, and above all, why should we expect it from the Editor of the Christian Advocate, who does not probably understand the use or meaning of even a ship's bulwarks.

* Max. 16. 15. † Exod. 3. 10, 13, 15.
‡ Rom. 10. 15

JOURNEY FROM CAIRO TO MALTA.

The following is an extract from a highly interesting letter from Rome, dated 30th April last, written in continuation of the journey which we published in our issue of the 3rd February last:

"We quitted Cairo in a pretty comfortable Nile boat, hired by us for our exclusive use. It took us four days to drop down the river and to pass the canal of Mahmoodecah to Alexandria. We might have gone much quicker, but as our trip between the banks of this classic river was a very agreeable one, we cared not about how long it lasted. Shortly before our arrival in Egypt the sluices connecting the Mahmoodecah with the Nile had been made available, so that we were spared the disagreeable loss of time and comfort attending the former transshipments at Atfé, not to mention the annoyances attending the engaging another boat. The passengers who go by the Egypt Transit Company, are conveyed in the short time of between 18 and 22 hours, but they must submit to the no small inconvenience of sleeping as best they can ensconced in some corner, or on their chair, or the table; and to be transhipped at Atfé, viz. the beginning of the canal, as the sluices are not broad enough to admit the passage of the river-steamers. I was very much pleased on seeing one of the canal-steamers shoot by us, as they are propelled by the Archimedes-screw. We landed in Alexandria at the time of a most dreadful shower of rain, and were conveyed by one of the six or seven coaches, of which the Pasha's dominions can boast, to the French hotel of this quondam mistress of the Mediterranean. Ibrahim Pasha and the Christians have turned Alexandria almost into an European town. Some of its buildings are very pretty and extensive, and the town is daily still more improving, together with its commerce, which at present is pretty considerable. Mons. Perpetuo, the Apostolic delegate of Egypt, is now building a very pretty new Catholic Church, which will, at least for a time, fully answer the demand of so extensive a Christian population, as resides in Alexandria, but moreover become an ornament to the town. As you are aware, he has called over to his assistance the Lazarists, and the Sisters of Charity; the former for the education of youth, and the latter for the care of the sick. We trotted about the place on donkeys, as usual, seeing its interminable ruins, Pompey's Pillar, Cleopatra's Needles, the Ports, the Arsenal, the Pasha's Palace, &c. &c. We took our passage on board the French Steamer "Scamander," and would have had to start on Sunday morning the 8th of January, but as it blew a hurricane, we had hard work getting on board towards evening, and were not under steam until next morning. Early the following day we made Candia, and on Wednesday evening, after having passed through the Grecian Archipelagos, we cast anchor in the harbour of "Syra." Candia was capped in dark, thick thunder-clouds, and looked very much as if it really had been the birth-place of "Jupiter Tonans." All the time we sailed through the kingdom of Greece, the weather was cloudy, chilly, drizzling, and stormy; in short so bleak and uninviting, that even our veneration for antiquity could hardly prevail upon us to expose ourselves upon deck, in order to get a peep at Naxos, Paros, Delos, or the like places, hallowed by ancient superstition, art, or history. In "Syra" we were shipped off to perform what is called "the quarantine." They say, that a leap from the Leucadian rock was a probable remedy for a certain disease of the heart; but I am sure that a fortnight's quarantine in "Syra" would be a certain cure to any mortal infected with the "Greeco-mania." Our classic "Scamander" was not sure whether she would go to Malta; thus in order to cleanse ourselves and our baggage, to fit us for the next steamer from Constantinople to Malta, we were just ready to undergo the so called "spoglio" (viz. being scrubbed in a warm bath, and having every article of our effects taken out and smoked for 24 hours) when a boat arrived to fetch us back on board the Scamander, which had been ordered to sail for Malta the next morning.

Early on Friday, 12th January, we were under weigh again, and came in sight of the eastern coast of Peloponessy on Saturday afternoon. The mountain tops of Argos were snow-capped, which was the first time — and — gazed upon such a phenomenon. We made Malta late the evening of the Sunday following, but as the weather was rather boisterous, we did not run in until Monday morning. We landed immediately, and were most comfortably lodged for 12 days (the day of arrival in and of departure from the establishment included) in the famous Malta "lazzaretto" I doubt not the best in the world. The sanitary regulations here are very reasonable, and very strictly enforced. Our stay in Malta (out of quarantine, which we were almost sorry to leave) extended no longer than 9 days, a time quite sufficient to inspect all that is worth seeing in this pretty little Island. Your compliments to the worthy Father Esmond were duly delivered to him. He made me once preach instead of himself; but the event shewed, he would have done better to leave me alone. Valetta, with its two exquisite harbours, its tidy straight streets, its magnificent churches, made my worthy travelling companions stare with wonderment. St. John's Cathedral struck them with a pleasing religious astonishment. This Church is magnificent, yet not unrivalled; but I assure you there is no church in the whole world with a more splendid and costly pavement, than this glorious temple of the Knights Hospitallers. Thanks to the liberality of the Government, it at present undergoes a thorough repair under the judicious and clever superintendence of the pious Mr. Hyzler, an artist of no ordinary merit. Of course we visited the Palace of the old Grand Masters, now the Government house, and were much pleased with its rich, interesting and well-arranged armory. The coats of mail, which once glittered upon the valiant Knights of St. John, are here preserved with praiseworthy, almost with religious care. Among them I could have almost kissed that which once belonged to the indomitable, the invincible La Valette, whose iron courage made 25,000 Turks bite the dust. A great number of little brass cannons, matchlocks, standards, &c. which the brave Knights carried off as trophies of their several victories, are no less instructing than curious. In short a visit to this beautiful armory, where ancient and modern weapons are mixed in such pleasing variety, does more than repay one's trouble. One day we spent in going to Civetta Vecchia (the old town, the capital of the Island before La Valette was built) and inspecting the old Cathedral and the Catacombs. If I mistake not, it is said, that the former was built upon the spot where the house of St. Publius stood, whom St. Paul cured during his stay in Malta. Not only in regard to architecture, but also to its numerous and beautiful frescoes, it is superior even to St. John's. Its wardrobe is very rich, and contains, amongst a great number of very beautiful things, an ivory crucifix presented to the chapter by Pope Pius VI. It was carved by the famous Ribeira, commonly called "Spagnoletto," and is a work of prodigious beauty and perfection. The view from the terrace of the chapter-house is most enchanting. The eye lingers with delight upon a scene of such multiplied beauties. The whole island of Malta with its hills, towns, casals (villages) bays, harbours, and little groves, bounded on every side by the heavenly blue Mediterranean, lies extended beneath one's feet. Towards the North-east direction the harbour in which St. Paul suffered shipwreck is conspicuous, near to which is the bay in which the Neapolitan auxiliaries landed, who raised the famous siege of Malta and drove the Turks from the island. With what fervorous feelings we contemplated such hallowed spots, you may easily imagine. Further off to the North the barren Lumino and the fertile Gozo are visible, and I was told that, on a clear day, even Mount Etna can be distinguished. Descending finally from our lofty position, we went to inspect the "grotto of St. Paul," which, as tradition has it, served the glorious Apostle of the Gentiles as his usual retreat for the performance of his devotional practices. A place so sacred and so dear to the Christian heart, has been enclosed by a very pretty little Church, the sacristan of which is the usual guide to the not far distant catacombs. These surprising subterranean passages and rooms, hollowed out of the soft Maltese rock, we entered with lighted tapers in our hands. That part of them which at present is shown to strangers is comparatively very small, as the greater part was walled up, in order to prevent any more loosnings of the road in such an interminable and dark labyrinth which now and then have happened, and proved fatal. What such gigantic works were first intended for it is difficult to conjecture, who executed them, is certainly beyond the reach of historical records. On our return to Valetta, we passed casal Mosta, to inspect the new Church which is in course of erection there. It is built upon the plan of Agrippa's famous Pantheon, and is almost finished. The zeal and magnificence wherewith this splendid building is carried on, are indescribable, and it rejoiced my heart to see that a small Christian village was capable, not only of rivalling, but, according to my humble opinion, even of out-doing the most magnificent temple, which the most refined era of imperial Rome has left us. Well satisfied with that day's excursion, we returned to Valetta; the extraordinary kindness of some of whose most respectable inhabitants, afforded us much pleasure during our short stay. The Protestant Church there is almost terminated, and is to be styled "St. Paul's" of Valetta; it is somewhat in the Grecian style of architecture, its portico had already once tumbled down, (which cost the life of many a poor labourer) and swallowed up an immensity of money. Anxious to arrive in Naples yet sometime before Lent, we bid farewell to sweet Malta, embarking in the pretty Neapolitan steamer "Herculanum" (Ercolano), which steered out of the great harbour about 11 o'clock p. m. of the 4th February last. I kept on deck, enjoying the bright moonshine and the gradually disappearing light-house of Malta.

MAGNA CHARTA.—INCARCERATION OF O'CONNELL.

The Overland Mail must have informed our readers ere this, that O'Connell, the great Advocate of Civil and Religious liberty, has been both fined and incarcerated, in defiance of the Magna Charta of British Liberty and of the Principles of the British Constitution. Perhaps a more fatal blow was never aimed at the birth-right of every freeman, since the foundations of our free Constitution were laid in the mutual ratification of Magna Charta by the monarch and the representatives of the people on the plains of Runnymede, than has been inflicted on the liberties of every Briton by the injury done to the integrity of trial by Jury in the person of O'Connell.

If a party have it in their power to deny to a British subject in Ireland, a fair trial by a fairly constituted Jury, such as the law guarantees, the same thing may be done in England when it is found convenient; but, at all events, no one will deny that the precedent is as dangerous as it is unjust, and that the more tamely it is submitted to in one instance, the more likely it is to be repeated in another, and if these things may be done in the green wood, what will not be done in the dry? If illegal aggression, like this, on the liberty of the subject be tolerated in Great Britain, what is to become of the liberties of her Colonies and dependencies? The case comes home to the heart of every British subject:

if O'Connell can be tried unfairly and condemned unjustly, what security is there for the liberty, the life, the property or the reputation of any other British subject?

We understand, and we rejoice at it, that the matter is understood in its proper light by the public in Calcutta, and that a heartfelt, wide-spread sympathy for the sufferer as the representative of liberty, is both felt and expressed. Trial by Jury, the Palladium of British liberty, is at stake; the right of every Briton has been violated in the person of O'Connell, and we need not be therefore surprised, that British Subjects of all creeds, religious and political, sympathise with the sufferer, in Calcutta as well as in Great Britain and Ireland, and are anxious to express their sentiments in the most significant and impressive manner in their power. Lord John Russell, the worthy representative of British freedom and legislative wisdom in England, has declared repeatedly, that O'Connell had not a fair trial, and that there should have been a different jury, a different verdict, and a different charge from the judge. Sir T. Wille, one of the greatest law authorities in England, has proclaimed that the administration of the law was disgraced, and the purity of justice outraged by the constitution of the Jury and the partiality of the Judge, and one of the twelve judges who sat on the case in question, gave it as his opinion, that the traverset was entitled to another trial on account of the irregularity and injustice of the mode by which he was brought in guilty. A Protestant Gentleman in Calcutta, has requested the Most Revd. the Archbishop Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, to open a Subscription, to give the public an opportunity of testifying their sense of the outrage offered to liberty in the person of O'Connell, and put himself down for 50 Rs. We are glad to be informed that this suggestion has been adopted by his Grace, the Archbishop, who has also offered his own subscription of 50 Rs. and we have no longer any room to doubt, that as much public spirit, as marked a sense of public wrong, and as strong a love of liberty will be manifested on this occasion in Calcutta, as at any former period. Calcutta has been always foremost among the great cities of the Indian Presidencies, whenever a great and good cause demanded a strong manifestation of independence, generosity, and intelligence, and we cannot fear that it will lose its proud pre-eminence on this occasion, when the cause which claims our sympathy, our voices and our subscriptions, is the integrity of trial by Jury,—a question in which every one of us is equally interested, whatever may be his political or religious principles.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE, INTALLY.

A beautiful, splendid engraving of the Sacred Heart of Jesus has been presented to the Chapel attached to St. John's College, Intally, by G. Casella, Esq. Consul of Sardinia.

THE RIGHT REV. DR. OLLIFFE.

We are informed that His Grace the Archbishop has received a letter stating that Bishop Olliffe and party sailed from Portsmouth in the Seringapatam on the 21st May last.

THE RIGHT REV. DR. BORGHI.

Extract from a letter addressed by the Right Rev. Bishop Borghi to the Most Rev. The Archbishop Vicar Apostolic of Bengal.

"I am happy to inform your Grace that His Holiness was pleased to promote my unworthy person to the rank of Bishop Assistant to the Papal Throne, and to give me a present of a crucifix and a large medal, both of silver. He encouraged me also in the most affectionate manner to continue my poor exertions for the welfare of my mission. He imparted his blessing to the flock confided to my care, assuring me that he entertains a particular affection towards the Christians of India.

"When at Naples, I met a very good reception from His Majesty, who gave me the honorable commission to kiss His Holiness's hands in his name. My Sovereign, the Grand Duke of Tuscany, also has treated me in the most kind manner, placing me at table between the Grand Duchess and the hereditary Prince his son."

We extract the following from the Tablet of the 11th May:

THE CHURCH IN AGRA.—The Right Rev. J. Joseph A. Borghi, Bishop of Bethsaida, and V. A. of Agra, in the Vicariate of Thibet and Hindoostan, has announced his intention of visiting Ireland early in the ensuing summer. During his stay in the sister kingdom, his lordship (who is a member of the Capuchin Order) will sojourn with his confrère and former fellow-student, the Rev. J. L. O'Riordan, of Cork. Dr. Borghi's partiality for Irish missionaries has prompted this visit to Cork, whence some of the most zealous labourers in the arduous vicariate of Agra have been hitherto obtained. We have reason, too, for believing that one of his lordship's earliest and most interesting college recollections will be gratefully revived in his approaching and most welcome visit to Mr. O'Riordan, who is already empowered by the good bishop to treat with candidates, and upon the most encouraging terms, for his distant and truly laborious mission. We need scarcely add, that his lordship and all who sympathise with him have our best wishes for the edifying result of his expected visit to Cork.

CHURCHES AT ROME.

Extract from a letter just received from Rome.

"But Rome, eternal Rome, in spite of everything morbid and diseased in the traveller, wins him with an irresistible charm. Her Churches are indeed marvels, they show at a glance the omnipotent power of her Faith. No cost nor labor is deemed too great to be devoted to the worship of God. Paintings and Statues, Columns and Vases of precious marbles, mosaics and carvings are seen in the most amazing abundance. I do not speak of St. Peter's or the other great Basilicas and known Churches of Rome. They are indeed unapproachable in grandeur, richness and finish—but I allude to many of the smaller temples resplendent with gems in the several departments of painting, sculpture and mosaic—each of these would be a precious jewel in Calcutta, worthy of a pilgrimage from the remotest parts of India. But if the Churches of Rome are costly and beautiful, the people, generally speaking, are worthy to possess them. They are remarkably pious and devout; enter a Church when you will, you are sure to find some humble suppliant prostrate at the foot of the altar wholly absorbed in devotion and regardless of the people around and about him. The Confessionals are always thronged, and you see the fruit of this devotion in the absence of all violent disorder and confusion, in the general good conduct and polite behaviour of the inhabitants towards strangers, and I believe, in the contentment of all classes with their condition.

"The Countess and I, with Dr. B. had the honor of being admitted to the presence of his Holiness, who received us most graciously, enquired how we liked Rome, and how long we meant to live in it, expressed his surprise at not having seen me in St. Peter's on Palm Sunday, to receive the palm from his Holiness's hands. This omission on my part was owing to my disinclination to appear in shorts, without which no person is admitted. At parting the good Pontiff placed both his hands on my cheeks, expressed his pleasure at having seen us, and condescendingly signified a wish that we would repeat our visit."

CONVERSIONS.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

DEAR SIR, —Some time ago the Christian Advocate, after having, as usual, poured out in a very characteristic article, his gall against the Catholics, entreated all Protestants, no matter of what denomination, to make the encroachment of Romanism on the Reformed Church, and on the Protestant Mission, a subject of special prayer, and to redouble their efforts in spreading the word of God, that sword of the spirit, before which neither the devil, nor his emissaries (!!!) can stand. But it is evident that their prayers are utterly unavailing, for the Catholic Religion is still making rapid strides. Protestants of every creed, as well as heathens, are daily and every where embracing the Catholic faith, in spite of the calumnies and misrepresentations, with which its enemies endeavor to vilify and destroy it. I remember having read in a work of a Protestant traveller in North America, that in the course of twenty-five years the United States will be exclusively Catholic. What imperative motive for us to sing hymns of glory, and thanksgiving to our Lord! What despair for the well paid and fat Parsons! I would advise the Christian Advocate and his adherents, since the Almighty is not moved by their warm supplications, to try, at least in this urgent and important circumstance, the intercession of their "Holy" Reformers, Martyrs, and Confessors, of Martin Luther, and Cranmer, and to trust them with the support of their work.

Yesterday a very edifying scene was witnessed in the Parish Church of the Sacred Heart of Durrumtollah. Two Protestants, who had been duly instructed, abjured their errors, were conditionally baptized, and received into the pale of the Roman Catholic Church by the Rev. E. Varallé.

I am told that the New Mission at Cowcolly and adjacent villages, blessed by God, promises a rich harvest. Several families (about one hundred and fifty souls) dispersed in four villages, have lately applied to the Rev. E. Varallé for instruction,—a Catechist has been appointed, and seventeen infants were regenerated by the holy waters of Baptism.

I cannot pass over a remarkable instance worthy to be here mentioned both for the edification of the Catholic world and for the regret of the Christian Advocate. In a village on the south of Calcutta there are, I am informed, many Anabaptist families, all of whom manifested the most earnest desire to be instructed in the Catholic faith, except their Anabaptist Catechist; but while the blindness of this poor Catechist is to be pitied, he, for the present, is yet no great loss to us, being one of those good natured men, who have two wives at once, and this, I suppose, by the special license of the Christian Advocate, such as that which the Landgrave of Hesse had from the Austin Monk.

ANGELUS.

23d July, 1844.

THE SUFFERING CATHOLICS AT GWALIOR.

TO THE MOST REV. P. J. CAREW,
Archbishop of Edessa,
Vicar Apostolic of Bengal,
Calcutta.

MY DEAR LORD,—I have now the pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of the two remittances you have made of Co.'s Rupees Three-hundred, (300,) to be distributed to the poor and destitute Christians of my Congregation, and with whose circumstances you have previously been made acquainted. Permit me, at their earnest request, to return you their grateful thanks for the warm advocacy you have taken on behalf of their embarrassed condition and for the timely support you have so humanely (through the aid of a kind and benevolent Public,) contributed towards their relief. They, with their devoted Families, will unceasingly and fervently pray for your Lordship's continued health and prosperity, and with unfeigned regard, believe me to remain,

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most obd. servt.

FR. FELIX, OF TURIN,
Catholic Missionary, Capuchin.

Gwalior, Lashkur, }

8th July, 1844. }

Further remittances to the extent of Co's Rs. 400, have since been made.—Ed.

THROUGH THE REV. FATHER BOCCACI, BERNAMPORE.

Major General Raper,	100	0
Rev. C. Boccaci,	5	0
J. H. Money, ...	5	0
A. Protestant, ..	10	0
W. Winchester, ...	10	0
Another Protestant,	10	0
L. Tiery,	10	0

THROUGH REV. P. BARBE, CHITTAGONG.

T. C. Scott, Esq.	10	0
R. Ince, Esq.	10	0
H. Ricketts, Esq.	10	0
J. Wheeler, Esq.	10	0
A. Sconce, Esq.	10	0
S. Buller, Esq.	5	0
F. Elson, Esq.	5	0
Mrs. V. Bruce,	10	0
Mr. J. D. Freitas,	5	0
" J. Pereira,	5	0

Stainforth, Esq.	10
Mrs. M. Jackson,	2
Mr. A. B. Freitas,	2
Mr. Edward,	2
P. J. D. Lalgado,	1
B. Vaz,	1
Mrs. Pereira,	1
Collection,	8
Rev. P. Barbe,	5

THROUGH MRS. CAPT. FITZSIMON, AT BISH- NAUTH.

J. Davies, Esq. M. D. Tezapore,	16	0
Lat. L. P. Faddy, 29th N. I.	10	0
Capt. and Mrs. Fitz Simon,	20	0

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

Mrs. Foley, Dum-Dum, through Rev. Mr.

Mascarenhas, 7

Mrs. Mark D'Cruz, through Rev. Mr. Ve-

ralle 1 0

Mrs. C. Bryant through ditto, 2 0

A Layman, 16 0

THROUGH MR. N. O'BRIEN.

A Friend to the Orphans, 10 0

D. B. 1 0

W. D. S. 5 0

Another Person, 0

A Friend, 0

Ditto, 0

A. B. 0

A Friend, 0

P. S. L. 0

T. F. 2 0

O. S. S. 5 0

Manchester, 1 0

R. K. Bailie, 1 0

H. D. M. 2 0

Thomas Jewell, 5 0

J. Strick, 5 0

E. J. Carrick, 3 0

A. C. 2 0

F. J. M. 4 0

G. D. 2 0

G. Gale, 1 0

J. M. Mathieson, 1 0

A Friend to the Poor, 1 0

FESTIVALS.

Thursday, August 1,—St. Peter's chair d. gr.
com. &c.

Friday, 2,—St. Alph. Liguori B. C. D. com. &c.

Saturday, 3,—Finding St. Steph. first M. sem.

Sunday, 4,—After Pent. 1st August St. Dominic
C. D. com. sem.

Monday, 5,—St. Mary ad Nives, d. gr.

Tuesday, 6,—Transfiguration of the Saviour. gr.
com. &c.

Wednesday, 7,—St. Catetan, C. D. com. &c.

Thursday, 8,—S. S. Cyriac and com. M. M. sem.

Friday, 9,—S. S. Nazar. and com. M. M. sem.

Saturday, 10,—S. S. Mary com. vig & H. M.

Sunday, 11,—St. Laurence, M. d. 2. cl. is already ch.

Selections.

THE CHRISTIAN BROTHERS IN DUBLIN.—It gave the lovers of real practical and religious education considerable pain to find that, owing to circumstances which came on them by surprise, the Christian Brothers, some days since, were constrained to close their schools in East Hanover-street, where, for upwards of thirty years, so many thousand children received the blessings of a most solid and valuable education. To remove misrepresentation, it may be well to state what led to this resolve. The house and adjoining grounds in Hanover-street were let by lease to trustees, his Grace the Archbishop, James C. Brown, Esq., P. Boylan, Esq., C. Toole, Esq., and J. Sweetman, Esq., from 1812, at the very high rate of 120l per annum. Whatever might have been their value then, from the wear and tear of the building, and from the depressed state of such value in that part of the city, they might be considered now worth not above the one-third of that sum. Fortunately for the Christian Brothers, although, perhaps, unfortunately for himself, the trustees had a portion of the concerns and grounds let to a Mr. Walsh for 80l Irish, which he reluctantly paid, because too high, till last year, when he departed this life. With his death the 80l died, and as the Christian Brothers could not meet such an enormous sum as the whole 120l, they had no alternative but to leave the school, as they could not afford more than the 40l per annum, which was not accepted.—Tablet.

WEST INDIES.

The last mail brings gratifying news from this part of the world. The Trinidad Standard, of the 22nd of January, thus speaks of the noble conduct of the Catholic clergy in reference to the all-important question of slavery in America:—"We have much pleasure in directing the attention of our readers to a long extract from the New York Herald, commenting upon the Catholic Church with reference to slavery in the southern States, and in observing the noble stand taken by the clergy of that Church in opposing it. The condemnation of the New York Herald is their highest commendation; and, to our mind, that slavery advocate, James Gordon Bennett, could not have pronounced a higher eulogium upon the Catholic Church than when he styled it an 'Abolition Society.' Such should, undoubtedly, be the designation of every Christian church; but we blush to own that there are some who have not merited the designation. May they be excited to emulate the splendid example now afforded them, and may the Catholic clergy be enabled to persevere in their career, and, under the Divine blessing, to advance the great cause of the abolition of slavery in the United States." This eulogy is the more valuable as it proceeds, so far as we can judge, from a journal conducted by Protestants. But Protestants, at last, are beginning to see who are the real benefactors of mankind, and the real advocates of freedom.—The

IRELAND.

(From the Calcutta Star.)

The following letter is from a Dublin Correspondent who begins it in the early part of May and ends with the close of the month:—

"Political matters remain in statu quo: the Repeal Rent for the first week of this month exhibited a remarkable falling off, only amounting to £200: but owing to a stirring appeal from Mr. O'Connell, it rose on the following week to £436. My last communication announced the postponement of the judgment, in the case of O'Connell and the other Traversers; as will be seen below, the judgment has since been pronounced. On Thursday, the 9th instant, Mr. Hume brought forward his motion in the House of Commons for the abolition of the Office of Lord Lieutenant of Ireland: he was very efficiently seconded by Captain Bernal, and the whole tenour of the debate showed, that both parties are inclined to get rid of this anomalous office. It has caused much sensation in Dublin: the Repealers, true to their creed, are against the removal of the office, arguing that the absence of a Viceroy will give them less excuse for demanding a Parliament in College Green; but all moderate men of both parties are favourable to the abolition of the Lord Lieutenantcy, and the only question appears to be, when would be the proper time to get rid of the mock pageantry of Dublin Castle? The motion regarding the Chief Judge's conduct, when practising at the bar (with reference to his recommending the Corporation of Kilkenny to suppress some legal document, which might prejudice their case,) was brought forward by Mr. Butter, member for Kilkenny, but negatived without a division. Mr. O'Connell again made his appearance in Parliament, for the purpose of opposing Lord Elliott's Registration Bill; but owing to the postponement of that measure, he returned to Dublin three days after his departure: it is now certain, that the new Registration Bill will not again be brought forward this Session, it having met with equal opposition both from Conservatives and Repealers! Among the minor signs of the times we may mention, that the "Irish Metropolitan Conservative Association" has dissolved itself, and the premises in Dawson Street are now occupied by the New Irish Reform Club!

"The Registry in the city of Dublin has been progressing most favorably in the Liberal cause; universal apathy pervades the ranks of the Tories; they have either no men to bring forward to the registry, or those on whom they calculate, have no desire to be used as the tools of a faction.

"It is a curious fact, that whilst the Government are prosecuting the proprietors of the Nation newspaper, so great is the sale of this Repeal Journal, that the Post Office authorities have been compelled to provide an extra conveyance for the delivery of this very paper (the Nation) which now forms the subject of an indictment: thus the Government is placed in the position of disseminating the doctrines which it is prosecuting in the Court of Queen's Bench!

"The publication of the Quarter's Revenue shows the power of Father Matthew's exertions:

compared with 1842, there appears a decrease in the Excise of £10,000; no contemptible proof of the spread of Tee-totalism!

"Term commenced on the 22d, and as an indication of the growing intelligence of the Roman Catholics of Ireland, out of ten gentlemen who were called to the bar, seven of the number were Roman Catholics. When it is remembered, that fifty-one years since an Irish Catholic was for the first time admissible by law to practise the legal professions in his own land, this recent admission of Roman Catholic barristers will be looked on as a "great fact" in the history of national progress.

"On Friday, the 24th instant, on the case of the Queen v. O'Connell being called: the Court proceeded to give judgment on the motion for a new trial. Judge Perrin gave as his opinion, that evidence was sent to the jury, which it was neither legal nor proper to have admitted for the purpose for which it was used.

"Judge Crampton gave judgment against the motion for a new trial as regards all the Traversers, except the Rev. Mr. Tierney. Judge Burton gave judgment against the motion for a new trial, as regards all the Traversers: and Chief Justice Pennefather, having given a similar judgment, the Court has decided against granting a new trial. Another motion has been made on the part of the Traversers, "in arrest of judgment;" but the Court having decided that they would only hear two Counsel on each side, the motion has likewise been negatived by the Court and the final sentence may be looked for before this letter is posted for the East. Considerable anxiety is manifested through all parts of Ireland to learn the issue.

"The parish priests are indefatigable in their exertions to maintain quiet among their congregations; indeed, nothing but the influence of the Roman Catholic Clergy has kept the people within bounds; the military authorities are on the alert, and the whole country resembles one that is controlled by an army of occupation.

"It is but doing justice to the Repeal Association, to notice the fact, that they returned a Bill of exchange for the sum of £178 to New Orleans, because it was accompanied by an imputation upon the loyalty of the Repealers. The letter, which was sent with the £178, recommended the Irish people, in a certain conjuncture, to abandon their allegiance, and rest their hopes upon an appeal to arms. The Repeal Association, in consequence of this letter, decided on not receiving the contribution from New Orleans. This at least proves, that, whatever may be the merits of the Repeal question, it advocates only to recognise the principles of peaceful means, and agitation. Speculations for Rail roads are at present the order of the day even in Ireland. A new line has been planned between Dublin and Cashel; but it is feared that the political excitement which will arise on the incarceration of O'Connell, will have the effect of putting an end to all useful speculations for the present. In anticipation of a sentence of imprisonment, an address has been issued to the people of Ireland by Mr. O'Connell, conjuring them to preserve peace, order, quiet and tran-

He likewise declares his intention to present to the House of Lords, by a Writ of Habeas Corpus. There has been a large assemblage of people of all classes on the Quay before the Four Courts, but all remains quiet down to the present time.

"On the 30th, Mr Moore, Q. C., moved that the Court would postpone the carrying of sentence into execution, pending the proceedings on the Writ of Error; it was refused by the Court immediately. Judge Burton, who appeared to be deeply affected—why it is difficult to say—then delivered judgment on the Traversers, as follows: That Mr. O'Connell be imprisoned for the space of 12 calendar months, pay a fine of £2,000, and enter into security, himself in £5,000, and two securities in £2,500 each, to keep the peace for seven years! A noli prosequi was entered in the case of the Rev. W. Tierney.

"The other Traversers were sentenced to be imprisoned 9 calendar months, to pay a fine of £50 each, and enter into security in £1,000, with two securities in £500 each, to keep the peace for seven years.

"An application was then made to substitute Richmond Bridewell for Newgate, as the place of imprisonment, which has been agreed to, and the parties were immediately removed there, in custody of the Sheriff. On sentence being passed, Mr. O'Connell rose, and in an audible voice declared, that justice had not been done him in the trial. A tremendous burst of applause proceeded from all parts of the Court, which was repeated again, and again, in spite of the efforts to repress it. It is vain to describe the excitement which pervaded the hall and vicinities of the Court; the popular excitement is immense. On the Chief Justice leaving the Court, it was feared some rioting might occur, but no breach of the peace has been committed. As the Traversers were conveyed to the Richmond Bridewell, the wailings of the women resembled the wail at a funeral!

"Since the sentence has been pronounced, intelligence has been received from the more remote parts of Ireland; and we rejoice to say, no disposition to riot has shown itself. There can be no doubt this, in a great measure, is owing to the indefatigable exertions of the parish priests. As far as regards the Government of Ireland, it cannot be denied that Toryism has gained a triumph in the imprisonment of Mr. O'Connell, since it has achieved a victory over the popular feeling represented by him. It is useless to discuss the means by which that triumph has been obtained, in the lax morality of Tory politics; the end justified the means, and the end has been attained!

"A few words on the nature of the sentence may not be inappropriate. Had the trial been held on fair grounds, and the Jury properly constituted, the sentence of one year's imprisonment may not be considered an extraordinary punishment, or the infliction of a fine of two thousand pounds, is, to say the least, ill-advised; inasmuch as it holds out an opportunity for the people to testify their admiration for Mr. O'Connell, by subscribing the amount of his fine. This, there can be no doubt, will be done; indeed, subscription list has already been opened for the purpose. Again, the binding over Mr. O'Connell to keep the peace for seven years, is equivalent to gagging him for life; and the question naturally arises, what the Judges mean by keeping the peace, as no one has pronounced the Repeal meetings per se, to be breaches of the peace. On the whole, we consider Ireland, at this moment, to be infinitely more unsettled than it has been for the last twenty years.

"There may be no displays of popular feeling, but there is a deep-seated feeling of dislike to England, and English Institutions, growing up in the minds of the peasantry and middle classes, which only waits opportunity to take a tangible form."

THE INFLUENCE OF RELIGION ON IMAGINATIVE LITERATURE.

No. I.

In taking the most cursory view of the fields of literature, especially in its imaginative department, it would be impossible to compare the productions of Christian with those of Pagan genius, without being struck by the universal manifestation of the influence of Christianity over feeling and passion, over the yearnings of affections, the aspirations of hope, and the conflicts of emotion, as these have found expression in the poetic and romantic forms of composition. That which we owe to our holy religion in its morally regenerating operations, is of such immeasurable extent, that its more indirect and subtle influences,—the silent, though not less strong and concentrated action, by which its quickening spirit sends forth streams of healing and blessing over the domains of thought and feeling,—may be too often unperceived and comparatively forgotten. Didactic teaching may bring truth more forcibly and clearly before the mind, challenging the reason and conscience to bow down to its appeals; but what, we may ask, are the sources from which the intimate joys, the gleams and visitings, of the heart's sunshine, are drawn, for those whose habit it is to live among the "SEINGS OF THE MIND"?—are they not to be found in the eloquence of their voices, the heirs of genius and worshippers of truth and beauty, that come to us like gladdening breezes of spring-time?—are they not to be listened for in the tones that rise, like the song of a bird amidst the roaring of a tempest, in sweet distinctness above the surges of life, the turmoil of its sorrows and cares? Christianity has attuned those voices for us, adding strength as well as sweetness to their language; and the spirit of the Divine Regenerator has acted on the mind of man, with a brooding like that of the Almighty Dove over the waters of primeval chaos.

It is impossible that poetry should be irreligious, being the expression, if unconsciously, of a desire after the infinite; and whatever draws the affection to the infinite, must, sooner or later, find way in poetry. It has been said, "an irreligious poet is a monster," and surely in the very nature of poetry there is an attribute which must give to its wildest dreams even, and vaguest fantasies,—to its wanderings seemingly without aim or beaten pathway, amid the "chambers of imagery," surrounded by self-created forms of beauty, wildness, or grandeur,—a tendency towards that whose highest essence exists only in THE DIVINE. In the perception of this truth, we are easily led to the conviction which is its consequent,—that among all poets, from the first that struck the yet untutored lyre, to the gifted ones of our own age, a correspondence, a relationship of spirit has existed, asserting for these children of song the exercise of priesthood only next in sacredness to that of the altar of sacrifice. What is the office of a priesthood but the guardianship and strengthening of the tie by which man is linked with Deity?—and whether addressing itself to heaven or earth, in the functions of instruction or those of prayer and sacrifice, acting an intercessory part, to sustain the soul in fidelity to its high calling, by arousing its sense of that calling's dignity,—to bring down the fire from above to sanctify on the spiritual altar the offerings of the heart. And in this, is not the office of the poet of an identical, though less formally consecrated and separated nature? He also is the guardian of our admiration and worship of the pure and beautiful; the sustainer and quickener of our sympathies with all that raises us above selfish and sordid considerations; it is his to open our eyes to the presence of God in the universe,—of that which sanctifies, which gives life and radiance. There are minds informed with a passion for the Beautiful, which supplies the strongest and most constant motive of exertion to such, and becomes the source of all joy and energy: this, when favoured and developed by circumstance, and embodied in adequate action, asserts itself as the highest order of genius,—whether finding vent in the creations of the pen, the pencil, the chisel, or those of harmony: these, we may affirm, with all reverence, are the chosen of heaven, sent forth to carry out the gracious purposes of Providence; and amongst these we must rank all true poets, whether Pagan or Christian. DEITY has chosen many ways for manifesting itself on earth; but there is in the Beautiful, whether in the works of nature, in moral or intellectual forms, or abstractions, something that draws the affections, with tender but irresistible force, upwards to its throne; something that reminds us of a home, in which the thousand yearnings, the scarce definable bodings of the heart, shall be satisfied and stilled; a note that seems to call the exile back from his wandering to a haven of peace and love. This feeling it is our wish to attempt, however inadequately, to trace, as intimated in the poetry of Paganism, but obscurely and vaguely, as only fully developed and recognised in that of Christianity; endeavouring to show what the latter has done for imaginative literature, by fixing its attention on that centre of Infinite Beauty and Holiness, which formerly it struggled to reach, with almost unconscious aspirations after a goal too high to be reached, save on the wings of faith.

"The disproportion of human passions to their ordinary objects," says Coleridge, "is among the strongest internal evidences of our future destination; and the attempt to restore them to their rightful claimants, the most imperious duty and the noblest task of genius."

We cannot allow that this theory, as applied to poetry, was, or could be, carried out, before literature had received a hue from the reflection of heavenly truth; but may acknowledge that this was felt, though indistinctly, to be its highest office, as poetry rose in dignity, refinement, and influence; and that Christianity gave the happy consummation, the last perfecting touches, without which the whole fabric would have been imperfect, the harmony broken and incomplete. It has been like the centering in one focus the refractions of light, that otherwise would have sparkled only in fitful gleams, instead of uniting in a broad flood of radiance. The benefits we owe to Christianity, in this respect, are inestimable; we may trace to its influence in all true poetry an elevation and purity of feeling, which enlists our sympathies for the morally beautiful, the dignity of innocence, the sublimity of self-devotion, the heroism of affection, in a degree we may in vain look for from even the grandest and most faultless productions of heathen art. Poetry was given to keep alive our best sensibilities, our virtuous enthusiasm, our purest affections; to lead us to the Beautiful, as it is a manifestation of the Divine. A mind not become completely sordid shrinks from the degrading cares of common life, with the instinct that they are not its proper objects of regard; but in approaching the sphere of the beautiful, does not such a mind experience an elevation and buoyancy, bearing assurance that this is its true atmosphere, as if an electric chain were touched, calling into action dormant powers, high-wrought affections, and energies suppressed almost with pain, amid the stifling atmosphere of every-day life?

Among the ancients, religion, the religion which the affections work out for themselves, in the absence of higher sanctions of truth, must be sought for in the creations of art and poetry, rather than in the theories of the schools or the fables of mythology; as the idea of Beauty, of the highest justice and perfectness, more or less strongly, taking possession of every earnest and gifted mind. Religion and the Beautiful are so suited, that the whole class of emotions called forth by the latter belong to our religious nature. The contemplation of beauty and sublimity has the effect of lifting off from the mind what M^{me}. de Staël has characterized as "le poids qui se confond presque toujours avec le sentiment même de l'existence," and thus giving it a new elasticity and fervour. The perceptive power by which we receive such impressions from these objects, may be considered a link by which DEITY has allied humanity to itself, as a channel opened for access to at least the outskirts of its glory. The indications of this may be sought for not vainly in antique art and poetry, and the religion of the affections elicited by their investigation through the creations of imagination, the analogy of which with Christianity (a relationship like that between a nucleus in its first stage, and its subsequent development into fulness of life) may strengthen our conviction that it is in Christianity alone that every pure affection and noble impulse meets a field for its exercise, a recognition of its purpose, and a worthy object for its aims. Byron speaks of "The quiet feeling which first woke Song in the world."

Now this may be true in one sense; for it was no doubt the feeling of a want by which man was first led to give his feelings expression in poetry. Shut in and around by a constant pressure from the world,—a bondage to circumstance and care,—if he thinks and feels deeply, if he can look into the mysteries of his own nature, he must become conscious of something within his breast, finding no response in the inanimate world around him (inanimate even in its life) and which speaks to him of a home he has been exiled from, a capacity of self-elevation, which wants occasion to assert itself, a depth and strength of emotion, (for we may speak of emotion as a faculty of the mind) which finds no adequate object to expend itself upon. It is the purpose of art to satisfy,—at least to soothe the desires of our intellectual nature, and poetry, the first of the fine arts, has more especially this office to discharge. One might say, that metaphysics have preserved for man the idea of God, (we speak of course of ages anterior to Christianity);—Art, the sentiment of Him. We may believe this charge, of training the mind to the apprehension of His perfections, by leading it over “the steps and links for intercourse with Him,” if not actually to the vision of His glory—to have been expressly laid upon art, most of all on the poetic; unless it sinks altogether below its own essential character.

The quickening our powers of admiration and sensibility to that which is not only morally, but in any form, beautiful, ought to be the æsthetic characteristic of poetry, without which it may possess merits, but cannot be true to itself. Wordsworth says, finely and truly:

“We live by admiration, hope and love;
And even as these are well or wisely fixed,
In dignity of being we ascend.”

It is because these high faculties are suffered to be dormant, that so many sink into gloomy lassitude, and live on as if existence had nothing serious, nothing earnest, for the intellect and affections to expatiate on; submitting to a weary routine of days, months, and years, without anything but the little cares of the present and the near to absorb the attention. In such, the faculty of admiring has become extinct, till that of loving inevitably follows.

If the view of Paganism in its relation to Christianity offers so many points of interest, how much more interestingly may they be contrasted, when the latter is regarded in its only true and perfected development, as Catholicity. We are aware that this has been often made the ground of attack against some of the tenets and practices of the Church, which have been impugned, because presenting a correspondence with certain features of classic Paganism. The charge seems to us to betray a superficial, as well as unsceptical view of human nature; to proceed from an idea of its utter degradation, its absolute want of every element of goodness, by the all from original innocence. It does not follow that because opinions were false, as fostered by Heathen belief, that the feelings were also so, with which its dictates were obeyed, and its rites frequented. The objects worshipped may have been, as Revelation declares, not divine, but onia; but the religious life in man's heart must have been in action then not less than it is now; he had the same desires, hopes, and impulses; the same sensibilities to the good and noble; this nature not only experienced those wants which Christianity satisfies, but bore impressed within those convictions which it justifies and answers. It is the characteristic of true religion; but we are not obliged, in embracing it, to reject, but to receive; not to cast away anything that can have become necessary to the happiness, or establish itself in the affections of a nature not utterly depraved; but to open the mind to the complement of what can only have been possessed imperfectly before. If we have attached ourselves to anything not absolutely unworthy, we shall be sure to recognize that object, in its perfection, completed and beautified, but still in the nucleus the same, when we have entered the domains of heavenly truth.

As one amongst those, the right ideas of Paganism, we may refer to that of propitiatory suffering, and the efficacies of sacrifice; this is most frequently perhaps among all religious convictions, expressed in the poetry of Greece and Rome. It was felt that sin had created a separation between the Divine and human intelligences; and that a sin-offering was requisite before reconciliation could fill the gulf that yawned between. A melancholy consciousness of this debt seems constantly to have haunted the heart, before Christianity taught how and by Whom that debt had been paid. The existence of a state of purification, before the soul, after death, could be admitted to happiness, was another of those articles of Pagan faith, bearing such mysterious analogy with Catholic truth; as was also the belief in a connection between the living and the dead, by which the latter was accessible to the invocations of, and enabled to bear succour to, the former. We meet with prayers addressed to the dead in many passages of Greek tragedy, showing that the consolatory and touching persuasion of a tie continuing unbroken by death, was not, at least as regarded the earthly life of the survivors, unreceived by those who had no ground on which to build the hope of an immortal and heavenly reunion with the souls of their loved ones. It would be anticipating a work we hope at a future time, however inadequately, to undertake, to enter now on a more particular analysis of this subject, or call attention to the individual writers whose works may furnish our illustrations of the view expressed above. If able to pursue the subject further, we may show how Christianity has affected imaginative literature, in rendering it subservient to those high purposes which alone are worthy to dilate all our capacities for the infinite, and exalting it into an influence to lead us to the knowledge and love of God. What literature in this department was under Paganism, may be usefully considered as preliminary to this attempt.—Catholic Mag.

ROME.—The last accounts from Rome announce that the senior member of the Holy Conclave, Cardinal Pecca, had received the last sacraments, and was not expected to survive many days. The Cardinal was born on the 25th of December, 1756, and consecrated in 1801 by Pius VII.

NEWMAN'S SERMONS.

Sermons bearing on subjects of the day.

By John H. Newman, 1838.

(Concluded from our last, page 37.)

It is with reference to this point, that in a passage quoted already he speaks of the notes of the Church as being "going" further than they were already "gone" from the Anglican Establishment, inasmuch as the Jerusalem bishoprick, just set up when the sermon quoted was preached, tended further to remove the appearances of unity. On that senseless measure, he thus energetically pronounces his anathema:—

"May that measure utterly fail, and come to naught, and be as though it had never been!"—p. 379, note.

Alas! this is cursing, not merely the barren, but the withered fig-tree.

The superiority of St. Peter to the other Apostles is thus intimated:—

"So much is spoken in general; but next who are spoken of as the rulers in the kingdom, Christ's viceroys? the twelve Apostles, and first of all Peter. To him our Lord addressed these wonderful words; 'I say unto thee that thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven.'* By the 'Church' must be meant a community or polity of men, and you see that St. Peter had the keys of this Church or kingdom, or the power of admitting into it, and excluding from it; and besides that, an awful power of binding and loosing, about which it does not ^{be} within our present subject to inquire."—p. 249, 50.

He rejects the idea, so often repeated by writers of his school, Dr. Pusey not excluded, that the Eastern Churches form "branches" or integral parts of the one Catholic Church:

"Nor can we doubt that the merciful hand of God has before now dealt with man in those far-spreading communions, though heretical, which have so long existed in the East; yet it is a duty to leave them for the One True Church."—pp. 407-8.

Having thus laid before our readers the passages that have struck us most, as representing the writer's views on the subject of the Church, it will not be, we trust, uninteresting to select a few extracts containing concessions or approximations on other subjects, for those who may not have opportunity or wish to peruse the entire volume. I. That God, after remitting sin, reserves and exercises the power of punishing the sinner, is taught in the following passage:—

"Further, it must not be supposed, because sinners have sincerely repented, that therefore they have no punishment for their past sins; and this puts a vast difference between the state of the innocent and the penitent. In this sense they never can be on a level: the one, if God so wills, is open to punishment; and the other is not; for God does not so pardon, that He does not also punish. When his children go wrong, they are, in St. Paul's words, 'judged.' He does not abandon them, but He makes their sin 'find them out.' And, as we well know, it is His merciful pleasure that this punishment should at the same time act as a chastisement and correction, so that, 'when they are judged they are chastened of the Lord, that they should not be condemned with the world*.' But still their visitation is of the nature of a judgment; and no sinner knows what kind, what number of judgments, he has incurred at the hands of the righteous judge. I say that repentant sinners are in this respect different from innocent persons; that, it may be, God will bring punishment upon them for their past sins, as He very often does; and it may be God's will to make that punishment the means of their sanctification, as He did in St. Paul's case."—p. 23.

2. In a course of comparison between the marriage feast at Cana and the Last Supper, after many things to which we can give no assent, we have this conclusion with reference to the blessed Virgin. After quoting the promises to the Apostles that their prayers should always be heard—"Whatsoever you shall ask the Father in my name, He will give it you"—Mr. Newman adds, "In the gifts promised to the Apostles after the Resurrection, we may learn the present influence and power of the Mother of God."—p. 43.

3. Immediately after this, we have the following observations respecting the blessed Eucharist:—

"Such seems to be the connexion between the feast with which our Lord began, and that with which He ended His ministry. Nay, may we not add without violence, that in the former feast He had in mind and intended to foreshadow the latter? for what was that first miracle by which He manifested His glory in the former, but the strange and awful change of the element of water into wine? and what did He in the latter, but change the Paschal supper and the typical lamb into the sacrament of His atoning sacrifice, and the creatures of bread and wine into the verities of His most precious body and blood? He began His ministry with a miracle; He ended it with a greater."—p. 43.

And again, on the same solemn subject:—

"And the case is the same as regards the sacraments of the gospel. God does not make for us new and miraculous instruments wherewith to convey His benefits, but He takes, He adopts means already existing. He takes water, which already is the means of natural health and purity, and consecrates it to convey spiritual life. He changes the use of it. Again he selects bread and wine, the chief means and symbols of bodily nourishment,—He takes them, He blesses them. He does not dispense with them, but He uses them. He leaves them to appearance what they were; but He gifts them with a Divine presence which before they had not. As He filled the Jewish temple of wood and stone with glory, or its consecration; as He breathed the breath of life into the dust of the earth, and made it man so He comes down in power on His chosen sym-

* Matt. xvi. 18, 19.

* 1 Cor. xi. 32.

bolds, weak though they be in themselves, and makes them what they were not."—pp. 116-17.

4. The following beautiful passage expresses the preacher's ideas respecting the practice of corporal austerities:—

"This is to feed ourselves with fear. Thus let us proceed in the use of all our privileges, and all will be benefits. Let us not keep festivals without keeping vigils; let us not keep Easter-tide without observing Lent; let us not approach the Sunday feast without keeping the Friday abstinence; let us not adorn churches without studying personal simplicity and austereness; let us not cultivate the accomplishments of taste and literature without the corrective of personal discomfort; let us not attempt to advance the power of the Church, to enthrone her rulers, to rear her palaces, and to ennoble her name, without recollecting that she must be mortified within while she is in honour in the world, and wear the Baptist's hair shirt and leathern girdle under the purple ephod and the jewelled breast-plate."—pp. 138-39.

These extracts will suffice to show, how little we now need argue in favour of many important points, once subjects of serious controversy. They may serve as landmarks, at the opening of 1844, to show us how we stand controversially with the movement party in the English Church. Where we shall be at its close, God only knows. May He, before it, we earnestly pray, give grace to the writer of the volume, to wish that four of its sermons were expunged from its pages. We allude to those four in which Mr. Newman takes on himself the fearful responsibility of keeping men back from Catholic unity, in the communion of the Apostolic See. We have foregone controversy in this article; and therefore enter not upon his arguments, if they can bear that name. For they are in clear contradiction with his own principles,—putting individual "experience" above the teaching of "faith," and making a certain inward sense (the seat of private judgment and of every religious delusion), a surer test of truth than the great evidences and notes of the Church. In his own words, "may they utterly fail and come to naught, and be as though they had never been!"

Or rather, though we have no portion in the appeal, we will willingly, heartily, and affectionately join in the request, that closes the volume, by a farewell address, on resigning the living of St. Mary's:—

"And oh, my brethren, O kind and affectionate hearts, O loving friends, should you know any one whose lot it has been, by writing or by word of mouth, in some degree to help you thus to act; if he has ever told you what you knew about yourselves, or what you did not know; has read to you your wants or feelings, and comforted you by the very reading: has made you feel that there was a higher life than this daily one, and a brighter than that you see; or encouraged you, or comforted you, or opened a way to the inquiring, or soothed the perplexed; if what he has said or done has ever made you take interest in him, and feel well inclined towards him; remember such a one in time to come, though you see him not, and pray for him, that in all things he may know God's will, and at all times he may be ready to fulfil it."—pp. 463-64.

What God's will is, we Catholics cannot doubt. Let us therefore pray that the writer may have light to see it, and strength to accomplish it!—Dublin Review.

MISCELLANEA.

NEW ZEALAND.—The last mail brings me interesting intelligence from this distant mission. Letters under date 29th November last, from Wellington, Port Nicholson, arrived here on the 13th inst per Portsmouth. They are full of wants for the Catholic mission there, under the zealous and intelligent Capuchin Father, the Very Rev. J. P. O'Reilly. He feels consoled under the great pressure of his cares and necessities with the conviction that a number of his tried friends in Ireland will co-operate with the very humble, but ardent, friend of the mission, Miss Eliza Dowd, in raising a sum of a few hundred pounds for the expenses of the Church, for vestments, beads, crosses, prayer-books, catechisms, an organ, sacred music, and other articles necessary for Divine worship, and for the promotion of practical piety and religion. "I hope," says this good father, "under the blessing of God and the charity of our beloved countrymen, that you will be enabled to realise the sum of about 500*l.* to keep this poor mission, and to give me means of having a catechist to assist me in my humble, but glorious, exertions for the faith of Christ. I recommend you to our venerable hierarchy and clergy. Nothing but sheer necessity compels me to set you thus begging, though that state has been illustrated by Him who became poor to enrich us." He then gives, in mournful detail, an account of all the articles they require in these distant lands for the holy service of religion, which he fondly expects will soon be procured by the zeal and energy of the faithful lovers of the Cross; concluding by saying, "I leave to your own recollection any other little matters which you may think may usefully embellish the house of God. You may perceive the gist of my commission will, I hope, tend to that effect."—Tablet.

CONVERSION.—On the 2d May, Mrs. Ferguson, lady of David Ferguson, Esq., of Nelson street, Tipperary, was received into the Catholic church, at her own house, by the Rev. Thomas M'Donnell, O.P., of the Dominican convent, in this city. Mrs. Ferguson is daughter of the late John Fitzgerald, of Limerick, Esq., solicitor, and sister-in-law of John Ferguson, of Gardiner-street, Dublin, Esq., solicitor; and also of the Rev. Charles Ferguson, O.S.J.—Limerick Reporter.

PALTRY BIGOTRY.—Count V. Hardenberg, Hanoverian Minister Plenipotentiary at Berlin has been recalled by order of the King of Hanover. The reason for this, as has been already stated, is owing to the Count having embraced the Catholic religion. Count V. Hardenberg, two years ago, was Hanoverian Minister at the Hague, and at that period was observed to frequent the Catholic places of worship there, a report of which was then forwarded to the Hanoverian government.—Pilot.

CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

No. 5.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, AUGUST 3, 1844.

[VOL. VII.

THE HERETICS HAD NOT, AND COULD NOT HAVE MISSION FROM THE PEOPLE NOR FROM THE SECULAR PRINCE.

TRANSLATED FROM ST. FRANCIS OF SALES.

(Continued from our last.)

We contend that the pretended Church will never be able to show that her ministers have legitimate mission, either mediate or immediate, either in point of right or in point of fact, from the laity; for they have been sent either by the People and Secular Princes, or by the imposition of the hands of the Bishops who ordained them priests—a dignity to which they are at last forced to have recourse, although they avail themselves of every occasion to express their contempt for it. If they say, that they have been sent by Secular Magistrates and the laity, they will be under the necessity of establishing two proofs which are beyond their reach; viz. first, that Seculars have de facto sent them; and secondly, that they had the power to send them, for we deny both the fact and the right: factum et jus faciendi.

It is quite certain that Seculars had not the power nor the right to send them, for they will no where discover in the Scriptures, that the laity and Secular Princes have power to establish and constitute Pastors and Bishops in the Church; they will find indeed, we acknowledge, that the laity gave them their testimony and assisted at their ordinations; it will be found also that a choice was conceded to them, as in the case of the Deacons who, according to St. Luke,* were proposed for ordination by the whole body of the faithful; but it never can be proved, that the people or Secular Princes either possessed or assumed the authority of Missions, in constituting, ordaining, and authorising Pastors: and how, then, shall they allege a Mission from the people and from Princes, since there is no foundation for it in Scripture? On the other hand we can produce the express and general practice of the whole Church which has power at all times to ordain Pastors by imposition of the hands of other Pastors and Bishops; thus was *Timothy ordained, and even the seven Deacons† who had been selected and proposed for this purpose by the Christian people, but were ordained by the imposition of the hands of the Apostles; thus these same Apostles have regulated in their constitution‡ as well as the great Council of Nice§ which, it appears to me, no one will despise; the second of Carthage,|| the third and fourth also,¶ held in the same city, and at which St. Augustine assisted Suppose, then, that the reformers had been sent by the laity, they would not have been sent Apostolically nor legitimately, and their mission would be useless; and in effect, Seculars have not the right of mission, and how, then, could they bestow a religious authoritative mission. Could they communicate an authority which they did not possess themselves? It is on this account that St. Paul speaking of the order of priesthood and of the pastoral office, has well said,—"Neither doth any man take the honor to himself, but he that is called by God, as Aaron was."

But Aaron†† was ordained and consecrated‡‡ by the hands of Moses, who was himself priest, according to the inspired words of David:§§ "Moses and Aaron are counted amongst his priests and Samuel amongst those who invoke his name." Thus too it is clearly expressed in Exodus.|||| "Take unto thee also Aaron thy brother with his sons from

* Timoth. 1. 6.

† Can. 1.

 Heb 5. 4.

§§ Psal,

† 1. Timoth,

Can. 6.

¶ v. 8, 12.

‡ Acts 6, 3 & 4. &c

¶ Ibid.

†† Exod. 28, 6.

| Exod 28, 1.

* Acts, VI, 3, 4, 5 & 6

among the children of Israel, that they may minister to me in the priest's office."

In accordance with this, we have a whole multitude of the Ancient Fathers. He, therefore, who claims for himself legitimate mission, must not derive it from the people, nor from lay-princes; for Aaron was not called in this manner, nor the pastors of the primitive Church. "That which is less is blessed by the better,"* as St. Paul assures us, whence it follows that the people cannot give mission to pastors, for the pastors are greater than the sheep† and mission is never imparted without a benediction. St. John confirms the same truth in these words:‡ "Amen, amen dico vobis, non est servus major domino suo, neque subditus major eo qui misit illum." "Amen, amen I say to you, the servant is not greater than his Lord; neither is the Apostle greater than he that sent him." For after this magnificent mission, the people continue always sheep and the pastor always a pastor; otherwise there would be utter confusion. I pass by for the present, what I shall prove in the sequel, viz., that the Church is a sacred monarchy, and that it, therefore, belongs to the chief pastor, and not to the people, to institute missions. I pass by also the disorders which would result daily, if the people were to exercise that power, for it is clear they could not send, one the other, since they possess no authority, one over another. And since such a practice would open the door to all sorts of heresies, we must infer that the sheep are to receive a shepherd elsewhere than from themselves, and hence we must necessarily conclude, that the people had not the power to give a mission or legitimate commission to these new Ambassadors.

But I contend for the second point, viz., that though they should have the power claimed for them, they have not exercised it, because the people or the magistrate who called Calvin and Luther were Catholic or not. If it be said they were Catholic, how could they call them to preach what they (the people) did not believe. The people and the magistrate belonged to the true Church or they did not; if they did, why did Luther withdraw them from their faith; and was he called to be excluded from the pale of the Church? But if they did not belong to the true Church, how could they have the right of mission and of calling, since outside the precincts of the Church there is no legitimate authority? But if it be said, they were not Catholics, or not Roman Catholics, what were they, then? They were not Lutherans, certainly, for we know, that at the time when Luther began to preach in Allemagne, there were as yet no

Lutherans, since he was the originator of the sect. But if they were not of the true Church, then, they had no vocation from that quarter, and how could they establish a mission for the preaching of the Gospel, unless by having recourse to the invisible mission of these aerial principalities,* to these powers of darkness of the world; in a word, to those malicious spirits, against which the faithful children of the Church have always maintained a constant warfare.—(To be continued.)

THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE ON TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

Agreeably to the promise which we made in our last, we now proceed to review the Advocate's arguments from Scripture against Transubstantiation. We adverted, on a former occasion, to the hopeless inconsistency and ignorance displayed by the Editor of the Christian Advocate, in calling Transubstantiation one of the bulwarks of the Papal system, while he maintained that doctrine to be so opposed to Scripture and common sense, that it is next to impossible for any man to believe it;—we shall soon see that refined dishonesty may be combined with gross ignorance. "So difficult," he says, "do Papists find the task of replying to the objections brought against this doctrine, that they are ever and anon complaining of their opponents for mis-stating the doctrine of their Church. We are anxious to do them all the justice we can, to attribute no sentiment to them which they do not maintain, and, therefore, although it will occupy more of our space than we can well afford, we shall state the doctrine in their own words." This is delightful honesty and candour, and (what is still more imposing) he actually gives a long quotation from the decrees of the Council of Trent in explanation of the true belief of Catholics on this dogma of our holy faith. But this is all dishonestly and ingeniously contrived to lull his readers into a sleepy confidence in his candour, and to persuade them, that after quoting the Council of Trent, he could not possibly be guilty of mis-representation. Was the Advocate, therefore, satisfied that his readers should learn our belief from the Council of Trent? Not at all. He promised to state the doctrine of Catholics in their own words, but he takes the liberty of mis-stating it also, in his own.

In page two of the pamphlet, he represents the Roman Catholic as believing, that the body of Christ, by deglutition and digestion, becomes parts of his own body; and then adds—such is the doctrine of the Church of Rome. This is a positive, wilful mis-representation, for which we can see no excuse whatever; and if the Protestants of Calcutta have the smallest respect for the Rev. Mr. Boaz, they ought to call on him to retract what he has so injuriously mis-stated, or to produce the authority on which he rests the truth of the preceding statement of our doctrine. This he has not done in the pamphlet now before us; and no doubt, he did not produce it, because he could not.

* Heb. 7, 7. † John 20, 21, & 22. ‡ John, 13, 16.

* Ephes. 6 12.

The Catholic Church teaches that, the body of Christ in the Blessed Eucharist is liable to no substantial change, or alteration, or corruption, and that it remains under the consecrated species only while they are uncorrupted.*

Let us have another example of still more insidious dishonesty from the pages of the pamphlet. After long extracts from the Council of Trent, from a French Catechism published with the Pope's authority, and from Dr. Milner's End of Controversy, the state of the question is thus unfairly and falsely summed up by the pamphleteer.—“The question then between Papists and ourselves in regard to this matter, is simply this, are the bread and wine used in the Lord's supper so changed after consecration, that they cease to be what they appear to our senses, and become really and substantially the body, soul and divinity of Christ, so that the communicant receives into his mouth not bread, but human flesh, not wine, but blood.” Here it is insidiously asserted that Catholics believe, that the sacramental elements of bread and wine become, or are changed into, the soul and divinity of Christ as well as into the substance of his precious body and blood, by the words of consecration; and this piece of dishonest trickery he is guilty of, immediately after citing from the decrees of the Council of Trent, the very words which teach most clearly what Catholics believe; viz. that the consecration effects a conversion of the whole substance of bread into the substance of the body of Christ our Lord, and of the whole substance of the wine into the substance of his blood; that his soul exists likewise under both species, on account of the natural connection and concomitance through which the parts of our Lord, after his resurrection from the dead, are mutually joined together, and his divinity on account of its admirable hypostatic union with the body and the soul.

See how he labours also to infuse into the minds of his readers the gross ideas which proved a stumbling block to the Jews—by the words,—“so that the communicant receives into his mouth not bread, but human flesh, not wine, but blood,” as if the communicant believed it to be gross, palpable, and corruptible flesh, like mere human flesh, and not the spiritualised, glorified body of our Lord and Saviour. We should like to know if the Editor of the Christian Advocate believes that our Saviour's body is now glorified and impassible, capable of penetrating through a rock, without sustaining an injury or losing its nature; and if he do believe so, what an absurd or dishonest man he must be, to speak, after this fashion, of our Saviour's body. Let us now hear the reasoning by which he would dissuade us from believing that the words of our Lord and Saviour mean what they so clearly express (Matthew 26, 27 and 28) “take, eat, this is my body.” And again—“this is my blood of the New Testament which is shed for many for the remission of sin.”

“The Papist interpretation is irrational and contradictory,” says the Advocate,—“if we suppose it to be true, then it inevitably follows, that our blessed Lord held his own body in his own hands, break it and gave it to his disciples,”—“that his blood was shed before it was shed, that his body was broken before he suffered on the cross, &c.” Here is a pretty jumble of truth and falsehood, of barefaced misrepresentation and distrust in the power of God. It is true that our Lord held his body in his own hands and gave it to his disciples; (this is what St. Augustine declared more than 1400 years ago*) but it is not true that he broke it, for according to the words of the Council of Trent, quoted by the Advocate, “the entire Christ exists both under the species of bread and under each particle of that species,” and therefore, in the doctrine of the Catholic Church, when the species are broken, the body of our Lord is not broken.

There is no contradiction in saying that the blood of the Lord was shed in the sacrament of the blessed Eucharist before it was shed on the cross, since the shedding in one instance, was after a mysterious, sacramental manner; and in the other, after a tragical and visible manner. The Advocate's fine antithesis, therefore, is a flimsy delusion which may have amused the ignorant readers for whom he professes to write, but could deceive no one. Catholics believe that God is omnipotent, and that his love for man is equal to his power; and hence they believe he is able and willing to verify his words, when he says, “this is my body;—

* See, Bellarmine De Sacramento Eucharistiæ, and our Theologians passim.

* “Christ was held in his own hands when commending his body he said; this is my body. For he bore that body in his own hands.” St. Augustine in Psalm 38.

this is my blood of the New Testament which is shed for many for the remission of sin." but the Christian Advocate proudly limits both the power and the love of God, when he says, it is a contradiction,—an impossibility to God himself to whom nothing is impossible, that the body of Christ should be in several places at the same time.

Hence, in order to bring everything to the level of his own finite, crazy understanding, he looks out for figures and metaphors to explain what our Saviour meant when he said; "this is my body." "Figurative expressions," he assures us, "are common to all languages; indeed," he continues, "such is the paucity of words strictly commensurate with the ideas we intend to express, that we can give utterance but to a few thoughts without using words in a tropical or figurative sense." What does the man mean? Is it possible that the Son of God could not as easily say—This bread is the figure of my body, if he intended to give us nothing but a figure, which words, in that case, would be plainly and clearly commensurate with the idea he intended to express; as, to say, "this is my body," which words are not commensurate with the idea of Protestant belief, but are clearly and unequivocally commensurate to express the dogma of our faith?

But he will treat us to an example of figurative language quite in point. Let us have it. "Suppose," he says, "we were to point to the group of statues in the southern entrance of the Town Hall, and say, 'This marble figure is a Hindu Pundit,—that figure is a Musalman Maulavi, would any man in his senses imagine that the words used meant, these statues were living, active, rational beings?'" To this our answer is, that no man in his senses would imagine so, and we are strongly disposed to think, that the Editor of the Christian Advocate was not in his senses, when he imagined this to be a parallel to our Saviour's words. Those statues in the Town Hall are visibly and clearly artificial representations of a Hindu Pundit and a Musalman Maulavi; they have head for head, hands for hands, and feet for feet; even the nose, the ears, the mouth or the eyes are not wanting; scarcely anything is wanting but life, and as there is no violence offered to language in calling a dead body by the name of the living man, so neither is there, in the case of the statues. But there is no likeness between a piece of bread and a human body, and our Lord did not say this bread is my body, but, this is my body, which words, used by a God-man, on an occasion so solemn as the last supper, and when he was about to be betrayed into the hands of his enemies, cannot be understood, without violence to the usages of language, to mean anything else than the fulfilment of the promise he had previously made, to give us his flesh to eat and his blood to drink. Our Saviour promised (St. John 6, 52,) "the bread that I will give is my flesh for the life of the world," and again "my flesh is meat indeed and my blood is drink indeed," (St. John 6, 56,) and at the last supper, about a year after these words were spoken, he said, in fulfilment of his promise,—"This is my body."

(To be continued.)

"THE ADVOCATE, CATHOLIC HERALD AND TRUTH"

Under this head is an angry, ungrammatical article in the Christian Advocate of the 27th ultimo, in which the writer endeavours to repel the charges brought against him by our correspondent, Au Revoir and ourselves, in relation to an article lately published in the Christian Advocate, and headed—Specimen of Romish Religious Literature in Calcutta.

The Advocate calls to his aid the Free Churchman, and in proof of his innocence, taking his own word, which is not worth much, for the truth of all he states, has ascertained, that the apocryphal letter said to be written by our Saviour's own hand and now in circulation in Calcutta, was printed, not in America, but in India, and the Editor of the Free Churchman procured a copy from a Roman Catholic; whence, in the Logic of the Christian Advocate, it is altogether a Specimen of Romish Religious Literature.

It is quite certain, however, and the Advocate knows perfectly well, that the Apocryphal letter came from America to India in 1841 in an American Ship, and that several copies were directed to Madras and Calcutta; it is quite certain also that we denounced the letter when it first made its appearance in Calcutta, as an absurd composition, an evident forgery, which it was blasphemous to attribute to our Saviour; and yet that shameless man who edits the Advocate, is bold enough to call it a Specimen of Romish Religious literature circulated by Papists in Calcutta. But he says it is "A FALSEHOOD" that an American Missionary was the author or the sender of it to Calcutta, and calls on us to give the Missionary's name and the Agents in Calcutta to whom the papers were forwarded. We never pretended to know the Missionary's name, nor did we say he was the author of the letter, nor are we aware that the papers were forwarded to any particular agents in Calcutta for distribution, but we know that the papers came in an American ship to Calcutta, and it is, to say the least, very strange that now, when it is impossible to ascertain particulars, we are called on to produce them, whereas while the ship was in Calcutta, and when, several years ago, we denounced the forgery as coming from America, the Advocate and the rest observed a profound silence.

The Advocate calls our correspondent to an account for a mistake which he made in saying, that we attributed the authorship of the Apocryphal letter to an American Missionary, but as he, (the Advocate) does not find fault with our correspondent's allusion to the testimony borne by the Englishman to the lying character of the Advocate, we suppose it is all too true; and, therefore, we have the pleasure of transcribing it: "Nearly five years ago, the Editor of the Englishman declared, that for impudence and falsehood, no journal, not calling itself Christian, surpassed the Calcutta Christian Advocate."

LETTER NO. XIV.

FROM A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA TO HIS PROTESTANT FRIENDS IN EUROPE.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—Let me hope that you have, since I last addressed you, so "exercised" and so "swept your spirits," that you begin to view the Church of Christ with the pure and the jealous eye of Faith; jealous as to her beauty, to her purity, and to her harmonious union as the spouse of Christ, "one is my dove, my perfect one is but one, she is the only one of her mother," was Solomon's song; "fair as the moon, bright as the sun," he again describes her, and you know that St. Paul calls her, "the body of Christ." Will you not allow, then, that this Church must not only be "holy, without spot, or wrinkle," but a one united fabric; a Church which cannot be pulled down and re-built at man's will and pleasure; a Church that is not liable to the vicissitudes of earthly governments; a Church of which it is blasphemous to say "the Church is in danger?" Allow me to remark this is a human cry, for the safety of a human institution, and truly Protestant, the cry of terror; but the Catholic believes the Church rests upon "the rock," and is rivetted thereto by an omnipotent hand; that there she stands as "the Pillar and ground of Truth," and as man's everlasting light-house to the realms of bliss; will you tell me that such "a glorious Church" as this, the Church of all nations, is to be maintained or overthrown by the petty Courts of Sessions in Edinburgh, or is to be kept up by the law framed by the Parliament of England, or is to be shaken by the Conventicles of Dissent? Alas! what earthly shadows you fight and lose your precious time about; mere chaff that is blown about by every contrary wind. Look then to your own Kirk in Scotland, and her dissentients, and thinkest thou the Psalmist means her when he breaks forth into this eulogy, "Glorious things are said of thee, O city of God?" Were I to apply this to you just now in Scotland, you would feel it as ridicule, as bitter irony, for nothing is more galling than feeling conscious of being contrary to what is meant, when that purports any thing great, good, or beautiful; or how irreconcilably out of place would the prophesy of Isaias be, with respect to your state, when he tells us of the future spiritual kingdom of "the Prince of peace," in these remarkable words: "his empire shall be multiplied, and there shall be no end of peace;" or, as you have it, "of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end." Can you carry this home with you, for if this related to the Kirk of Scotland in 1844, or to Protestantism in general, the prophesy should be recorded, "his empire shall be diminished, and there shall be an end of peace," for is it not an undeniable fact, an incontestible truth, that that fair handmaid of religion, Peace, is flying further from Protestantism every day, and that, from its own brittle nature, and other corresponding causes, such as the continual action of Catholic truth, it is perpetually breaking up to pieces, just as the avalanche of mingled snow and ice which rests for a time on the mountain side, yields, from its fragile and changing nature, to the warm rains of heaven, and to the powerful rays of the sun? Come, then, my dear friends in the North, leave Scotland, leave your ruinous Kirk, and, in the words of Jeremiah the prophet, "Break up anew your fallow ground and sow not upon thorns," and while you trace your way South, view with me, if you will, the mighty Church of England, in England: contemplate her peace! Behold her unity!! What startles you? Heard you that mighty shout, so loud and so stern that you might well hear it re-echoed from the wild crags of the north? It is the voice of thousands embodying that of millions—it is a deputation of the boldest, the staunchest, and the wealthiest sons of the Church of England: five Dukes, eleven Earls, about a hundred members of both Houses of Parliament, and hundreds of other influential characters make up the list, and at what portal do they beat and thunder for admittance and hearing?—at the portals of the Tower of the Church of England; at the Head

Seat of her Divinity, Oxford University! Yes, your newspapers announce to us the astounding fact. It may well startle you. Read the reply to this address from the Warden of this Tower, of the Chancellor of this University, his Grace the Duke of Wellington, and the Vice-Chancellor, Revd. Dr. Wynter, and you may learn from it that the Protestantism of the Church of England is gasping for life. The English Record says of it, "That the Chancellor, Vice-Chancellor, and the Heads of the University of Oxford should, in framing their reply, on an occasion so public and important, studiously avoid giving any opinion good or bad, of the Tractarian system"—this is a solemn, and even an astounding fact. Truly when it is found necessary to call those at the helm, and the navigators to an account, there must be great danger apprehended for the safety of the vessel. What! peace, when there is mutiny on board! What! unity, when Oxford is rent asunder! You know better than I can tell you, that whole congregations of you now a days get up and quit the Church; that the congregation of St. Paul's Chapel lately addressed a remonstrance to the Bishop of London; saying in it, "we see less occasion to harass your feelings, and to widen that schism which your Lordship need not be told bids fair to shake to its centre the Church of England; it is notorious that the Episcopal Bench is divided in opinion on the doctrines contained in the Tracts for the Times." In another account, I read that the Parishioners of East Farleigh having addressed the Archbishop of Canterbury to the same effect, got an equivocal reply from his Grace, and which brought upon him a spirited rejoinder. As to the point, it matters not to us whether you be Puseyites, High Church, Low Church, or No-Church, you are one and the same to a Catholic,—Protestants: you are only different branches of the same family of disunion; some lower, some higher, up the tree. Puseyism after all may be but the acme of Protestantism; the Puseyite may have gone through all its different phases; he may have dived deep into its turbulent and muddy waters; he may have strayed over its barren fields, until at last he meets with nothing but brambles, thorns, and briars, and then returns wearied and fatigued, like a strayed sheep; and in this condition lays himself down outside the threshold of the Catholic Fold. In this position I view the Puseyite; he may feel at present satisfied and somewhat secure in being so near, under the outward shelter of her everlasting walls, and from which he may derive some congenial warmth; but oh! let him "Beware," the wolf prowls about outside; let him knock, and it will be opened; let him call and he will be heard; mercy and safety are within, peril and danger are without, the gentlest tap, a mere whisper, will open the Fold door,—so watchful, so merciful is that "Good Shepherd" that keeps ward at the Gate; for has he not said it, "other sheep I have, that are not of this fold; them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice, and there shall be one Fold and one Shepherd." And if they will but "hear his voice," hear his Church, his Pastors,—for does he not say, "he that heareth you heareth me?" If they will but come in, we shall soon behold a beautiful verification of that prophesy of Isaiah: "And the children of them that afflict thee shall come bowing down to thee, and all that slandered thee, shall worship the steps of thy feet, and shall call thee the city of the Lord, the Sion of the Holy One of Israel." Where is the Catholic heart, then, that does not feel the liveliest sympathy, the most boundless joy at seeing the mist raised by fanaticism gradually breaking up, and his wandering brethren approaching nearer and nearer to the Ark of Salvation, the Catholic Church? But I must not allow myself to stray away too far from my subject—Unity in the Church of England! The Rev. C. J. Yorke, in his printed address to the Bishop of London, with reference to his Lordship's Charge, and who is Rector in his Diocese, defines that, "High Church-men are those who consider the Church of England to be, as to its constitution, a divine thing, and Low Church-men those who consider it a human thing," and then he adds, "I would glory in the name of Low-Churchman, for the unwarrantable mixture of what is divine and what is human fills me with awe." Then he runs on with his commentary; "The second notion is that our episcopalian ministry is the sole channel of spiritual blessings; if it is sound, what an enormous load of guilt rests upon episcopacy; if it be sound all other Christian Associations and all other National Churches, are in a state of rebellion like that of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram; and certainly instead of reasonably expecting any spiritual blessings thereby, they ought rather to expect punishment far greater than those of the Israelites. We, in order to discourage one party, affix a brand of reprobation upon all other denominations." He calls this "a tremendous principle," certainly it is, and would carry "a tremendous" consequence, but not one iota more tremendous or more terrible than that which this text involves, "If he will not hear the Church, let him be to thee as the heathen and the publican." Christ no where contradicts himself, nor do I believe is St. Paul accused of falsehood, when he says, "that they who do such things—contentions, dissensions, sects, shall not obtain the kingdom of God." I leave it to you here to decide if St. Paul was a "Low-Churchman." An Advocate of a similar stamp, Rev. Carus Wilson, Rector of Whittington, in his "Thoughts on the Times," remarks, "another prevailing mischief is the spirit of exclusiveness which says that salvation is, to say the least very doubtful out of the pale of the Church." I know the clergyman who partly emptied his Church by the constant enforcement of his authority on the ground of Apostolical succession, and the abandonment of all dissenters to the uncovenanted mercies of God: I defy any one to prove clearly an unbroken line from the Apostles to the clergy of our Church; there is a universal Church of Christ throughout the world, consisting of the faithful, to build up and perfect which all the enclosures of separate communion are respectively the instruments." Another divine in India, and a man of some note, writes,—“We must give it as our firm conviction that more confidence for the issue of the present struggle (Tractarianism) is to be placed under God’s Holy Spirit, in the Presbyters and laity of the Church of England than in her Right Reverend Bench.” Thus “the enclosures” on the walls of the Fold of Christ, would be made mere cobwebs, so that all preachers of contradictory doctrines might stalk in; this, however, but ill accords with the Psalmist, “and he built his sanctuary as of unicorns, in the land which he founded for ever.” The foregoing are the “notions” of one party, the following are the opinions of the opposite side. The Rev. Hugh M’Neile, of polemical celebrity, in his published letter of August, 1841, and addressed to the Manchester Convention of Ministers of all sects, remarks, “in it, the address, you say, ‘for a while let us lay aside our sectarian and partisan differences, and to the hallowed ground of Christian charity assemble for the purpose of bettering the condition of famishing multitudes;’ in what you call our sectarian differences are involved all the eternal truths of the Christian religion; truths from which alone can emanate anything deserving the name of Christian charity; you must excuse me when I say, that I anticipate no benefit to the world, to their country, or to themselves, from a conference of men who stipulate for the exclusion, during their conference, of all the essentials of scriptural truth, under the name of sectarian differences; this is not too strong, for your printed address is ‘to the ministers of all religious denominations throughout the united kingdom,’ and no arguments are required to prove that their sectarian differences involve all the essentials of scriptural truth, including the inspiration of scripture itself.” Now bear in mind that this was applied to about 600 ministers of the Gospel assembled on that occasion, and that such are the sentiments of hundreds of your clergy, and of tens of thousands of your people; charity herself with wide and emaciated arms appeals in vain; such is the fruit of your principle, “wherefore by their fruit you shall know them.” The Rev. Leonard Howard, D. D. Author of the Royal Bible, (1761) makes the following observation: in one of his works he says, “how common is it at present for men to assume the title of saints to themselves and fix the character of reprobates upon others, to renounce the conversation, and brand them with such odious names as if they were not to be conversed with, and all this for no other reason but for not breaking the unity of the Christian Church, and joining with them in such fanatical notions as Christ never taught, and which, consequently, his Church can know nothing of. The covetousness of the Jews once turned the House of God into a den of thieves; but now the barbarity of some pretended sects of Christians has turned it into a den of Lions; if this is Christianity, how strangely it is altered since our Saviour’s time; and how very surprising is it, that men should pretend to the kingdom of heaven, by those qualifications which are the very properties of hell.” These Champions may be considered as the representatives of your contending parties, High Church and Low Church, &c. A talented Protestant writer in India in treating of this subject, in a recent article, makes this true observation, “Unfortunately it is not only dissenting sect against dissenting sect that dishonour the name of religion; the Church (of England) is never at peace with itself.” And Dr. Hawkins, Provost of Oriel, tells you, in his printed Sermon, under the sanction and command of the Archbishop of Canterbury, of Episcopacy as being the, “living centres of Christian Unity, yet presiding over Churches distracted with every form of disunion; nay sometimes even amongst their own ecclesiastics, scarcely able so to moderate controversy, as not to hasten schism.”

Yours Faithfully,

C. A. C

THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

To the Editor of the Bengal Catholic Herald.

SIR,—The Calcutta Christian Advocate has attempted to reply to your article anent the letter said to have been written by our Saviour. He asserts that the Tract was actually printed and circulated by a person known to be a Catholic.

I have no means at present to ascertain the truth of this assertion,—but granting, for the sake of argument, that a person calling himself a Catholic, had really been so ignorant of the principles of the religion he professed, as to have taken the said letter to be genuine, and in his blind zeal, to have printed and circulated it;—was the Christian Advocate at all justified in making the circumstance public in the manner he did? The foolishness, or rather the ignorance, of one man he brings forward as that of the whole body of the Catholics; and this he does with a perfect knowledge of the letter having been already publicly condemned by you as an impious forgery. The Christian Advocate's object in this instance, as in all instances that enable him to give some false colour to a subject in order to prejudice the Catholics, is too apparent to escape even the understanding of his own sect, however subject they may be to obtusion by their leaders. The Bengal Catholic Herald, the organ of the Catholics here, brands a production said to be a letter written by our Saviour, as a forgery and an impious and blasphemous composition. The Calcutta Christian Advocate, hiding his time and opportunity, and with a motive well worthy the enemy of Christianity, attempts, after a period when the condemnation of the production by the Catholic Herald is expected to have been forgotten, to palm it off as the production of the Catholics, — because, as he asserts, a person calling himself a Catholic does, in his ignorance of the Catholic religion, re-print and circulate the Tract!

I know of many Protestants,—Church of England-men and Presbyterians, who deny that the Bible is an inspired book,—who assert that there are passages in it unreasonable, incredible and absurd,—but I also know that these men so assert from ignorance and from want of a knowledge of the truth.—Shall I then be justified, on the principle of the Calcutta Christian Advocate, to make such declarations the basis of a general accusation against the Protestants as the abusers of the inspired word of God? Shall I be justified in designating the whole body of Protestants as villifiers of that very book on which they found the various and tortuous ramifications of their Creed?

The Christian Advocate should imbibe and practice the first principles of Christianity, charity and truth, ere he attempt to call himself a CHRISTIAN Advocate.

W. G.

30th July, 1844.

THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

To the Editor of the Bengal Catholic Herald.

SIR,—I had expected that your Christian Contemporary, the Advocate, would have come forward in a true Christian spirit to make some amends for publishing the impious letter blasphemously attributed to our Saviour as a Specimen of Romish Literature, but it appears that I gave the Editor credit for a greater share of the milk of human kindness than he merited.

The Advocate, with great simplicity, asserts that the object of my letter, “if it have any, is to disprove that the document in question has not been circulated by Papists in Calcutta.” Poor little innocent! His simplicity could not discover any other object but the one which suited his purpose best! Shade of Whitaker! Well have you exclaimed! “Forgery, I blush for the honor of Protestantism while I write it, seems to have been the peculiar disease of the Reformed! I look in vain for one of those accursed outrages of imposition among the disciples of Popery.” If there were an eminent and liberal minded Protestant Divine, like Whitaker, in this city now, he would doubtless have told the Advocate to doff his pretended simplicity and to refute, if he can, the clear exposé of AU REVOIR, whose object was not to prove that the “impugned article” was not circulated by Papists in Calcutta, but to manifest to the readers of the Christian Advocate that the Editor was deluding them into the belief that the document in question was a Specimen of Romish Literature, knowing at the time that the organ of the Catholic Community, The Bengal Catholic Herald, had already denounced it to be not only an IMPIOUS FORGERY, but that it would be blasphemy to attribute to our Divine Master such an absurd composition.

Even now the Advocate has not the candour to do justice to you and the Catholics of Calcutta whom he has maligned, by admitting (what every journalist, much less a religious journalist, would have done under existing circumstances) that he was wrong in designating the composition to be Romish Literature, the Catholic Herald having many months ago denounced it a forgery—but such, alas! is the PROTESTANTISM of the dissenters called INDEPENDENTS!

"Independents! Oh!—kind Heaven,
How apt the name—how justly given,
Of virtue and her works attendant,
Of truth and reason 'independent'
Of all the sects whose faith's a riddle,
Who wane and wander like the moon,
Who turn the Bible into a fiddle,
And set its texts to every tune,
None can such variations play,
None more intolerant than they."

Granting it to be true that a simple and ignorant Catholic, believing the letter in question to be genuine, had caused it to be secretly printed and privately circulated, for such the Advocate admits it to be in this case, is it just or reasonable that the entire body of Catholics should be charged with the folly of one of their brethren? Alas! Sectarianism has a different mode of thinking and acting, when Catholics are to be put down! Honesty and truth are lost sight of, when Catholics are to be maligned!

AU REVOIR.

30th July, 1844.

ANTIQUITY OF POPERY.

To the Editor of the Bengal Catholic Herald.

DEAR SIR,—Bishop Tillotson, serm. 49., page 588, writes thus:—"In the beginning of the Reformation, when Antichrist sat securely in the quiet possession of his kingdom, Luther arose: &c." These words, securely and in the quiet possession, must be owned very emphatical, though I cannot draw any positive consequence from them as to the number of years in which that secure and quiet possession had already lasted: but, since so learned a man as he was, could not be ignorant thereof, it is probable he foresaw the advantage we should make of it, had he been too particular, and, therefore, judged it not safe to speak out, but rather to leave his reader in the dark, than let him know more than was fitting.

Perkins, in his exposition upon the Creed, page 400, ventures to speak a little plainer. His words are these:—"We say that before the days of Luther, for the space of many hundred years, an universal apostacy overspread the whole face of the earth, and that our Church was not then visible in the world."

Here Popery, which the author is pleased to call an universal apostacy, is owned to have overspread the whole face of the earth for many hundred years before the days of Luther. However, he did not think proper to specify, as he might have done, how many hundred years this universal apostacy had already lasted. But every intelligent reader will be able to guess, that when a man says many hundred years, he does not mean a very small number.

But the Protestant Homily Book, the authority whereof cannot be called in question, in order to show, in the most pathetic manner, the danger of Popery, which the composer has the charity to call abominable idolatry, has ventured to explain some part of Perkins's many hundred years in the following words:—"Laity and Clergy, learned and unlearned, all ages, sects, and degrees of men, women, and children of the whole of Christendom had been at once drowned in abominable idolatry; and that for the space of eight hundred years and more." Hom. against Peril of Idolatry, part iii. page 251. Printed, London, anno. 1687.

Here, then, we have eight hundred years, with a 'more' tacked at the end of them, allowed to Popery before the Reformation. The word 'more,' may be made to signify just as much or as little as every one pleases; but it may modestly be extended so far, as to make the total number amount to about nine hundred years, which brings universal Popery up to St. Gregory's time, who transplanted it into England, where it flourished exactly nine hundred years before the Reformation.

Mr. Napier, who in his book upon the Revelations, prop. 37, p. 68., is so sincere as to acknowledge, that Popery, to which he cannot forbear giving an ugly name, reigned universally at the very beginning of the 4th century, under the first Christian Emperor; but, lest any one should through mistake suppose Mr. Napier to be an obscure or inconsiderable writer, Mr. Collier, in his Historical Dictionary, has taken care to publish his merit, for he styles him "a profound scholar, and of great worth."

This learned and worthy person then writes thus:—"From the year of Christ three hundred and sixteen, the Antichristian and Papistical reign has begun reigning universally, and without any debateable contradiction, one thousand, two hundred and sixty years." And again, c. 11. p. 145,—"The Pope and Clergy have possessed the outward visible Church even one thousand two hundred and three-score years." I presume he counts to the time the Reformation was established in Great Britain.

This, however, is precise and clear, though the other three gentlemen were the more or less upon the reserve. Tillotson has only favored us with a broad hint; Perkins, indeed allows Popery many hundred years, but is careful not to let us know how many; the Homilist gives it eight hundred years, or more, but his more is like a string, that may be let out or drawn in as every one may fancy. But the learned and worthy Napier who speaks boldly, may serve as a commentator upon the other three; for he disperses the mist, and assures us that the Papistical reign commenced with the year of Christ three hundred and sixteen, that is precisely a year more than twelve hundred before Luther commenced his Reformation. What a pity, whilst his hand was in, he has not specified the very day of the month in which Popery began its universal reign, as he might have done the one with as much ease as the other; and then we Papists might have had the pleasure to keep the anniversary feast of its accession to the empire of the universal Christian world.

But though Mr. Napier has done Popery considerable service, by allowing it an universal reign even in the beginning of the fourth century, yet the fourth Protestant Annalists, commonly called the Magdeburgians, carry it still higher, and stick not to date the pretended decay of the Christian doctrine, and the straw and stubble of Papistical errors, as they call them even from the age immediately following Christ and his Apostles. It is thus that God has confounded the enemies of his Church, by making them become witnesses of the truth, and proclaim against their wills the antiquity of her faith, in those very writings they intended as the sharpest invectives against her.

Upon the whole, I cannot refrain from making this observation, viz., that if Popery had its beginning in any age since the time of the Apostles, it is morally impossible that so considerable an event should not have been transmitted to posterity, I will not say by one or two historians of note, but by hundreds, who would have marked out the precise time when it happened, with such unquestionable uncertainty as to render it impossible either to doubt or differ in opinion about it. Thus we know the very year when Arianism and Lutheranism began; the facts were never questioned by any man, and the certainty of them, leaves no room for any diversity of opinions about them.

If, then, there were any ancient records or authentic history that fixed precisely the time when Popery began, would not all Protestants have quoted them as the chronology of a fact which must have sunk the credit of the Church of Rome to all intents and purposes, and established the reformed Churches upon the most solid basis? Certainly they never would have looked over an advantage of such vast importance; nay, every man of learning would have had it by rote at his finger's ends without a book, and the date of every branch of Popery would have been as well known as that of the Reformation, concerning which there never were two opinions, among the thousands who have written on that great event.

Since, therefore, instead of this unanimous agreement in fixing the time when Popery began, we find nothing but cutting and shuffling—precarious guesses, and diversity of opinions among the very best Protestant writers, is it not a demonstrative proof that they have no ancient or authentic record concerning any beginning of it since the time of the Apostles? Hence we may justly conclude, that as it reigned universally for many hundred years before the Reformation, according to Perkins,—for eight hundred years and more, according to the Book of Homilies,—for above twelve hundred years, according to Mr. Napier,—and is owned by the Magdeburgians to have had a being even in the second century;—may we not conclude, I say, that it never had any other beginning than that of Christianity itself, viz. from Christ himself and his Apostles.

I observe, secondly, that the old childish whim of introducing Popery in the monkish ages (as Protestants are pleased to style them) of pretended ignorance and darkness, is quite cast out of doors both by the Homilist and Mr. Napier, for at the beginning of the 4th century there were no monks whatever, as Protestants understand the word, and though there were several monasteries at the beginning of the 7th, yet, as what Protestants call monkish ages are of a much later date, the pretended ignorance and darkness of those ages, could not favor the introduction of Popery, which, according to the book of Homilies, was fully established long before.

But to return once more to the learned Mr. Napier, whose chronology relating to the grand epoch of Popery is very curious. He fixes it precisely in the year of Christ 316; that is nine years before the first general Council of Nice, anno 325, and tells us expressly, that even then it reigned universally, so that it may be truly said, in the language of Bishop Tillotson, that even then Antichrist sat securely in the quiet possession of his kingdom. Astonishing news, indeed! very strange! unless we had some information how he had obtained it, that a kingdom, of so vast an extent as the whole Christian world, should be got possession of in a manner like a purse by stealth.

Be this as it may, it evidently follows, from Mr. Napier's chronology, that the Fathers of the Nicene Council, though revered and respected by Protestants themselves, were nevertheless all staunch Papists, and, what is very remarkable, many of the Bishops of that council were eminent Saints, and carried about them the glorious marks of their past sufferings for the faith of Christ.

I ask, then, whether the Bishops of the Nicene Council had been Papists from their infancy or not? If they were, then without dispute they had been brought up by Popish parents, and if so, Popery is still more ancient than Mr. Napier makes it; but if they had not been Papists from their infancy, then they were all infamous Apostates, without excepting St. Anastasius himself. Is it not therefore, very strange, that no individual among them should be touched with remorse, nor represent to the Council their fall from the ancient religion, nor exhort them to a reformation; especially when the supposed change from one religion to another was of so fresh a date, that there could not be a bishop in the Council but must have been concerned in it.

But it is still more amazing that the Arians, their mortal enemies, who were admitted to, and heard in the Council, should not reproach them with their apostacy, and put them to open shame; and yet the acts and histories of that Council mention no such thing: nay Eusebius himself, who was then present, and had written the history of the Church down to his time, knew nothing of such universal apostacy from the primitive faith of the Church, to Popery; for had he known it, it is incredible that he would have passed it over in silence. Therefore, since neither he, nor those that wrote immediately after him, have left us any history, record, or monument of a change in the faith of the universal visible Church introduced before their time, it is manifest there never was any such change, and, by consequence, the Popery which Mr. Napier owns to have reigned universally even nine years before the Council of Nice, was the very religion that had been handed down to them from the Apostles themselves.

But setting these testimonies of Protestant writers, which witness the antiquity of the Roman Catholic faith, aside, I shall, in my next, endeavor to take a more effectual way to prove it without being at the courtesy of any Protestant evidence to vouch for it.

R * * * * *

O'CONNELL TESTIMONIAL FUND.

His Grace the Archbishop,	50	0
A Protestant,	50	0
Mrs. O'Brien,	100	0
E. and J. O'Brien,	100	0
Rev. W. Kennedy,	10	0
Rev. J. Kenny,	10	0
Mr. J. Morel,	10	0
Mr. N. Prendergast,	10	0
J. Rostan, Jr.,	10	0
P. S. D'Rozario,	10	0

Subscriptions will be received by Messrs. John Lackersteen and Brothers.

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

THROUGH MR. N. O'BRIEN.

M. B.	4	0
C. B.	2	0

FESTIVALS.

Sunday, 11,—XI. After Pent. 2nd August of it.
Sem com. oct. and S. S.
Monday, 12—S. Clare V. d. com. oct.
Tuesday, 13,—Of the octave sem. com. S. S. M.M.
Wednesday, 14,—do. com. vig. V. S. C.
Thursday, 15,—Assumption of B. V. d. 1 cl.
Friday, 16,—S. Hyacinth c. d. com. of the two oct. aves.
Saturday, 17,—Oct. S. Laurence d. com. oct. Assumption.
Sunday, 18,—XII. After Pent. 3rd August S. Joachim c. d. gr.
Monday, 19,—of the oct. sem. com. dom. and S. M.
Tuesday, 20,—S. Bernard E. C. D. d. com. oct.
Wednesday, 21,—S. Jane Frances de Chantal V. d. com. &c.
Thursday, 22,—Oct. of the Assumption d. com. S. S. M. M.
Friday, 23,—S. Philip Benite c. d. com. vig.
Saturday, 24,—S. Bartholomew Ap. d. 2 cl.
Sunday, 25,—XIII. After Pent 4. Aug. SS. Heart of Mary d. gr. com. dom.
Monday, 26,—S. Lewis C. sem. (Yesterday) com. S. M.
Tuesday, 27,—S. Joseph Colasancius c. d.
Wednesday, 28,—S. Augustine E. C. D. d. com. S. M.
Thursday, 29,—Decollation of S. John Bap. d. gr. com. S. M.
Friday, 30,—S. Rose of Lima, virg. d. com. S. S. M. M.
Saturday, 31,—S. Raymund, c. d.

Selections.

THE PUSEYITES, ANGLICANS, &c.

OXFORD.—Mr. Macmullen appeared on Saturday, for the fourth time, for his degree, which was voted by the Vice-Chancellor. According to the statute, Mr. Macmullen cannot now appear again before the expiration of a twelvemonth. At the hebdomadal Board on Monday last it was unanimously agreed, that candidates for the degree of Bachelor in Divinity, shall, in future, be called on to perform the statutable pro formâ disputations—thus returning to the ancient practice of the University, in accordance with the statutes. This step, it is said, has been rendered necessary by the failure of the Board to carry through convocation a satisfactory statute regulating degrees in law and theology. It is, we believe, quite true, that a member of convocation, who was present at the delivery of Professor Garbett's sermon, on Sunday se'nnight, brought a charge against it, which was read before the Vice-Chancellor; but, unless the Vice-Chancellor should think there is, in the words of the statute, a rationabilis causa for so doing, there is no obligation on him to summon a board of heresy.—Tablet.

"THE UNBOUGHT LOYALTY OF THE IRISH CHURCH."

The Archbishop of ARMAGH is a rich specimen of the Apostolic holiness and orthodoxy of the Anglican Church in Ireland. His Grace is remarkable for more than that. He is the expositor of a new doctrine, and the inhabitant of one of the most magnificent mansions in London. He has discovered and propounded the doctrine that the Established Church of Ireland was always loyal to the British Throne, and he dignifies, by his person, an Apostolic palace in the classic region of St. James' Square. In this degenerate age, when "every year and month sends forth a hero," those twin glories of the Archbishop of ARMAGH should at least entitle him to a niche in some temple. It is only in the revolution of an age or so that a Ureka like that of the PRIMATE meets the eye. The Archbishop of ARMAGH, located in St. James' Square, London, and the loyalty of that Church, which he adorns, to the powers of England, are equally characteristic of the Church and the country, to which, as an individual, and a Bishop, he is married and ministers. But "lend us your ears." It appears that the Lord Mayor of London, in accordance with that civic hospitality which brings all things into a circle, civil, criminal, religious, diplomatic and political—a few days since gave a grand banquet. The immediate occasion of the display was in consequence of the annual Sermon preached in aid of the funds of the Society for propagating the Gospel in foreign parts.

This "Grand Banquet" is noticeable for many reasons. There was first the ecclesiastical mendicancy of dignitaries, the richest in the world, for teaching Christianity in foreign parts, when ignorance amounting to infidelity is spread through England—when a barbarism as gross as Egyptian darkness spreads its abominable pall over the land—next, for the gorgeous feasting of those same dignitaries, and drinking bumpers to the spread of Gospel truth, as if the diffusion of the pure beauty of Christianity was a thing for the sottishness of Heathenism—and, lastly, for the speeches of a couple of Archbishops—those of the dignitaries of CANTERBURY and ARMAGH. The Banquet is described as most magnificent. Gold and silver plate, with luxuries that would have resuscitated an exhausted Sybarite, were the inspirations of the Bishops. A toast was drunk, the terms of which we think most foully indecent, and scarcely creditable to print. But the Bishops drank it. Here it is—"Success to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts," and this was drunk with three times three and one cheer more. This is the modern English mode of converting the Heathen. Contracts for Bibles by the thousand, and drinking bumper toasts by Bishops—the one a mercantile speculation, the other a brutal profaneness—shades of GREGORY, AUSTIN and PATRICK! Did you imbibe your inspiration from the wine cup, and propagate Gospel truth like reeling Bacchanals? What affinity is there between Lord Mayor's feasts and the rigid gentleness and sober beauty of Christianity? Was it at the mellow moodiness of midnight festivals that the Apostle of Japan promulgated the truths of religion? How did the Catholic Missionaries of the world make their way—penetrate the cities of China and the backwoods of Canada—enlighten the fastness of India in its ignorance, and make their way once more into the heart of England in its enlightenment? What has champagne to do with Catholic Christianity, or port with Protestantism? Are "hip Hurrahs" to be the en avant of Huguenots? Is the spirituality of Bishops and brandy to be confounded and mixed up, and Christianity and custards, Confirmation and cheese to be discussed at Lord Mayor's tables? Is there to be a Civic Pope in London, as well as a female head of the Church, and who is to pronounce upon Trinitarianism and truth—Missionaries and malt—with an ex Cathedra infallibility? Is it not a most curious perversion of taste and truth, to mix up eating and education—drinking and diplomacy, piety and potations in the same olla podrida?

But we are forgetting the Archbishop of ARMAGH. His Grace is reported to have said:—

"The Irish Church was, and ever had been since the Reformation most devoted in its loyalty to the British throne, and joined to the British people, not merely by an act of union, but by a much stronger cord—that of kindred sentiments of education and of habits; in short, she was eminently English in her tastes and doctrines. An institution such as she was surely deserving of the attention and fostering care of the British empire. She was the stronghold of British security in Ireland. Once destroy her in the blindness of party conflicts, and in the wantonness of legislative experiment, and what would be substituted for the unbought loyalty, the high-minded obedience, and the lofty attachments of such an institution? For the sake, then, of Christian truth—and chiefly for that—but also for the sake of the stability of this great empire—for the sake of those very persons who seek her dismemberment—he trusted in God, that in their day the period would never arrive when the Irish Church would be coldly regarded by the people of England, and that she should ever receive the credit which was her due for the principles she inculcated, and be recognised to be, as she really was, an essential element of British greatness."

Bishops in primitive times have been called the "Angels of the Church," but his Grace of ARMAGH spoke like an Arch-angel. His words are partly historically true to the letter. Heaven forbid that we should gainsay a syllable uttered by such an oracle as an Archbishop; but we might be allowed respectfully to hazard an opinion that it is because of its being the devoted creature and ultra-loyal creation of English supremacy in Ireland, that the Church is neither loved nor followed by the Irish people, and that, in natura rerum, the same truth may hold good for the future as for the past. It is true, my Lord of ARMAGH, that she is "eminently English in her tastes and doctrines," but it is not true, most illustrious Archbishop, that "she was the stronghold of British security in Ireland." English security in Ireland never was, and never will be endangered, but by English acts and the policy of our rulers. The power of an inflicted church, according as it increased in this country, stamped its impress on the Irish people more and more, and tended to wrest assunder "the strong hold of British security in Ireland." Her Christian teaching has been the exacting of tribute—tithe, not truth, was her object. Her piety had an absorbingness of the pence of the poor people, and her benevolence is recorded in blood. Eastern Idols have had their victims, and human sacrifice, in the aberration of man's erring reason, has offended Heaven and astounded earth—but even in our own times Irish victims have been sacrificed to this gorgeous god of a pet Establishment; yet the Archbishop of ARMAGH, who lives in St. James' Square, takes on himself to enlighten the Corporation of London on Catholic Ireland, and to persuade us we do not know our own interests, but should succumb to the English interest in Ireland!!! What next?

Old MONTAIGNE, who discourses to us the learning of the world with a simplicity as concise as the unpretendingness and philosophy of his mind were remarkable, tells us that all other signs are common to all religions—hope, trust, events, ceremonies, penance, and martyrs—the peculiar marks of our truth ought to be our virtue as it is the most Heavenly and difficult and the most worthy product of truth.

Sages of ARMAGH and CANTERBURY how do you reply?—Cork Examiner, May. 15

CATHOLIC FOREIGN MISSIONS.

(ON PROTESTANT REPORT.)

In reference to our Foreign Missions, the following interesting particulars are extracted from the (Protestant) "Missionary Register," for March 1844:—

HONG KONG.—Dr. Bridgman, of the American (Protestant) Board of Missions, writes—"At Hong Kong we think we may and ought to commence foundations broad and deep for the whole system of missionary operations. This the Papal missionaries have done, notwithstanding the numerous establishments they have all over the empire. . . . Within a stone-throw of where I now write, they have erected a large three-storied house, and a large church adjoining it is nearly completed. On these two alone they will expend about 20,000 dollars. They shame us."—P. 126.

KOLONGSOO is an island near Amoy. Dr. Abeel, of the same board, complains—"Within a few days ago two Spanish priests have taken up their residence at Kolongsoo. They say that they are soon going into the interior. They have had a Chapel fitted up very near us, where they perform Mass for the Romanists of the European soldiers. Not understanding the language, they can have but little personal influence over the Chinese. At times we see native converts (!) with them, who probably understand this dialect."—P. 141.

BURMAH.—The Report of the American Baptist Mission says—"We are led to fear that the Burman Church at Rangoon is in a dilapidated state, and exposed to the inroads of the Romish emissaries."—P. 137.

AUSTRALASIA.—A missionary of the Wesleyan Society speaks thus of a "visit to Uvea, or Wallis' Island, which was a matter of some risk, from our conflicts with the Romanists and the Pagans. I had to encounter the Romanists in their own camp, as the priest had charged me with bewitching his children. We were compelled to leave this interesting island, where the united influence of Popery and Paganism forbade our leaving the native teachers."—P. 155.

NEW ZEALAND.—A minister of the Church Missionary Society writes from Otawao, under date March 28, 1843.—"About two months ago there appeared a great probability of disturbances [about fishing grounds] among the tribes, chiefly Roman Catholics, in this quarter. . . . I proposed certain boundaries; to which, after looking, and thinking and talking for some time, both parties agreed."—P. 158. This docility of the Catholic New Zealanders is studiously passed over without a word of commendation. Mark, however, how a similar dispute between Protestant tribes is spoken of. Another missionary, from the same society, in a letter dated Kaitotehe, March 31, 1843, says—"Much of my time has been occupied since the formation of this station in endeavouring to put a stop to a dispute between Ngatipou and Ngatimahuta respecting an Eel Pa, or Fishery, at Wangape, or at the least to lessen the bitter feelings which had arisen between the contending parties." The story is this: Uira, Chief of Ngatipou and Kepa, Chief of Ngatimahuta, both Protestants, dispute about fishing grounds. The Protestant missionary interposes and recommends arbitration, but in vain; and he "felt much depressed at the result of this meeting." Two days after he "endeavoured to persuade Uira and the Chiefs of Ngatipou to give up a part, at least, of the disputed spot, for the sake of the Gospel. They objected, saying. . . . 'We will die on the ground of our forefathers.'" Some weeks after, an equally unsuccessful attempt was made to compromise the affair, and the missionary "returned home much discouraged." About a month after, viz., at Christmas, the Protestant Bishop tried what he could do; but to no purpose. Between January and March, 1843, Ngatipou had mustered "about three hundred fighting men," and Ngatimahuta "about two hundred armed natives." "They had war dances, firing of muskets, &c." and "Evil! Evil! Evil! was the general cry." Finally, on the 10th March, "it was arranged (says the Missionary) that I should stand between the two parties, neither of which were to pass me. . . . Each party had their war dance, and rushed towards the place where I was standing, both parties stopping short as they reached me. After several angry speeches, each party saying that they would never give up their claim to the fishing grounds, they separated. Thus the affair has ended for a time; but it is possible it may be renewed at a future period. . . . Gospel principles have prevailed."—Pp. 156, 157, 158. Right glad are we that the Catholic natives have not merited the encomium of such "angry," "war dance," "Gospel principles"!

There is one little incident that must be noticed before concluding. It is this; "King George, Queen Charlotte, and the great Chief to whom the Executive Department [of Nina Foa] is entrusted, with his wife . . . accompanied us, with their tribes to the bold shores; when, on leaving, they kissed our hands, &c." P. 155. So writes a Wesleyan Missionary. Surely we shall hear no more of the "pride of the Pope of Rome," since their High Mightinesses of the Islands of the Pacific kiss the hands of a (perhaps ill-savoured) Methodist operative! We thank the "Missionary Register," for this information.

—Tablet.

BUKANSIDA.

PUSEYISM IN NEWCASTLE.

From the Tablet.

The following comment upon a paragraph that recently appeared in this journal is taken from a leading article in the Tyne Mercury of Tuesday:—

"A gentleman of considerable literary reputation in this town has recently translated the Hymns of the Salisbury Breviary, for the use of the Puseyite body in Newcastle. He adds, 'as anciently used by the ANGLICAN CHURCH.' The latter designation no one knows better than the talented individual alluded to, cannot be read without a smile. For who ever heard of the ANCIENT ANGLICAN CHURCH AT SALISBURY? till our ingenious friends, who halt half-way between Geneva and Rome, made so wonderful a discovery. However, halt as they may on their good journey to Rome, their defences of our practices, and unbounded admiration for the principles of authority and Church government, are gradually breaking down the barriers which alone kept the multitude from coming within her borders, and beholding the beauty and true loveliness of the fair Spouse of Christ."—TABLET's North Shields Correspondent.]

"We extract the above rather inconsiderate paragraph from the TABLET, a Roman Catholic organ of general ability and candour. We are something surprised, may we add a little sorry, to see a paragraph of this character from such a quarter. The TABLET surely considers the ancient Church of Salisbury a part of the Anglican branch of the Catholic Church? Now, the 'Puseyites' consider the Church of England, as held by them, to be a continuation of this branch; stripped, no doubt, of one or two doctrinal errors, of one or two questionable points of practice, and one or two questionable matters of discipline. The TABLET will say, 'they are wrong.' This the TABLET has a right to say, nor shall we attempt to decide such a controversy. What we would say is, that these (Puseyite) opinions have been held by many good and learned men, and so far the TABLET will, we think, go with us. But why then this sneering tone in a journal holding the opinions which the TABLET does? If there be, as unquestionably there is, a growing tendency in the sounder part of the serious mind of England to look back with regard and regret to mediæval institutions, and mediæval modes of faith, this ought to be a ground of heartfelt rejoicing for the TABLET; and in so far as that portion of the English church, which is led by Dr. Pusey, assists this tendency, ought it to be held in regard and respect by this Catholic Journal. We would counsel the TABLET and its conductors neither to attribute too much to "Puseyism" on the one hand, nor to slight it too hastily on the other. They (the Puseyites) are not AT THE BOTTOM of this movement, though they act as pioneers in the work of a return to better modes of thinking, both religious and political. The fact is, the hard-hearted, shallow-conceited, and cruel utilitarian philosophy of the time is now producing its RE-ACTION. The conceited jargon of Bentham, the half-cracked Malthusianism of Brougham, and the cruel and shallow sophisms of the Seniors, the Torrenses, and the Macullochs have now fairly sickened the healthy portion of English intellect. The consequence is, that men are driven, by the misery and inhumanity they see every-where around them, to recur back again to the happier era of their ancestors, and to see that the institutions of those ages were productive of a national felicity unknown in modern times, and worth, a hundred times told over, all the hollow, self-called "improvements of the age." In this re-action both politics and religion partake. Men now begin to venerate Edward the First and his Parliament for their repression of usury and banishment of the Jews from the then happy and really rich realm of England. Men begin to see that eternal spinning jennies and endless taxes lead to anything but national morality or national comfort; and that the Juggernaut of the steam engine and Stock Exchange is no improvement on the "political economy" of the Plantagenets. In religious feeling the same reaction is going on. A monastery is compared to a poor-law bastille, or a gigantic cotton-mill, much to the disadvantage of the latter; and we are beginning to discover that religion cannot be bad which was held by Edward the First and Third, by Gascoigne, by Fortescue, by St. Thomas à Becket, by the Black Prince, by Friar Bacon, by Bede, by Chaucer, by Bishop Fisher, and Sir Thomas More. The hymns which are the innocent cause of this long paragraph, will be found reviewed in another column, by no 'Puseyite' hand. We do not profess to know the translator; but we hope the TABLET may not object to their being sung in good English, as well as in Monkish Latin."

TIPPERARY.—CONVERSION.—On Thursday last, the 2nd instant the lady of David Ferguson, Esq., Nelson-street, Tipperary, was received into the Catholic Church at her own house, by the Rev. Thos. M'Donnell, O. P., of the Dominican Convent in this city. Mrs. Ferguson is daughter of the late John Fitzgerald Esq., of Limerick, solicitor; and, though seventeen years married, no suggestion was ever made, nor influence exercised by her husband, during that period with a view to induce her to change her religion. The greatest conjugal affection existed at all times between them. Her becoming a Catholic now has been quite a voluntary act of her own, after long and mature consideration. The piety and religious ecstasy of this lady during her profession of faith and reception into the Church was edifying beyond expression. Mrs. F. is mother of nine children, and a most amiable lady, and her husband is brother of John Ferguson, solicitor, Gardner-street, Dublin; and also of Rev. Charles Ferguson, O. S. J.—Limerick Reporter.

THE
BENGAL
CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

No. 6.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, AUGUST 10, 1844.

[VOL. VII.]

THE PRETENDED CHURCH HAS NO EPISCOPAL MISSION IN HER MINISTERS.

(Translated from St. Francis of Sales.)

Now, the descendants of the heresiarchs, finding themselves pressed by such powerful reasons, adopt, in these our days, another mode of defence. They say, but they say without foundation, that the first masters and reformers of their Churches, Luther, Bucer and Œcolampadius were sent by the bishops who ordained them priests, and that these in turn, sent the others who followed them, and thus they go on, linking their mission and occasion to that of the Apostles.

Truly this acknowledgment is very candid, in as much as it at least concedes, that their own mission could not be derived from their first ministers, independently of the succession and authority of our bishops, and of the imposition of their hands; and such, beyond all doubt, is the fact; for it would be no easy matter to make this their mission jump from the Apostles, so that it might fall, without succession, into the hands of the preachers of these times, without having been transmitted to us by our predecessors; there should have been a very long pipe in the mouth of the first founders of the Church to call Luther and the others, in this manner, without being heard or perceived by all those who intervened and stood between them; or otherwise, as Calvin said on another occasion, though improperly, these gentlemen reformers must have had very long ears. Our reformers, then, must grant that this mission has been preserved entire, if they pretend to it themselves. We do not deny that they had a mission from our bishops, and particularly from their chief the bishop of Rome, but we do deny formally, that your ministers have had any delegation to preach what they have preached, because they have published many things against the Church in which they were chosen and ordained priests. Now one of these two things must be admitted; either your ministers erred, or the Church that sent them was in error, and as a necessary consequence, either their Church is false or that from which they derived their first mission was corrupted. Let us rather infer, that their mission is absolutely false, for from a false Church, such as they describe ours to be, no true mission can be derived; if their own Church be false, where then is their mission; since in a false Church no legitimate mission exists, and thus, in any possible supposition, they had no mission to preach what they have preached? On the other hand, if the Church in which they were instructed and ordained, was the true Church, they were inexcusably guilty of heresy in having left it and in having preached against its faith; if it was not the true Church, it had not the power to send them or ordain them. But let us grant that they did receive a mission in the Roman Church,—they did not, certainly, get a mission to go out from it, and withdraw themselves and their children from obedience to it; surely, the delegate should not exceed the bounds of his commission, or, if he does, he is disavowed.

Luther, Œcolampadius and Calvin were not bishops; answer then for them, how is it possible that they could communicate, on the part of the Roman Church, any mission to their successors, since that Church protests and maintains most firmly, that bishops alone have power to bestow mission, either mediate or immediate, and that this prerogative by no means belongs to simple priests. On this head St. Jerome has very well observed the difference there is between a simple priest and a bishop, in his epistle to Evagrius. St. Augustine and St. Epiphanius* have reckoned Aërius in the number of heretics, because, amongst other errors, he maintained the contrary. Legitimate mission should be both episcopal and canonical, not a protesting, threatening mission.

(To be continued.)

THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE ON TRAN-SUBSTANTIATION.

When we last addressed our readers on this subject, we shewed the folly of the illustration which the Editor of the Christian Advocate derived from the Town-Hall statues, and we now propose to show, how inapplicable to his purpose are the other examples cited by him. "Thus, he says, God is called, 'a rock, a sun, a shield, a strong tower,' &c. Our Lord in like manner says, 'I am the vine,' 'the door,' 'the way,' 'the life,' 'the resurrection,' &c. His people are called 'the branches,' 'his sheep,' 'the members of his body,' but it is needless to multiply examples." We perfectly agree with our contemporary, that it is perfectly useless, worse than useless, to multiply examples of this kind which are nothing to the purpose, arguments a thousand times repeated, and a thousand times refuted, but repeated still, in the hope of deceiving such ignorant, inexperienced readers as those for whom the Christian Advocate professes to write. If these manifestly figurative expressions be a parallel to the words used by our Lord and Saviour in the institution of the blessed Eucharist, how does it happen that no one ever believed God to be literally, a material rock, literally a material sun, a shield, or a tower? How does it happen, that no Christian ever believed our Saviour to be literally, an inanimate, vegetable vine, or an inanimate door, or his people to be branches of that same inanimate vine, or dumb, irrational sheep? How does it happen that no Christian ever believed any such doctrine, while all Christians of every age and sex, of all nations, ranks and conditions, unanimously believed, on the authority of the words of promise and institution of the blessed Eucharist, the real, literal and substantial presence of Christ in that holy and adorable Sacrament? There must be some good, solid reason to decide the whole Christian world in favour of a literal interpretation in one case, and of a figurative interpretation in the other case, and yet according to the Christian Advocate, there is no reason whatever. Who would believe him, an ignorant man who does not know the meaning of a bulwark?

Every one knows that our Saviour makes use of metaphors and figurative language in many parts of Scripture, but they are metaphors which are clearly known as such, either because they are explained, or because they require no explanation. Thus when our Saviour says, I am the vine, you the branches; he that abideth in me, and I in him, beareth much fruit, for without me you can do nothing;" (John 15. 5.) no one could imagine, and in fact, no one ever imagined, that the disciples were literally vine-branches, or that Christ was a mere inanimate vine, because the context and the circumstances make the speaker's meaning quite clear. But then, the Christian Advocate has got, he says, a figurative passage which is not explained by the speaker, nor by the context; and he is quite at a loss to know why we do not understand it literally. We shall quote, he says, another passage in point under this head. In Matthew 8, 21 and 22, it is written, "Another of his disciples said unto him, Lord, suffer me to go first and bury my father. But Jesus said to him, follow me and let the dead bury their dead." Does our Lord here mean to say that those who are literally dead should bury their dead? If not, on what principle do Papists take this and similar passages figuratively, except on the principle for which we contend, and which is universally applicable, for here assuredly our Lord does not "explain the metaphor?" O! the folly and absurdity of calling this passage a parallel to the words of institution, and still more, the shame of saying that it is not explained! Let us ask the Editor of the Christian Advocate, in order to bring him to his sober senses, did our Saviour assert, and solemnly re-assert, that the dead are capable of burying the dead, while his hearers doubted and denied the possibility? Did he promise solemnly, that this prodigy should be realised, and continue to repeat the promise while his disciples were leaving him, scandalised at his expressions? Did he command the dead to bury the dead to the end of time? Was the burying of the dead by those already dead, prefigured in the old law and commanded in the new, under penalties the most awful? Does not our Saviour, in the passage cited, intimate that those who follow him are not dead, while those who concern themselves only about carnal things, are indeed dead to him, though they live to themselves and the world? "Follow me, says our Saviour, and let the dead bury their dead."

O! the folly and ignorance of the Christian Advocate! But notwithstanding all this folly, he is sure that he has now at least an unanswerable objection to the doctrine of

* Lib. De Hæresibus c. 53, et. 75.

Transubstantiation. After our Saviour had said (Math. 26, 27) drink ye all of this, in verse 29th, it is added; "But I say unto you, I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom;" See also to the same purpose, (Mark 14, 25.) We do not recollect ever having read in the Christian Advocate any thing to induce us to believe the Editor sincere, and the extract now before us would go to 'prove directly the contrary. He takes the trouble to tell us, that the words of the 29th verse in Matthew, are spoken in reference to what our Saviour previously called his body and blood, and refers to St. Mark for a corroboration of this assertion, but makes not the smallest allusion to St. Luke, who places these words before the consecration, and not after it. The following is the order observed in the narration of St. Luke—"With desire, I have desired to eat this pasch with you, before I suffer. For I say to you, that from this time I will not eat it, till it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God. And having taken the chalice, he gave thanks, and said, Take and divide it among you. For I say to you, that I will not drink of the fruit of the vine, till the kingdom of God come. And taking bread, he gave thanks; and brake, and gave to them, saying, this is my body which is given for you. Do this for a commemoration of me. And in like manner the chalice also, after he had supped, saying; this is the chalice, the New Testament in my blood which shall be shed for you."

It is therefore evident that there were two Chalices, one of which belonged to the paschal supper of the old law, and the other to the Eucharistic supper of the new, and that, according to St. Luke, the fruit of the vine refers to the former, not to the latter; and the same fact may be gathered from St. Matthew and St. Mark, though the order of narration with them is different; for our Saviour wished merely to tell the disciples, that the paschal supper which he had so often before eaten with them, he would eat no more, till it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God, where they were encouraged to hope for the banquet of immortality of which the Paschal supper was a type. But though the consecrated wine should be called the fruit of the vine, what would the Advocate gain by that? It was certainly the fruit of the vine before consecration, and as after consecration it retains the same appearance, the same name might be given to it after it had ceased to be substantially the fruit of the vine, as a dead body is called by the name of the living man, and as the pillar of salt mentioned in the old Testament, might be called, the wife of Lot. But on the other hand, whatever privilege there might be of calling wine metaphorically, blood, in a general sense, it would be quite harsh and repugnant for an individual man to call it his own blood, as our Saviour would have done, on an occasion so solemn as the last supper, if the Christian Advocate were to be believed. Hence all that our Protestant champion brings against us from St. Paul (1 Cor. XI. 23 to 28) goes for nothing; for even Catholics speak in the same manner of the sacramental elements after consecration. "In this passage we find, says the Advocate, that the Apostle Paul expressly calls the elements after consecration BREAD and WINE." But it is false; the Apostle does not call them bread and wine without qualification or limitation, as the Advocate represents; but, on the contrary, he distinguishes them from ordinary bread and wine, by the particles prefixed. "This bread," "this cup," "that bread," "that cup," are the expressions used by St. Paul, and taken in connection with the other words to which they refer, are exactly the same as those which our Catholic Theologians make use of in reference to this sacrament. The Advocate forgot to explain, for the benefit of his ignorant readers, some other expressions of the Apostle in this passage, which are very intelligent to a Catholic, but rather abstruse, in Protestant principles. "Therefore whosoever shall eat this bread or drink the chalice of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and of the blood of the Lord. But let a man prove himself; and so let him eat of that bread and drink of the chalice. For he that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh judgment to himself, not discerning the body of the Lord." How could a man be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord by eating mere bread and drinking mere wine, or what is the necessity of examination before eating and drinking, or how could a man eat and drink judgment to himself, not discerning the Lord's body, while he was eating common bread and drinking mere wine, in which the body of the Lord was not present, and could not therefore be discerned? Not a word of explanation from the Advocate on these points, or why St. Paul, instead of explaining the language employed by SS. Matthew, Mark and Luke, in favour of mere Protestant signs and figures, confirms Catholic belief by the most terrible denunciations against those who profane the reality: Let the Advocate take care how he speaks against it.

(To be continued.)

GWALIOR, LANDOUR, AND SIRDHANAH.

We have been allowed to make the following extracts from a private letter addressed to Archbishop Carew:—

"I will now narrate the success that has attended the endeavours regarding the poor at Gwalior. Captain Kirke has collected at Mussoorie Rs. 650—Meerut has yielded above Rs. 500, and Capt. Eyre writes me that Colonel Sleeman has given him the munificent amount of Rs. 400, and Dr. Hunter of Seepree, and Mr. Gubbins, of Puttyghur, each Rs. 100. These sums, though even with the generous offerings of your Grace's flock, inadequate to the extent of these poor people's necessities, are still an encouraging earnest of society's sympathy, and leads one to hope that when Captain Eyre has sufficiently matured his plans to appeal to the public more generally, a handsome subscription will be effected. Colonel Sleeman, in addition to his generous donation, is entering warmly into Capt. E.'s scheme of settling the Christians in a separate village, and is endeavoring to persuade the Gwalior Minister to yield them in perpetuity a grant of land for the purpose. Mr. Gubbins, too, has offered to employ any of the people who are recommended to him in the Revenue and Police Departments. All this your Lordship will be glad to hear, as I am to relate it.

"The Landour Chapel, of which a drawing appeared once in the Catholic Herald, has since undergone such additions and modifications, that it could hardly be recognized for the same building—and all this the good Father has contrived from his seventy rupees a month and an occasional assistance from individuals.

"Great improvements are making at the Sirdhanah College, comprising a colonaded front of more than two hundred feet, of which I hope some day to send a sketch to the Herald. If Dr. Borghi can only succeed in bringing out English Teachers, there is every reason to look forward to its becoming a first rate institution. Nearly six hundred rupees have been lately subscribed here by the Soldiers, to build a Chapel at Kusowlee. I cannot help wishing that our Gwalior Charity were proposed to them by the same authority, for those who so generously contribute to God's material temple would surely not be backward in ~~such~~ a cause. I have only lately found leisure to write to Dr. Carli as I said I should, and have not yet received a reply, but I hope His Lordship will evince his approval of my conduct by enjoining his clergy to propose the cause to their congregation, so that the Meerut Troops may have an opportunity of adding their assistance.

"My revered friend Fr. Devereux at the Cape, who knew your Grace in Ireland, informs me with deep regret that the Margist Mission is not to be sent out yet. But the cause he has yet to learn."

OVERLAND NEWS.—Letters from England, received by the last Overland Mail mention the following facts:—

The Rev. Mr. Sibthorpe is now publicly known to be deranged. On Sunday he hears mass in the morning and joins Protestant service in the evening.

The number of Oxford Converts to Catholicity is rapidly increasing, but that for the future the publication of their names, &c will be discontinued.

The late Mr. Beckford, the author of a work on Italy, when asked in his last illness by his physician what clergyman he would have, answered—"I don't know, but if I believe in any religion it is in the Roman Catholic."—He died without calling in any clergyman.

THE REV. MR. FREYCENON.

We have been favored with the following extracts of a letter from the Rev. Mr. Freycenon, dated Bandoorah 21st ultimo, to the address of His Grace, the Archbishop:

"Fifteen days ago, I visited twenty-five Christian families at Soolypoor, two days journey from this place—several of whom had never seen a European, and, consequently, eagerly gazed on me. The sight of my boat attracted a multitude to the river, and on landing the "Padre Sahib" was questioned from all sides. My answers so gratified them that they fell on their knees, reciting or singing the prayer, which they used to say after mass, giving thanks to God. After prayer, there was a profound silence, which was occasionally interrupted by the exclamations of the words "Christoo" and "Padre Sahib."—On the following day several of the Christians came to me and conducted me to their habitations. The whole day passed very profitably in giving them doctrinal instruction. I regretted much that circumstances would not permit my staying longer at this place, but I promised to visit them again soon, especially as they were all anxious to make their Confession. Twenty of their children are not yet baptized.

"Last month I visited the Christians of Mooshery-Kollah, who, as a mark of their gratitude, presented me with a very curious work of antiquity—an old sword, furred with cane and said to have been made in the 16th or 17th century. Several other places dispersed in different directions remain to be visited.

"Several Christians of Bandoorah have fallen back into schism, for we have neither Church nor burial ground in the place,—consequently they are in a manner compelled to go where they can bury their dead. Let means be sent and we shall soon have a new and beautiful Church."

BOMBAY MISSION.

Our Bombay correspondent of the 15th ultimo, mentions that the Right Rev. Dr. Wheelan, the Coadjutor to the Bishop, has left that Presidency for Poonah, where his lordship is expected to remain about a month or two. Rev. Messrs. Joao Cirjoytomo Mauchetti, Mamizio Luciano, and Ireneo Plezzadoro, Italian Missionaries, arrived at Bombay, on the Steamer Seostris, from Suva. They are of the Order of the Carmelites and left Rome on the 22nd May last, having had the honor of being presented to the Sovereign Pontiff who was at the time of their departure in the enjoyment of good health. These clergymen are attached to the Bombay Mission.

LETTER NO. XV.

FROM A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA TO HIS PROTESTANT FRIENDS IN EUROPE.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—Believe me, it is as disagreeable to me, as it must be painful to you, my having thus to continue the list of facts as to the disunity in Protestantism as a Christian society; but as it is necessary to expose and probe the wound before we can hope for a cure, so I must, in one or two more letters, lay before you further practical illustrations of your theory. It is acknowledged by some of your own writers that you cannot conceal your spirit of division and contention even in heathen and uncivilized lands. In Bengal I find that some of the Missionaries of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and Baptist Missionaries have attacked each other in the presence of the heathen, and in the neighbourhood of Calcutta. We read that they first circulated a Tract against the Baptists, and wherein it is said, "they (Baptist ministers) are ignorant people, and do not well understand the original languages. The opposers of infant baptism and other schismatics, are not from the Apostles; wherefore they, the ministers of the schismatics, are not from God, but from man; it is most evident they are not of Christ's true Church, &c." The Baptists instantly strike off a counter Tract and distribute it amongst the villagers against infant baptism, and in condemnation of the invasion of their missions. A Protestant Journal says of this, "we think they (such doings) must be regarded as the inevitable consequences of such intrusions and close approximations of different teachers." In the wilds of Canada, I remark the same sort of spirit at work. In one of the instructive Tracts, issued by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, there is an article thus headed, "Practical evils of dissent in the Colonies." It says, "The village of Huntingdon is one among many examples of the deplorable effects of schism in a new country; there, in a spot scarcely reclaimed from the woods, is a little collection of houses, a good mill, &c., one good spacious Church might contain all the worshippers; but here are four Protestant places of worship, altar against altar; all ill appointed, all ill supported, and while discordant preaching is going on, or unholy leagues are made of two or three irregular sects against the Church, and violent excitements are resorted to, &c." This corresponds with a scene which I saw once in a town in one of the colonies, that of two rival Churches built within twenty yards of each other, and a stately edifice of the Establishment was then building opposite, and at the distance of thirty yards from the others, and in which of course contradictory doctrines would be preached, "altar against altar," or rather pulpit against pulpit; and in order to perfect the scene an itinerant preacher must come, and take up his stand upon one of the massive blocks of stone intended for the High Church, preached evening after evening to mobs in the open air, until at last he was taken up by the magistrates and placed in the watch-house. Of late years, Plymouth-brethren have been transplanted from England into India: Officers chiefly of the army have come out converts to this new-light. I am assured that these modern saints meet in their own private houses, and that one of the party, by common consent, is metamorphosed for the time being, without changing the outward habilitment of the man, into a preacher and a man of prayer: they conscientiously avoid going to Church. There is a bewitching charm in all this; it is a most 'savoury unction to these latent feelings in man—pride and vain-glory; they are thus separated from the crowd; they are viewed, as they view themselves, as saints; they mix not among the throng of sinners, and thus others are caught in the snare. At the station from which I write, a society of this sort was lately formed, but of the "body of Methodists" they separated themselves from the multitude, would not attend Church or meeting houses, upon the ground that they would have to come in contact with sinners; they took as their text, "come out of her my children," but it proved an abortion; they quarrelled among themselves—this I had from an intelligent Protestant and a friend of some of the parties. That Plymouth-brethren are making inroads abroad, may account for the remarks made by the Right Rev. Dr. Wilson, of Calcutta, in one of his late charges; he denounces them thus, "I cannot conceal my judgment that they manifest the most deplorable ignorance, conceit and presumption; they overturn at once all order, all Churches, all Sacraments, all means of grace, the very perpetuity of the moral law itself; under the name of the spirit they deify self; claiming the Bible as their only rule, they substitute their ignorant perversions of its meaning; pretending to forsake the spirit of the world, they neglect the obvious means appointed by the mercy of God for the salvation of mankind; affecting an equality of rank, they prepare for the enormous evils of social anarchy; calling themselves brethren, they condemn and depreciate the holiest characters if not following with them." The Oxford Herald, in referring to this part of the Bishop's charge, observes that, "In some parts of the west of England this sect has long been progressing, and making many converts among the ignorant and unstable;" calls it, "pernicious tenets—this heresy." One of its advocates in India thus writes of the Bishop's sweeping denunciation: "To denounce as ignorant a Church which numbers amongst its body, some of the ablest and most eloquent men of the community; to impugn the principles of men, who are a living example of the virtues which were set before us by the author of Christianity himself; if the practice of self-denial, self-devotion, and love for the brethren, in its spiritual and more extended sense, form any part of Christianity, "the Plymouth-brethren partake largely of it," and he concludes by telling the Bishop that, "the days of mystery, and priestcraft he (the Bishop) sees are at an end." There is indeed hardly a newspaper or a book which treats of religious matters but bears the most damnable testimony to your disunity; not written by Catholics, but by legitimate Protestants; to whatever place or to whatever period of time we refer, we shall find the same demonstrative proof, and attested by yourselves, that your contending denominations are comprised in this text of Jude, as "These are they, who separate themselves; sensual men having not the spirit." The Scottish Christian Herald of April, 1836, thus scribes your scepticism, "And here to our surprise, we find scarce one among twenty that freely and frankly recognizes his own Christianity, without reserves and hesitations, that indicate a mind unsatisfied and unassured as to its own belief;" they are "tossed to and fro by every wind of doctrine." If I take up the life of Wesley, by Dr. Coke and Mr. More, I find that new Reformer of Reformers setting the spirit of Protestantism forth in his own sanctimonious and self-glorified way, he tells us that, "Instead of this (the established Clergy receiving him and his ministers with open arms) the greater part spoke of those ministers (Methodists) as if the devil, not God, had sent them; some repelled them from the Lord's table; others stirred up the people against them, representing them even in their public discourses as fellows not fit to live, papists, heretics, traitors, conspirators against their King and country, how did they (the established clergy) watch over the sinners lately reformed? Even as a leopard watcheth over his prey; they drove some of them from the Lord's table, they preached all manner of evil concerning them, openly cursing them in the name of the Lord, they turned many out of their work; persuaded others to do so, too, and harassed them in all manner of way. The Society in that city (London) had recently, and deeply, experienced the mischievous effects of that instruction (given by the Clergy of the Establishment) which is not according to the Oracles of God," p. 1856. But what are these, as St. Paul tells Timothy, but the "conflicts of men corrupted in mind, and who are destitute of the truth; from which arise envies, contentions, blasphemies, evil suspicions." Wesley and all the men of his time are gone to their account, but do you not recognize that the same contentious spirit which existed then in the bosom of Protestantism, exists now in Scotland, now in England, and all over the Protestant world? Only by the last Mail I remark that some ministers of the Church of England have denounced that great religious Sectarian Beggarmen, Dr. Chalmers, and his Scottish brethren as, "in heart, soul, and spirit, haters, even to blood, of the Church of England." Saith Jeremiah, the Prophet, "Peace, peace, when there is no peace." Is not this literally your case?—you have no peace, but disunions, enmities, contentions, dissensions, and quarrels, and yet, as the prophet says, you are "not confounded with confusion, and know not how to blush." Will not the inspired words of Jeremiah awaken you to reflection?—"Wherefore they shall fall among them that fall; in the time of their visitation they shall fall down, saith the Lord." Doth he not with the Spirit of God point out to you the Church of Christ and of all ages?—"Stand ye on the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, which is the good way; and walk ye in it; and you shall find refreshment for your souls." Ah! my friends, will you say, "We will not walk" in the "old paths," but will tread in the opposite tracks newly traced out for us by the teachers of the day, this way, that way, wandering in all directions. Hear the Prophet again, "And I appointed watchmen over you, saying; Hearken ye to the sound of the trumpet; And they said; we will not hearken." How pointedly does this mark you out. Christ says "hear the Church" "he who heareth you (the Pastors of his Church) heareth me." "Hearken to the sound of the trumpet." Hear the voice of the Church—"the Church of the living God" through whom Christ speaks to us, and you say, "we will not hearken." We will not hear her trumpet voice! We will not hearken to these "Watchmen," but to the dictates of our own private judgment! Oh! it is awfully clear! fearfully striking!! terribly prophetic!!! And the man of God further says, "Behold, I will bring evils upon this people, the fruits of their own thoughts; because they have not heard my words, and they have cast away my law." "The fruits of their own thoughts," the fruits of your own opinions and private interpretation of Scripture. Behold, these "evils" are now threatening the people of Great Britain. Does not one of your own great men say, that, "We are between the two seas of heresy and infidelity," such are "the fruits of your own thoughts." St. Peter again in his Second Epistle writes, "there shall be among you lying teachers, who shall bring in sects of perdition, and deny the Lord who bought them, bringing upon themselves swift destruction." Have not the Unitarians, Socinians, &c. actually done this, "deny the Lord who bought them," and do you not refuse to "hear his words" when you refuse to hear his Church, and the injunctions enjoined thereby? In a printed Sermon preached at Sydney, New South Wales, in 1837, and before the Lord Bishop, and the Diocesan Committee for the Propagation of the Gospel, there is the following avowal made in it, it says—"The Church of England is distinct from the Protestant community at large, and is a species of itself; she holds principles opposite to those of the Church of Rome, and also some contrary to the great body of Protestants. Look for a moment at the Church of Geneva. It is notorious that in the present day, she has become a mere shadow of Christianity; Socinianism on the Continent, among the German Neologians. Is this declension from the Catholic and primitive faith to be seen? In England, also, the increase of Socinianism, among Independent communities is no longer an opinion, but a fact." Again, he says, "Luther speaks of consubstantiation in reference to the symbol of the Holy Sacrament; Zuinglius, calls it a commemorative rite only. Again on the Sacrament of Baptism, three different opinions are propounded; Calvin's Baptism is regeneration by the death of Christ, sealed by Baptism; Zuinglius regards Baptism as a mere outward sign; Melancthon says, we believe the child is free from original sin," and he might add the modern belief of Methodists; their Baptism is a regeneration different from all these: the Baptists, Ana-Baptists, Quakers &c. have their own particular "notions," and this writer asks, "In this and other contrarieties what course is a Church to pursue that Unity of doctrine and faith may be consequently held and maintained." Will you answer the question, my friends,—'What course?' Do you adhere to the Rule which produces such heterogeneous sects and contradictory creeds, or have you some new device to pursue? But perhaps you may remark that whatever dissensions now disgrace Protestantism, the glorious Reformers of old, Luther, Zuinglius, &c. worked together in harmonious unity. Be the judge; but these worthies are worthy to have a letter entirely devoted to themselves.

Yours Faithfully

C. A. C.

The following lines are from a Catholic lady in the Madras presidency of most respectable family.

THE MISSIONARIES.

The advent of Dr. Olfitt and his companions will be an epoch in the religious history of India. We can only hail its dawn, blessed will those be who record its triumphs. The regret that mourned their departure from Ireland, may be imagined by all:—the joy that will greet their arrival, animates every heart.

FARWELL.

The sound long echoes o'er the deep
From Erin's verdant isle,
And if some mortals there may weep,
The angels brightly smile,—
As hovering round the sacred bark,
Intrusted to their care,
They view, as in a second ark,
God's choicest mercy there.
These pilgrims yearn to chase away
The darkness that o'erwhelms
The gorgeous East, and light convey
To India's hundred realms.—

*This light will cheer the holy band
Across the billow's foam,
And promise in that distant land
* A sanctuary and home!—*

WELCOME!

'Tis borne upon the spicy gale,
From Asia's far famed shore,
All Christian hearts the pilgrims hail,
Like friends long known before.
And though the future be concealed,
Yet still we may descry
Those blessings to the mind revealed,
By faith's prophetic eye.—
New altars on the Indian sod,
Where kneels each white-robed Priest,
Offering his converts unto God,
Now Christians of the East.
And Nuns whose heav'nly accents teach
The dark-eye'd babes to pray,
While their pure lives most clearly preach
The Gospel's sacred way.

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

Mrs. Waller, through His Grace the Archbishop,	Rs 20 0
Two Friends, thro' the Rev. Mr. Storck, . . .	8 0
THROUGH MR. N. O'BRIEN
Captain Cunningham,	1 0
Ramkianoo,	2 0
Bellie Thomson,	8 0
Captain Chester,	5 0
A Friend,	1 0
J. L.	1 0
J. P. A Friend,	1 0
J. Morrell,	3 0
An anonymous charitable friend has presented ten pieces of American Drill to the Orphanage and the various religious establishments in the Bengal Vicariate, with a request for the prayers of the Orphans.

BENGAL MISSION.

Through the Rev. Dr. Kennedy, 30 0

O'CONNELL TESTIMONIAL.

C. R. Lackersteen,	50 0
W. R. Lackersteen,	50 0
Rev. J. Storck,	10 0

Selections.

The Rev. Peter Powell has been appointed by the venerable Archbishop of Dublin as curate to the Rev. Mr. Fagan, P. P. of Kilquade and Newtown, Mount Kennedy, in the country of Wicklow. We trust that, with renewed health, these two earnest disciples of Father Mathew will be enabled to do all the good of which they are so desirous.—Tablet.

* Though I have scattered them afar off, among the heathen yet will I be to them as a sanctuary in the countries where they shall come.—Ezekiel xi. 16.

MONTH OF MARY.—The usual devotions in honour of the ever Blessed Virgin Mary, commenced in the Church of St. Audeon, on Wednesday last, with a solemn High Mass, ending with the devotions and benedictions of the Most Holy Sacrament. The Rev. J. Farrel preached a clear, solid, and pathetic sermon, on the nature, grounds, and importance of these devotions to the Mother of God. These pious exercises continue every evening during the month, at seven o'clock, and are attended by thousands. They commenced on the 1st instant, in the Church of St. Francis of Assisium, Merchant's-quay, with a solemn High Mass, Prayers, and Benediction. These devotions are also practised in Cork, Waterford, Wexford, and in many other parts of Ireland, with great spiritual profit. On the first and last days, and on each Sunday of the month, a great number of Catholics approach the holy communion and invoke the Holy Virgin to pray her Divine son to have mercy on them in all their temporal and spiritual necessities. The first Friday of the month is observed with marked piety in all the churches consecrated to the august devotion in honour of the Sacred Heart of our Lord Jesus Christ. Mass, Benediction, and solemn act of Reparation at eight o'clock in the morning. The solemn exposition of the most Holy Sacrament commenced at six in the morning, and terminated at six in the evening, in the Church of St. Francis of Assisium, Merchant's-quay, Dublin.—Tablet.

THE CONFRATERNITY OF THE IMMACULATE HEART OF MARY.—Notwithstanding the permission lately given by the Protestant Archbishop of Canterbury, to write against the veneration which "Roman" Catholics pay to the ever Blessed Virgin—these "Romanists" appear daily more and more anxious to extend this most salutary devotion far and wide. Already confraternities, in connection with that of Paris, have been established throughout the country. On the first instant, with the permission of the venerable bishop and the rev. pastor, a confraternity was founded in the Church of Birr, or Parsonstown, and the usual letter of aggregation duly signed and received, to the joy of the parishioners.—Ibid.

The Catholic College of All Hallows, at Drumcondra, for the benefit of the foreign missions, is abundantly progressing in the great work for which it was founded. The subscriptions and donations are daily augmenting; the number of professors has been increased; nearly fifty ecclesiastical students are being educated for the foreign missions, and arrangements are being made to place the establishment upon a still more profitable and permanent basis.—Ibid.

GOWRAN.—CONVERSION.—A Gowran correspondent informs us that on Sunday last, the 23rd instant, at the chapel of Gowran, at twelve o'clock mass, Robert Harwood, shoemaker, aged forty years, who had been all his previous life a Protestant, was received into the Catholic Church, by the Rev. Mr. Walsh, C. C., and read aloud before the congregation, his profession of faith, and his recantation of the errors of Protestantism.—Kilkenny Journal.

THE SACRO MONTE DI VARALLÒ.

A truly remarkable spot, very little known to ordinary travellers; yet, for natural beauty of situation, it may compete with many a more celebrated site, and for the accessory attractions held forth to curiosity and devotion, the sanctuary of the Sacro Monte may challenge comparison with the most noted scenes of religious pilgrimage in the world.

The Val Sesia is an exquisitely picturesque valley, within easy distance from the shores of the Lago Maggiore. The little town of Varallo stands within its romantic defiles, and, seen from a lofty bridge, crossing the rocky mountain stream of the Sesia, presents to the eye just such a landscape as limners and poets love. The "Sacro Monte" rises immediately behind it, and is ascended by a paved path, winding round the side of the hill, offering at every turn prospects of the most enchanting variety. This curious mount has fifty oratories upon it, besides the principal church, fountains, and other religious adornments. Each oratory has an architectural facade, and is occasionally decorated with a dome and portico, beneath which the spectator gazes through apertures resembling the peep-holes of a cosmorama, and beholds within them sculptured and habited figures as large as life, so grouped as to represent all the leading events in the history of our Saviour. The eye is at once fascinated and absorbed by the immense diversity of subjects all bearing upon the one great theme of human redemption, and thus to see

"The life as lively mock'd, as ever Still sleep mock'd death :"

produces upon the imagination a dreamy and most bewildering effect. A perfectly labyrinthine arrangement prevails among the truly curious oratories of the Sacro Monte, impressing the stranger with a notion that they occupy a considerable expanse of ground, whereas they are, in fact, crowded within narrow compass. The models are painted, and many of them clothed in real draperies, and adorned with human hair: so artistically, however, is every subject grouped, that no incongruity of costume or appearance is observable. Fresco paintings, many of them by eminent Italian masters, blending with the subjects of the sculptured figures, greatly assists and heightens the effect of the various representations. All of these are extremely ingenious, some of them marvellously fine. In the group representing the Fall of Man, Adam and Eve are beheld surrounded by animals of every kind, from an elephant to a mouse. The representation of the Massacre of the holy Innocents contains sixty figures and the subject of the Transfiguration is represented upon an immense scale. The figure of the demoniac boy is in the foreground. On the summit of a large artificial mountain are the three disciples, gazing in holy transport on their beatified Master, who, with Moses and Elias, are seen soaring above them, while the host of heaven are delineated within the vaulted dome, the height of which, in reality a hundred and sixty feet, by the magical arrangement of light and shade, appears far greater. The "raising of Lazarus from the dead," is another subject which deeply absorbs contemplation, and each stage in the progress of our Saviour's passion, is delineated with fidelity and truth that rivet attention and devotional sympathy. The representation of "Christ lying in the Sepulchre," is imposing in the highest degree. The spectator passes from daylight into a gloomy vault, and is at first unable clearly to distinguish any object. As, however, his vision becomes accustomed to the darkened medium, there breaks on his sight the lifeless body of Christ, in all the stillness and majesty of sepulchral repose. It is a scene of holy delusion that might convert at once a sinner into a saint!

The church of Sacro Monte is a handsome edifice, and the resident clergy have adjoining habitations of surpassingly beautiful situation. The place was originally founded in 1486, by Bernerdino Caimo, a noble Milanese, who established there four chapels, which the piety and munificence of princes and rich devotees successively increased to their present number. The great St. Carlo Borromeo twice visited the Monte Sacro di Varallo, and the pallet bedstead on which he died, is there preserved as a relic. Other objects of devotion are exhibited to the many pilgrims that resort to the holy mount of Varallo, such as an exact model of the Scala Santa at Rome, with relics and memorials of saints. It is a spot which, of course, offers many a salient point to the sneers of infidelity, and the sarcasms of heresy; but to the Catholic, who knows how to appreciate the spirit of piety which lends a charm and a grace to such graven commemorations of the mighty events of old, a visit to the Sacro Monte di Varallo, will be fraught with interest and edification.—Catholic Magazine.

THE GREAT ST. BERNARD.

The very uttermost malevolence of anti-monastic spirit has never found aught to assail or condemn in the constitution and character of those admirable sons of the mountain and the mist, who, at the daily peril and certain shortening of their lives, devote themselves, amid the cold and cheerless wildernesses of the Alps, to the exercise of that most glorious of all virtues, charity to their fellow-creatures, in its loftiest sense and most disinterested form. For upwards of eight centuries, the lonely monastery of the pass of St. Bernard has been the refuge and the salvation of the bewildered and exhausted traveller. During that long period, of what heroic self-denial, of what superhuman virtue, has that desolate convent been the scene!

If, in the sight of Heaven, the good actions of men ascend like the fragrance of incense, from what spot on the whole earth has a more unceasing stream of sweet savours flowed heavenwards than from those frozen and pathless wilds?

With descriptions of the Alpine region, where, more than eight thousand feet above the level of the sea, the famous hospice of St. Bernard offers to mankind the welcome refuge of its sanctuary,—and with accounts of the piety, the intrepidity, the social attainments, and the exalted virtues of its hardy inmates, the world has been long too rife, for any additional particulars of our own to throw further light upon an institution so universally known and appreciated. We but point with a feeling of indescribable pride to the hospice of St. Bernard, as to one of those wonderful foundations which could have flourished but in the bosom of the Catholic Church, and the very existence of which is an unfailing argument in favour of the truth of that religion of which those holy and generous monks are at once the humblest votaries and brightest ornaments.—Ibid.

ERECTION OF A NEW CATHOLIC CHURCH IN LIVERPOOL.

The ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of the new Catholic Church in Edmund-street, for the district of St. Mary, took place at half-past twelve o'clock, in the presence of upwards of two thousand spectators. The new erection will at once be a magnificent ornament to the neighbourhood, and a most convenient building for the administration of the ordinances of the Church to the spiritual necessities of the people. Its situation is on the south side of the street, upon the site of the old chapel, which has recently been removed in consequence of its utter inadequacy to accommodate the rapidly-increasing Catholic population of the district. Plans and designs for the building have been furnished by A. Welby Pugin, Esq., architect, of London; and the execution of the stone-work has been entrusted to Mr. Myers, who, no doubt, will creditably acquit himself. The body will be of the elaborately decorative style of the time of the eighth Henry; and above it will rise a splendid tower and spire to the very conspicuous height of 270 feet. The interior is calculated to furnish ample seat room for 1,500 persons.

The proceedings of the day commenced by the solemn celebration of High Mass in the temporary chapel in Rag-street; after which a procession was formed which proceeded to the ground in Edmund-street. We there observed amongst the clergy and gentry present, the Right Rev. James Sharples, D.D., Coadjutor Vicar Apostolic of Lancashire; the Right Rev. Dr. Brown, Vicar Apostolic of Wales; the Very Rev. H. Brewer, of Brownedge; the Rev. Dr. Appleton; the Rev. Wm. Parker; the Rev. Richard Gallow; the Rev. T. Fisher; the Rev. T. Bonney; the Rev. J. Wilkinson; the Rev. A. Abraham, of Netherton; the Rev. R. Tyrer; the Rev. R. Hoole; the Rev. S. Phillips, of Woolton; the Rev. P. Greenough, of Ince; the Rev. C. Shann, of Little Crosby; the Rev. G. A. Caldwell, of Ormskirk; the Rev. L. Cooper, of Warrington; the Rev. J. Carr, of Alburgh; John Rosson, Esq.; the members of the committee, and a large body of their friends.

Prayers, in the first instance, were offered in a temporary building erected for the purpose; after which the Right Rev. Coadjutor Bishop proceeded, in full vestments, to the bank immediately upon the side of the stone. Here he was presented, by Mr. Myers, and the gentlemen of the committee, with a handsome silver trowel, the handle to which was of elaborately carved ivory, to be used on the occasion. The plate of the trowel bore the following inscription, very neatly engraved: "Hic erit in signum pietatis et benevolentie. Ecece, B. V. M. In Jacovum Epum. Samar. et Vic. Ap. Dist. Lan. Coadj. an. Sal., 1844." A variety of documents, on which were inscribed the names of the various officers and dignitaries of the church, the pontificate of his Holiness Pope Gregory XVI., the Queen, the incumbent of the Church, as well as the current coins of the period, being placed in a bottle, hermetically sealed, were all deposited in a niche in the stone, which was immediately afterwards lowered to its place, there to remain, we devoutly pray, for ages upon ages, a monument of the public spirit, religious feeling, and liberal hearts of the Catholics of the present day. The ceremony closed with further prayers and a most affectionate benediction upon the people, by the venerable and esteemed Coadjutor Vicar Apostolic.

At the close of the religious ceremony Mr. Rosson addressed the assembly. Referring to the desirableness of a perfect co-operation between the English and the Irish Catholics, the learned and eloquent gentleman said that if there were two classes in any part of the world which ought to embrace each other, they were the persecuted Saxons of Lancashire and the persecuted Catholics in Ireland. Both, no doubt, were descended from martyrs for the same holy and sacred cause; let them, therefore, join heart and hand in furthering such proceedings as that which had been seen to-day, under the auspices of the beneficent and distinguished prelate who had officiated with so much grace and dignity, and who would make no distinction among the laity over whom Almighty God had been graciously pleased to place him. Nearly a century ago, in 1748, when the stand was made for the Stuarts, and the Catholics of Liverpool, his own family included, were persecuted and ruined, a chapel standing on the spot where the stone had just been deposited was burned down, as well as the house of the priest, who calmly read from his ritual the "preparation for death," and then, dressed in his vestments, and with the steadiness of faith passed through the mob, who, astonished, gave way on all sides, and a Presbyterian gave him shelter till all danger had passed away. It was thus God had protected them through peril, and now they might worship in safety and with the respect of their neighbours.

In the building which had been removed for a capacious erection, he (Mr. Rosson) had the great blessing of being received into the Church of Christ; and at the same time he felt the deepest gratitude in his heart for the worthy members of the illustrious order of St. Benedict and St. Ignatius, under whom he had received the further blessing of education. He would then deposit his humble offering to God, and entreat all present to do their utmost in like manner. Among the contributions laid on the stone, were—5*l.* from Mr. Fynnay, 1*l.* from Mr. Rosson, &c.

In the evening the members and friends of St. Mary's Society, about one hundred in number, sat down to a sumptuous dinner, provided by the care of Mrs. Shepherd, the hostess of the Grecian Hotel, Dale-street. The Very Rev. Henry Brewer, D.D., presided, supported by the Right Rev. Dr. Sharples. Sir Arnold Knight, M.D., the Right Rev. Dr. Brown, John Rosson, Esq., Morgan O'Connell, Esq. (Merchant of Liverpool,) Richard Shiel, Esq., Gerald Lynch, Esq., Hugh Bullen, Esq., and many other equally respectable Catholic gentlemen. Several eloquent and interesting speeches were made in the course of the evening, in proposing and responding to the toasts. The proceedings were enlivened by some excellent catches, glee and madrigals, performed by four professional singers, and the company separated at half-past ten o'clock.—Tablet.

THE ANTI-CATHOLIC PENAL CODE.

Mr. Anstey has the merit of being the first to draw the attention of the Catholic public* to the fact that the old penal code is still in force, except with regard to those persons who may have given requisite security for their good behaviour by taking the oaths set forth in the various Emancipation acts. The old penal code is not dead, but sleepeth; and so sleeps that it may easily be revived again. At this moment there is no doubt that sundry priests, country gentlemen, gamekeepers, school-masters—to say nothing of Jesuits and Monks—are as much obnoxious to these forgotten penalties as they ever were.

That huge two-handed engine at the door,
Stands ready to smite once and smite no more.

As to the "smite no more," we are not quite so sure; but the "ready to smite once" is an undeniable truth.

When this statement was first made public, we believe many of our alert and energetic co-religionists were rather annoyed at finding that any reckless individual had dared to waken them out of their slumber of security, and attract attention to the fact that danger still surrounded them. Some even ventured to doubt the unpleasant news, though the private judgment of the writer we have mentioned was borne out by the official assurances of the Criminal Law Commissioners. This affected or ignorant scepticism was very well for a time. But, now, what will it say for itself?

We have before us a bill that has just been laid upon the table of the House of Lords by Lord Brougham. It is a tolerably bulky affair, extending to more than two hundred pages of closely wedged matter, from which almost all traces of verbiage have been expunged. It is entitled "An Act to amend and consolidate the Criminal Law of England, so far as relates to the definition of indictable offences and the punishment thereof." We turn over a few leaves with our minds directed for the most part to sheep-stealing, will-forging, wife-killing, and such like offences—when lo! at page 43, we are induced to stop by observing a particularly short clause. It is numbered "Art. 189." Well, what is it? Hey-day! As we live!

"ART. 189.

"Whosoever shall say or sing Mass shall incur the penalties of the class."

And then follows—

"ART. 190.

"Whosoever shall willingly hear Mass, shall incur the penalties of the class."

This wakes us up a bit; and on looking a little more closely into these Articles, we find about fifteen pages taken up with a compressed and scientific re-enactment of the whole penal code. The only consolation we can discover under this threatened infliction, is contained in "Art. 207," which declares that the aforesaid penal articles shall not "be deemed to affect any person professing the Roman Catholic religion, who shall take and subscribe, according to law, the oath mentioned in Art. 156." That is to say, every priest who says Mass, and every layman who goes to chapel on Sunday morning, is liable to indictment and to the old penalties unless he takes the oath! This, be it repeated, is no new enactment; it is the existing law. By the laws of this most wise country you, Jack the cobbler, and you, Paddy the labourer, commit a misdemeanour every time you attend chapel, unless you have taken the oath! And what, think you, is the punishment of your offence? "Forfeiture of 100 marks (66²/3 13s. 4d.) and imprisonment for one year." Nothing less.

The case of the person saying Mass without taking the oath, is even worse. His punishment is "forfeiture of 200 marks (133¹/3 6s. 8d.) and imprisonment for one year, and thenceforth till payment of the 200 marks." But this is not all. The priest is not free from this fine and imprisonment even if he has taken the oath. He is still liable to the penalty after the oath, unless he is registered at the quarter-sessions; unless his chapel is registered; if he officiates at any chapel "with a steeple and bell;" or, at any funeral in any church or churchyard; or if he "shall exercise any of the rites or ceremonies of his religion, or wear the habits of his order, save within some place of congregation or assembly for religious worship permitted by the before-mentioned Act, or in a private house where there shall not be more than five persons assembled besides those of the household." That is, we take it, if the priest sits in the Confessional at his own house, with his stole on, while half-a-dozen penitents wait in his private chapel, or sitting-room, to go to their duty!

Of course, neither Lord Brougham nor the Commissioners are to blame for these things. The latter have only done their duty; which was to make an accurate digest of existing law and lay it before Parliament for its consideration. The unpleasant thing is, that these things form part of the existing law.

It so happens that on Friday last a question was put to Sir James Graham on this very subject. We have been supplied with a fuller notice of what was said than has been published in any of the other papers, and we here subjoin it.

In the House of Commons, on Friday, Mr. WATSON had a question to propose to the right hon. baronet the member for Dorchester. The Criminal Law Commissioners, in their report, suggested that the penal laws relating to religion particularly, as affecting Roman Catholics, should be revised. They had not, indeed expressly recommended it, as it involved questions of a political nature—many of those laws are obsolete, although still in force. Several petitions from Roman Catholics to this effect were presented by him during the last session of Parliament. The question he asked was, is it the intention of her Majesty's Government to bring in any bill during the present session, or to take means to carry out that suggestion.

Sir JAMES GRAHAM was much obliged to the honourable and learned gentleman for calling his attention to this subject. He (Mr. Watson) had mentioned it to him some weeks ago, and he was happy to say that he was now able to give him a full, and, he hoped, a satisfactory answer. It was very true, as stated by the honourable and learned gentleman, that many of the statutes concerning offence against religion were fallen into desuetude, particularly those of Elizabeth and James I., passed against Popery, the policy of which was long since effaced. He had given the subject the gravest consideration, and the result was that he had now consulted with the law officers of the Crown, and hoped, with their help, to be able to carry out the views of the Criminal Law Commissioners.

* "Guide to the Laws affecting Roman Catholics." By T. C. Anstey, Esq. London, Stevens and Norton. 1842.

On the other hand, we understand that besides the bill for amending the laws touching "Roman Catholic charitable donations," of which we printed one of the principal clauses last week, Lord Beaumont has another bill on the table of the House of Lords for repealing the entire body of the penal code. How much good may come of these efforts we cannot tell, but while rendering due thanks to Lord Beaumont and Mr. Watson for their more public and notorious labours, it is due to Mr. Anstey to state—what we believe to be the fact—that but for his suggestions it is very probable that neither the Peer nor the Commoner would have stirred hand or foot in the business. Mr. Anstey drew up and had engrossed the petitions which Mr. Watson presented last session. Mr. Anstey, we believe, first drew Mr. Watson's attention to the subject upon which he has now procured so satisfactory an answer from Sir James Graham. And, though we do not know the fact, we are very much mistaken if it was not Mr. Anstey who prompted Lord Beaumont, and perhaps drew up the two bills which he has now laid before the House. We say this to do justice to a name not before the public in regard to these important matters. But as to Sir James Graham, we devoutly hope that he may not (as heretofore) play us a slippery trick in this business. He holds out hopes that he will give effect to the recommendations of the Criminal Law Commissioners. But what are these recommendations? Why, merely that the penal code should be revised; but what part of it is to be retained, and what expunged, neither Sir James nor the Commissioners have yet told us. It will be well to remember that whatever remnants of the code are now retained, are retained with double meaning, and with a deliberate intention to carry them into effect. But any how, and whatever the result, it is policy to have these things discussed, and to throw the light of day upon them.—Tablet.

PROGRESS OF TEMPERANCE.

A most gratifying Temperance demonstration was held on Sunday evening in Newmarket-on-the-Combe, once the scene of peace, plenty, and employment—now the abode of poverty and wretchedness. Long before the hour appointed, streets leading to the place of rendezvous were crowded with persons of every age, each grade, and of all creeds—religious and political—to welcome to the "Liberty" Father Spratt, who arrived at five o'clock, and was hailed with the warmest manifestations of delight by the vast assemblage, which, at the lowest calculation, amounted to ten thousand persons.—The revered and venerable President was accompanied by the heads of the Irish and Saint Joseph's Societies, and by almost all the eloquent advocates in the city and its vicinity. The police of the district, under the management of Superintendent Walsh, assisted in making room for the several batches of postulants during the evening—(twelve hundred took the pledge). How rejoiced must not the thinking citizen be to behold Doctor Spratt, on the evening of the Lord's Day, making men sober, and pledging them against intoxicating drinks. Indeed, it could be said of him that he was then "verily the Shepherd of the fold of Christ." The Rev. Gentleman took the chair at five o'clock. He opened the meeting with a most instructive and eloquent discourse on the blessings of the doctrine which he came to promulgate, and called on the people to take advantage of the present opportunity. He entreated of them not to enrich a few by impoverishing the many, and to diminish crime by shutting up the flood-gate of all vice. He conjured and exhorted them to join the peaceful standard of Father Mathew, who was the best friend of the human race.

Mr. Flinn next spoke to the people, and gave them a most practical lecture on the evils of intemperance.

Mr. Martin A. Brennan was then introduced to the meeting, and spoke at great length.

Mr. Tompkins next delivered an animated speech, and, as he was concluding, the City Marshal, Thomas Reynolds, Esq., made his appearance, and was hailed with loud acclamation.

Messrs. Hayes, of Kingstown, Battersby, Coyne, and others, subsequently addressed the meeting.

At intervals the bands played several lively airs. —Doctor Spratt, at the close of the meeting, went to Stafford Street, and French-street, to administer the pledge.—Evening Post.

MISCELLANEA.

HANLEY.—CONVERSIONS.—On Sunday last four very intelligent and respectable families, making in all fifteen persons, were received into the bosom of the Holy Catholic Church, at Hanley, and made a public profession of faith, under the direction of the Rev. T. O'Keeffe, the pastor of that mission.—Tablet.

CANADA.—M. Moreau was at Montreal on the 3d May, preparing for his mission to Themiskaning, in which a Reverend Father of the Oblats, Father Laverbochere, would accompany him; two other priests of that community were going out; M. Boruassa, to St. Maurice with M. Payement, and the other, M. Pierre Fiset, to the Saugean Indians, with M. Boucher. The three young priests were ordained at Acadia by the Bishop of Kingston, Mgr. Gaulier, on the 5th of May.

On the 18th April Miss Nesbitt and Miss Cadoret made their religious profession at Quebec; Miss Lemorin, Miss Pelletier, and the Misses Paré and Guigras, took the white veil; and on the 22d Fournier de St. Thomas made her profession.

Four hundred and seven children of the parish of Notre Dame de Quebec, half speaking French and the other half English, made their first communion on the 2d of May.—Ibid.

NEW YORK.—CONFIRMATIONS.—On Sunday last, in St. Peter's Church, the Rt. Rev. Bishop of New York confirmed nearly 200 persons, of whom several were adults and converts. For three days previous there had been a spiritual Retreat under the direction of the Sisters of Charity, with instructions by Rev. Dr. Pise. Most of those confirmed also received their first communion, before which a hymn was chanted by all the children, producing a very touching effect, and the "Act of Atonement" was read beautifully, with marked propriety of accent and emphasis, by one of the smaller girls. The Rt. Rev. Prelate preached at half-past ten o'clock. The same day, at St. Joseph's Church, the Rt. Rev. Coadjutor Bishop of New York confirmed upwards of 350 persons, of whom, in like manner, many were adults and converts. As to St. Peter's, a spiritual Retreat preceded, and most of the newly confirmed received first communion. The Rt. Rev. Prelate preached at half-past ten o'clock.—Freeman's Journal.

CHARLESTON.—"POPISH PRACTICES."—Extensive arrangements having been made in Charleston to celebrate the visit of Mr. Clay to that city (expected to be on Thursday in Holy week) by a grand ball the same night, the Protestant Episcopal Bishop promptly issued a circular letter to the members of his communion, warning them against desecrating the holy season by participating in the intended festivities. He tells them that nothing would afflict him more "than the knowledge that any one of them would consent to countenance in the least either a public or private entertainment in the week before Easter, and especially on Friday—the day of the death of our blessed Lord, or on Thursday, the day on which He went into the garden of his agony," &c. The rector of the Protestant Episcopal Church of St. Michael, urging the letter of the bishop upon the attention of his congregation, goes still further, and threatens to refuse "the Easter Communion" to all who disregard the admonition. His address is most earnest. This is all well enough. It is a return to good principles, and is inasmuch a cause for rejoicing. "Trendimus in Latium" is still the word. But, what a clamour there would be about "Priestly interference," "Popish arrogance," and all that, if a Catholic bishop and priest attempted such a warning under such circumstances!—Telegraph.

ROME.—A few days back Dr. Baggs presented to his Holiness Drs. Grant and English, as respectively Pro-Rector and Vice-Rector of the English College, and they were graciously received by him and confirmed in their office.

Having thus seen the affairs of the College over which he had long presided satisfactorily settled, the Bishop of the Western District has left Rome, carrying along with him the affections and fervent prayers of many a heart that will pour forth a pious "God speed him" upon the head of one so justly dear to all.

Even as he was just departing, the English in Rome, both Catholic and Protestant, wished to present him with some token of their affection and gratitude: but as he would not delay his journey, this will be eventually sent to him in England. Yesterday the Rev. John Murphy left the Eternal City for the Lancashire District, and he will speedily be followed by the other clergymen recently ordained for the English missions. "How beautiful are the fact of them that preach the Gospel of peace, of them that bring glad tidings of good things!"—

I remain, my dear Sir,

Yours most obediently,

H. D.

Rome, April 19, 1844.

Tablet.

Extract from a letter from Rome of the 20th April:—"The Protestant noblemen here, and at their head Lord A. Fitzclarence, are going to present Dr. Baggs with a testimonial of their esteem and respect. Dr. Collier leaves in a few days. Dr. Baggs will be in England before Whitsuntide. His lordship passes by Loretto, Venice, Tyrol, Munich, and the Rhine. The English have been behaving most scandalously here this year—at least, some of them."—Ibid.

A correspondent at Rome of the Dublin Evening Mail communicates the following gratifying intelligence, dated Rome, April 3, 1844:—"An English lady of rank is to confirm this week, and many more, I here, are in preparation for the same ceremony. The male converts have generally received the rudiments of their education at Oxford. The females appear to have been well imbued with Tractarian views previously to their joining the church of Rome. On Candlemas day a number of officers, wearing the Queen's uniform and their different decorations of honour, appeared at St. Peter's, and each of them, on his knees, received from the Pope's own hands, a blessed candle, and then walked in the procession, holding the same lighted in their hands."—Quoted by the Freeman.

His Eminence the most Venerable the Cardinal Pucca, senior member of the Sacred College, died at Rome on the 19th ult., in the 88th year of his age. We have not details of the Court as yet.—Tablet.

FRANCE.—Three hundred Catholics, of Paris, assembled on the 25th ultimo, in the place Saint Thomas d'Aquin, and thence proceeded to the residence of the Comte de Montalembert, to whom they presented the following address:—

"MONSIEUR LE COMTE,—We approach you, as Catholics, to explain to you the profound impression which the eloquent speech you delivered in the Chamber of Peers, in support of Christian liberty, has left upon our hearts. Your words, Monsieur le Comte, will mark a new epoch in our history. For nearly three centuries, indeed, Catholicism has been progressively disappearing from our institutions, from our manners, from our sciences, from our arts, from our literature; and now the existence of a spiritual society appears almost an anomaly in the midst of the philosophical society of our day. You have shown to our modern sages, by invoking fifteen centuries of glory, that the French are a most Christian people, the eldest daughter of the Church, and in right of that title only does she move at the head of the nations. In vain our legists, misled by superannuated traditions, attempted to abolish liberty of conscience, and pretending that the modern Cæsar—that is to say the law, is, at the same time, pontiff, sovereign, and supreme arbiter of our faith: you have branded this most Pagan despotism, by opposing to it the traditions of Catholic France. No; our fathers did not break down the despotism of monarchy merely to bequeath to us the despotism of the philosophers. France has heard you, Monsieur le Comte; she, in her good sense, has felt that she was not herself. Others have admired the sincerity of your faith and the masculine freedom of your eloquence. As to us, not content with admiring, we have adopted your manifesto without reserve. 'I believe,' said a great man, 'that it never was more necessary to surround with all the rays of evidence a truth of the first order; and I believe, further, that truth has need of France.' It is the illustrious Count de Maistre, who testifies by our mouth that he has nobly served both France and truth. In the name of our faith and our patriotism, in union with the Catholic nations who, sighing, turn their eyes towards France, receive this public testimony of adhesion and gratitude. And ever, Monsieur le Comte, when you shall defend the independence of the Church, the liberty of conscience, the liberty of education, the liberty of the religious orders, the benediction of all Catholics will respond to your words."

The Count de Montalembert replied:—"If I receive with emotion and gratitude the step that you have been good enough to make towards me, if I rejoice to see the Catholics beginning on this occasion to count their numbers and to show their strength, it is certainly not that I desire to see in it any personal compliment to myself, but rather as homage paid to those principles of liberty and Catholicism which I have had the honour to defend, and that you all bear as much as I do in your hearts. The encouragement you afford me will fortify my resolution. I have need of it, gentlemen; we have all need of it for the struggle in which we are engaged will be as laborious as prolonged. We also have our Catholic emancipation to conquer. The acts emanating from diverse persons, which have passed over France, and by which our liberty is shackled, are certainly not quite so cruel and vexatious as the penal code which so long governed Catholics of a neighbouring country; but they are not less dangerous to the independence of the Church, and they are entirely incompatible with the principles of our constitution. To reconcile our laws, so contradictory and often so oppressive, with the character, so liberal and so just, is a task to which every one of us, each in his own sphere, ought to devote our lives. While the clergy fulfils its holy mission in disciplining our souls, it is for us laymen to pay them the debt, in restoring to them and to ourselves that liberty which is always the prime necessity of the Church. To succeed we can never have too much courage, patience and confidence in God. Our adversaries are numerous, exasperated, and redoubtable; but our duty is not to conquer, our duty is to fight. For the rest, gentlemen, if any one of our laws is oppressive, if the country itself is often unjust towards us, we never will be so to her. Blessed be the good God who gave for our birth-place a country which has conquered its political liberty, through which we may aspire to religious liberty. Let us bless Him that he has not placed us in one of those lands where despotism smothers all complaint, that of the Church as well as that of the people. Let us profit by this to invoke unceasingly publicity, the liberty of the press, and freedom of speech. Let us assume these new arms, these inappreciable arms, in the service of this old cause, which will never perish."—Tablet.

BELGIUM.

The cheerfulness of Catholic times is best preserved in this Catholic country. On the eve of May several societies of song serenaded the evening and madrigalled the morn at the Windows of the King, and those of the Ministers of State. The serenade and madrigal are not heard in the open air in England, much less as an expression of loyalty, or in honour of St. Phillip. —Ibid.

Again:—The month of Mary was commenced in many churches of this city by the interesting ceremony of the flower-offering. I went to see it in the church of St. Stephen of the Minims, where it was first introduced, and where it is kept up with most solemnity. I soon learned that the offering was postponed to the following Sunday; but in compensation we had a sermon full of flowers brighter than earthly ones, and more lasting, by Father Lalleur, who took the month of Mary for his subject. It was the first time at Brussels, although at Lille he had acquired great celebrity. He is of the same school and order with Father P. Deschamps. Every Tuesday and Wednesday morning, at half-past seven, throughout the month of Mary, the eloquent Father preaches in this Church.—Correspondent of the Journal de Bruxelles, of May 2.

GERMANY.

ALLEGED CONVERSION OF A PRUSSIAN MINISTER. The Cologne Gazette has the following from Hanover, 24th ult.:—"There is a report that the Count d'Hardemberg, Chamberlain of the King of Prussia, and his Ambassador at our Court, has become a Roman Catholic, and this is assigned as the motive of his recall. M. Schultze, the present Minister of Finance, will, it is said, be his successor."—Tablet.

LIBERTY OF CONSCIENCE AMONG CONVICTS. —Some months since, the chaplain of the Massachusetts State prison gave public notice that he had excluded from the school of the prison, and put out of the reach of prisoners, all books that were favourable to Unitarians or the Roman Catholic religion. On Friday, the following bill passed the Lower House in the Legislature of that State. Be it enacted, &c., as follows:—Section 1. The chaplain of the State prison shall permit, and supply the convicts, at proper hours, with the perusal of publications on all religious subjects of every denomination, offered for distribution. Section 2. No person who shall apply to be admitted as a Sabbath school teacher at the said prison, shall be refused admission, if any vacancy as a teacher exist, if he profess the Christian religion, and is of a good moral character. We take the above paragraph from the Baltimore Sun. We have frequently charged the Legislature of that State with bigotry towards Catholics—at least in the Convent case. We are happy to record an instance of liberality, though we fear had not the chaplain treated the Unitarians as scurvily as he did the Catholics, the Legislature would have postponed indefinitely any redress of the evil.—Ibid.

CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

No. 7.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, AUGUST 17, 1844.

[VOL. VII.

THE PRETENDED CHURCH HAS NOT, IN ITS MINISTERS, AN EXTRAORDINARY AND IMMEDIATE MISSION FROM GOD.

TRANSLATED FROM ST. FRANCIS OF SALES.

(Continued from our last.)

The foregoing reasons are so strong, that the boldest among you having abandoned the plea of ordinary mission, endeavour to persuade us, that their Reformers were sent extraordinarily by God, because the ordinary mission had been corrupted and at last abandoned with the true Church, under the tyranny of Anti-Christ. Behold their last retreat and strongest redoubt, and because it is common to all the heretical sects, it requires to be assailed by powerful arguments, and to be altogether destroyed from its foundations; let us put our arguments in order, and see if we can force this last barricado.

1st. I maintain that no one should claim extraordinary mission who cannot prove it by miracles; for I appeal to yourselves to say, in what predicament we should find ourselves, if this pretext of extraordinary mission were to be admitted, without good proof. Would it not be, most certainly, a cloak for all manner of libertines? What could prevent Arius, Marcion, Montanus, and Messalins from being received with honor into the rank of reformers, if they paid us with this coin, and gave us the same assurance of extraordinary mission.

2ndly. I maintain for certain, that no person was ever sent by God extraordinarily, who did not bring with him the credential letters of Divine Majesty. Moses* was sent immediately by God himself to govern the people of Israel; but before he went, he wished to know the name of him who sent him, and when he had learned the admirable name of God, he demanded the marks† and letters patent of his mission, a request which God himself deemed so just, that he bestowed on him the grace of working three sorts of prodigies and wonders which might serve as three public attestations, in three different tongues, of the commission which he gave him, in order that he who would not understand one, might comprehend another. If, then, our pretended Apostles claim extraordinary mission, let them show us some prodigy above the range of nature; otherwise, we are not bound to believe them. Truly, Moses well shows by his conduct the justice and necessity of this proof; for he to whom God speaks extraordinarily, must receive his authority in a miraculous manner: thus this great man, though he begged of God the gift of eloquence,* did not, however, ask it until he had received the power of performing miracles, thus indicating that it is more necessary to have authority to speak, than the gift of speaking with facility. Was not the mission of St. John the Baptist,† though not altogether extraordinary, authenticated by his conception and nativity,‡ and even by his miraculous life to which our Lord bore such honorable testimony? As to the Apostles,—who does not know the miracles wrought by them?§ and yet who could enumerate, then? Their handkerchiefs and their shadows|| cured the infirm and chased devils from the bodies of those possessed; the imposition of their hands¶ produced a multitude of signs and wonders among the people in confirmation of the doctrine which they preached. This is what St. Mark expressly declares, in the last words of his Gospel, as well as St. Paul in his Epistle to the Hebrews. Are those, therefore, who, in our age, pretend to an extraordinary mission, able to

* Exod. 4, 11.

† Luke 1, 63, &c.

‡ Luke 1, 63, &c.

|| Act 19, 11, and 12.

† Luke. 1, 18 &c

§ Mathew 11. 7, 8, &c.

¶ Ibid 5. 15.

Exod. 32, 10 and 13.

Exod. 4, 1, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, et. 9.

justify and recommend it by this proof? What privilege have they above the Apostles and Moses? Why should I say more? If our sovereign Master, consubstantial to the Father, whose mission was so authentic that it supposes in him the communication of the same essence,—if he, I repeat, who is the Living Source of all ecclesiastical mission, did not wish to be exempt from this proof of miracles, on what grounds can these new ministers be believed, on their bare word alone? Jesus Christ often alleges his mission in order to add weight to his teaching;* “As the Father hath sent me, I also send you.”† “My doctrine is not mine but his that sent me;” “you both know me and you know whence I am, and I ask not come of myself.” But also, in order to give authority to the effect of his mission, he displays his miracles, and declares, that if he had not done among the Jews the works which no other man had done, they would not have sinned in not believing him‡. And again he says to them; “believe you not that I am in the Father and the Father in me? Otherwise, believe for the very works’ sake.”§ After this, who will be so bold as to boast of an extraordinary mission without, at the same time, producing his miracles? Certainly, such a person should be regarded as an impostor. Now since not one of your ministers, from the first to the last, ever performed a single miracle, it follows that they had no extraordinary mission. I have one point more to advance, and it is a point on which there can be no doubt,—that no extraordinary mission ought to be admitted unless for the best reasons, if it be disowned, or even suspected by the ordinary authority which resides in the Church of our Lord; for we are bound to obey our ordinary pastors|| under the penalty of being declared publicans and heathens, and how then could we, without fear or suspicion, subject ourselves to any other discipline than theirs, if they should reject that which is extraordinary. In that case, we would be bound to hear the Church, and not receive these new comers, if they be disowned by the ordinary pastors.

God is not the author of dissension,¶ but of union and concord, and particularly among his disciples and ecclesiastical ministers. Our Lord shows this clearly, in the holy prayer which he addressed to his heavenly father at the close of his mortal life; and could his goodness contradict itself? Could he authorise, in opposition to each other, two sorts of pastors and two societies, the one extraordinary and the other ordinary. As to the ordinary pastors, it is certain that they have been authorised, and, for the sake of argument, let us suppose that these extraordinary pastors have been also authorised. Thus, there would be two Churches, which is contrary to the word of our Lord,—that he has but one spouse, that, his dove, his perfect one, is but one,* and how could a flock be well and faithfully guarded, under the guidance of two different shepherds, quite unknown to each other, who would lead the sheep into different pastures, who would guide them by different signs, and who would claim, each for himself, the entire flock; thus, the Church would be parcelled out here and there in different ways, under the government of different pastors, ordinary and extraordinary. Is our Lord divided, either in himself or in his body which is the Church†? No, truly it is not so; on the contrary, there is but one Lord‡ who has built and formed his mystical-body, with an elegant variety of members, well adjusted, collected and compact, bound together by all the joints of subordinate and mutual ministration, and, therefore, to bring the Church into this division of ordinary and extraordinary flocks, would be to ruin and destroy it. It remains for us, then, to return to what we stated above,—that an extraordinary vocation is never legitimate, if it be disavowed by the ordinary authority.

(To be continued.)

THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE ON TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

We come to consider next, the Christian Advocate's objection to Transubstantiation from St. John c. 6, v. 64, which passage, he says, explains, in a Protestant sense, all that our Saviour had said in the thirteen preceding verses. Let us therefore see how this one verse supports the Protestant view of the blessed Eucharist, and how it can be made by Protestant ingenuity to outweigh the value of the 13 immediately preceding verses which are as clear and strong as words can be in favour of the Catholic doctrine.

Is it not more probable that our Saviour's real meaning in this one verse, should be discovered by an attentive consideration of the preceding and subsequent verses, than all that goes before or follows should be explained by this solitary passage? Surely,

* John 20, 21.

† John 7, 16 and 28.

‡ Ibid 2, 24.

§ Ibid, 14, 11, and 13.

|| Mathew, 18, 17.

¶ 1 Cor. 44, 33.

 John 17, 11, and 12.

* Cant. 6, 8.

† Cor. 1, 13.

‡ Ephes. 4, 5 to 16.

it used to be, and is probably still, a maxim—that the surest way to obtain the meaning of a single expression or allusion, is to examine it in relation to what precedes and follows. But let us hear the champion of Protestantism in the Christian Advocate.

"It is evident," he says, "that his own disciples, as well as the other Jews, did understand him literally, and therefore they murmured and said; 'this is a hard saying, who can bear it.' But our Lord immediately corrects their mistake, and tells them in explanation of his meaning; 'It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing! the words that I speak unto you they are spirit and they are life.' So that this passage, so far from proving the point the Papists wish to establish, is, we apprehend, directly against them." We have, therefore, the Christian Advocate's acknowledgement, that the Jews and his own disciples understood our Saviour to speak literally, and not metaphorically, and therefore it is clear, that our Saviour's words, taken in their most probable, most obvious and most natural signification, promise us his real body, and not a mere figurative body, or a mere sign of his body. Did the Redeemer, in order to deceive the Jews and his own disciples, tell them, in explanation, that by his flesh and blood which he had promised them as meat and drink, he meant only the figure or sign of his flesh and blood? No such thing. Did he give any explanation incompatible with Catholic belief? No such thing. Did he give any explanation inconsistent with Protestant doctrine? Certainly, he did, "it is the spirit that quickeneth," says the Redeemer, the flesh profiteth nothing; the words that I have spoken to you are spirit and life." The Jews and carnal disciples imagined, that our Saviour promised them as meat, the dead flesh of a dead body, and as drink, the blood which once had flowed in the veins of that body; and being scandalized, they said; "how can this man give us his flesh to eat?"—"It is a hard saying and who can bear it?" Our Saviour, therefore, corrects their interpretation, not because it is literal, but because it is gross and carnal; he does not deny, that he intended to promise and give his real flesh, but he denies that he intended giving or promising, dead, inanimate, gross flesh, separated from the spirit; for such flesh would profit nothing unto life everlasting. Catholics believe and teach, that our Lord promised and bequeathed to the faithful in the blessed Eucharist, a living, not a dead, body; a spiritualised and glorified body, not a gross, corruptible body; a body not separated from the spirit, but united to it for ever in glory; the Catholic interpretation, therefore, is literal, but not gross or carnal, and accords admirably with the Saviour's explanation which confounds the carnal Jews and carnal Christians.

Let us ask the Christian Advocate, and in his person, we seriously ask every Protestant, this fair, simple, question. If, as the Redeemer says, flesh profiteth nothing, what will mere wheaten bread profit? Surely, mere wheaten bread is no better than mere flesh from the shambles, and if the flesh profiteth nothing, what profit can be derived from mere bread? We defy any Protestant in Calcutta or elsewhere, to give a satisfactory answer to this question, on Christian principles. *Protestants hold that they have nothing but bread and wine in the Lord's Supper, and if any advantage can be derived from them by constituting them the signs or emblems of our Saviour's body and blood, the same advantage could be derived from mere animal flesh and blood used for the same purpose, as was the case in the old law; and hence the question for ever and for ever recurs,—if the flesh profiteth nothing, what can bread profit a man unto life everlasting? We entreat our Protestant readers to reflect well on this, and to consider how far our Saviour elevates his gift to man in the blessed Eucharist, above all mere signs, or emblems or figures, however excellent these might be in their own nature. "This is the bread," he says, "that came down from heaven. Not as your fathers did eat manna and are dead. He that eateth this bread shall live for ever." By this allusion, the Redeemer indicates, that the manna which fell from heaven on the Israelites in the desert to be their support till they should reach the land of promise, was a type and figure of what he promised on this occasion, to bequeath to Christians, to be the food of their souls, during their journey through the desert of this life, towards heaven, the true land of promise. We should like to know, then, what advantage the Lord's Supper, according to Protestant notions, has over the manna which fed the Israelites in the desert? Bread and wine are corporal food, so was the manna, and if the former are called the figures of Christ's body and blood by Protestants, the latter was so called by the Redeemer himself, in the passages just cited; bread and wine are the fruit of the earth, the manna came down miraculously from heaven; the former have the same taste for all persons, the latter had the particular taste which the consumer wished; bread and wine are produced by human culture and human labour, the manna was called the bread of angels, because manufactured by the hands of angels, as well as because it was the type of the true bread of angels, promised and bestowed by Christ our Lord, on his followers. Let us, therefore, ask the candid Protestant, were not the manna and the Paschal lamb more excellent in their own nature, and more lively representations or figures of the body and blood of Christ, than bread and wine? and, if so, in what does the Lord's Supper in the New Law excel the typical and figurative supper in the Mosaic Law, in Protestant principles and belief?

Does not the order of Providence and the nature of things require that, as the Jews had the figure, Christians should have the reality? and that, as the Jews were commanded to eat the Paschal lamb really, truly and substantially, in commemoration of their deliverance from the tyranny of Pharaoh, so we are commanded to eat really, truly and substantially, the Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world, in commemoration of our deliverance by his blood, from the tyranny of the infernal Pharaoh?

We cannot enter more fully at present into the scriptural arguments, by which this dogma of our holy faith may be established; but we recommend our Protestant friends to consider attentively what we have advanced, and to have recourse for more satisfaction, if necessary, to some of our approved writers who have treated the subject in detail.

In conclusion, we beg leave to remind the Editor of the Christian Advocate, that it will not profit him to be a hearer of the word of God, or to profess himself a disciple of Christ, if he should say, like the Jews, How can this man give us his flesh to eat? Or, like the incredulous disciples, say;—it is a hard saying and who can bear it. We remind him also, that this is the doctrine which distinguishes the proud disciples, from those that were humble and faithful; and that the explanation which our Saviour gave of the gift of his body and blood, left his doctrine still full of mystery, since it was after that explanation, that many of his disciples went back and walked no more with him, whereas there is no mystery nor difficulty of belief in the Protestant idea, if proposed by our Saviour. Whoever, therefore, will believe the doctrine of Christ and remain with him to the end, must captivate his understanding to the obedience of Faith, and say, with Simon Peter, on this critical occasion: "Lord to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life. And we have believed and have known that thou art the Son of God."

LETTER NO. XVI.

FROM A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA TO HIS PROTESTANT FRIENDS IN EUROPE.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—I was going to remark, at the conclusion of my last letter, that you may deem that the present contentions and dissensions in Protestantism arise more from some fortuitous and transitory causes, than that you consider them as based upon such principles as must necessarily involve a continuation of such dissensions and strife as cannot belong to the Church of Christ, and that you may likewise be impressed with the notion that the early Reformers were actuated by a very different spirit, that they carried on their work in perfect harmony and unanimity; so you may endeavour to calm your fears with the insidious reflection, that the present unseemly excitement proceeds from an over zeal, and that affairs will return to the original spiritual peace, and brotherly co-operation which subsisted between your glorious Reformers. Well, I will allow them to speak for themselves, as you will find their acts recorded by one of your own celebrated writers, Bishop Milner, in his "Church History." Let Luther, as first in order and importance, speak; hear what he says, "It did not become him to be silent, while Zuinglius and Eccalampadius, by their successive pamphlets, raised such disturbances, unless indeed he was to give up his ministry, and the cure of souls; it was not to be borne that they should continue to talk, cause confusion among his people, and weaken his authority, and that notwithstanding he must give way and hold his peace; they traduced him and his friends in their books under the denomination of flesh-eaters, worshippers of a God that could be eaten, and turned into bread, deniers of the redemption of the cross; thus were himself and his friends slandered, whereas his opponents could not bear to be told that they erred in their interpretation of Scripture."—Zuinglius answers him thus: "In this way the doctrine of Christ must be subjected, not to one tyrannical pontiff, but to myriads of little tyrants; Brentius, (the Scabian Divine) has picked out of the streets a number of petty bishops, and formed a synod of them; surely, my Luther, this is setting an imprudent and a most mischievous example, your commending them; every crazy brain will be producing a tumult in the church, and exclaiming, this is error, this is heresy." In another place Zuinglius says; "To these 14 persons, he could oppose 200, their performance contained very little, except the slanderous accusation, that those who differed from them were deluded by Satan, a manifest proof of their own diabolical spirit." p. 403. "The people were already sufficiently alarmed with the novel ideas concerning the sacrament, and such a mode of treating it, seemed as if calculated on purpose to increase their aversion. Corulastadt had not rightly explained the matter." p. 397. But we read; "Luther was so much pleased with the little Treatise of the fourteen Scunavian divines (and with their diabolical spirit) that he procured a translation of it in German, and also wrote a preface to it, by which he gave great offence to the Swiss divines; he calls them, (Zuinglian's) novel dreamers, and ridicules them for having given six different expositions of the sacrament in the space of only one year." Zuinglius remarks in another part; "That either many persons not only sadly mistake the matter, the Eucharist, or else that he himself makes a greater mistake than they all; and further that unless common sense and piety itself deceive him, divines had all missed their aim for a long time." Melancthon, another of your Reformers, writes to Luther, "Zuinglius has sent hither in print his Confession of Faith, you would say neither more nor less that he is not in his senses; on original sin and the use of the sacraments, he clearly revives his old errors; on the nature of the ceremonies he talks like a Swiss, that is, most barbarous; at one stroke he would abolish all ceremonies, and he would have no Bishops, then he passes on vehemently to obtain his favourite errors on the Lord's Supper." Zuinglius thus retorts; "You say that in arguing this I do but dream; be it so, for those who see nothing in my arguments must be completely asleep," (p. 398.) until at last poor Luther was nearly overcome, and writes despondingly to one of his disciple Reformers, Spalatinus—"I am extremely tempted to embrace the errors of my adversaries, the Sacramentarians," and while he was thus "tossed to and fro by every wind of doctrine" he makes this appeal; "We entreat the Brethren heartily, through Jesus Christ, that if anything better be revealed to them, they would exhibit, that the public benefit may be conducted by Public Council." He says of Zuinglius and Eccalampadius; "Indeed in words they do exhort men to peace and harmony, but their practice proves they delight in sowing discord incessantly; devoid of every Christian grace, they pretend to the sanctity of martyrs, and further they allow no man to be a Christian, who does not agree with them in the same sentiments; such a man, they say, has no knowledge of the Scriptures, neither does he possess anything of the spirit." And again he asks, "Upon what grounds their boasting of the experiences and of the witness of the spirit was to be allowed, if he is to be denied the privilege of asserting, in his turn, with equal confidence what he knew to be true." Luther thus deals with the Reformers, Thomas Munzer and the celestial prophets (Protestants of course) "They say they are moved by the Spirit, but I must observe that it is a mark of a very bad spirit, when it exerts itself only in pulling down temples, and monasteries, and in breaking images; the greatest villains can do such things as these." Such "villains" were, Henry the 8th, the Duke of Somerset, Queen Elizabeth, Knox, &c. in England and Scotland, for who destroyed more Temples, Monasteries, and Images, than they? "These insane wretches," as he writes again of these Protestant prophets, "as yet have performed no miracles in attestation of their commission," (Query, did he himself perform any miracles?) "except that of calling mobs, despising the magistrates ordained by divine authority, throwing down statues, and requiring an implicit belief that they were the people of God." And yet did not this same man require an implicit belief that he was "the chosen man of God," and until Calvin was provoked to say, "I acknowledge that we owe much to him, nor would I refuse him a high degree of authority, if he would only govern himself;"—talks of the divine authority of magistrates, yet this same man, Luther, writes to the Princes of Germany, thus, "Compel me not, I beseech you, to pray against you, for I doubt not but God will hear my prayers; such is the state of things, that men neither can, nor will, nor indeed should they bear your government any longer," and you may gather from the history of the times that he helped to raise by his inflammatory harangues, the Rustic War, or, "the war of the Peasants." If, my dear friends, you have never met with these recorded facts before, you must indeed be "confounded with confusion" unless you "know not how to blush." But hear Bishop Milner's opinion of the matter; he says in his work, "We may lament his (Luther's) obstinacy, his violence, and his want of candour, of which the proofs are too numerous in the course of his opposition to his antagonists; further we may also admit that the turbulence, the precipitation, and the vanity of Corulastadt was in a great measure the occasion of bringing forth, and of exasperating those unchristian dispositions in Luther; those who would profit by the instruction which history furnishes, will not forget the lamentable instances of heat, error, and obstinacy in Martin Luther, and his obstinacy in disputing the sacramental tenet produced a permanent rent among the Protestants." Yet the Bishop tells us that this same turbulent, precipitous, and vain man, Corulastadt, "was the first to broach the true doctrine" of what your Mant, in his Common Prayer Book, calls, "the highest mystery in our religion," the Lord's Supper. The Rev. Mr. Scott, in his "Continuation" of Milner's Church History, says, "The only question, Luther lost his temper, betrayed his cause, injured the progress of the Reformation, grieved the spirit of grace, and split the infant Church, was that (the Sacrament) in which he was most clearly wrong." Hear again Luther himself upon this as he calls it, "pestilential, this sacrilegious heresy." "I am challenged by Eccalampadius, and I meditate an answer, but a most unaccountable lassitude, if not Satan himself, possesses me, so that I am able to do very little. Our ingratitude, or some other sin, is the cause of the divine displeasure; certainly our notorious contempt of the word of God will account for the present penal delusion or even a greater. I was too true a prophet when I predicted something of this kind would happen; these false prophets, and this rebellion of the common people, are proofs of the divine displeasure." Again he says; "Our ingratitude and contempt of the divine word, is the cause why God has permitted Satan to rage in this manner. I have often foretold that our ingratitude would be punished with wars and divisions among ourselves." Nor will you be inclined to give him much credit for any extraordinary prophetic spirit, when you read that, "The transactions at Wittenberg were most surprising; new sects arose there every day, and it was hard to say which were gaining or which were losing ground." I cannot but think these same reformers must have been very simple men; to have considered these "transactions" as "most surprising," in effects naturally following causes; yet in the face of all this, Protestant writers and preachers have hitherto found it so easy to gloss over these most damning proofs of your eternal dissensions with the most shameless sophistry, that the Rev. Mr. Scott in his work just alluded to, has the effrontery to call upon you thus: "To admire the wonderful works of God in raising such mighty instruments of his grace, to co-operate without mutual communication, and the consistency and uniformity of his spirit, in leading them to teach the doctrine of Christ in perfect harmony."!!! If in the common transactions of life such a position as this was propounded to you; if, for instance, it was shown to you that in a certain family there was continual dissension and strife among the members thereof, so that they at last separated, and wrote and published tracts against each other, and would not meet even to pray under the same roof, or break bread together, and that you had the fact acknowledged by themselves, yet that at the same time you were called upon, by some of the dissentient parties themselves, "to admire the consistency and uniformity, the perfect harmony," which subsisted between them; would you not consider being asked to make such an admission as the grossest insult that could be offered to your reason and common sense? Unquestionably you would; but when it comes to affect your Protestantism, you will allow yourselves to be immediately blind-folded; on one side of the sheet you will read such an exchange of terms as the following between the parties;—"a proof of their own diabolical spirit—deluded by Satan—delight in sowing discord incessantly—devoid of every Christian grace—novel dreamers," one exclaiming, "this is error, this is heresy," another, "they have erred in their interpretation of scriptures," a third "is guilty of heat, error, and obstinacy," a fourth of, "turbulence, precipitation and vanity." &c. &c. Yet on the other side, you are told all this is, consistency, uniformity, and perfect harmony, "in teaching the doctrines of Christ," Prejudice blinds you; deep hatred of "Popery" makes you callous as to your state; you cannot bear to contrast the beautiful unity and harmony of the Catholic Church with your own wretched condition; this is a secret hidden in the darkest recesses of your own hearts, so that your writers and preachers find it easy to beguile your understandings; your lacerated minds are open to receive any adulterated balm, so that it is mixed up with bitter abuse of "Popery." Harmony and uniformity, then, in teaching the doctrines of Christ among the Reformers! Can anything be farther removed from the truth than this? Bishop Millner relates that Zuinglius of Zurich, wrote to Francis the I. "That if he governs his kingdom as David, he will see in Heaven all the virtuous men and women that have ever lived; and among these, the two Adams, Abel, the Virgin Mary, David, likewise Hercules, Thesius, Socrates, the Catos, and the Scipios, &c. while in the mean time the dreaming Anabaptists may sleep in Hell, that sleep which they deserve, and from which sleep may never more awake." The Bishop says of this, "the pen drops from one's hand in writing such a sentence as this," but in what does it differ from the following sentence; the present rector of Whellington, Rev. Carus Wilson (see letter

No. 14) tells us, "I know another young clergyman, who told a gentleman that his servant had better throw herself into the mouth of hell than enter a Methodist Meeting House." Thus you continually consign each other to hell; does not this show that the same spirit which lighted the flambeau of the Reformation, keeps it burning as fiercely now as it did at the beginning? Does not this prove that the "waters of contradiction" run on as turbulently now as when they first broke forth out of that fearful chasm produced by that terrible convulsion, the misnamed, Reformation, only that, like a rushing cataract, they gain tumultuous impetuosity as they proceed in their course, varying in form, but increasing in violence, until they rise, in the words of the inspired penman, like "clouds tossed with whirlwinds, to whom the mist of darkness is reserved." How truly do your sects verify the celebrated saying of the great Tertullian, who wrote about 200 years after Christ, that, "Heretics vary in their rules; namely in their confessions of Faith; every one among them thinks he has a right to change, and model what he has received, according to his own fancy; heresy always retains its proper nature, in never ceasing to innovate, and the progress of the thing is like its beginning; every thing is on the change in heresies, and when thoroughly looked into, in process of time, they are found quite different in many points from what they were at first." In truth, my friends, if such testimonies, both ancient and modern, make no impression upon you, you must be, as the Psalmist says, "like the deaf asp, that stoppeth her ears," or like those people who, "shut their eyes, lest they see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their heart, and be converted." In conclusion "out of thy own mouth I condemn thee;" this is what the present Bishop of Salisbury says of your divisions in his printed Sermon; "two facts must, I conceive, on all hands be admitted, one the unprecedented multiplication of schisms among those who profess and call themselves Christians; the other, absence of any extensive success in missionary labours. The Church is not united under its divine head; and the world does not believe in the Mission of the Son of God."!! Silence on my part, and meditation on yours, is the best sequel to this. Yours Faithfully,

C. A. C.

THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE AND THE
FREE CHURCH-MAN.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—In the last issue of the INDEPENDENT CHURCHMAN, erroneously yclept the Christian Advocate, the Responsible Editor of the FREE CHURCHMAN has come forward very heroically to help his fellow labourer out of the mire, and to endeavour to prove that he, of the Christian Advocate "is more sinned against than sinning."

In reading the letter of the Free Church Editor, it forcibly reminded me of Don Quixote, whose extraordinary feats are nearly akin to that of the Editor. He has come forward with four formidable assertions, "simple truths," "in opposition to the gratuitous denials of the Herald."

First assertion. The tract was circulated "amongst Roman Catholics and by a Roman Catholic."

Who denied this? But is the Editor sure that the circulator of the tract is a Catholic, one in communion with the Holy See, i. e. acknowledging the Vicar Apostolic as the head of the Catholic Church in Bengal.

Second assertion. The tract was printed through the agency of another party, who is also a Roman Catholic.

Who denied this? But is the Editor sure that the printer is a Catholic and not a schismatic like his "fellow labourer"?

Third assertion. All this the Editor asserts on the authority of the party who had the tract printed and who circulated it.

Who denied this? But is this Roman Catholic testimony or the testimony of one not in communion with the Church of Rome?

Fourth assertion. The Editor of the Free Church asserts what he knows "to be true" and the Editor of the Catholic Herald "denies what he cannot know to be false"

What a climax! I wish the Independent Church Editor much joy of his friend the Free Church Editor!

But to be serious. Will the Editor of the Free Church-man candidly avow that at the time he penned the introductory lines to the impugned article, headed "a specimen of Romish literature in Calcutta," in which it was asserted that the tract was circulated in the neighbourhood of a "Mass House" during the last Lent, did he not endeavour to have it impressed on the minds of his readers that the tract had the sanction of the legitimate authority of the Church? Further,—Will the Editor assert that he was not aware that the particular "Mass House," to which he referred, was interdicted to all Catholics,—that the parties, he who printed and he who circulated the tract, frequented that place of worship and were, consequently, looked on as schismatics and not Catholics?

AU REVOIR.

P. S. The Free Church-man calls the Christian Advocate "fellow labourer." If they be labourers in the same vineyard and both profess to teach genuine Christianity, how comes it that the Editor of the Free Church-man instead of teaching his free doctrines in a certain school-room in Park-street, does not promulgate them from the Union Chapel Pulpit, from which the Editor of the Advocate so grandiloquently teaches Independence. Surely there must be some unity between FREE CHURCHISM and INDEPENDENTISM, since both are striving to obtain the mastery over the Church by Law Established?

What think you, Sir, of the following

VISION OF HERESIES.

Doubtless!—all the piles that stand
Severed along that base of sand—
Whose dogmas differ—changed each hour,
As Whigs change principles in power,—
Are all, though varying in their hue,
The one, the holy, and the true!
Behold them—each a godly work!
The Church of Law and Tithe—the Kirk—
The Church of Bess, the Church of Knox—
The Church of Wolf, the Church of Fox—
Of Luther, Calvin, Wickliffe, Huss—
The Dane, the Swede, the Greek, the Russ—
The Wesleyan—the Muggletonian—
The Hugonot—the “Humbugzonian”—
The Manichean, Albigenes,
The Irvings parting with their senses,
The ducking Baptists—unducked Quakers—
Ranters, Jumpers, Seekers, Shakers,
The Plymouth brethren—Free Churchism—
The Mormonites—Independence—
Socinians, Arians, Unitarians,
ALL PROTESTANTS!—AND ALL AT VARIANCE!*

THE SUFFERING CATHOLICS AT GWALIOR.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—It affords me much pleasure to forward to you, for publication in the columns of your valuable Journal, the accompanying list of subscriptions raised at this station for the relief of the destitute Christians at Gwalior.

The first name in the list is that of the venerated Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, whose philanthropic exertion on this occasion claims one's admiration and gratitude. The benevolent Catholics of Calcutta have set us a noble example of disinterested charity. The numerous calls made upon them for aid towards charitable institutions of their own does not deter them from extending their charity to their brethren in other parts of the world.

Almost every gentleman of the Civil Service stationed at Agra have generously come of ~~Chr~~ with liberal donations on this occasion. The ~~com~~ foremost in the list is the name of ~~position~~ instance, we have seen these lines before. Ed.
tain far the Honorable the Lieutenant Governor, whose liberal example has given life and energy to this charitable undertaking. I entertain the most sanguine hopes that when the subscription book is circulated in the military cantonments it will be attended with a similar success.

This noble and generous example is worthy of the imitation of the gentry and public of Calcutta; were they to come forward on this occasion and lend a helping hand, doubtless some permanent provision could be made for the poor Christians at Gwalior. As matters now stand the utmost extent of our aid will only suffice to relieve their immediate wants.

We are anxious to know the result of the Advocacy of your worthy brother of the Star. Perhaps he may consider this letter worthy of notice in his journal as setting before the public of Calcutta the generous example of the gentry of Agra.

The sums collected by our esteemed Bishop, the Right Rev. Dr. Carli, have been forwarded to the Rev. T. Felix at Gwalior, with a request that he will associate with himself some British Officers at that place and, in communication with them, adopt the best means for appropriating the contributions of the public.

His Grace the Arch-Bishop, Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, being the contributions in the Bengal Vicariate,	700 0
Honorable J. Thomason, Esq. Lieut. Governor,	500 0
Major General J. Alexander, Commng. at Agra,	25 0
J. Thornton, Esq. Secretary to Govt.	50 0
J. Davidson, Esq. Judge.	100 0
R. W. C. Hamilton, Esq. Resident at Indore.	50 0
Capt. W. J. Grant, Aid-de-camp to the Lieut. Governor.	16 0
Capt. F. C. Minchin, Private Secretary to the Lieut. Governor.	16 0
A. Shakespear, Esq. Secretary.	16 0
R. H. Dunlop, Esq. Civil Service.	16 0
G. F. Edmonstone, Esq. Registrar Sudder Dewannee.	16 0
H. M. Elliott, Esq. Secretary Sudder Board.	50 0
T. J. Turner, Esq. Member Sudder Board	16 0
C. C. Jackson, Esq. Magistrate and Collector.	16 0
A. W. C. Plowden, Esq. Civil Auditor.	16 0
B. Taylor, Esq. Judge.	20 0
J. Craigie, Esq. Magistrate.	50 0
E. Lodge, Esq. Principal Agra College.	16 0
Rev. J. Moore, Oordoo Translator.	16 0
W. Bramley, Esq. Civil Service.	16 0
W. Greenway, Esq. Agra Assay Master.	16 0
J. Ede,	10 0
E. Teyen,	4 0
J. Hyland,	5 0
W. Rebello,	1 0
James Rebello,	10 0

James St. Leger Rebello,	1 0
Alice Rebello,	1 0
Walter Atkins Rebello,	1 0
F. F. D'Cruz,	2 0
R. B. McAuliffe,	4 0
B. Christie,	4 0
S. M. Leslie,	1 0
J. P. Racks,	2 0
A. Porter,	1 0
C. Adels,	2 0
E. F. Bouvais,	5 0
J. Jones,	1 0
J. H. G.,	2 0
Soob Rao,	5 0
Rajbullab Bonerjee,	2 0
Kunheya Lall,	1 0
F. Lawrence,	1 0
Rev. Mr. Caffarel,	5 0
Rev. Father Lorence,	5 0
J. C. Cuddy,	1 0
Rev. Father Anasthasius,	5 0
R. Pereira,	0 8
C. Murphy,	10 0
L. E. Philips,	3 0
H. Crawford,	2 0
J. Teyen,	4 0
C. H. Lindsay,	4 0
C. Berry,	5 0
W. J. Chambers,	2 0
Jno. Jacobs,	2 0
T. Copping,	1 0
L. P. Preyre,	5 0
J. P. Adels,	10 0
J. Flood,	3 0
A. Friend,	1 0
J. H. S.,	2 0
W. C. Phillips,	1 0
J. Anthoney,	2 0
G. Stowell,	3 0
J. H. P.,	2 0
A. D'Costa,	2 0
J. Hammerdinger,	3 0
E. W.,	1 0
E. A. H.,	3 0
J. H.,	1 0
B. M. G.,	1 0
R. Mispillar,	1 0
H. T. Gamgre,	2 0
R. G.,	5 0
J. Canter,	5 0
B. Griff,	3 0
M. J.,	2 0
J. R. C.,	1 0
W. Purvis,	5 0
Right Rev. Father T. C. Carli, Catholic Bishop,	15 0

Agra Civil Lines, Your Obedient Servant,
27th July, 1844. J.

Note.—In addition to the 700 Rs. already acknowledged, Messrs. Lackersteen Brothers have lately sent 300 Rs. more, making in all 1,000 Rs.

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

Sergt. Murray through His Grace the Archbishop,	10 0 0
P. J. M.,	1 0 0
Soldiers of Dum-Dum, through the Rev. Mr. Storck,	11 14 6

Collections through Rev. Mr. Johnson Rector of St. Xavier's College for July last,	17 4 0
Ditto, through the Rev. Mr. Rabascal, Serampore,	30 0 0

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

Colr Sergt Cohen's subscription from August 1844, to July, 1845,	3 0 0
Qr. Mr. Sergt. Kelleys Do. Do	3 0 0

CHANDERNAGORE ORPHANAGE.

P. J. M., through His Grace the Archbishop,	Rs. 50
---	--------

THROUGH MR. N. O'BRIEN.

R. O. D.,	Rs. 8
C. H. Cameron,	20
W. D.,	3
James Cleghorn,	2

ERRATUM IN OUR LAST.

For ten pieces of drill from an Anonymous charitable Friend, read, forty pieces.

FOR THE SUFFERING CATHOLICS AT GWALIOR.

THROUGH THE REV. MR. ZUBIBURN AT NOWCOLLY.

Mr. Barber,	Rs. 10
Rev. Mr. Zubiburn,	5

O'CONNELL TESTIMONIAL.

Rev. Mr. D'Mello,	Rs. 10
-------------------------	--------

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

P. J. M., through His Grace the Archbishop,	Rs. 50
---	--------

Selections.

The first evening sitting of the Clerical association took place on Monday last, at 5, Essex-bridge, Dublin. A considerable number of members assembled, and enjoyed the rich treat of intellectual and theological conversation. Many subjects of deep concern, and of great practical utility, were discussed with all the force of scholars and the piety of ecclesiastics.—Tablet.

ROME.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TABLET.

SIR,—You will hear, I believe, from another quarter, that his lordship the Right Rev. Dr. Baggs set out to-day to take possession of his bereaved district. He is accompanied to Prior Park by two new priests—Dr. Fergusson, lately of the Propaganda, and the Rev. Joseph Prendergast, from the English College in this city. About six weeks since his Holiness was pleased to appoint Dr. Baggs, as likewise Dr. Collier, V. A. of the Mauritius, Bishops Assistant at the Throne; and this kindness was doubly enhanced by the very flattering expressions of his Holiness's esteem and regard, with which it was accompanied. Dr. Baggs was further honoured by celebrating High Mass before the Pope, in the Sistine Chapel, on Passion Sunday.—Ibid.

CATHOLIC LITERATURE.

To the Editor of the Englishman.

Sir,—In your Saturday's issue (the 29th ultimo,) I noticed a letter signed "FAIR PLAY," complaining of you for having published a statement, calculated to wound the feelings, and misrepresent the principles of the Roman Catholics.

Your remarks in reply to "FAIR PLAY's" complaint were not, I think, characterised by your usual manly, and straightforward spirit of impartiality.

There are some Protestant religious periodicals in Calcutta, which appear to make it their chief occupation to tack together all the stories they can obtain, which may serve to damage the reputation, moral, religious, and literary, of their Roman Catholic neighbours.

When these stories, (some of them as silly and absurd as they are false,) are confined to the pages of such periodicals as the Calcutta Free Church Magazine, or Christian Advocate, they are, comparatively speaking, harmless. But when they are extracted in the columns of journals so widely circulated as your's, the case is altered.

You copied from some one of the above pious journals, a statement about the Catholics in Calcutta having circulated a letter, said to be written by our Saviour, and the obvious design, purpose, or tendency of which statement is to represent the Catholics as the patrons of the most gross superstition and folly, if not blasphemy. FAIR PLAY complains of your conduct in this, and asks you to acknowledge that you had published what was unfounded and calumnious. Oh! you reply it was not we who were to blame. We were not the authors of the calumny. We merely gave circulation to it, so far as we could. If that was not your exact words, it was the purport of what you said. You say you merely copied the paragraph from another paper. But pardon me, Sir, unless I greatly mistake, you did much more than merely copy the paragraph. You commented on it, as true. You said you thought it would excite your readers' "surprise and disgust" (the italics are mine) this conduct of the Roman Catholics, or the contents of the letter, which it was alleged they had circulated. In either sense, you wished and did your best to excite public disgust at the Catholics. The man who thus gives circulation and currency to a false and calumnious statement, is little better than he who originates it, many will think.

You have indeed in some measure made reparation for the injury you did the Catholics in this instance, because you have extracted from the Catholic Journal, the passage calculated to show that the Free Church Magazine were misled, either by their credulity, misguided zeal, or some less creditable motive, when they alleged that the Catholics held this impious, absurd letter (said to have been written by Christ) as true. Regret for having circulated the calumny, you expressed none. Yet I will give you credit for having felt it.

Sir, as a Christian, I cannot help regretting that the Free Church Magazine, and Christian Advocate, should ever attempt to support and advance their own cause, by circulating absurd and silly stories, calculated to prove their Roman Catholic neighbours either fools, or dishonest men. Such conduct, Sir, to say the least of it, indicates a most reprehensible want of good manners. You, as an honest independent "Englishman," and impartial champion of FAIR PLAY, should be the last to countenance such conduct. Besides, I thought it had been the boast of the defenders of the Protestant faith, that they disdained to use such unworthy and carnal weapons as misrepresentation, calumny, detraction, abuse, and invective, or odious personalities in their spiritual warfare. As a friend and well-wisher of the pious journal which gave origin here to the absurd and unfounded statement in question, you should advise its editor to confine himself in future to fair and temperate arguments, and well-authenticated edifying facts, and to lay aside the use of such weapons as detraction, calumny, and abuse, in the prosecution of his godly work of evangelizing the world. I am sure he must, as a reasonable man, take your advice in good part.

The editors of the Calcutta Free Churchman and Christian Advocate know well, that the Catholic body, both in the East and Europe, contains men of extensive and varied learning, and whose honesty and piety, and benevolent exertions in the cause of education, will not suffer by a comparison with their neighbours. To attempt, by means such as those I am now reprobating, and which the pious Journals in question have so inconsistently employed to hold up the Catholic body as the patrons of the most humiliating superstition and credulity, is a line of conduct which the Protestant press, at least the honest portion of it, ought by every means in their power to put down. Can the cause of Christianity in the East possibly gain by any attempts to malign and traduce the Roman Catholics? Are the conduct and labours of these men in this country, not worthy of the highest respect and honor—take them as a body.

Protestant gentlemen of the first-rate reputation for talents and experience in the East, have borne willing and disinterested testimonies to the pure and blameless lives, and to the zeal of Roman Catholic Missionaries in India, China, and Ceylon. And not only to their excellent moral character, talents and zeal, but to the great success which they have met, in bringing the heathen to a knowledge of their God and Saviour. The sacrifices which a Roman Catholic Missionary makes, when he quits his country and connections, to devote his life to the instructions of the heathen in the East, are much more trying to flesh and blood, than our Protestant missionaries are willing to undergo. Compare the pecuniary remuneration of the two; compare the comforts and luxuries of the majority of Protestant Clergy and Missionaries in his country, with the humble and narrow means of the Catholic; and say then, who shows the most disinterested zeal in their common master's cause? Do the editors of the Protestant Journals in Calcutta, consider, Sir, that poverty and its attendant evils, are not quite enough for the Roman Catholic Missionaries to contend against but that they must also be subjected to railing and unfounded accusations?

Yours, &c.

3rd August.

A PROTESTANT.

P. S.—The Editor of the Free Church Magazine is, I have every reason to think, a man of sterling honor and integrity, as well as sincere piety.

He has been led to "bear false witness" against his Catholic neighbour in this instance, when he gave the public here to understand, that the Catholics held the wretched and impious letter in question, to be genuine, and circulated it as such. I trust he will now see, that honor, reason, and religion, call upon him to express, in the strongest and most public manner, his regret for having been the means of circulating so false and injurious a statement.

If he refuse to do this, the public will know how to estimate his honor, integrity, and religion. I trust this letter contains nothing at which candor or liberality may take offence, and that your sense of justice will induce you to insert it.

 We wish to avoid theological controversy, and would recommend its being confined to religious publications, each sect taking care of its own creed. We may occasionally extract an item for, or against some of the hundred sects that exist, and may at times give our opinions on religious questions; because a paper like this, of general information, should not leave any subject wholly and always untouched; but we cannot open our pages to sectarian controversy.—Ed. Englishman.

THE URSULINE AND PRESENTATION ORDERS.

(FROM THE PITTSBURGH CATHOLIC.)

As correct information, on the subject of Religious Orders, their duties and objects, is so difficult of attainment to all classes of our community, and as they are not unfrequently made the subject of calumnious misrepresentation, invective and vituperation, by the opponents of our institutions; though, commonly, in lamentable ignorance of the real character of the objects of their attacks, we deem it proper to place before our readers an excellent article from the last No. of the "Dublin Review," which is calculated to throw considerable light on this subject. We, at first, intended to copy only a few select extracts from it, but, on reflection, have come to the conclusion of presenting it entire to them, doubting not, that its perusal will impart much useful information on the subject of "Religious Orders" in general. Originally, persons in embracing the "Religious" life, had no other object in view, than their own sanctification. They intended to serve God more perfectly than could be done by them, whilst living in society, and impeded by worldly cares and solicitudes,—by retirement, meditation, prayer, mortification, the reception of the sacraments, and the practice of the other ascetic virtues. Such, even at the present day, is the religious life, in Oriental countries. But since the calamities that befell Europe, following first in the train of the religious revolution of the sixteenth century, called the Reformation, and subsequently the "French Revolution," different societies were formed of either sex, devoted exclusively, or principally to the discharge of the corporal or spiritual works of mercy to their neighbour. Such are the orders of "Sisters of Charity" and "Sisters of Mercy," who, although not negligent of their own sanctification, or unmindful of the necessity of cherishing the virtues of the ascetics, yet devote the greater proportion of their time and labor to their neighbor's good—the poor, and the sick at hospitals, or at their own houses,—the reclaiming of sinners—the instruction of the ignorant—the support and education of orphans—charity or free schools—as well as the practice of all the other words of mercy, corporal and spiritual, are the exalted objects of those faithful followers of their Divine Master. These orders, as better adapted to meet the wants of society at the present day, receive a more rapid extension, and a more favorable regard, than the purely ascetic communities. But we must here break off our remarks—which however, we may continue in a distinct article in some future number,—and introduce our readers to the article itself. It is headed, "The Ursuline and Presentation Orders;" Miss Nuno Nagle.

THE LIFE OF MISS NANO NAGLE.

Foundress of the Presentation Order.

We have here a work many years after its time, but still welcome; incomplete in its execution, but yet an effort in the right direction. We hail with pleasure any tribute of gratitude and respect, however small, to the benefactress of our religion and country. We have tributes in abundance, on painted canvass and printed page, in the breathing marble and living bronze, to those whose claims upon our remembrance are far inferior to her's; and monuments on many a bending column, and along many a dime cathedral aisle, to those whose title to that honor is written only on the embattled field, which war's murderous breath has strewn with carnage, or on the ocean's waters, which have closed over many a gallant heart, that sunk into its "yeast of waves, unknelt, unconfined, and unknown." But for the meek retiring benefactress of her race, whose career of usefulness has been among the hovels of the poor, whose path was along the garret stair, or dingy cottage floor, for the hallowed minister of peace and charity, the world, of which she was not worthy, has no "storied urn or monumental bust;" and her reward must be sought elsewhere than in the fame or gratitude of earth.

The work mentioned at the head of this article is from the pen of the late Right Rev. Dr. Coppinger, Bishop of Cloyne and Ross, and is the substance of a sermon delivered by him while yet a priest, before a charitable society in Cork, and on the solemn commemoration of her demise. It was an appeal to their charity in behalf of the Presentation schools; and it was thought no appeal could be more successful than a recital of the virtues of her to whom they owed their origin. It is the only account of Miss Nagle that has ever been published. Until this republication, the copies were scarce, and consequently difficult to be procured. From the nature of the occasion on which it was delivered, we cannot expect a minute biographical detail, nor any other language than that of eulogy. We had first intended to supply this deficiency, and gratify the curiosity of our readers, from the letters and documents which have been placed at our disposal, but find that we must, however reluctantly, confine ourselves to a mere outline of her life, and a condensed review of the two orders which claim her as their foundress.

Miss Nagle was born in 1723, at Ballygriffin, the family seat of her ancestors, on the picturesque banks of the Blackwater. Her father was Garrett Nagle, Esq., of that place, the representative of a family still highly respectable, and still in possession of much of their original inheritance. In the maternal line she claims kindred with the Matthews of Thomastown, and, through them, with the Rev. Theobald Matthew. It is no common glory for one house, to have given two such benefactors to its country. After receiving the scanty measure of knowledge which the domestic tuition of the times afforded (and the penal laws prevented more,) she was sent, as was usual with persons of her class, to Paris, then as well as now the centre of the fashionable world. The Irish government of that day, very calamitously for themselves, drove many of the best families of the land into exile. For if ever an Irish sword was to win its way to wealth or fame, it was to be in other lands than its own; and the military chronicles of France, and Spain, and Austria, are marked by few names more glorious than those which the bigoted and barbarous policy of England expelled from their native shores. The birth and connexions of Miss Nagle secured her ready admission into much of the society which then adorned the metropolis of France; and the attractions, ever varying and ever new, which the life of a great city affords to one hitherto accustomed to the quiet monotony of a simple rural life, made her present residence fascinating in no ordinary degree.

She remained in Paris for some years, when an event occurred which exercised an important influence on her life. She had spent the night at a fashionable party, and was returning home at an early hour in the morning, when, on turning a corner, she saw some poor people standing round a church door, waiting to have it opened for mass. Their simple and self-denying piety was a censure upon her careless, if not criminal, course of life; and, in the compunction of the moment, she made a resolution of retiring from the world, and devoting herself to the instruction of the poor. She returned to Ireland after a short interval, and carried her resolution into effect, by instructing and catechising the poor children in the neighborhood of her father's residence. At this period, which was about the year 1750, the people were ignorant beyond anything she could have conjectured. The penal laws had been in operation for more than half a century, which made instruction a felony, and the Catholic was shut out from any source of knowledge, unless he consented to imbibe the poison of heresy at the same time. The few lessons which could be given by a Catholic teacher or pastor, were given by stealth, as if they were committing some bad and wicked thing, and at distant intervals, such was the fearful insecurity of the times. They, therefore, became as seed sown among brambles, which is choked before it can produce any lasting fruit. The difficulty presented by these laws was felt fully and intensely by Miss Nagle. Any attempt to et. the people, without being successful, would have drawn down upon her the rigor of the laws, and endangered the security of herself and all belonging to her. Moreover, her own position was a dependent one; she had not, of her own right, the means which would enable her to accomplish her purpose. Unwilling, therefore, to be a spectator of the misery which she could not relieve, she determined on seeking in the seclusion of some religious house on the continent, that peace which her own country could not afford her. In a religious community she could at least weep over the desolation of her people. But that peace and religious retreat which she sought, she was not to find. She took leave of her friends, as she thought, for ever, and made every preparation for immediately entering a religious community. We know not whether her wishes were directed to any particular form of the religious life in preference to others; but it is probable that, as far as depended upon herself, she would have selected the one which was more immediately concerned for the poor. But her heart was still in Ireland; her affections were with its poor persecuted children. Their spiritual destitution was the subject of her thoughts by day, and she never retired to rest at night, without a prayer of regret at their supposed desertion.

The anguish and trouble of her mind, induced her to consult some enlightened members of the Society of Jesus, then in the French capital, and their opinion was, that her vocation was to the poor of Ireland; and, in consequence of that decision, she returned once more to her native country.

Her father, who loved her tenderly, was no more; and the penal laws were, in consequence of the comparatively mild administration of the Earl of Chesterfield, somewhat less rigidly enforced, and a fearful accident, which occurred in Dublin, led to the opening of the chapels, and the unmolested celebration of public worship. In the year 1763, we find her living with her mother and sister, in that city, but a spitting of blood, which seized her soon after her arrival, threatened to defeat her hopes, and frustrate her good intentions. She began her mission by opening a school for fifty children, and was encouraged by the advice and assistance of her sister and mother, who seem to have been animated by a kindred feeling to her own. She hired a private room, and engaged a competent and trustworthy person to pay them that minute attention, which she could not afford to pay them. She now became aware of the necessity of her labors; and often in after years, used to say that she was absolutely horrified at the wickedness of those who were assembled in her little school in Dublin. She was not long engaged in her useful and meritorious labors, when she had to sustain the double loss of a mother and a sister. The ties that bound her to the world were thus severed one by one, and this bereavement, however afflicting, but left her the more love for God. After performing towards them the last rites of affection, she dissolved her school, and removed to Cork, where her brothers resided, and where a new career of sanctity and usefulness lay open before her.

She was not long in this city when her zeal was called into activity. She established a school for some poor girls, in the strictest secrecy, however, and without the knowledge of her own family. The opening of this school, and the singular manner in which it became known to her friends, we shall give in her own words. It is an extract from a letter, dated the 17th July, 1769, and addressed to one of the first members of the Ursuline Community, to encourage her in the work in which she was engaged:—

“Dear Miss Fitzsimons,—I am sorry Miss Coppinger cannot see the schools, as I think no one can have an idea of their use, unless an eye witness. As you wish to have a particular account of them, I shall tell you how I began. I think I mentioned to you before, that it was an undertaking I thought I never should have the happiness of accomplishing. Nothing would have made me come here, but the decision of the Clergyman that I should run a great risk of salvation if I did not follow the inspiration. This made me accept a very kind invitation of my sister-in-law to visit her. When I arrived, I kept my desire a profound secret, as I knew if it were spoken of, I should meet with opposition on every side, particularly from my own immediate family, as, to all appearance, they would suffer from it. My confessor was the only person I told of it; and, as I could not appear in the affair, I sent my maid to get a good mistress, and to take in thirty poor girls. When this little school was settled, I used to steal there in the morning: my brother thought I was at the chapel. This passed on very well, until one day a poor man came to him, to beg of him to speak to me to take his child to my school; on which he came in to his wife and me, laughing at the conceit of a man who was mad, and thought I was in the situation of a schoolmistress. Then I owned I had set up a school, on which he fell into a violent passion, and said a vast deal on the bad consequences that may follow. His wife is very zealous, and so is he; but worldly interest blinded him at first. He was not the person I dreaded would be brought into trouble about it; it was my uncle Nagle, who is, I think, the most disliked by the Protestants of any Catholic in the kingdom. I expected a great deal from him. The best part of the fortune I have, I received from him. When he heard of it, he was not at all angry at it; and in a little time they were so good as to contribute largely to support it. I took in children by degrees, not to make a noise about it in the beginning. In about nine months I had two hundred children. When the Catholics saw what success it had, they begged that, for the convenience of the children, I would set up schools at the other end of the town from where I was, to be under my care and direction; and they promised to contribute to the support of them. With this request I readily complied, and a number of children, equal to those I already had, were taken in, and at the death of my uncle, I supported them all at my own expense. I did not intend to take boys; but my sister-in-law made it a point, and said she would not allow any of my friends to contribute to them unless I did so; on which I got a master, and took in only forty boys. They are in a house by themselves, and have no communication with the others. At present, however, I have two schools for boys, and five for girls. The former learn to read; and, when they learn the Douay catechism by heart, they learn to write and cipher. There are three schools where the girls learn to read; and, when they have their catechism by heart, they learn to work. They all hear mass every day; say their morning and night prayers; say the catechism in each school, by question and answer, all together. Every Sunday they all say their beads; the grown girls say them every evening. They go to confession every month, and to communion when their confessors think proper. The schools are open at eight; at twelve the children go to dinner; at five they leave school. The workers do not begin their night-prayers until six, after their beads. I prepare a set for first communion twice a year, and, I may truly say, it is the only thing that gives me any trouble. In the first place, I think myself very incapable; and, at the beginning, my being obliged to speak for upwards of four hours, and my chest not being so strong as it had been, I spat blood, which I took care to conceal, for fear of being prevented from instructing the poor. It has not the least bad effect now. When I have done preparing them at each end of the town, I feel myself like an idler that has nothing to do, though I speak almost as much as when I prepare them for their first communion. I find not the least difficulty in it. I explain the catechism as well as I can, in one school or the other, every day; and if every one thought as little of labor as I do, they would have little merit for it. I often think my schools will never bring me to heaven, as I only take delight and pleasure in them. You see it has pleased the Almighty to make me succeed, when I had everything, as I may say, to fight against. I assure you I did not expect a farthing from any mortal towards the support of my schools, and I thought I should not have more than fifty or sixty girls until I got a fortune; nor did I think I should have a school in Cork. I began in a poor humble manner; and though it pleased the Divine will to give me severe trials in this foundation, yet it is to shew that it is His work, and has not been effected by human means. I can assure you my schools are beginning to be of service to many parts of the world, this is a place of such trade. They are heard of, and my views are not for one object alone: if I could be of service, in saving souls in any part of the globe, I should do all in my power.”

(To be continued.)

THE TIMES—OH, TEMPORA!

To the Editor of the Tablet.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—After three centuries of fierce, unkind, uncharitable, and continued controversy against the Church of Christ, and his divine faith, now we find that the enemies of this Holy Mother have been working in vain: that from the champion of the Reformation, Luther, down to the famous Dr. Philpotts, their bitter writings and sounding words have been no more than a waste of time, which ought to have been employed in a better cause; that the incessant endeavours of the corrupted press of the United Kingdom have been fruitless; and that the Weekly Dispatch, as well as other vehicles of public intelligence, have troubled themselves, only to witness their foolery and opprobrium. After the same period of persecution, murders, oppressions, and vexations, we come at last to know that all this has been unjust and undeserved, and that our Mother, the Catholic Church, has been persecuted gratis, et sine causa. The Reformation, the glorious Reformation itself, is recognised now as being nothing but humbug, and a scheme for getting money and for accumulating sacrilegious wealth. And why so? Why, because the Times, the leading newspaper of England, the national paper, the prince of the public scribes, and, I think, the organ of the rulers of Great Britain, says so. Let us hear its editor, in a long article of Friday, the 10th inst., in regard to the state of affairs in Spain, to which I refer my readers, and from which, it being too long for your columns, I extract the following remarkable and consolatory lines. Speaking of the Church of Spain as she at present appears to the civilised and religious world, he says, "The persecution she has undergone has been as fierce as the trials of ancient martyrdom: but, like the persecutions of old, these trials must reach their termination, and the Church still stands, where it stood since the days of the Apostles, victorious in defeat, triumphant in its extremest need." Such is the truth slipped from the pen of the Times in the nineteenth century. Certainly, Mr. Editor, how many rightful reflections, how many natural consequences, spring from these few lines. The Church of Spain has been, is, and I hope she will be until the end of ages, the Catholic Church in close connection with Rome, the Church of Christendom spread all over the known world. Therefore, if her persecution is fierce as the trials of ancient martyrdom, what ought we to think of the persecutions undergone by this very Catholic Church in the space of three centuries in England, France, &c.? They must have been fierce as the trials of ancient martyrdom, and she then has been persecuted unjustly, as she was unjustly persecuted by Nero, Caligula, Dioclesian, and other Pagan tyrants. Aye, and I say that the persecutions of the last three centuries have been more unjust; yes, because the Pagan tyrants knew not her merit, and her modern persecutors acknowledge it. If the Church of Spain still stands where it stood since the days of the Apostles, ergo, it cannot be the Harlot of the Apocalypse; it cannot be an idolator; it cannot be superstitious; it cannot be spurious; it cannot be a sect; it cannot be a tyrant; it cannot be the enemy of learning and civilisation; it cannot be the corrupter, but the faithful preserver and depository of the Holy Scriptures; it cannot be. . . . But where am I going? According to this unexpected and plain confession of the Times, the Catholic Church is nothing more or less than the Immaculate Dove, the Spouse of the Immaculate Lamb of God, the Column and firmament of the Truth, built on a rock, unconquerable through the wonder-erud of nineteen centuries, and which is always victorious in defeat and triumphant in its extremest need. So it was in the days of the Apostles; it was spotless; it had none of the faults and wrinkles which its enemies fancy to see in it. No, no; if the Catholic Church still stands in the nineteenth century, where it stood since the days of the Apostles, it must be the same; and it being still cherished, and victoriously and triumphantly defended by its Founder, who is omnipotent, and who with a breath of his divine will can reduce to impotence the most potent powers of darkness, it cannot be otherwise, for it would be impossible that the hand of God should then protect it. God be blessed, my dear Sir, for his great mercy in making the instrument of his divine will, and the organ of his divine truth, the most inveterate enemies of his Immaculate Spouse, showing to the world in such a wonderful manner and plainly, that the doors of hell will never prevail against her. Let us go on; the true Babylon is falling; if we push a little, it will be ruined for ever.

I remain, Sir, yours,
MARIANO GIL DE TEJADA.

3, Portland-place, North End, Fulham,
May 13, 1844.

[Tablet.]

INCORPORATION OF ROMAN CATHOLIC SOCIETIES AT BOSTON.—The Legislature of this State within the last two or three years, not having the fear of God and the New England Puritan before its eyes, hath very erroneously and with evil complacency according to the oracle just named, suffered five acts of incorporation, for as many Roman Catholic societies, to have met their approbation. Of these, three were Mutual Relief Associations, one a Temperance Society, and the other—St. Vincent's Orphan Asylum. The Puritan further deposeth:—"that no sect of late years appears before our Legislature with so much favour as the Roman Catholics. We are free to declare that a political party so managing, shall never receive our vote, however coincident their views may be with ours in other respects." The writers know as well as we do that their first assertion is not well founded. That every session since the word Catholic was first uttered in the Massachusetts Legislature, the most unfriendly epithets have been piled on our faith and practice. Not by any one party, but by the ignorant and fanatical of both; we can also proudly point to proofs of individual liberality amongst Whigs and Democrats, and have only to regret that they are so limited. The Puritan would not wish to encourage charity, or foster temperance, or promote benevolent associations amongst Catholics. The orphan and the inebriate may be abandoned, and the sick man pine away unvisited and unassisted because of his religious belief. It is not bad enough for ruffian mobs to destroy our seminaries, but revere-nd editors must likewise attack our humble asylums for those who have no parents and no protection but what public charity provides them with. Alas! for the miserable bitterness of sectarian hatred, which cannot suffer the fathers to be fed in peace!—Boston Pilot, April 27.

CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

No. 8.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, AUGUST 24, 1844.

[VOL. VII.]

THE PRETENDED CHURCH HAS NOT IN ITS MINISTERS, EXTRAORDINARY AND IMMEDIATE MISSION FROM GOD.

TRANSLATED FROM ST FRANCIS OF SALES.

(Concluded from our last.)

And in point of fact, who will point out to me a single legitimate extraordinary vocation which was not admitted by the ordinary authority? St. Paul,* beyond doubt, was called extraordinarily, but did he not obtain the approbation of Ananias and of the Apostles once or twice?† In this sense a mission sanctioned by the ordinary authority is termed the vocation of the Holy Ghost. The mission of the Precursor,‡ strictly speaking, cannot be called extraordinary, because he taught nothing in opposition to the Mosaic Church, and because John was moreover of the Sacerdotal race; nevertheless, the singularity of his life and doctrine was recognised by the ordinary authority of the Jewish Church in that solemn embassy to him of the priests and levites, the object of which presupposes that he was held by them in great esteem and repute; the Pharisees themselves,§ who sat on the chair of Moses, came publicly and without scruple, to participate in his baptism. This was, surely, to recognise his mission and take it in good part.

Did not our Lord himself,|| though he was the superior, wish to be acknowledged and received by Simeon, who was a priest, since he blessed the son, the mother, and St. Joseph? By Zacharias* also,¶ who was another priest, by St. John, and even at the time of his passion which was the fulfilment of the chief end of his mission, did he not wish to have more-over the prophetic testimony of the high priest for that year? And this is what St. Paul says and teaches, when he desires that no person who is not called by God as Aaron was, should assume the pastoral honor††; for the vocation of Aaron was by the order of Moses, since God did not immediately of himself put his holy word into the mouth of Aaron, but Moses,* to whom God gave this command; "Speak to him and put my words in his mouth, and I will be in thy mouth and in his mouth." If we consider more attentively what St. Paul says, we shall learn that the vocation of ecclesiastical pastors and magistrates, should be made visibly† and not as if by enthusiasm, under the influence of a hidden and interior impulse; behold the two examples which he proposes,—that of Aaron‡ who was anointed and called visibly, and that of our Lord and Master,§ who, being the sovereign pastor and pontiff of all ages, did not glorify himself, that is to say, did not assume the honor of holy priesthood, as St. Paul had said before, but was manifested by him who said to him; "Thou art my son, to-day I have begotten thee, thou art a priest for ever according to the order of Melchisidech."

Has he intruded and forced himself into this honor? No, but he was called||. Who called him? His eternal Father. And how did he call him? He called him at once, both mediately and immediately; immediately, at his baptism¶ and transfiguration, in these words, "This is my beloved son in whom I am well pleased, hear ye him;" mediately, through the prophets, and through David in particular, in these passages of his psalms cited by St. Paul††: "Thou art my son, to-day I have begotten thee,"††—"according to the order of Melchisidech." Thus his vocation was every way visible; the word in the cloud was heard, and Acts. 9, 6 and 17.

† Luke, 48.

‡ Matthew 4, 3, 5, 17.

* Luke 4, 3, 5, and 7,

† Ibid. 32, 3 and 4,

§ John 1, 19, &c.

¶ Luke 2, 28 and 34.

|| John, 1, 29.

* Heb. 5, 4,

† Levit. 8, 12.

|| Heb. 5, 5 and 26.

 Matthew. 3, 17.

†† Psal, 2, 7.

Exod. 4, 15.

Exod. 28, 1.

|| Heb. 5, 20, 5.

†† Matthew, 17, 5.

in the writing of David,* was heard and read. But St. Paul wishing to show, still more forcibly, the vocation of our Lord, alleges these passages of David in which it is said, that Jesus Christ had been glorified by his Father; being thus content to produce perceptible and external testimony, and he produces it from the ordinary scriptures, and from the prophets received and recognised as such.

To all these reasons I shall add,—that the authority of an extraordinary mission has never destroyed that of the ordinary, and is never intended to overturn it; witness all the prophets who never raised up altar against altar, and who never contradicted the priesthood of Aaron, nor abolished the constitutions of the Synagogue; witness our Saviour himself who assures us, that every kingdom divided against itself shall be laid desolate, and house shall fall upon house. Hence the great respect which he manifested for the chair of Moses! whose doctrine he so much venerated and always commanded to be observed. In truth, if an extraordinary authority were to abolish that which is ordinary, how should we be able to know when, in what, and after what manner, we should be obedient to it? No, no, the ordinary authority is constant, and shall always exist while the Church exists here below; the pastors and doctors whom God has once given to the Church, must have a perpetual succession; “for the perfecting of the saints until we all meet in the unity of faith and of the knowledge of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the age of the fulness of Christ, that henceforth we be no more children tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the wickedness of men, by cunning craftiness by which they lie in wait to deceive.” Behold how well St. Paul discourses, to show, that if the ordinary doctors and pastors were not to have a perpetual succession, or if they were liable to be supplanted by others extraordinary, we should have nothing but disorder, interruption and variation both in faith and discipline; we should be liable to be seduced by lying men, ever ready to boast of an extraordinary vocation; like the gentiles, we should be doomed to walk in the vanity of our own thoughts, each one consoling himself in the persuasion that he felt within him an extraordinary motion of the Holy Ghost; a delusion of which this age furnishes so many examples, that a stronger argument could not be advanced to our present purpose: for if an extraordinary mission is to remove the ordinary mode of pastoral administration, to whom should we then entrust our charge? Is it to Calvin, a rock, unconquerable throne, or to the Queen of England? Alas! each one, in turn, will adopt the convenient pretext of extraordinary mission, to recommend himself. In truth, the word of God delivers us from all these difficulties; he says, that he has built his Church on so good a foundation, and with proportions so skilfully planned, that the gates of hell shall never prevail against it; but if the gates of hell have not prevailed, and never will prevail against the Church, an extraordinary vocation cannot be necessary to abolish it, for God hates nothing which he has made, and how then shall he abolish that holy Church, his ordinary spouse, to make room for another of extraordinary creation, since it was he himself who built the former, upon himself, and cemented it with his own blood?

RIGHT REV. DOCTOR OLLIFFE.

The Catholics of Bengal will rejoice to learn that Bishop Olliffe, together with the numerous party which accompanies his Lordship arrived safely and in good health in the Madras Roads, on the 10th instant, after a most prosperous passage of eighty days. Our letters commend in the highest terms, the Ship Seringapatam and also the Commander, Captain E. Voss. The arrangements on board are of a very superior description for the accommodation of Passengers, and throughout the voyage the Captain was unceasing in his kind attention to the wants and comforts of those entrusted to his care. We remember with pleasure the splendid testimonial of gratitude, which, on the first arrival of the Loretto Nuns, the Catholic Ladies of Calcutta and their friends presented to Captain Campbell, in return for that gentleman's kindness to the religious Sisters, who came to India in the Scotia. In the present instance, as the party, now on their way to us from Madras in the Seringapatam, are far more numerous than that which came in the Scotia, and must have required greater exertions on the Captain's part to render the passage so very agreeable as we are assured that it was, we hope that a suitable tribute will be paid also in recognition of Captain Voss's services.

In effect it is the interest,—we speak of the matter in a religious point of view,—of the Catholic Community here to show that they appreciate duly such kindness. The parents and friends of the Apostolic party in the Seringapatam will bear with joy and heartfelt emotion of the parental solicitude paid to their relations, and of the handsome manner in which that benevolence was rewarded. The good tidings will pass from one family to another in Ireland, and the dread that now exists of allowing the pious youth of both sexes to devote themselves to the Indian Mission will be thus gradually dispelled. So admirable were the arrangements on board the Seringapatam, that both the Ecclesiastics and the Nuns were enabled to attend during the voyage to their respective religious offices, and they had also the happiness to assist every Sunday and festival at the Holy Sacrifice of the Altar. One of the religious ladies writes, with great delight and gratitude to God, that on each of the four days preceding their arrival in Madras, she and her pious sisters were enabled to approach daily to the Holy Communion. In the wonderful ways of Divine Providence, we may confidently hope, that the holy and edifying example thus given to all on board, will greatly contribute to remove religious prejudices from the minds of many, and lead, not in a few instances, to the conversion of our separated brethren. We may add here, that by the last mail, we received intelligence that, besides the Nuns now coming to Bengal, the Parent House of the Loretto Institute has just sent three other Sisters under the care of a Chaplain to Buenos Ayres—all the expences of this new Mission and of the erection and endowment of the new Convent and Schools are to be fully paid, we believe, by the Government of that Colony. By the late mail, we also learn that Sir Thomas Edmonde, Bart. has begun to erect a spacious range of School Rooms, to be annexed to the Loretto Convent lately established at Gorey, county Wexford, and, that another house of the same Institute was to be founded on the Northern side of Dublin, near the sea, in order to afford the Pupils the advantage of sea bathing.

NOTICE.

To the Catholics of Calcutta and its vicinity.

In order to afford the Catholic Community an opportunity of receiving in a suitable manner their future Chief Pastor, Bishop Olliffe and the numerous party of Ecclesiastics and Religious Ladies, who by his Lordship's exertions have been induced to devote themselves to the service of Religion in the Bengal Mission, it is arranged, that, as soon as the Semaphore announces the arrival of the Seringapatam, printed notices of the announcement shall be distributed as widely as circumstances will allow among the Catholic families of Calcutta, and that the Joy Bells of the Cathedral as well as of the Church of the Sacred Heart shall also be rung in honor of the same happy occurrence. If the weather permit, the Clergy and Laity will receive his Lordship and party at the Chaundpaul Ghaut at 5 o'clock P. M. on the day on which the Seringapatam reaches Calcutta, and proceed from thence in the order before observed, on a similar occasion, to the Cathedral. Should the weather be unfavorable, the Bishop and party will on arriving proceed at once to the Cathedral and, after returning thanks to God for their safe passage, the Ecclesiastics will proceed to St. John's College and the Religious Ladies to their Convent. On the Sunday after his arrival, the Papal Briefs, in virtue of which Bishop Olliffe was promoted to the Episcopacy and appointed co-adjutor Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, will be read at the solemn Pontifical High Mass to be celebrated by his Lordship, in the Cathedral.

DANIEL O'CONNELL.

The papers received by the last Overland mail mention that the Writ of Error in the case of the Queen versus O'Connell and others came on for argument, in the House of Lords on the 4th July. The Council for the Plaintiffs in Error are Sir T. Wilde, Mr. Hill, Mr. F. Kelley, Mr. Seymour Murphy, Mr. C. Crompton, Mr. O'Leary, Mr. J. W. Smith, Mr. Close, Mr. Peacock, and C. M. O'Hoyler. The case was opened at great length and could not possibly terminate for many days. The London correspondent of the Calcutta Star says that "it is the opinion of some eminent Lawyers that there is "error in the Record," and that Mr. O'Connell will, in consequence, be liberated."

The following extract of a letter from an Irish Officer in Her Majesty's service, an ardent lover of Ireland and O'Connell, will, we are confident, be found to contain expressions of feelings and sentiments much in accordance with those of a vast majority of our readers:—

"I feel much pleasure in forwarding herewith a draft for Fifty (50) Rupees, which I will feel much obliged by your handing to the Treasurer of the O'Connell Testimonial. You are not a stranger to the feelings of devoted admiration and unbounded affection which I entertain towards the illustrious Liberator of our beloved country and our Creed. As a Catholic who, though yet young, well remembers the days of bondage, ere the vile Orange faction had yet received its death blow in the extorted boon of emancipation; as one of the millions whom he has disenslaved and elevated to the privileges and rights of a free subject, I have always deemed O'Connell my greatest political benefactor, towards whom my heart throbs with sentiments of the deepest gratitude and veneration. The feelings of personal devotion which I have ever cherished towards him, have, if possible, increased in intensity, since the late monstrous and unjustifiable prosecutions (I had almost written persecutions, and here they are tantamount.) To complete the full measure of O'Connell's illustrious name it was only necessary that he should suffer for his country, and to the numberless other traits of patriotism which shed a halo of glory around his distinguished career, must now be added, the brilliant one of having endured Martyrdom in the cause of Ireland. The topic of the late trial is one on which I almost fear to express myself, as I feel the theme is a thrilling one, to an Irish Catholic painfully so. The gross and palpable perversion of justice (in this instance unredeemed even by the technicalities of the Law) the spirit of venomous personal hostility, and the utter absence of that dignified impartiality which should ever reign sovereign in a court purporting to administer the laws of a free country, which characterized the late proceedings, are such as to arouse the indignation of every man not thoroughly blinded by prejudice, and have enlisted the sympathies of all except those whose animosity towards O'Connell and hatred of Catholic Ireland reign paramount over every other consideration.

"I have not met with a single individual who could defend or even palliate the monstrous mockery of justice evinced in the accidental (!!!) omission of the names of the Catholic Jurymen, although they do not disguise their exultation in the circumstance and gloat over the sentence (a necessary result of such omission) with feelings which, to say the least, reflect little credit upon human nature.

"I hail, with very sincere gratification, the demonstration of manly sympathy which the metropolis of British India is about to testify towards the greatest man of modern times; I feel convinced it will be received by its illustrious object with feelings of pleasurable pride as emanating from an enlightened community such as that of Calcutta eminently is. This Testimonial will convince the Liberator, that his brilliant exertions in behalf of his lovely but ill-fated country, his splendid talents, which confer additional lustre upon the most devoted patriotism, and his fearless advocacy of oppressed humanity of every creed and country are appreciated in the East, as well as in the land of the West,—that the lustrous brilliancy of his deathless fame is here, as in every other part of the civilized world, confessed and acknowledged, and that, denizens as we are of this sultry distant clime, we have not forgotten the ties of attachment and affection which link us to O'Connell and our Fatherland. Although Catholics are particularly and in a more especial manner called on by a strong sense of obligation to evince their gratitude to the man who delivered them from religious degradation, and to whose almost superhuman exertions and the long struggles, sustained throughout a long the column are, it is our charge? of servitude on a rock, unconquerable throned, still I hope period of nineteen centuries or to will deem doctrines, a

Ephes. 4

tribute of esteem and respect to him who has advocated the cause of men of all persuasions. If the Catholics of Ireland feel that he is, par excellence, their Liberator, let it not be forgotten that Dissenters of every description have reaped the benefit of his talents, and that his voice has been raised in behalf of the Presbyterian of the North as well as the Catholic of the South; that he has been the advocate of the Jew and the Gentile, the degraded sons of Africa as well as the unhappy children of Poland, and that his entire life has been one continuous struggle for liberty of conscience, and the moral and political freedom of mankind, without respect to country, creed, or complexion. Every Englishman who values the proud privileges of his country, who regards trial by Jury as the palladium of British Liberty, and who appreciates the inestimable blessings of a free constitution, is personally interested in the sentence of O'Connell, and every man, whatever be his country or place of birth, is bound to sympathise with the champion of Freedom who has been ever found in the foremost ranks in denouncing oppression and despotism whether in the person of the miscreant Autocrat of Russia, or the merciless calculating slave owner of America. "Si monumentum quaeris, circumspice." His intense love of Ireland and fearless expressions of his opinion have consigned him to a prison, "it's treason to love her and death to defend," and even the bitterest enemies of O'Connell are forced to concede that he "loved her, not wisely, but too well."

"May I be permitted to offer a suggestion which needs little apology, as my motives are the furtherance of this great object you have in view—would it not be advisable to advertise a brief notice of this testimonial in the principal Calcutta and Provincial newspapers? I conceive the publicity thus afforded to this intended demonstration, would tend much to promote contributions, as I feel assured many persons who would be willing to subscribe, have otherwise no opportunity of learning that any testimonial to O'Connell (in Calcutta) is contemplated. I myself became acquainted with the fact by the merest accident, and I am indebted to a chance information that I have now an opportunity of adding my mite to this most seasonable and well-merited testimonial to Mr O'Connell. Of course any recommendation of the object is not to be expected from any journal in this country, but I think an advertisement such as I have alluded to would be attended with good result.

"There will be a subscription in our Chapel next Sunday morning for the Gwalior Christians. It has been warmly recommended from the Altar by my most excellent and revered friend the Rev. ———— whose exertions in this as in every other good work, untiring and unwearied attention to the eternal interests of our poor Catholic Soldiers, and amiable deportment, are beyond all praise. Prayers are offered up every Sunday after Mass for the health and happiness, temporal and eternal, of O'Connell, that the Almighty may comfort him during his term of imprisonment, and restore him unimpaired and unsubdued by that confinement which many hope will prove his death, to continue that brilliant destiny which he has been called on to fulfil. The Rev. Gentleman's remarks on the subject while they necessarily steered clear of political allusions (his congregation being almost exclusively military) were feeling and pathetic, merely mentioning the fact that O'Connell, their countrymen and benefactor, was sentenced to a dungeon.

"I remain, &c. &c."

A LOVER OF O'CONNELL, AND OF IRELAND."

THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, TRANSSUBSTANTIATION, AND THE ANCIENT FATHERS.

Such is the blind zeal of the Christian Advocate in his opposition to Transubstantiation, that having failed miserably in his scriptural objections, he has recourse to the supplementary aid of the Ancient Fathers of the Church, whom almost all Protestants regard as the teachers of Popery. In these circumstances, it is easy to imagine how embarrassing was the task of the Christian Advocate, when he had to Anabaptise the Ancient Fathers, and at the same time, secure the genuine Anabaptists of these latter days, from the haven of Popery which, he feared, the newly Anabaptised Ancient Fathers might still retain. Accordingly, he tells us, (and a wonderful announcement it is) that, although he goes back 1600 or 1700 years to disprove Transubstantiation from the musty records of the Ancient Fathers, he might much more profitably employ himself about the writings of modern Anabaptists, since the "learned and pious theologians of the present day are in a more advantageous position for expounding and illustrating the word of God than we, the so called Fathers." What follows is perhaps still more wonderful. The Fathers are to be admired, he says, for their piety, and respected for their steadfastness amidst persecution, but, although they teach the doctrine of the Anabaptists, "we ought to have but little confidence either in the correctness of their judgement, or in the extent of their knowledge." What a strange theologian, the Naval Editor of the Christian Advocate must be, to make such a declaration as this; and yet, some how or other, this man seems to be admitted, by a kind of common consent, to be the great champion and redoubted defender of Protestantism in Calcutta. On what ground the Rev. Mr. Bouz could be admitted to a preeminence so enviable, we cannot conjecture, except it be the principle of analogy, that as the varied political interests of England are best defended by the wooden walls of her fleet, so the various, conflicting Protestant sects which divide the land, are safest under the protecting quill of a Marine Editor. At all events, we shall soon see that he discharges this duty in Sailor style.

What does the rough, honest, but untutored Tar know about the spirituality of religion, accustomed as he is to the buffets of the storm, the painful infliction of the rope's end, and all the sturdy matter of fact details of sea-faring life? The arts of Navigation and ship building have been improving since the days of Noah to the present hour; and as we have now better navigators and ship-wrights than at any previous period of the Christian era, why should not the interpreters of scripture also, in these palmy days of Bible reading, excel in all manner of qualifications, the so called Ancient Fathers, however pious they may have been, or steadfast under persecutions? It may be said, that this is the reasoning of a Sailor, not only ignorant but irreligious; be it so, it is the reasoning of the Editor of the Christian Advocate, as we hope to be able to convince our readers presently. "It is admitted," he says, "that all the sciences cultivated in the present day (navigation and rope-making included) are more generally known, and better understood, than they were among the ancients. But why a principle which is almost self-evident when applied to secular knowledge, should not hold good in regard to theology, is difficult to determine." On this truly Protestant principle, then, the religion of Jesus Christ is to go on improving to the end of the world, and the last Reformation will alone deserve the name of a true reformation, so that if this frail world have many more days to endure, we are to have an improved reproduction of the Church of God, which will eclipse even the present Anabaptist conventicle!!! O, the religion of Protestants! for ever undergoing reformations of reformations, and never arriving at fixity of doctrinal belief; or, as the scripture expresses it, for ever learning and never arriving at a knowledge of the truth.

Religion with some is a mere worldly speculation, and in the minds of such persons, it is subjected to the laws of all things temporal, and made liable to the vicissitudes of secular science. St. Peter was a fisherman, and although he may not have understood the management of a boat or ship, as well as the Editor of the Christian Advocate, we are disposed to think him a much better theologian than his rival in Calcutta; and in St. Peter and his Co-apostles, although less scientific tradesmen than the modern Bible interpreters, were far superior to them in the science of theology, the Disciples of the Apostles, and the Disciples of their Disciples, will have a fair chance of carrying off the palm also; and thus the higher we go up to the apostolic source the less exceptionable the teaching of the Fathers should be supposed. What then becomes of the down-hill career of improvement to the end of the world? Did not the Apostles teach the entire true system of Christian belief, and above all, did they not teach it to their own disciples and successors? and if so, what improvement and discoveries, unknown to them, can modern interpreters dig out of the Bible, unless they choose to call the vagaries of their own private diseased imaginations, improvements on the teaching of the Apostles?

The Disciples and successors of the Apostles learned, preached, and practised whatever the Bible teaches or enjoins, before they had read it; and hence they could interpret whatever they read, by the light of previous apostolic teaching, as well as by the aid of existing apostolic usages and institutions.

Who ever heard of such folly as would make the work of God improveable by human power and wisdom? We should not be surprised to hear the Editor of the Christian Advocate next proposing a voyage to the moon, with the intent of improving its shape and developing its capabilities. But after all, bad and worthless as the Ancient Fathers are, in the judgement of the Christian Advocate, he says, that they had the good fortune to know nothing of transubstantiation, or in other words, that they were all Anabaptists. When we come to examine the extracts which he makes from the writings of the Fathers to prove this assertion, it will be time enough to expose himself and his infamous tricks to the scorn and confusion which they deserve; for the present, we shall be content to place him in juxtaposition with Luther and some learned Protestants of more modern date, regarding the testimony of the Primitive Fathers of Christianity. These venerable witnesses of antiquity, who, according to the Advocate, preached Protestantism, were, according to the learned Protestant, Causabon, all on the Catholic side; and the equally learned Protestant, Obrecht, testifies that in reading their works, "he was frequently provoked to throw them on the ground, finding them so full of Popery." The Rev. Conyers Middleton heaps every kind of obloquy upon them, and even goes so far as to say, that if one miracle, said to be performed after the time of the Apostles, were to be admitted as genuine, Protestantism would be undone, in as much as such a miracle would have been wrought in confirmation of Catholic doctrine.

Let us now hear Luther, the father of the Reformation, in opposition to the Protestant Champion of Calcutta, regarding the doctrine of the Lord's supper. "I have hitherto taught, says Luther, and I still teach, that it is of little consequence, and a question of no great moment, whether a person believes that the bread remains in the Eucharist, or that it does not remain, and is transubstantiated."

Let us now hear this same Protestant Patriarch proving the real and corporeal presence of our Lord Jesus Christ in the Blessed Eucharist, from the writings of the Ancient Fathers.—"That not one among the Fathers, says Luther, numerous as they are, should have spoken of the Eucharist, as these men (the Calvinists and Anabaptists) do, is truly astonishing.—Not one of them speaks thus:—there is only bread and wine, or, the body and blood of Christ are not present. And when we reflect how often the subject is treated and repeated by them, it ceases to be credible—it is not even possible—that not so much as once, such words as these should not have dropped from some of them.—Surely it was of moment that men should not be drawn into error—still they all speak with such precision, evincing that they entertained no doubt of the presence of the body and blood. Had not this been their conviction, can it be imagined that, among so many, the negative opinion should not have been uttered on a single occasion? On other points this was not the case,—but our sacramentarians, on the other hand, can proclaim only the negative or contrary opinion. These men, then, to say all in one word, have drawn their notions, neither from the scriptures nor the fathers."†

We fear it will be very hard to reconcile Luther to the Editor of the Christian Advocate, but while the enemies of truth disagree, the cause of truth is advanced. If there were no other arguments to establish the truth of the Catholic religion, it could be collected from the conflicting testimonies of its adversaries.

THE IMPIOUS FORGERY.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

DEAR SIR,—In perusing the Englishman of Saturday last, I observed a letter signed "A. P." The pious writer, anxious to vilify the Catholic Religion, does his best to convince the public that the so called Letter of Our Lord, &c. is a Catholic work. It is not enough to say that the Letter has been written by a Catholic hand, but it should be proved that it has been sanctioned by the Catholic Church. I have no time to undertake a serious investigation of the matter, but it is an undeniable fact that that Letter has always been condemned by the Holy Catholic Church as an impudent forgery, and that she has always forbidden her faithful children from reading, distributing, and keeping such a Letter. Now, dato non concessio, that it has been sold by Catholic booksellers, printed and distributed by some Catholic or rather schismatic, it only proves, that there are some superstitious and ignorant people in the Catholic Church. Has not the Protestant Church to deplore the gross superstition and the vast ignorance of the greatest part of her members?

* Hactenus docui, et adhuc doceo, parum referre, nec magni momenti questionem esse, sive quis panem in Eucharistia manere, sive non manere et transubstantiari credat.—LUTHER. . De Cena Domini.

† Defensio verborum Cæcæ. T. 7. p. 391, Edit. Wittenbergæ 1557.

Eusebius, the historian, quoted by A. P. died in the year 338—that is, in that happy epoch wherein, according to all Protestant denominations, the Catholic Church, now the Temple of Idolatry, the Church of Antichrist, the abode of the Lusty of Babylon, was still pure in her dogmas and free from false worship, superstition and heresy. Now had the Letter in question been mentioned by Eusebius to be a Catholic production, why do not A. P. and all Protestants, who boast to profess the pure religion of the early ages, venerate it? or, why do they reject as spurious a letter, in which the love of Christ for the human being is so well characterised, a document authenticated by the veneration of the first ages of Christianity. We, who are said to belong to the Prostituted Lady, to be the followers of Antichrist,—we, who are said to have shamefully abandoned the purity of the early ages, consider the Letter of Our Lord, &c. notwithstanding its supposed antiquity, no more than an impious forgery. The Pope has disavowed, and still disavows the genuineness of the emblems and insignia papalia affixed to the Letter. We Catholics maintain with the Pope that the insignia and emblems are not less forged than the letter itself.

Yours truly,
SAL TERRE.

21st August, 1844.

LETTER NO. XVII.

FROM A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA TO HIS PROTESTANT FRIENDS IN EUROPE.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—I have in some of my former numbers given you the most irrefragable testimony—the acknowledgment of your own divines and writers—that dissensions, contentions, enmities and contradictory doctrines do exist in Protestantism, and that such being the innate germ of its principles, you consequently have not and cannot have that great and vital mark of Christianity, Unity, and by which sign, the Son of God tells us, the world is to know, by the unity in his body, the Church, that God the Father had sent him, as he sent his Apostles and their successors. I would therefore consider it a gross insult to your reason to press this fact any longer upon your attention; deny it, and you close your eyes and do violence to your understanding; confess it, and it behoves you to consider whether your want of unity unqualifies you to be ranked as the Church of Christ, a consequence that would be fatal to your eternal salvation. Upon this point, I find a very apropos observation made by the Lord Bishop of Australia at one of the Anniversary Meetings of the Auxiliary Church Mission Society, whereat a gentleman remarked that, with respect to the divisions among Protestants which the Lord Bishop had lamented, the nature of Protestantism is, that there shall be divisions, and therefore thought that all parties should go hand in hand as far as possible—to this honest speech his Lordship replied, “he must express his decided dissent from part of his friend’s remarks, for if division is necessary to the existence of Protestantism, he would almost think that it cannot be the Church of Christ, for in that Church there must not be division but unity.” If this concession is in conformity to the maxims of scripture, “as it certainly is, then it is no less certain that Protestantism “cannot be the Church of Christ,” for while its principle is allowed to work, divisions must necessarily be its fruit. There was a time when people believed, as Catholics do still, in the Holy Catholic Church, as implying one Fold, one Faith, or one uniform doctrine; without schism in the body, or contradictory doctrines, and which we may readily suppose was the belief of the Apostles when they drew out The Apostles’ Creed. We read in the Acts that, “the multitude of believers had but one heart, and soul!” one uniform doctrine; or as it said in the Corinthians, “For we, being many, are one bread, one body, all partake of one bread—labouring together,” and being thus united, were entitled, “the Holy Catholic Church.” If this was not the constitution of the Church of Christ, why such injunctions as these? “Now I beseech you, brethren to mark them who make dissensions, and offences contrary to the doctrine you have learnt, and to avoid them!”—“be careful to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.”—We must, therefore, grant that the Churches of the Apostles were thus framed, and called collectively, the “Catholic Church,” or admit, without any equivocation, that the Christians of those days were divided as the Protestants of these times, that is, would not agree in points of doctrines—would not join each other in prayer—would not worship together, or partake of the “one bread,” a conclusion which I think even you will shrink from coming to, and this ought to demonstrate to you that the term and signification of “Catholic Church” are totally inapplicable and incompatible to Protestantism. It is true, that there were schisms, heresies, wolves in sheep’s clothing, false teachers, &c. in the time of the Apostles, but you surely will not allow that consequently they belonged to the confraternity of the Catholic Church, as your modern theologians will have all separate sects to form the Universal Church of Christ? In truth your Reformers in framing your various “confessions of faith,” did not forget that this essential attribute—of unity, ought to belong to Christ’s Church, they therefore kept before your view the bare shell, and which the slightest collision could break to pieces; their “Catholic Church” was a mere nominal and puffed up thing without substance. Here are two or three of your articles; one is thus worded; “Who-soever wishes to be saved, above all things, it is necessary, that he hold the Catholic Faith, which faith, except every one do keep whole, and undefiled, without doubt he shall perish everlastingly.”—The Catechism of Geneva, teaches “thus therefore there would be nothing but damnation and death for him who is out of the Church.” Yes, without doubt all who separate from the communion of the faithful, to form a separate sect, must never expect salvation as long as they remain in that state of separation.” The Bohemian Confession (Art. 8,) says, “We have been taught that all ought to keep the unity of the Church—that no one should introduce sects or excite sedition, but that every one should prove himself a true member of the Church in the bond of peace and in an unanimity of sentiment.” I could give you half a dozen more at least as stringent; but what are they after all? mere professions—bubbles of the Reformation; your practices soon proved of what a soapy nature they were made of; as light as they are, porous and fragile; thus we see your professions and principles are in direct opposition to each other; those “separate sects” which, as you read above, “must never expect salvation as long as they remain in that state of separation,” are now in a manner legalized by your divines to enter heaven, and are told they can “agree to disagree,” can consistently and conscientiously differ on points of doctrine and discipline weighty and important as they may be, and thus, as the Rev. Carus Wilson, [see my letter No. 14] says of the Church of Christ, “to build up and perfect which all the enclosures of separate communions are respectively the instruments,” such is the modern Catholic Church of Protestantism. The Rev. gentleman calls such maxims as are implied in the preceding articles, “the very essence of Popery.” Yet it is gratifying to us Catholics to find, as it is an augury of better things, and as if some rays of light were breaking through the mist, showing to you how you are wandering in doubt to and fro, that you are daily becoming more alive to the absolute necessity of unity, and more sensible to the evils of your own monstrous divisions and dissensions. By some of the English papers, I observe, a meeting was held in June, 1843, in Exeter Hall of different denominations; ministers of the Church of England, Independents, Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, &c. It is headed, “Christian Union,” it sets forth—“That this meeting is convinced of the duty and practicability of rendering visible the union of all who hold the head, Jesus Christ, the Lord; that this meeting deem it an imperative duty, for the defence of the truth—for the strength of the Church—for the spread of the gospel, to seek Christian Union, not in ritual uniformity—not in exact agreement of Creed—not in a universal incorporation of Churches, &c. &c.” You have only to conceive St. Paul as presiding at the meeting, or to call to mind his many injunctions, as, “being of one accord, agreeing in sentiment—labouring together—speak the same thing—continue in the same rule, &c.” to comprehend fully how incongruous was the spirit of this meeting with that of St. Paul. They profess indeed that they “deem it an imperative duty to seek Christian union,” but they adopt a principle diametrically opposed to it; and contrary to what St. Paul and the rest of the Evangelists prescribe. It is like a patient, feeling the necessity of taking a certain medicine, but using that which would have quite a contrary effect; certainly Protestantism has seldom been guilty of greater fanaticism than what this meeting presents to us; were they asked to adjourn to the next Church, and “partake of the one bread,” or worship alike and together in “Christian union,” would they do it? A simpleton might well laugh at it, from its extreme folly. “Christian union” between Protestant sects who “agree to disagree”!!—who can “conscientiously differ on weighty points of doctrine.”!! No wonder that the heathens of India turn Protestantism into ridicule, and as they are beginning to do; this is the return they will make to dissenting Missionaries for the instruction which they have bestowed upon them. This contention among yourselves, between a certain longing for unity on one side, and a desire for latitudinarianism on the other, is forcibly represented by Mosheim, D. D. Chancellor of the University of Gottinger, in one of his works he observes—"for the Church, considered in its collective and general character, allows now to all its members the full liberty of entertaining the sentiments they think most reasonable in relation to those points of doctrine that formerly excluded the Lutherans and Arminians from its communion, and looks upon the essence of Christianity and its fundamental truths as in no wise affected by these points, however variously they may be explained by the contending parties; but this moderation, instead of facilitating the execution of the plans that have been proposed by some for the re-union of the Lutheran and reformed Churches, contribute rather to prevent this re-union, or at least to render it much more difficult, for those among the Lutherans, who are zealous for the maintenance of the truth, complain that the reformed Churches have rendered too wide the way of salvation, and opened the arms of fraternal love and communion not only to us, Lutherans, but also to Christians of all sects and all denominations. This pacific project was so warmly opposed by the greatest part of the Lutherans, that it came to nothing in a short time." So, my friends, will all your attempts to obtain union "come to nothing" while the spirit of Protestantism influences you. In a letter which I lately had from an intelligent Protestant Officer, he says, that he believes that "members of the Church of Geneva, of England, of Scotland, of Rome, Lutherans, and other bodies from the Church of Christ." Such a Latitudinarianism is but a sort of blind, a cloak for men's understandings, a potent balm for tender consciences, which lulls them into a fatal delusion, a twig to hold by, a spell that throws a deceptive security around it, a fatal sophistry which is taken for gospel, and acts as a soporific to the troubled soul and fickle mind of man; it passes current with the Protestant world; it goes down with the crowd, being pliant to every wind of doctrine; all sects are self-interested in it; it is in fact the carte-blanche of Protestantism, and which may be applied at pleasure to every fresh wound inflicted upon unity and truth; you cannot bear to admit such an inference as this. "If it be sound (episcopal ministry) then all other Christian associations, and all other national Churches, are in a state of rebellion like that of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram."—Rev. J. Yorke's address to the Bishop of London. The consequences conveyed in this are too terrible, therefore you try to shelter yourselves under a screen of your own making; the liberalism of the day. Ah! my dear friends, will it preserve you from the thunderbolts of heaven? Will it save you from the denunciation, "If he will not hear the Church, let him be to thee as the heathen and the publican." But you challenge me "to the lam and to the testimony," well, let this, my friends, be the test: I will bring your collective body of creeds, as a Church, to the standard of scripture, and if it stands, if it corresponds with this touchstone of truth, then indeed all my words will go for chaff, and you will stand confessed as the Church of Christ, of St. Peter and St. Paul, and I will join you forthwith, but if, on the other hand, I bring the proof home to your minds, and succeed in showing to you clearly, and scripturally, that your collective sects or denominations, do not agree in spirit and constitution with the sentiments and figures in Scripture, as defining the Church of Christ, then, my dear friends, in the name of God lose no time in seeking for the true Church, that "pillar of truth." I shall first, however, give you the opinion of the ancient fathers, upon unity. St. Ignatius, the disciple of St. Peter and St. John, and second Bishop of Antioch, in his Epistle to the Christians of Smyrna, counsels them thus:—"Avoid schisms and discords, which are the source of all evils; follow your Bishops, as Jesus Christ his Father, and the College of Priests as the Apostles; let no one presume to undertake anything in the Church, without the Bishop." Again he says, in writing to Polycarp, "watch most carefully for the preservation of union, as children of light avoid the divisions of unity, &c." St. Irenæus declares that, "those who separate and divide the unity of the Church, shall be visited by the chastisements of Jeroboam." St. Cyprian wrote a whole book on unity; have you never read his celebrated saying, that, "He cannot have God for his Father, who does not acknowledge the Church for his Mother." He asks, "O the schismatics then imagine that Jesus Christ will be with them in their assemblies, whereas they assemble out of the Church; the stain of schism they never would efface by their blood, because the crime of discord is beyond all expiation." But I must pass over St. Chrysostom, Augustine, Tertullian, and numerous other fathers, and who write in awful language of schism and heresy, and again, in glowing terms of unity, that I may give you the opinion of two of your own "Fathers," Samuel Parker, bishop of Oxford, wrote, "I will challenge all the world to show me any one thing more earnestly enjoined and frequently recommended than the preservation of unity among Christians, and thus our Saviour, having instituted the society of the Church, where he enjoins them (the governors of it) to be careful to preserve unity." The great Doctor Welsh, of the Free Church of Scotland desires you to "look at the Saviour's prayer, in the 17th Chapter of St. John, where the success of Christianity in the world is made to hinge not merely upon a real and vital, but upon an ostensible union among Christians, such a union as that the world in virtue of seeing it, would be turned into the fold of the Gospel, and therefore, I say, that there should be no barrier in the way of an ostensible union of co-operation, although it may be the work of years before that union can be complete as to come to incorporation." This was said just as he was breaking union along with five hundred of his clerical brethren, with the old Church of one thousand six hundred and odd!! Worthy the disciple of John Knox, worthy the spirit of the Reformation, its inconsistency and changeling system!!!

Yours faithfully,
C. A. C.

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

Sergt. Murray, through His Grace the Archbishop,.....	40	0
Sergt. Cooney, do. do.....	50	0
Aga Curbullye Mahomed, do. do.....	25	0

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

Rev. E. Veralli,.....	5	0
Anonymous, through the Rev. Mr. D'Mello,.....	2	0
P. J. M., through His Grace the Archbishop,.....	4	0
J. G. for July, through do.....	2	0
Mrs. Creighton, through do.....	50	0

THROUGH MR. N. O'BRIEN.

Thomas Kenry,.....	16	0
Captain Fisher,.....	2	0
James Harrison,.....	2	0

FOR THE SUFFERING CATHOLICS AT GWALIOR.

Y. Z., through Mr. P. S. D'Rozario,.....	15	0
Mrs. E. P. d'Beaufort, through the Rev. E. Veralli,.....	2	0
Lady, through do.....	4	0

O'CONNELL TESTIMONIAL.

of doctrine.....	5	0
and O'Connell,.....	50	0

To His Grace the Right Rev. Dr. Carew, Archbishop of Edessa, Vicar Apostolic of Bengal.
MY LORD,—I send you by the bearer the sum of Fifty (50) Rupees from the Troops of H. M.'s Regiment in the Fort. It is as follows:—

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

From H. M's 10th Regt. Fort William.

No. 7 Company,.....	16	15	0
No. 6 Company,.....	9	12	6

26 11 6

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

From H. M's 10th Regt. Fort Wm. .. 23 4 6

Total amount, 50 0 0

I received this money only an hour or so ago, and I trouble your Grace at this late hour, with the account, for the satisfaction of our dear Soldiers, who wish to see it published (if possible) in the Herald of next Saturday. If it is convenient for your Grace, could you oblige them, by handing over this money to Mr. W. Lackersteen to-morrow, and desiring him at the same time, to see that the requisite notice is put in the Herald.

With the most sincere prayers for your Grace's health and the welfare of all our establishments, I remain, with the most profound respect,

Your Grace's most humble & devoted servt.

St. Xavier's College.

R. COOPER.

Augt. 22, 1844, 8 o'clock p. m.

FESTIVALS,—SEPTEMBER, 30 DAYS.

Sunday, 1st,—XIV. after Pent. 1st Sept. of it, sem. com. S. Aegidius and S. S. M. M.
Monday, 2nd,—S. Stephen, C. sem.
Tuesday, 3rd,—S. Aiden, B. C. d. (E. S. 31 ult.)
Wednesday, 4,—Of it sem.
Thursday, 5,—S. Lawrence Justinian, B. C. sem.
Friday, 6,—Of it sem.
Saturday, 7,—Office of the Immaculate Conception, sem.
Sunday, 8,—XV. after Pent. 2nd Sept. Nativity of B. V. d. 2nd cl. com. of Sunday and S. with an Octave.
Monday, 9,—Of the Octave sem. com. S. M.
Tuesday, 10,—S. Nicholas, of Tolentino C. d. com. oct.
Wednesday, 11,—Of the Octave, sem.
Thursday, 12,—do. do.
Friday, 13,—do. do.
Saturday, 14,—Exaltation of the Holy Cross, d. gr. com. oct.
Sunday, 15,—XVI. After Pent. 3 Sept. Octave of Nativity of B. V. com. Sunday and S. M.
Monday, 16,—S. S. Cornelius and Cyprian M. M. sem. com. S. S.
Tuesday, 17,—Impression of the Stigmata on the body of St. Francis C. d.
Wednesday, 18,—S. Joseph of Cupertino, C. d.
Thursday, 19,—S. S. Januarius and companions, M. M. d.
Friday, 20,—Eustatius and companions, M. M. d.
Saturday, 21,—S. Matthew, Apost. and Evang. d. 2nd cl.
Sunday, 22,—XVII. After Pent. 4th Sept. 7 Dolois, of B. V. d. gr. com. Sunday and S. S.
Monday, 23,—S. Linus P. M. sem.

Tuesday, 24,—B. V. Mary of Mercv d. gr.
 Wednesday, 25,—S. Thomas of Villanova, B. C. d. (22nd. inst.)
 Thursday, 26,—S. S. Cyprian and Justian M. M. simple.
 Friday, 27,—S. Cosmas and Damion, M. M. d.
 Saturday, 28,—S. Wencelas M. sem.
 Sunday, 29,—XVIII. After Pent. 1st Oct. S. Michael, d. 2 cl. com. Sunday.
 Monday, 30,—S. Jerom, C. D. d.

Selections.

IRELAND.

Earl De Grey has resigned the Viceroyship of Ireland to the great regret of the Conservative party. He is succeeded by Lord Heytesbury.

Mr. O'Connell has declined the appointment of Lord Mayor of Dublin for the year 1845.

The greatest anxiety is displayed by persons of all classes to evince their attachment to the "Repeal martyrs." Presents of various kinds are daily received by them from the inhabitants of the rural districts, as well as from the metropolis. From Lord Cloncurry, several presents of salmon have been received. A loaf of sugar was transmitted by a lady. Large quantities of strawberries have been forwarded. Several presents of trout have been sent from various parts of the Kingdom. A car-owner drove down to Bray, and, having procured several fine fish, which were taken out of the water in his presence, brought them to the prison. The presents include champagne. But the "monster" present consisted of a large cake, measuring nine feet six inches in circumference, presented by Mr G. Hawkin, an English Repealer.—Twenty-four boys have been expelled from the National Schools in Dublin, because they insisted upon wearing the Repeal button during school hours. The prohibition was confined to those hours merely, but the boys would not doff the national emblem even during that short period.—A garrison order has been issued by the Commander of the Forces, that no civilian wearing political or party badges be allowed to enter the barracks upon any pretence whatever.

On the 10th of June, a deputation of the Corporation of Dublin proceeded in thirteen carriages to the Penitentiary, with a view of presenting Mr O'Connell with a public address; but were refused admission. On the same day, a deputation for several of the corporations proceeded to the prison, for a similar purpose. The members composing it assembled at the residence of Mr. O'Connell, in Merrion-square, and proceeded from thence to Richmond Bridewell. The Governor of the prison met them at the gate when the Mayor of Cork, on behalf of the great body of the municipal representatives present, explained their object. Mr. Purdon then said:—"I am sorry to inform you that I cannot, in the discharge of my orders, permit any deputation to enter the prison for the purpose of presenting an address to any person confined in it. I am, however, most happy to inform you that Mr. O'Connell and his friends are in the enjoyment of good health." The deputations quietly withdrew, and held a meeting in Mr O'Connell's house, where the several addresses were delivered to his son.

On the 19th of June, the Right Hon H. O'Brien, Lord Mayor of Dublin, accompanied by his chaplain and various aldermen and town councillors, and a deputation of the corporation of Dublin, presented an address to the Queen, at Buckingham Palace. It says:—"We feel that the law has been strained far beyond its legitimate bounds, and as interpreted by your judges, has entrenched on the rights of your Majesty's subjects to free and fair discussion of political matters, and if permitted to become current law, will tend to enslave your Majesty's heretofore free people." The Queen was attended by the Duke of Wellington, Sir R. Peel, and the principal Secretaries of State. She returned the following answer:—"I thank you for your renewed assurances of loyalty to my person and crown. I have announced to you my fixed determination to uphold the law, and to respect the decisions of my courts, to which the administration of justice is confided. If errors have occurred in the proceedings of the court, they are open to review, and will be rectified by the supreme tribunal of appeal. The faithful execution of the law is regarded by me as the surest safeguard of the rights and liberties of my people."—At four o'clock, the deputation proceeded to the House of Commons, in the same form as to the Palace and, being ushered to the bar of the House, the Lord Mayor presented a petition.—London Mail.

THE LIFE OF MISS NANO NAGLE.

Foundress of the Presentation Order.

(CONTINUED FROM PAGE 97.)

We need scarcely draw attention to the noble Christian spirit that breathes through every sentence of this fine letter. When it was written, she had been five years engaged in the labors which she there describes. Neither wet, nor cold, nor fatigue, could prevent her from visiting her schools, or deter her from her mission of charity. She spent her day teaching the young their catechisms, and the old their prayers,—even those prayers which should be ordinary household words in the mouth of every Christian. Her visits were often prolonged to a late hour, after the schools were dismissed, in her anxiety to impress the truths of religion on some hapless child of poverty and misfortune. We have often heard aged persons say, that in their youth they had seen her wending her way homeward after her long protracted labors: and even at the time and season when the twilight, darkened rapidly into night, is wont to make the footpath dangerous to the benighted pedestrian. At her usual hour she was sure to be seen, in the dark and cold evenings of winter, picking her steps by the light of a small lantern which she bore with one hand before her, while the other held her cloak, to protect her from the wind and rain. Her health, so far from suffering, seemed to have improved by her labors; the attack, which at one time threatened, the most serious consequences, passed away without any bad result. He who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb, gave her strength to perform her toilsome duties with perseverance, regularity, and efficiency. She lived for some time with her family; but she gradually withdrew herself from all those claims which mere worldly ceremony required to be discharged. She never visited but where the good of her neighbor was to be promoted. She divided her time between the care of her poor children, and her own religious duties: and allowed herself no relaxation, save what she felt, as she herself tells us, in speaking to the poor of God, or the yet greater pleasure of pouring out the affections of her heart to Him in the privacy of her chamber, or in the presence of the altar.

The good she had hitherto effected, was, at best, but temporary. The system adopted by her was eminently useful, but she herself was its sustaining principle; and if she were taken away, the entire would fall to the ground. In a few years that event would inevitably take place,—she had no security that it may not happen in a day. It was, therefore, a subject of the most vital and urgent importance, to consider whether some stability may not be given to it beyond what it obtained from the uncertain life of one individual. This could only be effected by means of religious community; but at such a time, and in such a country, the establishment of a religious community was a bold and perilous undertaking indeed. She communicated her wishes to those who, in every difficulty, had been hitherto her guides. One was the Rev. Mr. Doran, a member of the Society of Jesus; the other was his nephew, then the Abbé Moylan, but subsequently Bishop of Cork. To these zealous and enlightened guides, she laid open the hopes, the wishes, the fears and anxieties of her heart. After a mature consideration of the objects sought to be attained, and difficulties to be encountered, the Rev. Mr. Doran suggested, that no institution would be more likely to ensure their purpose than a community of Ursuline nuns, and in accordance with this suggestion, the Abbé Moylan repaired to Paris, to make arrangements with the convent of St. Jacques, the principal house of that order in France.*

Many and serious difficulties obstructed the purpose of the good Abbé, and prevented him from accomplishing the object he had in view. The first that presented itself to the minds of those to whom his proposal was made arose from the unsettled state of Ireland, and the precarious tenure by which the Catholics held their freedom from persecution. At any moment the penal laws might be rigidly enforced against them. Another arose from the difficulty of procuring subjects. If we may judge by some letters of Miss Nagle, now before us, but which want of space will not permit us to present to our readers, some of the professed religious of St. Jacques were willing, but, probably from prudential reasons, were not permitted to come. It was at length arranged that a few novices should be received and trained in the discipline of a religious life, and in the manner of conducting schools. When this training was completed, it was hoped that one of the greatest difficulties would be removed. Those who presented themselves for that purpose, and were selected, were four, viz.—Sister Angela Fitzsimons, Sister Augustine Coppinger, Sister Joseph Nagle, a relative of the foundress, and Sister Ursula Kavanagh. They were all nearly connected with the first families in the kingdom, and Miss Kavanagh was nearly allied to the illustrious house of Ormond. Miss Fitzsimons was in Paris for the express purpose of entering the order of the Visitation, when Providence directed her attention to the wants of her own country. They all commenced their noviciate at St. Jacques, on the 5th of September, 1766. We have several letters of Miss Nagle to Miss Fitzsimons, written during the noviciate; we shall only quote a part of one dated Bath, July 20th, 1771, from which it is evident, that the intention of establishing a convent was concealed even from the members of her own family. She thus expresses herself:—

“Dear Miss Fitzsimons,—Though I did myself the pleasure of writing to you lately, yet, I do so now again, as a letter I received from our worthy friend makes me acquainted with the sudden death of his sister-in-law; she was a most amiable person, and I am most sincerely sorry for her. You thought I came here for my health. As you are so good as to interest yourself in my regard, and I was afraid it might make you uneasy, I beg to assure you that, thank God, I never was better. It was not to take the waters I came here, nor have I tasted them: I came to see my brothers, and be assured it was with much ado, I could prevail on myself to pay this visit. I did not acquaint you with this tour, as I wavered so much with myself, that I may say, till I was in the ship, I was not sure of coming. It was so much against my inclination to leave my children: and only to serve the foundation I never should have prevailed on myself. Our friend, I have reason to think, spoke with a prophetic spirit, by what has happened, for my own family would never have the opinion they have at present, nor ever interest themselves as they do for its success. You must have been surprised when you heard that they knew nothing of it. You hear what was true. The young lady that told you was the first, my sister Nagle says, that told herself, and though she did so, she could hardly believe her. You don't forget what I wrote to you, that when I began my schools, my own immediate family knew nothing of it, so the same method I was resolved to take now, as I was sure they would be the first to oppose me. I never said one word to them till I saw things had such a prospect of succeeding: which I was sure I never could have persuaded them of, if they did not see it. It gives them all great pleasure that I should be the means of promoting such a good work, and my sisters-in-law are as eager to get good subjects for it as we could be. I hope you will approve my manner of acting, as the less noise is made about affairs of this kind, in this country, the better. Mr. K—g got a letter from Dr. Butler,* on which he came to speak to me about his sister, and says, as we must be of such vast service to the kingdom, if we had the Protestant's consent for this establishment, he would be the better pleased she was amongst us, as she could do more good there than any where else; on which I told them before my brother and sister, that, had I consulted my own family, I should not have had a school in Cork; which they said was true."

* The Ursulines were instituted by Angela Merici better known as St. Angela of Brescia from a town of that name in the diocese of Verona, who died in 1540. They were approved by Paul III. They were especially patronized by St. Charles Borromeo, who gave system and regularity to their educational labors, and who is considered the patron of their schools. The convent of St. Jacques, at Paris, was the first house of the Ursulines in which enclosure was inviolably observed, and was founded in the beginning of the seventeenth century, by the Mesdames Acarie and Sainte Beuve; one the foundress of the reformed Carmelites, in France, the other the intimate friend both of Catherine of Medici and Anne of Austria.

In the beginning of 1771, the Abbé Moylan visited Paris, for the purpose of transplanting the germ of his future community. The difficulties alluded to by Miss Nagle in her letters, again presented themselves. A professed religious was necessary for the foundation of a religious house, and not one of the convent of St. Jacques would volunteer for the purpose, or, if willing, would be permitted to come. It would be rash and uncharitable to criticise the motives which presented them. It may be that they shrunk with the timidity natural to secluded females, from their long and dangerous journey, or were unwilling again to brave the perils of that world which they had renounced for ever, or that they cleaved with a holy fondness to those cloisters where they had spent so many happy years in the quiet exercises of religion, and in the security of a more favored land. Whatever their motive may have been, there was no one to accompany the young colony to Ireland, and the object of the good abbe's mission seemed utterly and irretrievably hopeless. In this critical conjuncture, and when he was on the eve of abandoning it altogether, he was informed that in the Ursuline Convent, at Dieppe, there was one who would consent to establish the foundation he had in view; she was Miss Margaret Kelly, a lady of Irish birth, but who had been long resident in France, and was a professed religious of the convent of that place. Having been thus far successful, and all things being arranged for their departure, they left Paris for Rouen, where it was arranged that their future mother superior should meet them.† Their resting place, after the first day's journey, was the convent of the Carmelite nuns, at St. Denis which, at that time, numbered among its inmates no less a person than Madame Louisa, the saintly aunt of Louis XVI. The young novices were much consoled by the zeal and piety for this lady. She even declared to them, in the fulness of her heart, and with feelings of the warmest emotion, that if the circumstances of her condition permitted her, she would at once accompany them on their mission to the poor Irish. Sister Angela Fitzsimons had a voice of expressive sweetness, and it was long remembered by the religious of St. Denis, how beautiful she sang the anthem of the Virgin, in the still evening time, within their walls. They reached Rouen on the feast of St. Mark the Evangelist, and were joined there by Mrs. Kelly, from Dieppe. In a few days they sailed from Havre; and after a voyage, which may be considered quick in those days of imperfect communication, they arrived in the Cove of Cork, on the morning of the ninth of May, which, that year, was Ascension Thursday. The building intended for their reception not being completed, they were reduced to the temporary accommodation of a house in the neighborhood, when they were joined by two ladies, Miss Moylan, and, we believe, Miss Lawless, who had been awaiting their arrival. On the 18th of September, 1771, the house being completed, they entered on possession, and commenced the foundation of the Ursuline order in Ireland.

Their position in Ireland was not to be one of ease or rest. They took under their care the schools, already described by Miss Nagle, but they were not unmindful of the peculiar objects of their institute, and soon after opened schools for the education of the more opulent classes of society. Their first consisted of twelve pupils, one of whom, we have heard, is still living. With the exception of Mrs. Kelly, none of the religious were yet professed. To facilitate this important object, a bull was procured, from Clement XIV., dated January 13th, 1773, permitting the first twelve novices to be professed after one year's probation, thus dispensing, in their regard, with one-half of the usual and prescribed term of novitiate. Availing themselves of this permission, the sisters Angela Joseph, and Ursula, were professed on the 15th of the following February; Sister Louisa Moylan* on the 26th of April, 1774; and Sister Augustine Coppington on the 31st of January 1775. The latter had been one of the Paris novices, but was compelled by bad health to leave the convent for a time. On the very day of her profession, the first election, according to their constitutions, took place, and she was elected mother-superior of the community. There being now four professed religious, and the new institute having thus acquired some degree of stability, Mrs. Kelly deemed her mission in Ireland fulfilled. Though she was Irish by birth, we have heard that Ireland was not the land of her affections. Since her childhood she had resided in France, and the ties were stronger that bound her to "la belle France" than to the green hills of her native country. The quiet tenour of the little convent at Dieppe, and the security of her silent cell, contrasted strongly

* Subsequently Lord Dunboyne, but at the time Bishop of Cork

† Hence it is that while the Irish Ursulines consider themselves a filiation of St. Jacques, they are by the French writers and religious reckoned a filiation of Dieppe.

* This lady was a sister of the Abbe Moylan. She was, as may be seen, the first who joined the community on its arrival in Cork. She lived within the convent walls for the unusual period of seventy-two years; and after sharing in all its struggles and difficulties, lived to see the present prosperous condition of her beloved sisterhood, over which she presided for many years with honour and efficiency. She died full of years and virtues, lately as the year 1842, in the ninetieth year of her age; and was for many years the connecting link between the present community and those saintly women who bore the weight of the day, and the heat, in evil and perilous times.

with the many duties of her new position, of the danger to which they were continually exposed by the bigotry of the times; and in the Easter of 1775, she returned to France happy in the consciousness of having contributed to so great and enduring a good.

They had not been long in Ireland when they were exposed to some annoyance, if not danger, by the No Popery corporation of that day. The establishment of a Popish nunnery in their city was an offence that required prompt and effectual punishment. Some violent measure was in contemplation, and would have been adopted but for the prudence and humanity of one influential gentleman, of the name of Carleton, who restrained their intolerance by appealing to their own interests, and showing the policy of permitting so much money to be spent in the city rather than abroad, good-humouredly adding that the Protestant succession was not likely to be endangered by a few ladies meeting to drink tea and say their beads together. The appeal was successful; but such was the insecurity of their position, that for years they dared not assume the religious habit, except on solemn festivals, and in the veriest privacy of the convent. It was not until the 11th November, 1779, and even in opposition to the well meant, but certainly timid, remonstrances both of Dr. Moylan and their foundress, that they laid aside the secular dress for good, and assumed the habit of their order. The issue proved that the apprehensions of their friends were excessive. Other times came on; they shared in the increasing rights and liberties of their people, and the daughters of St. Ursula have never since been molested.

In tracing consecutively the establishment of the Ursulines, we have for a moment lost sight of their foundress. The object dearest to her heart was the education of the poor. She thought that object was attained when the new religious arrived; but her wishes in this respect were not fully realized. The Ursulines are for the education of the rich. If the poor come under their care, it is only in a subordinate degree, and their claims are but secondary to those of the others. She, who believed her mission to be to the poor, was not likely to witness with satisfaction an arrangement so unfavourable to them. When her wishes were not complied with (and probably the rules of the order did not admit of their being complied with,) she retired from the convent in which she had for some time taken up her abode. That her dissatisfaction extended only to the preference given to the children of the rich, and not to the institute itself, is evident from the fact that she ever remained on terms of the most friendly intercourse with the sisterhood, and, while she lived, was accustomed to visit their schools for an hour on Sundays, to give instruction in the catechism to the children. It is to be regretted that there should have been any misunderstanding on a subject of such importance, but we think we can trace in it another instance in our regard of that special Providence which ordereth all things sweetly, and for the best and wisest ends. It is another proof that, in the fluctuating tide of human events, there are movements directed by God, which pass the comprehension and escape the notice of us who live and move upon the surface. The establishment of some such institute, must precede that of one for the education of the poor. The germ of knowledge must be brought to maturity in one mind before it can be communicated to another. There was no educated middle class in Ireland, as in France, that would have furnished subjects for an order like the Presentation, having for its object the education of the poor. They had to be created in the country. The springs of knowledge had been dried up for years, and therefore some domestic institute was necessary not only for the education of the rich, but to provide for the education of the poor; and such an institute was the Ursuline. Even to this day, a great majority of the members of the Presentation Order are indebted to it for their education,—perhaps their vocation to a religious life; however it may have been inadequate to the wishes of its foundress, we are convinced that it has been a powerful, if not a necessary, instrument in the furtherance of her views.

Though disappointed in the object for which she had yearned through many a long year, and the hope of which had sustained her through many a day of toil, she yet did not abandon that object in despair. She determined on making another effort to attain it; she took up her abode in a house adjoining the convent, and associated with her a few generous individuals, animated with a kindred spirit to her own. Her pecuniary resources had not been exhausted, and she was therefore able to make a provision for their support. In this establishment, we have the germ of the Presentation Order. It did not acquire the consistency of a religious order until some years after her death. She neither contemplated nor desired such an honour for her companions: she would have them bound only by annual vows, and constitute but a simple religious congregation. Their duty was, like hers, to seek out the poor girls of the city,—to gather them around her,—to teach them the rudiments of knowledge,—to instil into their minds the principles of religion,—to relieve their physical wants, and, if possible, to provide them with some means of subsistence for the future. They were to be bound by no law of enclosure, for the comprehensive charity of their foundress would have them visit the poor man's hovel, and the sick man's bed. It was said of her, that she left not a garret in Cork unvisited. Her footsteps were everywhere to be traced,—in the filthiest lane, and in the most obscure cottage. Like Him whom she loved so well and ardently, she went about everywhere doing good. These duties she would impose on her associates of the Presentation; and these duties did they fulfil, not only during her life-time but for years after her death. (To be continued.)

RELIGIOUS PROFESSION.—Miss Victorine Strachey, second daughter of Captain Strachey, Royal Navy, received the veil, the 22nd of April, at the convent of the Visitation, St. Mary at Amiens-sur-Somme.

Printed and Published by P. S. D'Rosario and Co

THE

BENGAL

CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit —one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, AUGUST 31, 1844.

[VOL. VII.]

GENTLEMAN EDITOR OF THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE AND THE ANCIENT FATHERS.

We were greatly amused by an article in the last number of the Christian Advocate, inadvertently on our stricture of the pamphlet on transubstantiation. The summary of its contemporary's reply is, that—he is a gentleman, neither a Baptist, nor a Sailor, nor even an Editor!!! that the Catholic Herald indulges in abusive language and cannot be answered by him,—that it is unsafe for Protestants to read it. Surely our contemporary could scarcely acknowledge in plainer terms that our arguments are unanswerable, and Protestants cannot be at a loss, any more than Catholics, how to unde. sand such observations. The Christian Advocate has pointed out the language in our journal, which he seems objectionable,—why not also point out the arguments which he deems weak or faulty, if he could do so? Is not the Christian Advocate the last journal in the world, that should complain of unbecoming language?—a journal of which the Englishman, itself a Protestant Journal, has said, that its impudence and falsehood no journal not calling itself Christian, surpassed the Calcutta Christian Advocate. We appeal to the better and more educated class of Protestants to say whether it is gentlemanly, or Christian charity, or the low spirit of sectarian antipathy, that induces the Editor of the Christian Advocate to designate us invariably by the name of Papists, Romanists, &c. even when he pretends to write for our instruction. In the very pamphlet which we have been dissecting in some of our previous numbers, he sets out by telling his readers, that the Jesuits never hesitate to use any or every means to accomplish their ends; and yet he complains of a few hard words in our Journal in reply to that pamphlet.

But no one, for a moment, can mistake the real meaning of the Advocate's complaints. We leave it to any candid man, Catholic or Protestant, to say, whether we ever gave expression to anything so injuriously personal or abusive, as the following extracts from the last number of the Christian Advocate in allusion to our Journal. "A man in a frenzy, be it from bodily pain or mental anguish, is not to be reasoned with, he is more an object of pity than of reason," "the tiger spirit of the man of sin is not changed, he is as fierce as ever." "What is the difference between the spirit which actuated such abuse, and that which lighted up the fires of Smithfield!" Such is the language of the Christian Advocate while he affects to act the gentleman, and complains of our language towards him! and this too, while he assures us, that he never addresses himself to the passions of his readers, but always to their reason! Can it be, that, as he mistook a bulwark, once before, for something very unlike it, he now mistakes, in his new character of gentleman, passion for reason? If we have any reason to regret the language, which we employed, at any time, towards the Editor of the Christian Advocate, we are glad at all events that we succeeded in drawing from him, the public avowal,—that he is a gentleman who does not write for the atmosphere of certain places, but for gentlemen. It is not the part of a gentleman, certainly, to mis-represent injuriously the creed of a fellow Christian and refuse to retract the calumny; and all this the Christian Advocate has been convicted in our previous numbers of having done. It is not the part of a gentleman, whether a Sailor, or Baptist, or an Independent, to forge evidence against any point of Christian doctrine from the writings of the Fathers by collecting scraps from several distinct works and producing them, in joint array, as the consecutive reasoning of the Fathers in whose writings they are found; and this, without any notice of the trick. This is the heavy crime of which it behoves the gentleman Editor of the Christian Advocate to clear his reputation. We call it a heavy crime, for so we think it, if it be deliberate and voluntary, and we shall not say that the writer in the Advocate is positively guilty, until he refuses to declare himself sorry for the forges, voluntary or involuntary, which lately appeared in that journal. If a controversialist were permitted to produce testimonies from the writings of an author, in the way described above, what blasphemies could not be demonstrated from the writings inspired by the Holy Ghost, to be sacred Christian duties!!! “And casting down the pieces of silver in the temple, he (Judas) departed; and went and hanged himself with a halter.” (Matthew 27, 5.) “And he (Jesus,) said to him; thou hast answered right; this do, and thou shalt live.” (Luke 10, 28.)

What would be thought of an infidel who would take away these references, and join the two sentences together, as the testimony of sacred Scripture in favor of suicide? Would you not declare him a monster of iniquity, if he did that knowingly, and refused to retract the forgery when reminded of it? Certainly you would, and very justly; therefore, we say to all, no matter what may be their creed, excuse if you can, the following forges which we extract from the pages of the Christian Advocate.

FORGERY THE FIRST.

“God in your Gospel,” says Tertullian, who flourished at the latter end of the second, and at the beginning of the third Century, “has so revealed the matter, calling the bread his own body, that you may hence understand how he gave bread to be the figure of his own body: which body, conversely, the prophet has figuratively called bread, the Lord himself being afterwards about to interpret this sacrament. For we must not call our senses in question, lest we should doubt respecting their fidelity even in the case of Christ himself. Because if we question the fidelity of our senses, we might peradventure be led to say, that Christ delusively beheld Satan precipitated from heaven or delusively heard the voice of his Father testifying of him, or was deceived when he touched Peter’s mother in law, or smelt a different odour of the ointment which he received for his sepulture, or tasted a different flavour of the wine which he consecrated in memory of his own blood. Christ reprobated neither the water of the Creator with which he washes his people, nor the oil with which he anoints them, nor the fellowship of honey and milk with which he feeds them as infants, nor the bread by which he represents his own body; for even in his own sacraments he needs the beggarly elements of the Creator.”

FORGERY THE SECOND.

“The Lord,” says the great Augustine in the fourth century, “when he gave the sign of his body, did not doubt to say this is my body. In the history of the New Testament, so great and so marvellous was the patience of our Lord, that bearing with Judas, though not ignorant of his purpose, he admitted him to the banquet, in which he commended and delivered to his disciples the figure of his own body and blood. Christ instructed his disciples, and said unto them. It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing. The words which I speak unto you are spirit and life. As if he had said: understand spiritually what I have spoken. You are not about to eat this identical body, which you see; and you are not about to drink this identical blood, which they who crucify me will pour out. On the contrary, I have commended a certain sacrament unto you, which will vivify you if spiritually understood. Though it must be celebrated visibly, yet it must be understood invisibly.”

We call upon the Editor of the Christian Advocate to point out the work of Tertullian, in which the passage cited by him from that Father, is read conservatively as he (the Advocate) has cited it, and to authenticate in the same way, at least by reference, the passage from St. Augustine. If this cannot be done what are we to think of the gentleman Editor of the Christian Advocate, and what becomes of the cause of Protestantism in the hands of its greatest modern champion! He does not make a single reference himself to the works of any of the fathers, except Athanasius, but merely hands us over to Faber, for whose honesty he has made himself personally responsible, in these words—“we quote the translation of a writer of unimpeachable integrity and honesty.” Either the Editor of the Christian Advocate, therefore is an exceedingly dishonest gentleman or Mr. Faber for whom he goes bail, is very dishonest, and has sadly imposed upon the Advocate, as well as upon thousands of others. Why does the Advocate refer, in one case, to the work of the author (Athanasius) from whom he quotes, and in all other cases to Faber? We very much fear the no Sailor, no Baptist, gentleman Editor, who does not write for certain atmospheres, but for gentlemen, will get out of the forgeries, very awkwardly.

THE WOMAN CONDEMNED TO DEATH IN THE ISLAND OF MADEIRA.

We quote the following from the Christian Advocate of the 3rd instant, to show the animus with which the writer endeavours to introduce the subject.

"Popery unchanged and persecuting—a woman, the mother of seven children, condemned to death for renouncing Popery.—We have now over a space of some years endeavored to impress upon our readers the real spirit and tendency of Popery, rampant Popery, unchecked or influenced by the spirit of an enlightened community, or of humane laws. We have more especially taught our fellow-men that it is unchristian in its persecuting character—that she is an drunken, drunken with the blood of the innocent and with the blood of the martyrs of the faith, and only needs the opportunity to exhibit her natural disposition. We had anticipated the spirit of persecution might, after a while, be brought forth, but we were scarcely prepared to find that we should have to place on record such a heart-rending and shameless case as the following; a mother of seven children condemned to death in the Island of Madeira, by a British Magistrate, for renouncing the errors of Popery, and that on the strength of an old statute. Is Popery changed—are its so-called cruel enactments obsolete—do they belong to a dark age? Let this martyr'd woman and her seven children reply. We cannot suffer ourselves to write as we feel on this subject. All Britain has rung with the infamy of America, in sentencing J. C. Brown to death for aiding the rescue of a female slave. We trust its voice will not be less potent in this case, nor less successful, for Brown, thanks to the humanity of Britain, lives, and is again a free man."

Here is a paper edited by one who dares to call himself a Christian, giving vent to the grossest abuse against Catholicism, with a malice and hatred well worthy only of the Independence of all Christianity,—because, forsooth, a woman was nominally sentenced to death for embracing heresy. The Editor would not wait to hear, either of a contradiction of the report or of any circumstance tending to make the condemnation of no moment. Oh! no—but with that eager zeal which sets at naught all Christian charity and truth, he pounces upon and gluts over any matter savouring of anti-Catholicism and anti-Christianism. We give below the letter of LORD HOWARD DE WALDEN, the English Ambassador at Lisbon, addressed to the Lord Provost of Edinburgh, which shows that the bigots and the infatuated of this country in particular have, after all, found a mare's nest.

But we are inclined to ask whether the penal laws of England against the Catholics, not some annulled and some to this moment extant, are less "heart-rending and shameless," less wanting in that "spirit of persecution," which the Christian Advocate so charitably anticipated would soon break forth among the Catholics? Will he then with equal zeal cry down these penal laws that mark the "spirit of persecution" in the Protestants against the Catholics? Oh no—his Christianity, if he have any, does not extend so far—his religion is contained in a nut-shell,—abuse the Catholics, and you are a pious, good, independent Christian!—We would ask the readers of the Christian Advocate, the thinking portion of them,—those who can judge and decide for themselves, whether they will any longer sanction and support the advocacy of a system consisting of abuse, uncharitableness and untruth. We would ask them for their own sakes to eschew it, lest they themselves in time, imbibe the pernicious principle: and further we would advise the Editor of the CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, in order to avoid any more breaches of consistency on his part, to change the title of his paper to Anti-Christian Advocate.

To the Lord Provost of Edinburgh.

My Lord—I had the honor to receive by the last packet a letter from your lordship forwarding to me for my use a copy of a memorial transmitted by the magistrates and town council of Edinburgh to the Earl of Aberdeen, on the subject of the recent sentence of death passed on a Portuguese woman at Madeira for the sole offence of having embraced the Protestant faith.

The Portuguese Government has, as yet, no knowledge whatever of this circumstance. The subject, however, on my bringing it forward unofficially, met with immediate attention; and I have received from the Minister of Foreign Affairs not only an explanation of the laws telling upon the case (from which it would appear that practically such a sentence is a mere matter of form,) but also the positive and direct assurance, for my better satisfaction, that no member of the Government could contemplate for an instant recommending the Queen to confirm such a sentence.

According to the law of Portugal, the penalty for apostasy is death; but under an Alvará of 1801, the Tribunal of the Second Instance appears to have been invested with the power to modify sentences of lower tribunals in such cases. However, no capital punishment can be carried into execution, except under the sign manual of the sovereign, which, in itself, under the reigning Queen of Portugal, would be a certain guarantee against any such horrors.

I cannot better exemplify the tolerance of the Portuguese Government in such matters than by recurring to a recent case of extreme notoriety in Lisbon, in which a Portuguese Roman Catholic priest, having abjured the Roman Catholic religion has not only returned to this city, but known to have been attempting to make proses to the Protestant faith, without incurany penalty of the law.

Your lordship may be satisfied that the case of the woman, Maria Joaquina, has met with attention from their Majesties and the Government, and that there is no question whatever either of the extreme penalty of the law or any extraordinary severity being put into force against her; but under total ignorance of any of the circumstances attending the case, of course nothing more can be said.

I have the honour to be &c.

Lisbon, June 3, 1844. HOWARD DE WALDEN.

ANTIQUITY OF POPEERY.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

DEAR SIR,—No Christian Church, teaching a doctrine opposite to Popery ever appeared in the world before it.

It is morally impossible that any considerable revolution should happen, either in Church or State, without being taken notice of by some historian, writing at or about the time when it happened, nay, the thing is not only contrary to experience, but the very immediate end of history, which is to instruct posterity in the knowledge of what has happened in former ages: and though transactions of the greatest moment may be mangled and disguised by authors as they are differently affected, yet they can never be wholly overlooked or omitted by them.

This is particularly true with respect to any considerable change in religion, because such changes being the constant source of extraordinary events, by causing disturbances, and frequently entire revolutions in the State, can never escape the notice of an historian:
 and a person may as soon make me believe the greatest contradiction in nature, as that such changes may actually happen without being mentioned in any history of that State or Kingdom, in which they happened.

Now the whole question is, whether the doctrine called Popery, has a fairer title to antiquity. If Protestantism be the true Christian doctrine which was taught by the Apostles, it must have had a being in the world pre-existent to that of Popery: and then there must have happened a total change from Protestantism to Popery, in some age or other since the time of the Apostles, for without this change, Popery could not have got possession of the universal visible Church, as it certainly had at the beginning of the Reformation; when Martin Luther stood alone against the whole Christian world.

It shall, therefore, be my task to demonstrate, that there never happened any such changes or which amounts to the same, that a church teaching a doctrine opposite to the professed errors of the Church of Rome ever appeared in the world before it, which, if it can be made evident, the consequence will be that the doctrine called Popery, is as ancient as Christianity, having been handed down to us from Christ and his Apostles.

But it is very necessary that the reader should here observe, that Popery in general may be divided into two parts; viz. the discipline and the faith of the Church of Rome.
 The proper objects of faith, viz. all revealed truths, are the same in all ages, nor can any authority upon earth pretend to make the least change in them. But the discipline of the Church being not of Divine revelation, but human institution, is doubtless changeable, because the same legislative power, whether in Church or State, that can make laws and regulations for the public good, may likewise, for the same just reason, alter, suspend, or repeal the laws or regulations it made.

Thus, the ancient penitential canons, though they were in force for some ages, have not been binding for several hundred years past.
 Thus likewise the Council of Trent regulated the prohibited degrees of consanguinity and affinity otherwise than they were before, nay, even the apostolical constitution of the Council of Jerusalem, which forbids blood, and things strangled, Acts xv. 29. remained not long in force, but as the motives ceased, the objection of course became void. For let laws be ever so good in themselves, they are not good at all times, nor in all places.

Now then when I endeavour to prove, that the doctrine of Popery is as ancient as Christianity, I do not mean the discipline, but the faith of the Church of Rome: for it is absurd to maintain that regulations of discipline, which came gradually into the Church, and have been subject to variations, are as ancient as the Church itself.

What historian has ever written the life of the Virgin Queen Bess without making the change in religion, and the establishment of the Reformation in England, the principal subject of his history? The same may be said of those who wrote the lives of the first Christian Emperors, whose histories are all filled with ample relations of the heresies that started up in their times, and the disturbances they occasioned both in Church and State;—the opposition they met with,—the Princes that favoured them,—the Fathers that wrote against them,—and the councils wherein they were condemned, nay, I dare challenge any Protestant to name one considerable heresy, I mean what both Papists and Protestants own to be a heresy, whereof there is not a particular account in some history of note; such as who was its first author,—where and when it was first broached

—what progress it made,—what influence it had upon the affairs of Christendom,—what Bishops opposed it,—what books were written against it,—what councils were called to condemn it,—and such other particulars as are a full evidence of the truth of the main fact.

Hence I infer, first, that an universal silence of historians in relation to any considerable change in matters of religion, is a proof amounting to a moral demonstration, that there never happened any such change: and secondly; That to accuse any Church of gross errors, whereof no particular author or beginning is to be found in any authentic record is a mere groundless charge, that cannot be maintained with any color of justice or reason. It is upon these two principles I shall ground my arguments, to prove that the doctrine called Popery, is as ancient as Christianity, and I will endeavour to set the whole matter in as clear a light as possible, in the following manner.

If the doctrine called Popery be not as ancient as Christianity, then Protestantism, as far as it is directly opposite to it, must be the religion which Christ and his Apostles established in the world. I presume all Protestants will readily grant this; nay, if I am not under a very great mistake, it is what they principally contend for, because the most plausible thing they can say for themselves, is, that the whole business of the Reformation was to recover religion from the corruptions introduced into it, and bring it back to its ancient purity.

It follows hence, that there must have been two great changes in the state of the Christian religion, since its first establishment by Christ and his Apostles. The first from Protestantism to Popery had full possession of the whole visible Church for many hundred years before the Reformation; and the second from Popery to Protestantism, which was effected by that Reformation. These two changes therefore must be clearly made out from the incontestible evidence of authentic histories and records; for, if it cannot be thus evidently proved, that the first change from Protestantism to Popery happened as really and truly as the second, from Popery to Protestantism, then it follows that Protestantism never had a being pre-existent of Popery, the consequence whereof will be, that Popery had its beginning from the very time of the Apostles.

Now these two changes, if they both really happened, may be called at least equally great, nay, the first, viz., from Protestantism to Popery, appears evidently far more difficult than the second, on account of some doctrines in the Church of Rome, which if not taught by the Apostles, could never have been introduced without the greatest difficulty imaginable. I shall instance a few.

First.—It being a principle of Protestantism, as well as Popery, that Christ alone has the power of instituting sacraments; because he alone can appoint proper instruments to convey his grace to our souls: if Protestantism, which allows but of two sacraments, was the religion taught by the Apostles and established in the infancy of the Church, I leave any man of common sense to judge, whether five new ones, never heard of in the time of the Apostles, could have been afterwards imposed upon the Church; and rendered an article of her faith without the greatest difficulty and most vigorous opposition, at least for some time. Would not every good Protestant Bishop have immediately stood in the gap, and cried out against such a barefaced innovation? Would they not have written against it, and alleged that Christ had instituted but two sacraments, that the Apostles had never preached but two, that the precise number of two, and no more, had been handed down to them by the immediate successors of the Apostles, and that, therefore, no human power could make any addition to that number, without impiety and sacrilege: finally, would they not have stigmatised the first authors of such an innovation, and cut them from the communion of the Church. It is certainly most rational to judge, that Bishops and Pastors then in being, were they of the religion which Protestants now possess, would have exerted their utmost zeal and authority in a case of such importance, unless we suppose they were all laid asleep with opium, or doated, and knew nothing of the matter; for no one has hitherto ever heard or read one word of any opposition or resistance made to the coming of any of the five sacraments, which are now denied by Protestants, or of any disturbance that has happened in the Church about it. Very strange! that such a change should happen without noise or trouble, or, if there were disturbances, that no historian should give us any information of the matter.

Secondly.—I should be glad to know by what secret charm the Mass got admittance in the universal Church, if it was neither instituted by Christ, nor introduced by the practice of the Apostles themselves; for if the Popish doctrine relating thereto, viz., that it is a true sacrifice, or external oblation of the real body and blood of Christ, under the forms of bread and wine, ordained by Christ himself, at his last supper, be false, we cannot doubt but that the Apostles and their immediate successors were utter strangers to it, and of consequence, that none of the primitive Bishops or Priests ever said Mass, being all true Protestants in this, as well as other articles of faith.

Here then, rests the main stress of the difficulty, viz., how all the Bishops and Priests in the world, who had been brought up, as we must suppose, in the principles of the Protestant religion, and, of consequence, in a total ignorance both of the doctrine and use of the Mass, should afterwards not only unanimously agree to embrace this new scheme of religious worship, but even to regard it as the most sacred and solemn part of the public devotion of the Church. What, could all this be done without contradiction, noise or trouble: or had there been contentions, schisms, and disputes about it, as it is morally impossible but there must have been, unless the whole thing be a fiction, could events of such importance escape the notice of all historians?

Thirdly.—Sacramental confession has its peculiar difficulties, for it is not a mere speculative point, but of all practical duties the most repugnant to human nature; and I dare say no man would ever have submitted to it, who was not first convinced that he could not be saved without it. But what increases the difficulty of introducing it into practice, is, that no dignity, either in Church or State, ever exempted any member of the Church of Rome from the obligation of Confession. All Bishops, Kings and Princes, nay, Emperors and Popes themselves, bear an equal share in the burthen with the very meanest of the laity. They must all fall prostrate at the feet of their confessors, discover their most hidden sins, submit them to their censure, and perform the penance enjoined them.

Now if this was not the doctrine of the Apostles; if all the Popes and Bishops of the primitive Church were brought up in the principles of the Reformation; finally, if the obligation of auricular confession be a Popish error, and of consequence unknown to antiquity, then I cannot forbear putting this question: which of the two is the most surprising, the extravagance of those who first took a fancy to impose this heavy yoke both on themselves and others, or the weakness of those who submitted to it? for, that it was effectually submitted to, is a plain matter of fact. But since the very attempt of introducing a novelty (if it really was one) so burthensome and odious, was no better than a mad extravagant undertaking, can any one imagine that it met not with such great opposition at the beginning, as to put the whole Church into disorder and confusion? Is it not natural to suppose, that both the laity and clergy rose up in defence of the Christian liberty their forefathers had enjoyed, and alleged that since all Christians before them had been saved without stooping to the yoke of confession, they saw no reason why they might not be saved upon the same easy terms? Would not all these particulars (had they really happened) have been recorded in some history of note? Doubtless they would; and whoever believes the contrary, is capable of swallowing any improbability whatever.

It is, therefore, an incontestible truth, that a change from Protestantism to Popery, in the particulars I have specified, could never be effected without violent opposition, nor, of consequence, without occasioning troubles and schisms in the Church, in further proof whereof, let us suppose that a set of men should at present attempt to introduce the number of seven Sacraments, the Mass, Auricular confession, or any noted article of Popery, into the Church of England, and I appeal to all sensible men whether those religious zealots would not meet with a very warm opposition from all the Bishops and the whole body of English Clergy.

We have an instance upon record of their episcopal zeal for the Protestant religion, in the reign of King James II. who only endeavoured to compel them to order his proclamation for liberty of conscience to be read in all the Churches.

But the world knows what success he met with, and the history of the golden candlesticks will never be forgotten. Their zeal threw the whole nation into a flame, and Whitehall became shortly after too warm for that unfortunate Prince. If, therefore, Protestantism was the religion established by Christ and his Apostles, and professed in the infancy of the Church, can we imagine that the good primitive Bishops, who were so ready to lay down their lives for the Church, were not as zealous against Popery, as those of the Church of England? or that they were not ready to stand in the gap, and oppose the torrent with their utmost strength, when they saw it flowing in upon the Church?

But such an imagination being wholly groundless, it follows that what I have undertaken to prove is an undeniable truth, viz. that the first supposed change from Protestantism to Popery could not be effected with less difficulty than the second, from Popery to Protestantism. Nay, to speak naturally, the difficulty to effect, and of consequence the opposition made to it must have been much greater, for the reasons I have assigned.

Now no man of any reading can be so ignorant, as not to know with what difficulty and opposition, the second change, called the Reformation, was begun, carried on, and at last effected. Innumerable histories are filled with ample relations of the obstinate and bloody wars it occasioned in Germany, France, the Low Countries, and other Kingdoms and States. They tell us with what vigour it was opposed by Leo X. and the subsequent Popes; by the Emperor Charles V. by Francis I. of France, and his successors, and even by Henry VIII. under whom great numbers suffered for that cause. Finally, the history of the Council of Trent, in which it was condemned, is known by all men of learning; so that no man can doubt of the truth of a fact so particularized, and circumstantiated in all histories written upon that subject.

Here, then, I may justly demand of Protestants the same satisfactory accounts of the first-supposed change from Protestantism to Popery: for since they were always equally productive of the same effects, no rational man will ever be made to believe, that a change from Popery to Protestantism, in a few Kingdoms only, should occasion so great a number of remarkable events,—cause so many bloody wars,—such disturbance in the Church, and revolutions in the states; and that an entire change from Protestantism to Popery should not be attended with any of the like effects.*

I desire, therefore, some tolerable account of the particular circumstances of this change, as who were the principal actors therein? In what age has it happened? Did it come in by degrees or all at once? If all at once, then we must either suppose that the whole Christian world went to bed Protestants and rose Papists the next morning by unanimous consent; or that a formidable body of Papists, like Cadmus' armed men, rose out of the ground, and in a trice cut the throats of all true Protestants in the world; or finally, that Popery dropped from the clouds, and got full possession of the Universal Church without being perceived by any body, till the clear-sighted Martin Luther made the happy discovery: for truly, I can think of no other way to render it possible that it should get admittance all at once, or without opposition, noise or trouble.

This however being somewhat out of the way, and proper only for machinery exploits upon the theatre, I must rather suppose Protestants will say it came in by degrees. Be it so: but then it is reasonable they should give me a satisfactory answer to a few questions, and prove the truth of the facts from unquestionable records. If Popery came in by degrees, it got footing first in one place, then in another, as the Reformation did in Germany, Switzerland, and Geneva, before it crossed the seas to visit England; for we must suppose there were Protestant and Papist States and Kingdoms for some time in former ages, as there have been ever since the Reformation. I ask, then, where it was that Popery made its first appearance? Was it in the East or West, the South or North? What Kingdom, State or Nation abjured the Protestant religion first? Who was the first Popish Bishop of Rome, Emperor, or King? What Protestant and Popish Kings were contemporaries? What was happened in their several reigns about religion? What books were written for and against Popery? What Protestant Councils were called to condemn it? And lastly, by what name were those, who adhered to the ancient Protestant religion, distinguished from the others who embraced Popery? For I am sensible that Protestants and Papists are names invented since the Reformation. Now, since it is highly improbable that two such different communions, or religions as those of the Reformation and the Church of Rome, should be at any time in the world without names to distinguish them, because even the most inconsiderable sect never wanted a name, I should be glad to know what their names were in former ages, viz. from the time that Popery first got footing in some particular State or Kingdom, till its full establishment in the Universal Church.

I doubt not, however, but that by the art of invention some ingenious hypothesis may be made, an imaginary scheme may be formed, to show the metaphysical possibility of things that have never happened, nor ever will happen. But this way will not do. I demand not the invention of a fruitful brain, but plain facts, and good history to prove them. Nothing less will satisfy me, nor indeed any man who is not fond of being deceived. I desire to know the true history of Popery: I mean not that Popery which was established every where upon the ruins of Paganism, but of that Popery which we suppose to be younger sister of Protestantism. I desire to know when and where this unfortunate baby, so hated and persecuted by the best natured people in Europe, was born,—where she was nursed,—who were her parents and masters,—what memorable adventures befel her,—when she made her first appearance,—by what trick or slight did she steal away the inheritance from Protestantism her supposed eldest sister, nay, and maintain the full possession of it "for many hundred years?"

In a word how came she to be mistress of the whole Christian world? These are the most material points for which I demand authentic history; and till it can be produced, I shall continue, with a very safe and easy conscience, in my belief that the religion now called Popery is as ancient as Christianity, and that it had no other beginning than what Christ and his Apostles gave it.

R * * * * *

SERAMPORE CATHOLIC SCHOOL.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

SIR,—I had the gratification this morning of witnessing the First Annual Examination of the boys of the Serampore Catholic School, which took place at the parsonage, before a concourse of respectable gentlemen and Baboos as large as the small town would admit. We were extremely sorry our venerated Archbishop, Dr. Carew, could not preside on the occasion, because Bishop Olliffe and his suite being hourly expected, and his Lordship intending to meet them on their arrival, could not make it convenient to come up. In his absence, however, the Very Rev. Dr. Kennedy, Principal of St. John's College, took the chair.

The Senior classes were examined in Latin, French, Mathematics, Algebra, Geography, English History, and other ordinary branches of education, and the preparatory or Junior classes underwent examination in the lower branches of education. The readiness and accuracy with which the answers were given to the several questions put to them were highly gratifying and satisfactory; on the whole, they acquitted themselves in a style which reflected great credit on this institution, particularly on our zealous and indefatigable pastor, the Very Rev. Mr. Rabascall, to whom we are greatly indebted for this excellent institution. After the examination was concluded the prizes, consisting of appropriate books, were distributed by the founder of this institution to the successful students.

I feel extremely sorry that pressure of business does not admit of my writing so full an account of the examination, as may more clearly demonstrate the efficiency of the institution, and the progress made by its scholars. I trust to God that this and the Female Institution (attached to the Loretto Convent of Serampore) will thrive well, as they are the standing memorials of our endeared pastor, the Rev. B. Rabascall, who is, to our deep regret, about to depart from us shortly to his mission at Aden.

Serampore. Aug. 28. 1844.

O'CONNELL TESTIMONIAL.

To MESSRS. J. LACKERSTEEN & BROTHERS.

GENTLEMEN,—I have the pleasure of sending you a ten Rupee note (all I can afford) towards the "O'Connell Testimonial," to which you are so kind as to act as Treasurers; and respectfully trust that my fellow-countrymen throughout India will come forward on this occasion, and testify to the world their admiration of the virtues, talents, and devotion to his country, of the illustrious man who made them free subjects of the British Crown, by forwarding to you whatever their means may admit, and thereby manifest that Irishmen although 15,000 miles distant from Old Erin, are not unmindful of the great injustice done to their native land, by placing in a dungeon at his time of life, without a fair and impartial trial, the leader of the great majority of their countrymen, whose confidence, veneration, and affection, he possesses to an extent unprecedented in the annals of the world—for the offence of honestly, zealously, and indefatigably advocating the civil, religious, and political rights of his countrymen, and demanding that Irishmen should be placed on a perfect equality with their English fellow-subjects.

I am, Gentlemen,

Your most obedient servant,

Calcutta, AN IRISHMAN OF VERY

27th August, 1844.

LIMITED MEANS.

O'CONNELL TESTIMONIAL.

A. B.	25 0
An Irishman of very limited means,	10 0
A Friend, through Mrs. O'Brien,	50 0

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

A. G. W. through His Grace the Archbishop,	20 0
Soldiers of Dum-Dum, Monthly Subscribers, through the Rev. Mr. Storck,	3 2
A Catholic Friend, through His Grace the Archbishop,	20 0
A Friend, through the Rev. Mr. Storck, ..	20 0

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

A. G. W. through His Grace the Archbishop,	10 0
---	------

COWCOLLY MISSION.

A. G. W. through His Grace the Archbishop,	10 0
---	------

SUFFERING CHRISTIANS OF GWALIOR.

A. G. W. through His Grace the Archbishop,	10 0
F. S., through Mr. P. S. D'Rozario,	20 0
A Catholic,	2 0
A Poor Man's Mite,	1 0

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

F. A. G. W. through His Grace the Archbishop, ..	50 0
Mrs. Capt. FitzSimons through do. do.	50 0

LORD BEAUMONT'S PENAL CODE REPEAL BILL.

We can at present only refer our readers to the following report of a conversation which occurred on Friday last, in the House of Lords, on this most important subject. We are surprised to find that not one of the daily newspapers contains any report of the proceedings in question, nor any notice of them, further than by stating that some conversation took place! Very possibly there may be some connection between their silence and Lord Brougham's concluding hint, which we have printed in italics!

LORD BEAUMONT, after presenting several petitions on other subjects, said that, with a view to what he was assured to be the convenience of the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, he was quite prepared to postpone the second reading of the above bill, which stood for this evening. He begged, however, to state, that having regard to the importance of the measure, and the interests affected by it, he could not brook a long delay. The noble and learned lord's (Lord Brougham's) code, which re-enacted the monstrous statutes he proposed to repeal, had put every one in possession of the law on these subjects, and had armed informers with most potent weapons of annoyance. Above all there was the character of the country to redeem in the eyes of all nations from the stigma of being under such a code. He therefore wished to know whether the Government meant to bring in any bill of the same character with his own, and if so, whether it would be done speedily. If he had a satisfactory answer on these points he would willingly consent to the postponement of the second reading to-night. If not, he must press it.

The LORD CHANCELLOR assured the noble lord that the Government had such a measure in preparation, and that it would be laid upon the table in a few days. It did not go quite so far as the noble lord's bill; but, when it was printed, their lordships would be able to compare the two in their opposition to each other, and judge for themselves.

LORD BROUGHAM complained that he had been unfairly treated by the noble lord. He was most desirous—as desirous as the noble lord himself could be—to obtain the repeal of the very statutes which the noble lord had charged him with being desirous to re-enact. But, so long as they were suffered to exist, he had no alternative but to incorporate them with the remainder of the Criminal Code.

LORD BEAUMONT hoped that the word “opposition” had been inadvertently used, and that the noble and learned lord on the woolsack would explain it.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said, that nothing was further from his mind than any opposition to the noble lord's bill. All he meant to say was, that among the twenty-nine Acts of Parliament contained in that bill, there were probably a few which it might be found advisable to retain at present. But to the principle of the bill he was cordially favourable. Moreover, he assured the noble lord, that the Government measure should be referred to him before it was laid on the table of that House, as it was of great importance that they should act in concert, and not in opposition. With respect to his noble and learned friend's observations, he certainly agreed with him that it was unfair to represent his proposed code, as an endeavour to re-enact those penal statutes, of which all parties were agreed in desiring the abrogation.

The Bishop of EXETER was favourable to one part of the bill, but to the principle of the remainder he never could agree. He had always looked upon the Catholic Emancipation Act as a final measure.

The Duke of WELLINGTON here rose, but upon a cry of “Order” being raised, resumed his seat.

The Bishop of EXETER could not consent to the removal of any of the securities belonging to the Established Church.

LORD BEAUMONT was the last man in their lordship's House to do any thing to weaken the establishment. (Cheers.) If the right rev. prelate could prove that any one of the enactments which his bill tended to repeal was in any respect a security to that establishment, he (Lord Beaumont) undertook to have it expunged. (Cheers.) But that was not the case. The bill had been most carefully prepared by a very judicious hand, and for no other purpose than that of taking away a multitude of absurd, monstrous, and even bloody enactments, which no one would think of putting in force, and which only existed for the disgrace of the Statute Book and the empire. He would particularly specify those of the 13th and 23rd Elizabeth, by which the profession of Popery was still punishable as high treason. How could those, who approved of the recent conduct of our ambassador at Constantinople, in obtaining the repeal of similar laws there—(only not near so abominable)—in favour of Turkish converts to Christianity, defend those statutes for example, or resist their Repeal, under pretence of securing the Establishment? (“Hear, hear,” from Lord Aberdeen.) The noble lord was proceeding to make further observations on this point, when LORD BROUGHAM, in rather an excited manner, rose to order. The discussion was entirely irregular. The gravest subjects had been touched upon by the noble lord—matters of domestic policy—of municipal, constitutional law—and even of religion itself—the character enjoyed by this nation among foreign nations had been brought into question—and an invidious comparison made between her code and that of a foreign State. These and the like delicate topics had been handled by the noble lord when there was, in fact, no fitting opportunity to consider them, or to reply to his statements. There was no question before the House. The noble lord had risen to postpone the discussion of his measure; but, in point of fact, had done his best to promote it. He trusted that not one word of so irregular a discussion would go forth to the public.

LORD BEAUMONT was far from being desirous of any such discussion. But the right rev. prelate having offered an unexpected objection, he had thought it incumbent upon him to give it an immediate reply. (Hear.) He begged to express his entire satisfaction and gratification with the assurances he had that night heard from the noble and learned lord on the woolsack, and would gladly consent to a short postponement of his bill for the present. Here the conversation dropped.—Tablet.

THE LIFE OF MISS NANO NAGLE,

Foundress of the Presentation Order.

(CONTINUED FROM PAGE 112.)

We have now before us the Apostolical brief of the sixth Pius, dated at Rome, in September 1791, which recognized their existence and approved their objects. It is addressed to the late Right Rev. Francis Moylan, and was issued in the beginning of that storm which was about to burst on the Holy See, and on society at large. Its first murmurings were already heard. The struggle had begun in France; the religious orders were already being swept away. The Jesuits, powerful as they were, had been abandoned to the clamours of the press, and the intrigues of wicked men, and if the doom of others was delayed, it seemed certainly and speedily at hand. It was at this eventful period that the petition on behalf of the ladies of the Presentation was laid before his Holiness; and it came upon his careworn and afflicted heart as the harbinger of happier times. It told him that the religious spirit was not dead in Christendom. The cauldron was seething with the ingredients of discord and disaster, and the bitter waters seemed likely to inundate the altar and the throne: but there was one spot on God's earth where the spirit of religion survived, which was yet green with the dew of heaven, and where his grace was producing fruits akin to those it produced of old.

"More grateful or more seasonable intelligence (we use the Pontiff's words,—the page on which he wrote them was wet with his tears of joy) we could not receive, especially at the present time, when the designs and schemes of wicked men tend to nothing else (if that were possible) than the ruin and destruction of the Church of Christ. We feel and acknowledge it an effort of the boundless providence of Almighty God that while elsewhere the institutions and convents of both sexes are sacrilegiously plundered and destroyed, houses are, by the increase of piety, erected and endowed in your diocese, for the reception of pious virgins, whereby the Christian education of young girls is happily secured. Having therefore, first of all offered due thanks to the Divine Mercy, and next, highly approving in the Lord of the aforesaid Nano Nagle's intention, sincerely also and earnestly inclined in favour of your petition, we give you power to erect and to form not only in the city of Cork, in other towns, houses for the reception of pious virgins, whose duty it shall be to instruct little girls in the rudiments of faith and morals, to teach them different works peculiar to their sex, to visit sick females in the public infirmaries, and help them in their necessities."

The latter part of this injunction they continued to fulfil for some years. They discharged all the various functions of Charity, which are divided between the Sisters of Charity and they, and those of the Presentation Order. Their usefulness was so evident, and services so much required, that in the year 1805, large and efficient communities were established in Dublin, Waterford, Kilkenny, and Killarney. In that year, their institute was raised to the dignity of a religious order, and its members permitted to make a solemn religious profession by a brief of Pope Pius VII, dated the 9th of April, 1805. A constitution was drawn up and approved of, founded principally on the rule of St. Augustin, as observed by the Ursuline nuns. In addition to the ordinary and usual vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, a fourth was added for the gratuitous instruction of poor females. By a special clause, they were dispensed from attendance on the sick, and required to observe strict and inviolable enclosure for the future.

This deviation from the original purpose, and even from the express intention of their foundress, was certainly the result of mature deliberation. There were many who disapproved of it at the time, and even now its utility is more than questionable. It is certain that it has, in many instances, prevented the extension of the order to many country towns. We admit that even in spiritual concerns, the same subdivision of employment may be beneficially introduced, which has contributed in so eminent a degree to improve the processes of human industry; and that if a religious order be entrusted with the management of a school alone, it is likely to attain its object with more effect, than if required to visit the sick or attend a hospital besides. We admit that such a subdivision of the offices of charity is in the abstract, desirable, and in large cities may be practicable; but in small towns, where the population is small, and the means limited, and where one religious house only can be established, such a subdivision becomes impossible; and where any convent is established in such a locality, it is not unreasonable to require that all their wants should be attended to,—that the poor should be instructed,—the sick visited—the children of shopkeepers educated, than whom we know no class more neglected. For while the poor have the Presentation nuns, and the rich the Ursuline, or some similar establishment, they are generally reduced to such imperfect education as a half-instructed teacher in a country town is capable of communicating. We think that the limiting of the objects of the Presentation Order was rendering it less useful to the public; and that instead of the thirty houses of that observance which are now in Ireland, they would, but for that alteration, be at the present time nearly four times that number.

But the subject of our notice was not to witness such a deviation from her original intention. Her wish was to make her charity as extensive as the infirmities that claimed its exercise, and to form her infant congregation to habits of the most generous and comprehensive benevolence. She was the first to bind herself to that object by a vow. The opening of her new house, which took place on Christmas-day, was marked by a singular proof of her affection for the indigent children of her Redeemer: fifty poor persons were seated at a table and ministered unto by her own hands, and she continued to repeat that charity on each recurrence of the solemnity while she lived. It was in strict accordance with the tenor of her life. For thirty years she was engaged in her charitable duties, breaking the bread of life to the ignorant, and the meat which perisheth to the hungry. Her solicitude extended even to the youth of the other sex: in the very beginning she provided a school for their instruction though this duty has long been discontinued by the Presentation Order. She provided an almshouse for the aged and decrepid, of which some remnant is still in existence. The last work of charity in which she was engaged, was an asylum for the poor penitent females. She would shelter, were it necessary, in her bosom, those wretched outcasts, at whom the world, which has made them what they are, points the finger of scorn and abhorrence. They found in Miss Nagle one who felt this misery, and was anxious to relieve it; and that merciful design she would also have carried into effect, if her destined career of usefulness was not already at an end, and the measure of her good works filled up, and pressed down, and already running over.

But the sanctity of God's chosen servants is not attained by works of eternal charity alone: there is an internal world in the heart which must be purified. Though "from the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh," yet there are hidden trials reserved for the people of God, which the world can never know. It is only He who called them, and sustained them, and "made with the temptation issue," that knows the secret and rugged path by which the soul is led onward in perfection. Miss Nagle had her interior trials. What servant of God has been exempted from them? Besides her daily solicitude, like the apostle, for her numerous children, she was doomed to encounter disappointment and contradiction; and what is yet more hard to bear, insult and calumny. In the public streets she was sometimes called an impostor. Reckless extravagance and Pharsaical ostentation were often alleged against her. Imputations of a yet fouler kind were devised by the corrupt malignity of her enemies. But like Him, who when reviled, did not revile; and who, though led like a sheep to the slaughter, opened not His mouth,—her only defence was meekness and uncomplaining submission. The barbed and poisoned arrow pierced her bosom, but few were aware of the wound inflicted; nor would any have ever known it, if solicitude for her spiritual daughters had not induced her to put them upon their guard against the tempter, and fortify their inexperienced minds against the suggestions of calumny. She was wont to spend four hours each morning in the duty and in the attitude of prayer. Each year she made a spiritual retreat of eight days, great part of which she spent in Church on bended knees: and the night of Holy Thursday was over with her, one of sacred and unintermitted watching before the adorable sacrament of the altar: yet it was only in performing, after her death, the last rites of friendship to her remains, that her bones were discovered to be excoriated and ulcerated, and to have been so for years,—yet the acute pain which kneeling must have caused her, she bore with silent and enduring fortitude.

She never whispered to her nearest and dearest associates, a hint of her secret and long-continued suffering: it was known but to herself and God. The soles of her feet were, at the same time, found covered with tumors, such as would have prevented any other person from walking, yet for the last three years of her life she walked over a great part of the city, begging from door to door for the support of those charitable institutions, which would otherwise have fallen to the ground.

To such works was the life of Miss Nagle devoted. In the year 1784, she reached the fifty-sixth year of her age. In the spring of that year, the symptoms of a premature old age began to develop themselves in her exhausted frame. She was weak and feeble, less from years than labors. She began to complain of weakness, oppression, loss of rest and appetite; and a troublesome cough increased not a little the sufferings of the last moments of her life. On the 26th of April, it was evident to all around her that her last hour was come. She had previously received the last rites of religion, and was fully sensible of her approaching end. She called her little community around her, and giving them her last lesson—a lesson so like the tenor of her life, and so honorable to them—"Love one another as you have hitherto done," she took her last farewell, and passed gently from this world to a better. Her remains lie in the quiet and beautiful little cemetery, formed originally for the Ursuline, but now belonging to the Presentation nuns, where many of those she loved so well are buried by her side, and where no step intrudes to brush the dew drops from her grave, but some casual visitor, attracted to the spot by the memory of her virtues and her name.

Thus passed away from earth one of the greatest women of these our times. She was great, not in the estimation of the world—for when was it ever found to do justice to worth like hers?—but she was great before God. Her excellence did not consist in word, but in action. Her power did not consist in writing novels or poetry, or in ministering to the taste or the curiosity of the public; but it was exercised in benefitting the poor, by exalting their character, and enlightening their minds. She was specially called to fulfil a great object; and she did fulfil it. If we needed any other proof of its divine origin, to attach us to our faith the more, we should find it in that power which it possesses of manifesting, as it has done in this instance, life and strength in even the most unfavorable circumstances. The principle of life and productiveness which was given to it in its origin, by Him who was "the way, the truth, and the life," which is exemplified by the vine and the grain of mustard seed; which has been manifested by the martyr and the apostle; which has produced so rich a harvest of sanctity and usefulness, in the religious orders and charitable institution of every age and clime; which is still in active operation in the all-pervading spirit of modern Catholicism, is that which presents itself to us in the life and character of Miss Nagle. That divine power you may modify, or check, or suppress for a time, by violence or injustice; but you can never utterly destroy. It is immortal.

and indestructible like Him who gave it. But if the branch be severed from the parent stem, from which it derives its life, it will immediately wither and decay. Gold may give it a false and hollow lustre, or it may brighten in the sunshine of royal and legislative favor, but it is dead and leafless still, and will never bloom or bud forth again. Neither Missionsary societies, however numerous, nor newspaper paragraphs, however flattering, nor royal endowments, however munificent, can supply that life, which is to be given by the Spirit of God alone. The subject of our notice had none of these to sustain or stimulate her zeal; but she had what is far better,—the power and favor of God. She was a living branch of the true vine, whose roots are fixed deep in the everlasting hills, and which has been moistened with many a martyr's blood. The portion of the vineyard in which it was, seemed abandoned by the Son of the vineyard. The wild beasts of the forest were permitted to ravage and lay it waste for a season; and stormy troubled days they were in which it started into existence: but it put forth its leaves, and blossomed, and bore fruit an hundred-fold, because it was one which the right hand of the Son had planted. Has Protestantism ever borne such fruit, albeit it has had "kings for its nursing fathers, and queens for its nursing mothers?" Has a voice ever gone forth from its collegiate walls or lordly palaces, from deanery or vicarage, calling to the poor in the power of one Christian brotherhood, and leading them by word and example to their Father in heaven? Have the streets of London, Birmingham, Sheffield, Manchester, Leeds, or any other town, ever heard the voice of wisdom crying aloud in the streets, or calling the children from lane and factory to taste the sweets of knowledge? If we may know the mother by her instinctive love, which is the mother of the poor? How much of royal and legislative favor was bestowed upon the charter schools of Ireland, at the very time that the foundress of the Presentation was engaged in her work of usefulness; yet how different has been the issue of both! In a few years, and despite the fostering care of Church and state, the charter schools become such an abomination in the land, that those who promoted their erection are obliged to remove them as public nuisances from among the people. The Presentation, on the other hand, goes on increasing in utility and public favor, winning for itself and its works golden opinions from all men, and from all parties. Has England had anything like it to exhibit for the last three hundred years? with all its wealth at its command, has it achieved anything like what has been achieved by this one lady, in one of the poorest and most misgoverned countries of the earth, and with so many social, legal, and political difficulties to encounter? It was not so in Catholic England, in times of old, and when she was united to the centre of unity, from which alone the principle of life can emanate. How rich and abundant was the fruit which then she bore! Its remains are still to be seen throughout the land,—mere husk and rind, from which the substance is gone, but which mark the rich luxuriance of that branch of God's Church to which they belonged. But since that branch has been severed from the parent stem,—since it has been corrupted by heresy and schism—the principle of life has been dried up within it, it bears the curse of sterility; and until it is engrafted on the true vine, which is Christ Jesus, it will never bloom, nor bud forth again. To use the words of our own beautiful melodies,

"Like a dead leafless branch in the summer's bright ray,
The beams of the warm sun play round it in vain,
It may smile in his light, but it blooms not again."

To estimate the good effected by Miss Nagle let us examine it somewhat more in detail than we have hitherto done. There are in Ireland alone, 30 convents of the Presentation Order. In these convents there are at least 13,000 children instructed. They are taught the elements of human knowledge as well as the principles of their Christian duties. They are prepared for the fitting reception of the sacraments, and made acquainted with those branches of household industry which may be useful to them hereafter. Nor is the zeal of the teachers stimulated by any selfish or mercenary motive. The principle of their efficiency is charity. What they do, they do for God. In each of the little up-turned faces that looks to them for instruction, they see an immortal spirit entrusted to their care, and for whose salvation they will be held accountable, and by its side there is an angel to demand hereafter an account of the beings entrusted to their guardianship. The tie which binds the religious to her pupil, is one of no common order. It possesses more the affection of the parent than the formality of the mistress. She becomes the repository of their little wants and cares, and domestic trials. Her influence endures after the school has been exchanged for the cares and troubles of the world. In prosperity it cheers with the consciousness of her approval. In adversity it consoles with the hope of her sympathy. Should the bright promise of youth be blasted by the seductions of the temper, and the injured woman be thrown upon the world, the hard and despairing heart is often softened into shame and compunction, by an interview with her who spoke kindly to her in her young days; who taught her her duty to God, and was wont to advise her what to do when she would have to encounter the dangers of the world, however ill that advice was followed. And the consciousness that, thus deprived and shameless as she has been, she is not yet forgotten in her wanderings by her ever kind and indulgent mistress, we know to have brought back many an erring female from vice and misery.—To be continued.

MISCELLANEA.

INTERESTING TO ROMAN CATHOLICS.—Our Roman Catholic readers will be somewhat staggered to learn that every one of them who heard Mass on Sunday last, without having taken the oath prescribed by law (which we fancy will be the case with at least nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand of them,) thereby subjected himself or herself to a fine of 66*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* and twelve month's imprisonment! Yet such is the fact. Many of the penal statutes, though supposed to be obsolete and practically repealed, by non-usure, still disgrace the statute book, and may be enforced to-morrow, just as a dormant law, of whose existence nobody dreamt, was revived and enforced against the Dorchester labourers. (The Mercury, of Liverpool, from which this passage is taken, then quotes a leading article of the TABLET on the subject.)—Tablet

WATERFORD.—Mr. Stephen Spaih was received into the Catholic Church on the 7th instant, by the Rev. Patrick Cantwell, Curate of St. Patrick's.—Waterford Paper.

REMOVAL OF THE GREAT BELL OF ST. MARY'S FROM SHERIDAN'S FOUNDRY TO THE METROPOLITAN CHURCH.—This interesting specimen of Irish manufacture and enterprise, the largest and the first of its size ever cast in Ireland, excited much curiosity as it passed along the quays, and through Sackville-street, to its destination yesterday. The accompanying crowds increased to such extent when it arrived at the church, that with some difficulty the police were enabled to keep free passage through the street. The bell was drawn up an inclined plane, on the carriage constructed for its conveyance, and rolled along a tramway of planks into the church. It was subsequently elevated, near the altar (with much mechanical skill, considering the enormous weight of nearly three tons,) on a hollow square platform, nearly four feet from the ground, and remains thus placed for the convenience of the ceremony of its pontifical blessing to be solemnised on to-morrow. The dimensions of the bell are five feet four inches in diameter, four feet in height, four inches in thickness and five thousand and fifty-four pounds weight—the clapper alone weighs nearly one hundred weight. The cost of the bell, mountings, and belfry, amounts to 350 guineas,—the free and generous offering of the excellent ladies of the parish, which, when added to the completion of their intended design of furnishing three statues for the pediment of the portico, will arrive very nearly to a similar amount of 1,000 guineas, previously collected by these pious ladies of the parish, for the chaste and magnificent pure white statuary marble altar that already decorates this truly splendid edifice. The inscription round the lower edge of the bell is as follows:—"This bell (the first public Angelus bell tolled here for the last three centuries) was cast in Dublin, A.D. 1844, by order of his Grace the Most Reverend Doctor Daniel Murray for his Church of St. Mary's of the Conception, Marlbro'-street, Dublin." On one side, between the wreath of shamrocks at the rim and top, is represented the Archbishop's arms, with shield, pallium, cross, mitre, &c., and on the reverse, the maker's name, J. Sheridan, Dublin. In Catholic countries, the donors of the bell suggest the name to the bishop at its blessing, and this gives rise to their being called the sponsors of the bell, as the lotions and unctions of the ceremony tend to have such called the baptism of the bell.—Freeman.

Embarked, on the 1st March, 1844, at Marseilles, for Madras, Fathers Desire Audibert, of the diocese of Frejus; Laurence Punicelli, Louis Berlendis, Italians; I. B. Trincar, of the diocese of Le Puy; Vincent Hugla, of the diocese of Rodez; Prosper Bartrand, of the diocese of St. Claude; and the Brothers Louis Gonon, of the diocese of Grenoble; and Maurice Gillard, of the diocese of Lausanne.—Annals of the Propagation of the Faith.

CHANGES AT ROME.—A letter from Rome of the 1st instant mentions a report that Cardinal Lambruschini is on the point of resigning his present post, and will be succeeded by Mgr. Capaccini, who is returned from Lisbon, and will be made a cardinal at the next consistory. Cardinal Lambruschini is expected to be appointed Secretary of Trêves.—Herald.

In consequence of the death of Cardinal Pacca, the offices which he filled have been distributed as follows:—The Cardinal Macchi is named Secretary of the Holy Roman Inquisition. The Cardinal Ostinis Protectorate of the Theological Academy. The Cardinal Barberini, Arch-priest of the Lateran Basilic. The Cardinal Spinola of the Apostolic Dater. The Cardinal Mezzofanti, Prefect of the Holy Congregation for the correction of the Oriental books of the Church. The Cardinal Acton to the Protectorate of the Ecclesiastical Academy.—Univers

The Father Alphonso Corsetti, of the order of Minors of Observance, during twenty years a Missionary in America, is about to leave Genoa to return to his Mission. He is to be accompanied by nineteen young priests of his Order.—Tablet.

They write from Rome that the sale of the gallery of Cardinal Fesch has been suspended; about 700 of the pictures have been sold this year, and there remains 2,000 for sale next winter.—Journal de Bruxelles.

M. Strauss, who has got himself a name in Germany for his cold infidelity, is now at work on a History of the Apostles, conceived in the same spirit with his notorious "Life of Jesus." Not content with having denied the historical existence of our Saviour, he denies also the existence of the first men who propagated the revealed religion. This may appear incredible to those who know not the deplorable tendency of some German Protestant writers; unhappily, it is only too true.—Ibid.

On the 6th December, 1843, there departed from Naples for Sennaar, in Africa, the Rev. Jerome Serrao, and Brother Philippini, of the congregation of St. Vincent: they go to join the Rev. Mr. Montuqi, who has recently opened an important Mission in that country.—Annals of the Propagation of the Faith.

The Rev. Father Gregory Mary de Bene embarked at Genoa, on the 25th of February, with three other Capuchins, namely, the Rev. Fathers Louis de Raveunc, Francis Anthony de Faberne, and Paul Anthony de la Nouvelle Maison. Those courageous Missionaries are going to devote themselves to the salvation of the savages of Brazil, who are still seated in the shadow of death.—Ibid.

Two priests of the Congregation of St. Vincent have just embarked for the Mission of China; they are the Rev. Mr. Jandart, of the diocese of Lyons, and the Rev. Mr. Yzabel, of the diocese of St. Fleur.

In December, at Brest, for China, the Rev. Fathers Adrian Languillat, of the diocese of Chalon-sur-Marne; Joseph Gonnelt, of the diocese of Viviers; Louis Tassin, of the diocese of Arras; Adam Vanni, of the diocese of Chambery; Stanislaus Clevelin, of the diocese of Doubs; and Brother Pamphilus Sinoquet, of the diocese of Amiens.

Three members of the Society of Foreign Missions departed lately from Brest for China, on board the Archimedes steamer; they are, the Rev. Messrs. Daveluy, of the diocese of Amiens; Chauveau, of the diocese of Luçon; and Thivis, of the diocese of Langres. They will be at the disposal of the Procurator of Macao.—Annals of the Propagation of the Faith.

BALTIMORE.—SISTERS OF CHARITY.—The Sisters of Charity at Baltimore have purchased that piece of ground known as Mount Hope College, for the purpose of establishing an hospital. It is but a short distance from the city, and cost 13,000 dollars.—Tablet.

GEORGETOWN.—TAKING THE HABIT.—The United States Catholic Magazine states that at the convent of the Visitation, Georgetown, D. C., in February, the religious habit was given to Miss J. Pearce (sister Mary Eulalia) Miss Georginna Pearce (sister Mary Michael;) both of Boston; Miss Elizabeth Travers (sister Mary Agatha) of Washington, and Mrs. Keating (sister Mary Joseph) of Philadelphia.—Ibid.

BATH.—Miss Marriott, eldest daughter of the Rev. Harvey Marriott, rector of Claverton, near Bath, who is what is commonly called "a low churchman," has joined the Church of Rome.—Freeman.

THE TRACTARIANS.—OXFORD, May 18.—The Tractarian party here are under great excitement in consequence of the refusal of the Vice-Chancellor to allow Mr. Macmullen's decree. Mr. Knollis, Fellow and Dean of Magdalen College, has addressed a letter to the Margaret Professor of Divinity (Dr. Taussett,) calling on him to bring the sermon of Professor Garbett, preached at St. Mary's, on Sunday last, before a board of heresy. It is also announced that the Tractarians still oppose the new statute for establishing the proposed college of modern languages, on the ground that the teachers are not called on by the new statute to sign any test of religious doctrine, so that continental Protestants, Presbyterians, and others, may be admitted.

OLD LUSTRES NEWLY LIGHTED.—A friend of ours when on a visit, not long since, to an ancient archiepiscopal city of the North, was highly entertained by the accounts he received of the discordant state of feeling among the dignitaries of the cathedral respecting a certain ceremonial observance. The case was this:—It appears that a part of the church furniture consists of a pair of large altar candlesticks, with tin candles, painted white. These it had been customary to place on the altar on communion days; and, till very recently, nobody dreamt of objecting to the custom. The salvers and patens, chalices and flagons, and the candlesticks were, on great festivals, displayed, and were esteemed to be highly ornamental. One patent chalice and flagon, to be sure, were for use, and the rest were ornaments—and why not? Large salvers and candlesticks are handsome things; private gentlemen went to exhibit their stores of plate on festal occasions—why should not capitular bodies do the same? There seemed to be no reason why they should not. But, alas! for the candlesticks and tin candles! Some High Churchman hinted that their right to be placed on the altar arose, not from their ornamental qualifications, but from their physical signification of the "true light of the world." Here was a coil; the hitherto innocent candlesticks, and still more guiltless tin candles, became criminals and apostates; they ceased to be Protestant candlesticks! Hitherto, they were dumb images, that said nothing—meant nothing; "story they had none to tell!" but now the breath of life was breathed into them, and they vented flat Popery.—Edinburgh Observer.

PUSEYISM AND RUSTIC FESTIVITIES.—One of the modes by which the new school of theology in the Established Church endeavours to win the affections of the lower classes is by taking into patronage popular festivities and an increase of rural holidays. To this we have no manner of objection for we have all along been convinced that the innocent hilarity of the poor has been cruelly neglected by the rich, and one after another of the good old English sports and pastimes has been disused and suppressed, till in the present day hardly anything in the shape of a popular merry-making for young or old of the poor is to be witnessed in any part of the country; but we have very strong doubts whether the poor have been made any the better or the happier by the change. Still there is, after all, something inconsistent in the mode of celebrating Saint's day holidays, which seems to be coming into favour under "New England's" auspices. A religious service in church followed immediately by greasy-pole climbing, jumping in sacks, trying to gulp treacle cakes, and other not very intellectual pastimes, does seem rather odd, and better selection as an accompaniment to devotion could no doubt be made. Perhaps the new directors of the old sports forget that they were always adapted to the time and the clime, and the people for whom they were intended.—Tablet.

OXFORD, MAY 21.—The Rev. Charles Marriott, of Oriel College, has addressed a letter to the Vice-Chancellor, requiring him to summon a board of heresy, to examine certain charges brought by him against the Rev. James Garbett, professor of poetry, founded on a sermon preached by Mr. Garbett, in the university pulpit, on Sunday se'nnight. Mr. Marriott is a leading follower of the Rev. J. H. Newman.—Ibid.

A letter from Rome, of the 23rd ult., says:—"The College of Cardinals will, it is said, be convoked in May, as a Consistory, at the Vatican, when various promotions will be made, and religious affairs in Russia and Spain taken into consideration. Cardinal Spinola is replaced as Legate at Bologna by Cardinal Vannicelli, who is succeeded at Forlì by Cardinal Gisi."—Ami de la Religion.

COUNT VON HARDENBERG.—The Hanoverian Minister Plenipotentiary at Berlin has been recalled by order of the King of Hanover. The reason assigned for this is said to be, that the Count has embraced the Roman Catholic Religion.—Tablet.

THE
BENGAL
CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

[No. 10.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 7, 1844.

[VOL. VII]

ARRIVAL OF THE RIGHT REV. DR. OLLIFFE AND PARTY.

During the preceding week the Catholic community was almost in a state of feverish anxiety to hear of the arrival of Bishop Olliffe on the Seringapatam, and on Sunday last their expectations were gratified by a notice, stating that Semaphoric Intelligence of the arrival of the Vessel had been received and that his Lordship would land at 5 o'clock on that evening. Long before the appointed hour a large concourse had assembled at Baboo Rajchunder's ghaut, in eager expectation of seeing their new Prelate, but, owing to the strong currents which now prevail, the Seringapatam could not come off town, and the assembled multitude dispersed after nightfall, greatly disappointed. On Monday, another notice was issued, announcing that a Steamer had been despatched to convey the Right Rev. Dr. Olliffe and Party to town, and that his Lordship would land at 3 o'clock. The crowd on this occasion was greater than on the preceding evening. All the Priests attached to the Cathedral, St. John's College, St. Xavier's College, the Durrumtollah and the Serampore Churches, robed in their surplices and stoles, attended by a large number of ecclesiastical and lay Students of the Colleges, with an immense body of the Catholic community, crowded to the ghaut, joy beaming on the faces of all. After his Lordship's party, consisting of Nuns, Monks, Lay-Brothers and Ecclesiastical Students, 26 in number, had landed, Bishop Olliffe, with the Rev. Messrs. Mascarenhas and Kennedy, came on shore, attired in his episcopal robes, and immediately, all the clergy and a great many of the laity who were near saluted his Lordship by kissing his ring. The cortege of carriages and other conveyances which followed his Lordship was immense, and on arriving at the Cathedral he was greeted by the joyful presence of several thousands. The Bishop alighted from his carriage at the south-west gate, and walked in a procession, formed by the clergy and laity, to the entrance of the Cathedral, where he was received by his Grace the Archbishop, who embraced him affectionately and after giving him as usual, the holy water and incense, conducted him to the sanctuary, whilst the choristers chaunted the Magnificat, at the conclusion of which, Bishop Olliffe imparted his benediction. His Grace the Archbishop then ascended the Pulpit, and addressed the congregation in a strain of eloquence which certainly could not be excelled. To those who had not the good fortune to be present on this interesting occasion, the following sketch will convey but a faint idea of the impassioned and edifying address delivered by the Archbishop. The text was, "How shall they believe in him, of whom they have not heard? And how shall they hear without a preacher? And how shall they preach unless they be sent." Rom. chap. X. v. 14 & 15.

"There is an obvious connection between these words, and the occasion which now assembles us together. Before I refer more particularly to that relation, I shall unfold for your instruction, some of the great truths which are bound up, if I may so speak, with the passages just quoted from the sacred Scripture.

"Revealed religion being a sacred deposit of heavenly origin, one granted by God to man, in order to link earth to heaven, and to instruct man in the truths he requires to believe and practise for salvation, it is obvious that the Divine Wisdom and Goodness must have provided, from the beginning, a suitable and secure medium, for communicating this precious gift, and for transmitting it in integrity to succeeding ages. From Adam to the time of Moses, the faith of the Redeemer to come, of one God, of an eternity of happiness and misery for the virtuous and the wicked, and the knowledge of the religious rite of sacrifice, by which supreme worship was paid to God, were handed down, by tradition, for a period of 2,000 years, by a succession of Patriarchs, until at length, the truths thus preserved, together with the Jewish Code of worship, were consigned to writing, by the ministry of Moses. Once, that the Jewish priesthood was established, the guardianship of the sacred deposit of religious worship was confided to their care, until the period should arrive, when their carnal dispensation was to find its consummation in the new and eternal testament, and the priesthood of Aaron, which brought nothing to perfection, was to give way to that illustrious priesthood of which the Psalmist spoke, when he said of the Christ, "The Lord swore, and it shall not repent him. Thou art a priest for ever according to the order of Melchisedech." As soon as this new priesthood was introduced, the inspired writings clearly indicate, that, as in preceding ages, so also until time should be no more, the integrity of the sacred deposit of religion was to be guarded and preserved inviolate, by means of a never failing succession of lawful pastors, all linked and connected, by their ordination and Mission, with Christ and his Apostles, the founder and first ministers of the Christian Church.

"Thus, in this grand view of religion, we ascend securely and without interruption, from the present day, to the hour, when the Almighty voice first proclaimed, in the Garden of Paradise, the great truth, that the seed of the woman should crush the serpent's head, and that the evil inflicted by original sin, should be repaired by the incarnate Mediator of God and man, Christ Jesus. For, at every interval, from the present to that, when the consoling announcement just recited was first uttered, we find the preservation of religious truth confided to duly constituted guardians, who were at once depositaries and witnesses of the doctrine, which they received from their predecessors, and which they transmitted with holy care to their lawful successors.

"In effect, reason itself points out, that for the preservation of religion, this was the course which was most consistent with the wisdom of God, the grandeur of religion and the moral well-being of man. For what is the Christian religion or revelation, but a full development or unfolding of all the great truths of faith and morality, which the types and figures of the worship practised under the law of nature and that of the Jews shadowed forth? Between religion, as it existed under the law of nature and of Moses, and as it exists under the Gospel, there is no contradiction, no conflict; there is nothing in the latter inconsistent or incompatible with the truth and divine origin of the former. In the Garden of Paradise and under the law of nature, the seed of religion was consigned to the earth. Under the law of Moses the stem came forth, as yet weak and unadorned, until, under the Gospel, it grew into a stately tree covered with foliage and fruits, shedding beauty on the soil in which it was planted, and giving shelter and support to all who came under its salutary shade; indeed, this comparison is suggested by the Saviour, when he says, "The kingdom of heaven is like to a grain of mustard seed, which a man took and sowed in his field. Which is the least indeed of all seeds; but when it is grown up it is greater than all herbs, so that the birds of the air come and dwell in the branches thereof." The truth conveyed in this illustration, the Saviour expressly confirms, when he says, that he came not to destroy the law but to fulfil it, and when he adds, at the same time, "For amen I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall not pass of the law, till all be fulfilled." The Gospel then, or Christianity, was to be the consummation or perfection of the old law, not a dispensation condemnatory of that law, not a religious system framed to contradict any of the immutable truths, which God revealed to the Jewish people. In a word, as the pencilled outline or shadowing of a picture is withdrawn from view, and, relatively to us, ceases to exist, when it is clothed with color, beauty and perfection by the artist's skill, so, in a similar way, the old law with its types and shadows passed into oblivion, when Jesus Christ, whom they prefigured, gave them their consummation.

"It is of importance on this occasion to call your attention to the great care, which was taken, at the introduction of the written law to invest Moses with all those characteristics of truth, which, in concerns of great moment mankind deem necessary, in order that all danger of imposture may be excluded. In proportion to the exalted nature of the commission and ministry, with which Moses asserted, that he was honoured by God, in the same degree, it became indispensable for him, in order to secure a reasonable obedience from those whom he proposed to address on the subject of his Divine Legation, to lay before them, such credentials of his mission, as ought to convince every impartial person, that he was really sent by God, in the sacred capacity which he assumed. The obedience, which religion requires of man, is called by St. Paul, a reasonable obedience. To be so, we must have rational grounds to believe, that the person who claims our credence as a minister of God and of religion is really such, and that he has been duly sent to exercise his ministry in our regard. For it would be obviously an error most prejudicial to our salvation, if we unfortunately surrendered our souls to the guidance and instruction, either of one, who really was not sent by God, or of one, who by separating from, or rebelling against the authority, by which he was previously commissioned, forfeited all the prerogatives, which could entitle his ministry to be listened to, and revered by us. And this error in a concern of the greatest moment would be justly imputed to us, as a grievous fault, if we culpably fell into or persevered in it, through the neglect of such reflection or rational inquiry, as we could have employed to guard against it, but which we unfortunately disregarded, from tepidity, or indifference in the awful subject of our eternal salvation. Amongst the people of God, you know, that death and other most terrific punishments befel those who usurped the office of the priesthood, and that the worship offered to God in the temple on Mount Garizim, although it was offered to the true God according to the Mosaic rite, even though it were celebrated by a Priest of the race of Aaron, was rejected as profane and schismatical, because it was stained with disobedience, a crime, likened by the prophet Samuel to the sins of witchcraft and idolatry. When, contrary to the law of God, Saul usurped the office of the priesthood and offered up in sacrifice, the sheep and oxen he had taken from the Amalekites, the Prophet thus addressed him, "Doth the Lord desire holocausts and victims, and not rather that the voice of the Lord be obeyed? For obedience is better than sacrifices, and to hearken rather than to offer the fat of rams. Because it is like the sin of witchcraft to rebel, and like the crime of idolatry to refuse to obey. Forasmuch therefore as thou hast rejected the word of the Lord, the Lord hath also rejected thee from being king." These events in the history of the people of God clearly show, how grievous a crime it is, either for one not a priest, to usurp the priesthood, or for a priest to presume to exercise its functions, in opposition to the authority whence his priesthood was first derived. The sacred writers seem at a loss for language sufficiently strong to depict the enormity of a sacrilege, which, according to the prophet Samuel, converts sacrifice, the noblest and most expressive act of religion, into an abomination like that of witchcraft and idolatry, and the Saviour in his conversation with the Samaritan woman, declaring, that "Salvation was of the Jews," clearly intimated, that salvation was not of the Samaritans, who adhered to a schismatical worship and priesthood, whilst, on the contrary, the lawful worship and priesthood being retained by the Jews, ensured to them salvation, if they made a due use of these great blessings. You must bear in mind that neither the Samaritan woman to whom the Saviour addressed the important words just referred to, nor her fellow citizens of Samaria, at that time, had contributed in any way to the introduction of that religious revolt, which the Saviour censured; centuries had then elapsed, since the schism of Samaria was first introduced, and yet the Saviour does not on that account exempt her or her fellow citizens from the fatal consequences of that separation, but, on the contrary, he makes use of such language as clearly conveyed, that if they adhered to the religious rebellion introduced by their forefathers, they must expect to share in the same condemnation.

"The justness of these reflections will be best illustrated by referring to those parts of the Sacred volume, in which we find mention made of the chief events which attended upon the introduction, first, of the Jewish and afterwards of the Christian dispensation. On both these most important occasions, we shall find, that, before Moses or the Saviour entered on their ministry, they proved, in the most unquestionable manner, the truth of their Divine Mission. They saw, that without proceeding thus, they would not be entitled to be received as the Legates of Heaven; that it would be throwing open the door to the wildest presumption, fanaticism and imposture, if, without such a guarantee, and in virtue only of their own naked assertion, they were to be acknowledged as the ministers of the Most High. When, therefore, God spoke to Moses from the burning bush and revealed, that he had chosen that great man to deliver his people from Egypt, and conduct them to the promised land, Moses asked the Lord, what he should answer, if the people, to ascertain the truth of his Mission, should inquire of him the name of him who sent him? Three miracles were then performed to enable Moses to prove his Mission. It was only when thus furnished with undoubted proofs of his Mission, that Moses asked the gift of eloquence from God, in order that he might be qualified to make known to the people the orders of the Almighty, thus intimating, that until furnished with the proofs of his Mission, he ought not to presume to address the people. The Mission of John the Baptist was authenticated by the miracles attendant on his birth and by his miraculous life, to which even the Jews bore testimony. The Mission of the Apostles was proved by their countless miracles, and the Saviour himself says, that if his Mission were not proved by miracles, such as no other had wrought, the Jews would not have sinned in rejecting him.

"In these ways did God authenticate the Mission of those personages whom he sent in an extraordinary way, to announce his holy will to men, and thus did he render the obedience given to his messengers reasonable. You will also perceive that, with equal Providence, the Almighty arranged, that the authority and Mission thus once imparted after an extraordinary manner, should be transmitted through a fixed visible external ordinary medium, and in such a way as would point out satisfactorily to every one solicitous to know the truth, those who were the lawful inheritors of these great prerogatives, and distinguish them from others, who usurped the honor of the priesthood. Thus, when God selected Moses in an extraordinary manner for his ministry and numbered him among his Priests, for the Psalmist declares that Moses and Aaron are counted amongst his Priests, he provided for the transmission of the priestly office in these words, addressed to Moses: "Speak to Aaron and put my words in his mouth, and I will be in thy mouth and in his mouth;" and again the Lord spoke thus to Moses, "Take unto thee also Aaron, thy brother, with his sons from among the children of Israel, that they may minister to me in the priest's office." Thus by an external visible ordinance and appointment was the priesthood transmitted first to Aaron, whom Moses consecrated and anointed, and provision also made, after a similar manner, for its perpetuation in the sons of Aaron. You know that this order was preserved inviolate to the time of Christ, and that the least infraction of it was punished by God with the greatest severity. The Saviour acknowledged its existence and the respect due to it, whilst it existed, in these memorable words: "The Scribes and Pharisees sit in the chair of Moses, &c. &c." This reverence enjoined by the Saviour ceased to be obligatory only when that priesthood completed the term fixed for its duration by Moses in Deuteronomy, chap. 18., when, referring to the future Messias, he instructed the Jews, that, on the coming of the Messias, they were to hear him. "The Lord thy God," said Moses, "will raise up to thee a Prophet of thy nation and of thy brethren like to me, him thou shalt hear." Christ was that Prophet whom the Founder of the Mosaic Priesthood ordered to be heard, and in whose presence, therefore, the authority of that priesthood was silenced, because it had reached its appointed term and consummation.

"In the new dispensation, we shall find an order and economy observed quite similar to that which prefigured it in the old Law. Jesus Christ, as we have seen, when announcing his divine Mission, and, in consequence, the abrogation of the Mosaic worship, proves, that he was sent by signs and wonders, which none but one sent of God could perform. He then chooses his Apostles, and imparts to them, in a visible external manner, authority to undertake their Mission, "As the living Father hath sent me, so I send you." The very name Apostles, by which he wished them to be designated, signifies, as you know, persons sent. The Mission he thus gives to them, he empowers them to transmit, in a similar way, through a medium external and visible, such as that through which they had been themselves constituted ministers of the Gospel, when he thus addressed them, "Go teach all nations, &c. &c. and behold I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world." The Apostles, as individuals, were to live only the ordinary term of human life. In their ministerial or apostolic office they were to be immortal, because the Mission they first received was to be imparted by them to a never failing succession of Pastors, who, in virtue of this lawfully derived inheritance, would be the representatives of the Apostolic College, and invested with the like prerogatives. That the Apostles understood the Saviour thus, is evident from the proceedings they adopted, to elect a successor to Judas, as well as from those resorted to, for the ordination of Saul and Barnabas. It was in virtue of the authority and Mission thus received, that St. Paul, by the external rite of the imposition of hands, ordained Titus and sent him to govern the Church of Crete, with instructions to set in order the things that were wanting, and ordain Priests in every city. In like manner in his instructions to Timothy, St. Paul, alluding to the sacred rite by which the Apostolic Ministry was to be perpetuated, warns him to impose hands lightly upon no man, and tells him to commend the truths which Paul had taught him, to faithful men, who shall be fit to teach others also.

"In this short outline we find most satisfactorily delineated the mode, the medium, the order, the rule, by which the Apostolic authority and Mission were to be handed down to the end of time, and the avenue effectually closed against the intrusion of fanatics, impostors, or usurpers into the true sanctuary. As in the Aaronic priesthood, legitimate descent in the tribe of Aaron was necessary for him who claimed the priesthood, so also in the priesthood of Melchisedech, its powers and Mission were to be transmitted only through an unbroken lawful succession, handed down from age to age, from generation to generation, by the sacred rite of the imposition of hands. The words of Christ promising to abide with his Apostles to the end of time, guarantee the existence of the Apostolic College until the consummation of ages. His promise, that the gates of hell shall not prevail against his Church, bids us be without fear of its corruption or decay. The very end for which the Pastoral and Apostolic office was ordained, was, St. Paul declares, for the perfecting of the Saints, until we all meet in the unity of faith and of the knowledge of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the age of the fulness of Christ; that henceforth we be no more children tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the wickedness of men, by cunning craftiness, by which they lie in wait to deceive. These, then, were the great ends, to attain which the Apostolic Ministry was ordained, and to be adequate for the attaining of those ends, that ministry must endure until the benefits above enumerated be secured. That can happen only when time shall be consummated. The Apostolic Ministry must therefore endure so long, without interruption or defect. For shall it be said, that the words pronounced at creation by God, and in virtue of which the material world has been preserved and renovated for six thousand years, are as efficacious now for the purpose for which they were uttered, as at the first moment of creation, and that the promises of the same Deity for the unfailling endurance of his Church and priesthood, institutions ordained not to supply our animal wants or for a material end, but in order to the perfecting of the Saints and to the preventing us from being carried to and fro by every wind of doctrine: shall it, I repeat it, be said, that the laws for the preservation of the material and less noble part of creation, shall continue in vigor to the end of time, and that those glorious assurances made by Christ to his Church shall grow old and effete with the lapse of ages. Away with so unworthy an hypothesis, one which can find an asylum only in the bosom of him who would measure the grandeur of Religion and of the Church, its guardian, by the petty standard of sectarianism, of him who would exhibit Religion, not as one and undivided, seamless, like the garment of the Saviour, but as a paltry patchwork made up of the collected shreds and rags, gathered together from the heresies and schisms of every age and country.

"The Apostolic Ministry must then be transmitted, through a fixed, external, visible, ordinary medium, from hand to hand, until the consummation of ages, and in such a way, that at the end of time, the Chief Pastors of the Church shall, in virtue of that glorious inheritance, rely as securely on the promise of Christ to abide with them, as did the Apostles themselves, when that promise was first given. Hence, on the other hand, in whatsoever sect or Church a disruption or separation from that Ministry has taken place, they who usurp the sacred ministry, are, in the language of Scripture, "Wolves in Sheep's clothing." "Thieves who have got into the sheepfold, not by the door, but by some irregular, unlawful entrance, Hirelings, who are solicitous only for the wages of a mercenary, and who, being devoid of all affection for the flock, flee at the time of danger and provide for their own safety." Apply these principles, and try by this standard any or all of those sects or churches which, by a strange abuse of language, are styled reformed. Whence was their Ordination and Mission derived? It could not have been extraordinary, because the Scriptures clearly show, that the ordinary Ministry established by Christ was to endure until the consummation of ages. Besides, such an extraordinary Mission should be authenticated by miracles like that of Moses, of John the Baptist, of Christ and of the Apostles, otherwise, if without such an authentication, the established pastoral authority could have been set aside, it would have been in the power of any fanatic or impostor to pretend to an extraordinary commission from God, to reform the Church according to his caprice or artifice, and treat with contempt and disregard the pastors who had been hitherto regarded with reverence. Now, the so-called reformers have no miracles to produce in support of their Mission, and are not therefore entitled to be reckoned in the number of Apostolic pastors. Moreover every extraordinary Mission recorded in Scripture, always upheld and never contradicted the ordinary authority. Thus the prophets always upheld the lawful priesthood and worship. The Saviour acted thus also, as we have seen; and assisted at the public worship in the temple of Jerusalem.

"It is not less clear that the Reformers were wholly destitute of that authority which an ordinary Mission confers. Before their revolt they all belonged to the Catholic Church, in which they had been baptized, and to which they had solemnly promised obedience. It is obviously absurd to suppose, that that Church conferred on them a Mission to contradict the doctrine, which she taught throughout the world and to violate towards her all the vows of obedience they had taken in her sanctuary. Besides, in the principles of the Reformers, she was an idolatrous false Church, and if so, she was no more competent to impart the prerogatives of an Apostolic Mission, than would be the chiefs of the worshippers of Juggernaut; on the other hand, if the Church, from which the first Reformers separated had authority to give a true Mission to the ministers appointed by her, she must have been the true Church, and if such, separation from her communion must have involved the guilt of schism, as the contradiction of her doctrine must have invoked the guilt of heresy.

"Thus, then, under every respect, are the ministers of the reformed Churches destitute of a lawful Mission, and their Churches are therefore so many withered branches, cut off from the Apostolic tree, the only principle and source whence they could derive life and fecundity.

"Contrast with this helpless destitution, the glorious spectacle, which the Catholic Ministry displays with respect to its Ordination and Mission. Contemplate, for illustration sake, the circumstances which authenticate the Apostolic Mission of the distinguished Prelate who has just come amongst us, and see, with what ease and facility he can trace his connection with the Prince of the Apostles, to whom it was given to feed the lambs and the sheep, the people and the pastors of the Christian fold. In a moment, he can lay before you the evidence that he has received the mysterious unction and rite of consecration from Bishops belonging to the ancient and ever faithful Church of Ireland. His venerated Consecrators will attest, that before they admitted him to the Apostolic College, they were careful to ascertain, that his promotion was sanctioned by the successor of St. Peter. Thus, in the nineteenth century, the voice of Peter, speaking through his successor, is first listened to with reverence, before any one is added to the Apostolic College, just as we read that it was, in the acts of the Apostles, when Mathias was chosen to succeed to the traitor Judas. Your future Prelate's venerable Consecrators are themselves the successors of those Apostolic pastors, who in Ireland, for three centuries bore triumphantly through a sea of blood, the Ark of Catholicity, and endured, like the first Heralds of the Gospel, hunger and thirst, and stripes and mockery, rather than swerve from the obedience and communion of the See of Peter. This was the lesson which their sainted predecessors handed down to them from the first foundation of their Church by St. Patrick, whom, in the early part of the fifth century, Pope St. Celestine sent to preach the Gospel to the Irish people. Among the Canons which ancient usage has designated as those of Patrick, one expressly ordains, that, for the decision of all difficult questions, recourse should be had to the Apostolic See. In the seventh century St. Columbanus, in a letter to the Pope, gives the following glorious testimony of the Irish Church. "Among the Irish," says the saint, "there is no Jew, no heretic, no schismatic; but the Catholic faith, such as it was delivered by the predecessors of your holiness, continues unshaken among them." "For we are bound to the chair of Peter: it is that chair, which renders Rome, otherwise indeed great, eminent and illustrious with us. By the Apostles Peter and Paul, you are become almost celestial, and Rome is the head of the Universe and of all Churches." When by the zeal and learning of the Irish priesthood, the Danes who settled in Ireland became converts to the Gospel, those among the converts who were deemed qualified for the Episcopacy received consecration at the hands of Lanfranc and Anselm, Archbishops of Canterbury and the Pupal legates in England. Such is the illustrious Hierarchy through whose sacred ministry, the excellent Prelate now before you has been introduced into the Apostolic College.

"Look now around your sanctuary and behold the first fruits of the benediction imparted to him by this connection with the chair of Peter. You behold on one side the Holy Priests and the pious Candidates for the priesthood, who rejoice to take the Lord for their inheritance, persuaded, with the Psalmist, that one day in the house of the Lord is better, than a thousand years in the tabernacles of sinners.

"You behold, on the other side, those sacred Virgins, who, mindful that the figure of this world passeth away, eager to be holy, both in body in mind, and to serve the Lord with an undivided heart, have devoted themselves to religious retirement, and have consecrated all their gifts and talents to the thrice holy avocation of bringing up the little ones of Jesus Christ in the fear and love of their creator.

"Such are the great blessings prepared for you at the very opening of the Apostolic Mission of the Prelate, who is to be one day charged with the care of your immortal souls. Of this awful commission the Apostle Paul declares that each Bishop shall have to render an account. Be it your care, that your Bishop may do this "with joy and not with grief. For this is not expedient for you."

The address was listened to with intense interest by the assembled thousands, and so soon as his Grace had concluded, the Te Deum was chaunted in thanksgiving for the safe arrival of our future chief Pastor and his holy band of followers.

We may add that the interesting and animating scene of Bishop Olliffe's landing was considerably heightened by the presence of his venerable Mother, his Sister and Brother, 3 Priests, 5 Chaired Nuns, 4 Lay Sisters, 11 Ecclesiastical Students, 2 Lay Brothers, (tradesmen,) who accompanied him.

NOTICE.

The Right Rev. Bishop Olliffe will celebrate a Solemn Pontifical High Mass on to-morrow (Sunday) at the Cathedral at 7½ o'clock A. M. In virtue of a privilege granted for the occasion by His Holiness the Pope, all who devoutly confess and receive on to-morrow, assist also at the Pontifical Mass and offer up their prayers, in union with his Holiness's intention, will receive a plenary indulgence.—Calcutta, Aug. 7.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

DEAR SIR,—If you be ever at a loss to fill up a corner in your useful paper, the following anecdotes will assist you. They are excerpts from my note book, (rather a curious miscellany you will say in its way) and are strictly true, though propriety of course forbids the publication of names.

Yours faithfully,
VNVS.

PROTESTANT CONFESSORS.

It is an old adage that "coming events cast their shadows before them;" and so it happened that ere Dr. Pusey's discourses and the "Tracts for the Times" had increased the already lengthy catalogue of religious Isms, an occasional Parson was to be met with bold enough to combat the doctrinal indifference of the day by varying the usual hum-drum moral sermons of the Establishment by a passing remark on original sin, the necessity of Baptism, &c., and even hinting at the comfort and efficacy of auricular confession. It is of one of these worthy "Precursors" that I give you the following narrative. The fact occurred at M—, in the Upper Provinces, in 1832.

The Rev. Mr. W— was on his way to the Regimental Hospital to discharge a sick call, and, in passing, left his lady to pay a visit at my house. In the course of conversation the subject turned upon the birds of the Himalaya Mountains, and Mrs. W. was descanting on the beauties of a splendid golden eagle, she had once entrusted to a soldier to stuff, and who had dishonestly sold it to, purchase liquor, when her husband returned and taking up the thread of the story he said, in a most solemn manner, "Yes, my dear, and that poor man is now dying, and I have just been receiving his confession, and—" he was proceeding, when his impatient spouse eagerly exclaimed, "He did not say a word about the eagle, my love, did he?" The Rev. husband saw the broad grin upon our faces, which it was impossible to restrain, and chidingly replied "No, my dear, how could you suppose the poor man would think of such a trifle at such a moment?" But the wife did not seem to consider it such a trifle, neither indeed did I, and I began to think what delightful confessors these easy-going Parsons would make, were it not for their fair confidants to detail ones "trifles" to all the Parish!

"SAUCE FOR THE GOOSE IS SAUCE FOR THE GANDER."

There once lived together two brothers, whose principal pursuit was studying the native languages, and the elder of whom used to exercise his colloquial powers, and indulge his Protestant propensity to controversy at the same time, by cajoling his Pundit, nolens volens, in arguments of Faith. It needed but a glance at the Pundit's asinine physiognomy to see that his own holy Gunga was more in danger of ignition from his zeal than his understanding; nevertheless he had the actuteness, when foiled in argument, to take his stand upon the infallibility of the Shastras, and settle the point in his own estimation by exclaiming "lekin humaree kitab men isa likha hy," or, "isa nuhin likha hy," as the case happened to require. The brothers were at this time young, and, like most of their age, had not troubled themselves to examine the foundation of their own Faith, but had taken for Gospel the opinions their parents had taught them. The younger heartily joined in his brother's triumph over his ill-matched opponent, who was ever unable to answer (indeed in the depth of his credulity he was quite unmoved by them) the questions "But how do you know these books are true? and that you understand them aright?" yet always recurred in after disputes to the same position "humaree kitab men isa likha hy." The brothers, convictions have since changed, the elder having attached himself to the modern "Saints," whilst the younger has bowed to the olden Faith, and many a contention have they had in consequence, in all of which the former has been constrained to enact the part of the vanquished Pundit, for, after vainly urging the point by the aid of reason only the end has always been "it is so in the Bible,"—"humaree kitab men isa likha hy," or the contrary, as he happened to be supporting his own opinions or attacking his brother's Faith, and when pressed with his own former questions to the discomfited follower of the Shastras, instead of attempting a proof (which he knew had been tried in vain on Protestant principles,) he seemed scandalized at his brother's profanity, and expressed his conviction (as no doubt would the Pundit have done of him but for his better manners!) that the Devil possessed him. Could their friend the Pundit have witnessed one of these discussions, how would he have wondered at the brother's contention and at his quondam opponent adopting in defence the very principle he had formerly derided as (what it really was) a "petito principii!"

RELIGIOUS FANATICISM A BAR TO ALL IMPROVEMENT.

At the taking of Alexandria in the middle of the 7th century, by "Amrose" General of the Caliph "Omar," a famous philosopher of the city, called John the Grammarian, interceded for that part of the celebrated Library that had escaped the flames in the wars of Julius Cæsar when 400,000 volumes had been destroyed. Amrose would have readily granted the favor, but dared not without consulting the Caliph. "If," replied that unlettered fanatic, "those books contain nothing but what is in the Koran they are useless, if they contain what is not there, they are dangerous: they must be destroyed." Upon this reply, the whole of this magnificent collection of 300,000 volumes, consisting of the best works on the arts and sciences, philosophy, and history that the genius and learning of man had till then produced, were doomed without distinction to the flames: and they served to heat the ovens and public baths for six months.*

However much we must for ever lament such irreparable mischief, we can in some measure excuse the conduct in the ignorant bigoted Mussulman conqueror of the seventh century; but what are we to think of the following somewhat parallel instance of Christian fanaticism of the 19th century, which boasts of its enlightenment and civilization? It occurred in the year 183—and not 100 miles from the Protestant Episcopal Palace of Calcutta. Mr. M. was the principal Civil Functionary at B—, a well educated, talented, amiable person, and attached to the sect of Irvingites, who were then rather fashionable. So zealous an advocate was he of that Apostle of unknown tongues that it was asserted he supported his widow. Be this as it may, he turned the Circuit House into a Chapel, furnished it with seats, &c., and preached to a goodly congregation. Among other things he taught that all pictures are abominable, and that no book should be tolerated but the Bible, which he said contains all that is needful for man, and that aught else is hurtful. This, reading "Bible" for "Koran," is precisely the decision of the Caliph Omar above quoted, and led to the same result. Mr. M. true to his principle, caused the entire of his extensive library, valued I was told at Rs. 20,000, to be heaped together and burnt, observing to those who suggested to him to sell or give them away, that it would ill become him to disseminate what he believed and taught to be dangerous to men's souls. Whether any of his Disciples followed this example of self-denial I never heard, but I know that some would read no book but the Bible—and the Regulations!

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

THROUGH THE ARCHBISHOP.

Anonymous,.....	Rs. 16	0
Sergt. Cooney, Dum-Dum,.....	10	0
J. G....	2	0

THROUGH MR. N. O'BRIEN.

J. L.....	3	0
S. L.....	2	0
C. T.....	2	0
Wm. Henry.....	2	0
G. Moore.....	2	0
R. W. Stanford,...	2	0
A. S.....	1	0
J. N.....	1	0
J. L.....	2	0
J. R. C.....	4	0
G. G.	1	0
F. D.....	1	0

At the High Mass on Sunday a collection will be made for the Bengal Catholic Orphanage.

* Geramb's Pilgrimage to Palestine.

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

Mr. Piaggio and Associates..... 5 0

FOR THE NATIVE MISSION.

Mrs. Crow, through the Right Rev. Dr.
Olliffe, 5 0

Selections.

SCOTLAND.

TO THE LORD PROVOST, MAGISTRATES, AND COUN-CIL OF THE CITY OF EDINBURGH.

My Lord Provost and Gentlemen—In the Scotsman newspaper, of the 29th of May last, I find the following memorial addressed by you in your official capacity to Lord Aberdeen, as Secretary for Foreign Affairs, to Lord Howard de Walden, our Ambassador in Portugal, &c. :—

“The memorial of the Lord Provost, Magistrates, and Council of the City of Edinburgh, “Humbly Showeth—That your memorialists have heard, with the utmost surprise and horror, that a Portuguese woman, named Maria Joaquina, has been condemned to suffer death, solely on account of having embraced the doctrines of the Protestant faith, nothing else having been brought against her than her denial of worship to images, and of the doctrines of transubstantiation.

“That viewing with the utmost abhorrence and alarm this recurrence to the practice of the dark ages of propagating religious belief by persecution unto death—a practice which was believed to have been entirely abandoned on all hands—your memorialists cannot but express, in the strongest manner, the feelings they entertain regarding this most atrocious proceeding, as an interference with the sacred rights of conscience, and a most alarming encroachment on the rights of mankind.

“That, holding such sentiments, they would most effectually urge on her Majesty's Government the propriety of using such influence as they may be able to exert to procure a reversal of this sentence, and your memorialists shall, &c.”

My Lord this is a precious document, and on it I hope you will allow me to offer a few remarks.

First of all, I beg leave to pay a well-merited compliment to your benevolence and humanity. Ah! how promptly you come to the rescue of poor Maria? You heard merely that she was condemned to death, and suffering your zeal to carry you beyond the limits of prudence, without having ascertained the real facts of the case you forthwith addressed a memorial, strongly worded, in her favour to our humane and liberal Government. I assure you, gentlemen, the celebrity of your motions on this occasion may well contrast with the sluggishness of our predecessors in office; who, to the great merriment of your entire city, suffered Queen Victoria to enter Edinburgh one fine morning ere they had cast off their nightcaps.

You heard, my lord, that a Portuguese woman was condemned to death “solely for having embraced the doctrines of the Protestant faith.”

Did you hear, at the same time, which Protestant faith she embraced? You are aware we have many Protestant faiths—a whole legion of them. We have scores of Protestant faiths south of the Tweed, and scores again north of that river; and as for Protestant doctrines, why they baffle calculation. Pray, did Maria, the Portuguese, embrace them all, even those that mutually contradict one another? Ah! tell us, my lord, which and how many of all the Protestant creeds and doctrines have been honoured by the martyr's choice.

Your memorial affirms that nothing else was brought against Maria Joaquina than her denial of worship to images, and of the doctrines of transubstantiation; and Mr. Macfarlan, on whose motion the memorial was transmitted to Government, informs us further, that she was sentenced to death “for denying the worship of the Virgin.”

To me, who am a Catholic, and; I am sure, to every Catholic in every corner of the world, these assertions present a lamentable specimen of magisterial wisdom and understanding. What! my good Lord Provost, do you and your brother officials of the Town Council of Edinburgh really imagine that Catholics worship images; that they worship the Virgin? True, we believe in the doctrines of transubstantiation; your forefathers, for one thousand years and more, believed in it; nine-tenths of Christendom still believe it; magistrates as enlightened, councillors as wise as those of even modern Athens, believed it; and gloried, as we do, in this belief. Nay, if you, my lord, believe in the creed of your own country, or in the creed of England, you believe in things more incredible than the Catholic doctrine of transubstantiation. But while we are not ashamed to admit what we really do believe, we will not suffer even the Lord Provost and Town Council of Edinburgh to pass off their fancies for articles of our faith. We do not, then, worship images: we do not worship the Virgin, more than your lordship does. I will even venture to say, that no one was ever put to death in any part of the Catholic world “solely for denying the worship of images, or of the Virgin.” If the Lord Provost and magistrates of Edinburgh would only deign to learn the very first elements of Church history, they would, doubtless, come to the same conclusion. Until of late, methought the idea that Catholics were idolaters was confined to the most ignorant of the populace, to fanatical preachers, to Exeter-Hall orators. Alas! alas! how grieved am I to find that it is still cherished by the Lord Provost and magistrates of modern Athens!

The document I am commenting on states that you, my lord and gentlemen, view with the utmost horror and alarm, “this recurrence to the practice of the dark ages, of propagating religious belief by persecution unto death.” These feelings of horror and alarm you so forcibly express, are natural to good, kind, Christian hearts, and are peculiarly becoming the dignity of magistrates; they will be understood and appreciated by the public; but, I regret to say, you have been unfortunate in alluding to what you are pleased to call the practice of the dark ages—the propagating religious belief by persecution unto death.

By the dark ages we generally understand that time which elapsed from the fall of the Roman Empire to the revival of learning, in the 14th, 15th, and following centuries. Now during that time the Catholic Church was zealous and successful in propagating religious belief; during that time her missionaries converted to Christianity the nations of Northern Europe, and our own Caledonian forefathers among the rest; during that time many of these zealous missionaries died for the faith they taught; but I have never yet read in any history that they propagated their belief by "persecution unto death." They were often slain themselves, they never slew any one. What, then, can your lordship mean by saying that it was the practice of the dark ages to propagate religious belief by persecution?

But, perhaps, in speaking of the dark ages, your lordship alludes more particularly to the age in which the Reformation took place—an age in which many a hapless religionist was, indeed, persecuted unto death. I quite agree with your lordship in thinking, that, in spite of the full blaze of the Reformation light, the sixteenth century was, in many respects, an age of darkness. In it many nations of Europe were led astray by hypocrites and fanatics; in it they were taught to reject "the faith once delivered to the Saints," and go in search of a new and better creed, which, as would appear from their incessant changing and shifting, they have not yet discovered; in it, preaching new doctrines and persecuting the old, was the order of the day. Now, if religious persecution be characteristic of a dark age, let me ask what age has a better claim to the epithet of "dark" than that in which your Protestant forefathers were so fond of persecution, that they not only persecuted the Catholics, against whom they had a natural grudge, but they cruelly persecuted one another; so much so, that the Kirk of Scotland owes nearly all her martyrs to her Protestant sister kirk of England.

Under these circumstances, and with these facts before your eyes, it was both unjust and ungenerous in you, my lord, and your brother memorialists, to load the middle ages with the crimes of more modern days—crimes to which they were utter strangers. You cannot but know that religious persecution began in good earnest among Christians only with the Reformation; and the Reformers, John Knox among the rest, were to a man violent persecutors.

In speaking of persecution for conscience sake, your memorial says that such a "practice was believed to have been entirely abandoned on all hands." Indeed, my lord! And are you and the town council of Edinburgh so little acquainted with the religious state of Europe, as to assert that even within the last half-century there has been no persecution for conscience sake? Did you never hear of the late King of Prussia persecuting, first his Protestant, and then his Catholic subjects, compelling the former to adopt a new creed, framed by himself, and the latter to administer certain sacraments when and as he pleased? Have you never heard of the venerable Archbishops of Cologne and Posen, who endured so much for the Catholic faith at the hand of the same monarch? Are you not aware that the Emperor of Prussia has long persecuted, and is still persecuting, millions and millions of his Catholic subjects, and that he has now turned his fury against the Jews? Have you not heard that the Danish Government recently expelled two Methodist preachers, one of whom is a British subject; and that Sweden, if I mistake not, only a few weeks ago, sent into exile a distinguished artist merely for having become a Catholic? You, that have heard so much, and endeavoured to make others hear, of the sufferings of Maria Joaquina, have you not heard that Nicholas of Russia recently disgraced the person and confiscated the property of one of his Ministers at the Court of Rome solely for having embraced Catholicism? And that, more recently still, Ernest of Hanover recalled his ambassador at Berlin for being guilty of the same enormous crime? Nay, my lord, did not your lordship's friends complain, some year or two ago, that some of the "unco righteous" men of our land drew the sword of persecution against yourself, and thereby prevented your sitting at an earlier period than you did in the civic chair of Edinburgh? And even now, are not you and your confreres inflicting the worst kind of persecution on your Catholic brethren when you affect to believe and basely insinuate (as your memorial does insinuate) that they are worshippers of images and of the Virgin? No, indeed, my lord, you will not suffer us Catholics to believe as you do, that the days of persecution are gone by. Would to heaven they were!

Your memorial concludes by an affecting appeal to Government in favor of the rights of conscience and of the rights of mankind. This is as it should be, and does it much credit, my lord. But, it may be asked, why, with so much zeal for the inviolability of the rights of conscience, and of the rights of mankind, you have remained silent so long? Have these sacred rights been outraged no where but in the small and distant island of Madeira? What! a single solitary damsel, dying there for the faith, has been suffered to monopolise all your sympathies, and you have not a word to say, nor a tear to shed, for the persecuted millions in Russia, Prussia, Denmark, Sweden, and the Levant! Ah! there is something magnanimous in your devotion to the sex; and were the great Burke to read your pithy memorial, he would shed tears of joy, and declare that the "AGE OF CHIVALRY" is not wholly gone. A remnant of it is yet to be found in our ancient Caledonia; and if by any means it can be turned against Catholicism, it has every chance of long enjoying the high patronage of a certain Lord Provost, Magistrates, and town-Council of Edinburgh.

Happy Maria Joaquina, your fate is truly enviable. Others, as innocent as you, are allowed to perish in thousands, unnoticed and unknown! Not a voice is raised in their favour; not a step is taken to relieve the dying, or to honour the dead. With you the case is otherwise. You will not be permitted to die, if the influence of pitying Britons can aught avail. If, however, the doom that threatens you may not be averted —if you do succumb, it must be consoling for you to think that you will doubtless receive the praise due to a martyr from the lips of a man high in dignity, and who at one time was all but a martyr himself. I am, my Lord Provost and gentlemen of the Town Council of Edinburgh, your very obedient servant,

F. S. X.
Tablet, June 8, 1844.

THE LIFE OF NANO NAGLE,

Foundress of the Presentation Order.

CONCLUDED FROM PAGE 124.

For seventy years this beneficial agency* has been in active and useful operation.

The merit of instructing the poor is largely shared by the Ursulines,* for each convent has attached to it a school for the education of poor girls; but the object more immediately contemplated by them is the education of the wealthier classes. At the present day, when we have so many efficient establishments, both secular and religious, for this purpose, we may be induced to undervalue its importance, but if we carry back our thoughts to the middle of the last century, and consider the deplorable condition of the Catholics of that time, we shall form a more fit and adequate estimate of their value. At that time there were but few, if any, educational establishments in the country. Those who sought the precious boon of knowledge, had to run many a risk and brave many a danger, before it could be secured. It must have been a hard trial for a father's and mother's heart to sever the fond ties that bound them to their child, to send them across the expanse of more than one sea, and at a time when a voyage to France or Belgium was very different from what it is in our time; to be separated from them for many a long year, it might be for ever; to entrust them to strangers, where they could but rarely hear from, where, if sickness came upon them, there was no mother's hand to relieve; when, if even death came upon them, as it must have often done, they would be consigned to earth before their very illness was known, and while yet the fond and trusting parent was looking forward with hope to the return of his accomplished child. Even to those who could afford it, it was a painful duty to send their children abroad for education. What must have been the state of those whose means of position in society did not enable them to do so, and who had no alternative but ignorance or apostacy for their children?

We think that female education can be best effected by means of a religious community. That education does not consist in the cultivation of the mental faculties alone, nor in the possession of one or two accomplishments, however brilliant in themselves, or laboriously acquired; but it consists in the combined and judicious training of both mind and heart, both of the intellect and the affections. Woman must be taught to know her duties and to love them; she must make these duties pleasing to herself, and useful and agreeable to all around her. Her kingdom is by her own fireside; her empire is over the heart. It is not solely by the brilliancy of her attainments, that she can best secure that empire, for the qualities that dazzle are not always the most likely to fascinate. She must be formed to habits of order and punctuality in her ordinary every-day duties of charity, and kindly feeling in her intercourse with society, of profitable employment of time in her own house, and of practical observance in all her domestic relations, and at all times. She must invest home with a charm strong enough to draw the partner of her affections from the haunts of dissipation. Her heart must ever beat with joy, and her eye brighten with pleasure, when he returns each day from his professional labours or duty. Should adversity darken his worldly prospects, there should be one heart to feel his misfortunes as her own; or should dishonour surround his name, she must love and cherish him still, for in weal or in woe her plighted faith till death is his. We know not whether these great fruits of female education have been even more abundantly produced than by those Catholic religious establishments which have been founded for the purpose. Among these the Ursuline Order is eminent in utility as it was the first in time. We need only allude to the very convent which is the parent house in these countries—the Ursuline Convent, at Blackrock.

This community, from the time of its foundation by Miss Nagle, continued in the south suburbs of the city of Cork, and in the very house which received them on their arrival. But, in consequence of increasing numbers, both of religious and pupils, enlarged accommodation became absolutely necessary. It was then determined to remove it to its present site at Blackrock, a beautifully situated village on the banks of its noble and picturesque river. Probably many of our readers have had, like ourselves, the pleasure of visiting this magnificent establishment, and seeing the order of its arrangement, the exquisite loveliness of its site, the grand and imposing appearance of the external line of building, and the elegance of its natural decoration. It contains, if we recollect rightly, more than fifty choir religious, and on an average eighty pupils, all taken from the wealthier classes of society. Such is the minute attention paid to their wants, that even the convenience of salt water bathing is provided for them within the convent walls. After being provided with all the useful and ornamental qualities required by their rank and station in society, they are sent forth to edify, instruct, and adorn the spheres in which they move. If no other monument of Miss Nagle's charity existed, this house alone would give her a strong claim on the gratitude of every reflecting mind. It is a singular fact that the very locality in which they reside was part of the property of that uncle of Miss Nagle's, whose means enabled her to carry her good resolutions into effect. Having passed through various hands (being at one time the residence of the unfortunate Henry Sheares, whose connection with the events of 1798, and subsequent melancholy fate are well known,) it came about twenty years since into the hands of its present occupants. On their removal, the house which they had previously occupied was given over to the Presentation nuns. Thus, after the lapse of many years, and many changes of fortune and government, was it arranged by Providence, that they should get possession of the very house erected by Miss Nagle for the accomplishment of her benevolent designs.

* The Convents of the Ursulines in Ireland are Cork, Waterford, Thurles, and Galway; each of which has a poor school attached to it.

Having trespassed thus far on the patience of our readers, we shall only say, in mitigation of their impatience or displeasure, that we know no higher or holier duty of a Christian journal, than to rescue the memory of the great and good from forgetfulness, to bring the light of their virtues and their works from the obscurity in which their own humility would conceal them, and place that light so that it may shine on every member of the human household; a beacon, a guide, and an incentive to noble deeds to all. We deem this duty the more urgent upon the present occasion, for the subject of our notice was scarce known but in connection with the Presentation Order. The memory of her personal worth and virtue was fast merging into forgetfulness. To have rescued that memory from oblivion and done her even this late and imperfect act of justice, we deem an honour to ourselves.

CHAPTER OF DEATH

(Continued from page 34.)

William Pitt's last words were addressed to the Bishop of Lincoln, in reply to the latter's religious exhortations. "I fear," he said, "that like many others, I have been too neglectful of prayer, for it to avail me much on my death-bed, but I recommend myself to the mercy of God!"

Nelson, who, in the arms of victory, encountered the grasp of death, preserved to the latest period of his ebbing life, the same ardent and unwearied zeal for his country's glory that, throughout his career, had characterized his unmatched achievements. Repeatedly, and with fretful impatience, during the slow progress of his mortal agony, he demanded of his attendants "whether the French admiral had struck his flag?" nor seemed to bestow upon his own hopeless condition a moment's consideration, until the glad tidings of triumph had been made known to him. The last words of the hero were, "Anchor, Hardy, anchor!" the very command which most precisely suited the circumstances of the moment, a proof of the tenacity with which, on the very brink of the grave, his unconquered and mighty spirit embraced all the duties of his position.

Desaix, when he fell mortally wounded at the battle of Marengo, exclaimed; "Allez, dire au Premier Consul que je meure avec le regret de n'avoir pas assez fait pour vivre dans la postérité." "Go, tell the First Consul that I die with the regret of not having yet achieved enough to entitle me to live in the estimation of posterity."

The brave and gallant Duc d'Enghien, ignominiously massacred in the ditch of Vincennes, was summoned in the middle of the night to meet his fate. Upon observing the preparations for his execution, he exclaimed, "Ah! grâce au ciel! je mourrai de la mort d'un soldat!" "Heaven be praised! I shall die a soldier's death!" Upon requesting to be allowed the spiritual ministrations of a clergyman, he was greeted with the insulting reply, "Est-ce que tu veux mourir comme un Capucin? Tu demandes un prêtre; bah! ils sont tous couchés à cette heure-ci." "Have you a mind to die like a capuchin? You want a priest! pshaw, they are all in bed at this time!" Without replying to this infamous speech, the unfortunate prince knelt down, prayed fervently for a few moments, and then, rising, exclaimed, "Let us proceed." When they were about to fire on him, he said to the gen d'armes appointed to perform that duty, "Now then, my friends!" to which an insolent and ferocious voice rejoined, "You have no friends here!" He who uttered this brutal gibe was Murat, who, when meeting, many years later, with a precisely similar fate, may have remembered, with some feeling of compunctions visiting, having been present at the murder of the Duc d'Enghien. "Epargnez la tête, visez au cœur!" "Spare my head, aim at my heart!" was the ex-king of Naples's own dying request.

When Marshal Ney was awakened on the morning of his death, by an officer who proceeded to read his death-warrant, in which were enumerated all his titles, he remarked, "Que ne dites vous simplement Michel Ney, aujourd'hui soldat Français, et bientôt un peu de poussière."

Why not rather simply say Michael Ney, now a French soldier, and soon but a heap of dust." Having performed all his religious duties, and taken an affecting leave of his family, he exclaimed, just before the moment of his execution, "Je déclare en face de Dieu et des hommes, que je n'ai jamais été traître à ma patrie, puisse ma mort la rendre heureuse! Vive la France!" "I declare, in the presence of God and man, that I have never been a traitor to my country. May my death render her happy! Long live France!" Refusing to have his eyes bandaged, he bared his breast, gave the word to fire, and fell.

The last words of Napoleon, after a formal, and it is to be hoped devout compliance with all the rites of the Catholic Church, were—"Tête d'armée," proving that the flitting spirit of the warrior was still hovering amidst the scenes of his ancient glory.

A BISHOP'S ZEAL AND A CHAPTER'S PRACTICE.

(From the Examiner, June 22.)

The sudden exertions of the Bishop of Exeter to suppress brothels and the trade in prostitution are probably referable to the case of the Rev. Mr Marsh, the reasoning in the Prelate's mind being this, that the only sure way of guarding against such scandals was to abolish the opportunity for them altogether. Recourse to Jesus had to the Legislature to compass what the virtue and discipline of the Church were insufficient to effect. The pending measure is, then, a bill to cut off the Rev. Herbert Marsh's supplies. The Reverend gentleman's Bishop could not keep him in order, could not prevent his immoralities, but the Bishop of Exeter steps in and endeavours to provide the only security against the repetition of them on his part, or that of other erring sons of the Church, by sweeping away the haunts of the vice. This is as if Father Mathew were to call for the abolition of all gin-shops and ale-houses, as the only way of guarding against the backsliding of his pledged disciples; but-Father Mathew relies on the force of his moral lessons, and not on reformatory by act of Parliament, or any of those frail securities for virtue which impede the gratification without in any degree correcting the disposition for a vice.

The Bishop of Exeter only meddles with that part of a great evil which, as it has most publicity, is most open to scandal. He will transport for repeated offences in brothel-keeping and procuration, but he does not propose to meddle with the seduction of wives or daughters in other ways, and he gives the most whimsical reason possible for the latter non-interference.

"Seduction could never be proved without the evidence of the unhappy seduced one, and no consideration would induce him to place the unhappy woman in the box to prove her shame and all the arts that had been used against her chastity."

Why, this is done, as every body but the Bishop must know, in every action for seduction, the principal witness being in all such cases the victim, who is brought forward to prove her shame, and to narrate the incedent details of her debauchery.

The Bishop evidently pretends to a much more intimate acquaintance with this subject than he possesses. Indeed, how is it possible that the holy man could know so much about it as would qualify him to provide against all its forms and contrivances in legislation. Authorities connected with the police might have the necessary knowledge for grappling with the evil, but it lies quite out of the sphere of observation of Bishops, and they can have but general and vague ideas of the nuisances to the details of which they are endeavouring to adjust laws. It is their province to exhort to virtue, to dissuade from sin, and not to call in the Legislature to attempt to do by law what they have failed to bring about by the lessons of religion and morality.

There seems to us small respect to the heads of the Church in referring a Brothels Bill to a select committee in great part composed of Bishops. What a subject for the inquiries and contemplation of these holy men!

And what was the conduct of the Church up to a very recent time as to the great evil in question? Lord Fitzhardinge, who seconded the Bishop's Bill, has opportunely drawn attention to this point.—

"He begged to ask whether the right rev. prelate had ascertained one point which had been publicly stated, and no answer had been given to that statement; and he [Earl Fitzhardinge] presumed that it was impossible to give a contradiction to the statement, otherwise the body to which he referred would not have contentedly borne the imputation. Little more than two years ago it had been publicly stated that the notorious brothels, the property of the dean and Chapter of Westminster, were most numerous just about the Almonry, a place he [Earl Fitzhardinge] did not know [laughter], that there were in the Almoary twenty-four notorious brothels, all the property of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster [loud laughter,] being in the proportion of two brothels to a prebend [much laughter, which continued for some time;] that in the Orchard-street district there were thirty brothels; in Pye-street district, forty brothels; in York-street district, twenty brothels; most of which were the property of the dean and the members of the chapter in their corporate capacity. [Laughter.] Now he thought, that in the fair exercise of the right of property, they might have done something before recourse was had to legislative enactments. [Hear, hear.] He was the more inclined to refer to that statement [which had appeared about December, 1841, in the newspapers,] because the Dean and Chapter had shown very little consistency. He recollected that this very same body, the Dean and Chapter of Westminster, had refused a place in Westminster Abbey, on the score of morality and religion, to the statue of Lord Byron, and he said it was a gross inconsistency to reject the one whilst they were maintaining the other, unless indeed the circumstance was to be taken into consideration [which his lordship supposed could have no weight with the reverend body] that the statue would pay no rent and the brothels did. [Hear, hear.] He feared it might be said that they—

"Compound for sins they are inclined to,
By damning those they have no minds to"

[Laughter]"

To this the Bishop of Gloucester, one of the Chapters, with much soreness, testily replied—

"Two years ago he remembered to have seen, not in a newspaper, but in a handed-bill, assertions going still further than those city by the noble earl in atrocity, calling in question the character of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster because a portion of their property in the Almonry was occupied by houses of ill-fame. He took the very earliest opportunity of mentioning the subject to a learned and venerable person who presided over that body—the late Dean of Westminster, and, in consequence, the subject was brought before the corporate body, and he was told that no step could be taken, because the whole of that property was entirely and completely out of the control of the Dean and Chapter, being held on a lease for 40 years; but as the leases ran out they refused to renew them, and thus abated the nuisance. But they had determined to take a still stronger step, and, out of their own funds to purchase the remainder of the leases. They had done so, and from their own resources they had purchased the remainder of the leases, and the houses had been pulled down and destroyed."

Much is confessed here. No steps were taken to abate the enormous nuisance till the appearance of the hand-bill, on which the Bishop took the first opportunity of mentioning the matter to the Dean of Westminster. But for the hand-bill [the charitable work of Dissenters] the Dean of Westminster would never have been moved to interfere by the Bishop of Gloucester, who would have remained in happy ignorance that the Abbey was the centre of the profligacy of Westminster, and that brothels clustered round it more abundantly than about Covent Garden

Theatre. It was only the publicity of the infamy that brought about the late and imperfect reformation. Before the date of the hand-bill, the Dean and Chapter received their rents without troubling themselves about the source whence they were derived. There was no ill-fame on audit-day in the money. Lucri bonus odor.

Of course we are bound to believe that the Dean and Chapter, till the advent of the hand-bill, knew nothing of the practices under their noses. Possibly they were too virtuous even to comprehend their nature. But how is it that these holy men should have lived in the centre of such a system of profligacy without knowing anything about it, while the Bishop of Exeter, under whose eyes nothing of the kind has ever come, knows so well all about it as to be qualified to legislate for its suppression?

But for that lucky hand-bill, for which the Chapter cannot be too grateful to the Dissenters, though they have never acknowledged the obligation, this very Brothels Bill of Dr. Philpotts would have seemed aimed expressly and mainly against the bad houses the property of the Dean and Chapter of Westminster.

The reformation did not begin till it was compelled by public exposure and public scandals and it only took place just in time to save the Bishop of Exeter from the pain of having to cite the holy precincts of Westminster as the example of rank profligacy most urgently crying for the punishments provided in the pending Bill.

But even after the hand-bill had awakened the slumbering morality of the Chapter, and they had began the work of purification, even, as even, as the Bishop of Gloucester says, at some cost, at some sacrifice of profit, was the reformation complete? We have reason to believe that it was not, and that many of the abominations still exist, because the Chapter will not pay the price for getting rid of them. Their coffers had been swelled by the large rents which the vice had rendered them, but they grudge the sacrifices to complete the purification which the aforesaid hand-bill had so tardily compelled them to commence. The work will not then be finished unless the Bishop of Exeter makes the law do what the morals of the Dean and Chapter would not accomplish at some small pecuniary cost.

Laymen, who have found their estates disgraced and injured by the sort of nuisance in question, have known how to get rid of it at some temporary pecuniary sacrifice; but the Dean and Chapter of Westminster are the only folks who have not known to deliver themselves of the reproach of participating as proprietors in the infamy of having brothels held under them.

But then, to make up for this sin of omission, see, as Lord Fitzhardinge observed, how refined and eager their morality has been in excluding the statue of Lord Byron from the Abbey.

In their precincts were a hundred reeking altars to the filthy god of the gardens, but they cry out shame, and shut their doors against the statue of the genius that produced Childe Harold and Don Juan. they can perceive the taints in his writings, through they had never discovered the taints in their rent till the handbill revealed it.—Hurkaru.

MISCELLANEA.

REVOLTING CHARGE.—At the Bristol Quarter Sessions on Tuesday week, the Rev. Henry Heathcote, who was described in the calendar as 40 years of age, and who is a clergyman of the Church of England, a married man with two sons, was placed at the bar charged with a series of offences of the most disgusting character. It is utterly impossible to give the evidence, which disclosed a state of moral depravity on the part of the prisoner scarcely possible to exist with sanity of intellect. As respects the first indictment, the jury acquitted the prisoner of all the serious counts, and found him guilty of only the common assault; on the second indictment they found him not guilty of the intent, but guilty of the solicitation and of the common assault. The other indictment was withdrawn. The Recorder then, on the first indictment, sentenced him to pay a fine of 20s; for the offence in the second, of solicitation, &c., 12 months' imprisonment in the common goal of the city; and for the common assault in that indictment that he do pay a further fine of 20s.—Bath Herald.—This conviction has been noticed to the Lord Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, who has directed the proper proceedings to be instituted, under the Church Discipline Act, against Mr. Heathcote, with a view to his deprivation and deposition from the ministry.—Times

The following is an extract from the probat of wills, as laid before the House of Commons July 12, 1832:—Fowler, Arch bishop of Dublin left 150,000*l.*; Beresford, Archbishop of Tuam, left 250,000*l.*; Agar, Archbishop of Cashel, left 400,000*l.*; Stopford, Bishop of Cork, left 25,000*l.*; Percy, Bishop of Dromore, left 400,000*l.*; Cleaver, Bishop of Ferns, left 50,000*l.*; Bernard, Bishop of Limerick, left 60,000*l.*; Porter, Bishop of Clogher, left 250,000*l.*; Hawkins, of Raphoe, left 250,000*l.*; Knox, of Killaloe, left 100,000*l.*; Stuart, of Armagh, 300,000*l.*; total, 1,875,000*l.*; besides maintaining their wives and families—all, with two exceptions, Englishmen.—Ireland as a Kingdom and Colony, p. 239.

THE PANTHEON.—The National states:—"The Government is about to conciliate the priesthood by a new concession; it being intended that the Pantheon is again to be converted to religious purposes, by celebrating in it, on the next anniversary of the days of July, a funeral service in honour of the victims of that glorious week."—Tablet.

CAPE PALMAS MISSION.—The Rev. John Kelly has returned from this mission, seven priests of the order of the Heart of Mary for the evangelising of negro nations, having arrived to take charge of it. One of them, Rev. L. de Reignier, soon after his arrival fell a victim to the fever on 30th December. Mr. Pindar, a Catholic layman, who, as catechist, had accompanied Rev. J. Kelly, died, on January 1st, of a coup de soleil. Bishop Barron had arrived at Goree, but had not reached Cape Palmas. Hitherto but little success had attended the labours of the Catholic missionary in this colony. Much may be hoped for, from the devotedness of the religious body who are especially consecrated to the salvation of the negro nations. At all events their toils and sacrifices will be of grateful odour to God and men.—Tablet.

THE

BENGAL

CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

No. 11.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1844.

[VOL. VII.]

VINDICATION OF OUR PROOFS OF TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

In the Christian Advocate of last Saturday week, a correspondent, CANDOUR, attempts to answer, on Christian principles, a question put by us some time ago in reference to John, c. 6. v. 66, "If the flesh profiteth nothing, what will mere wheaten bread profit?" The Editor of the Advocate does not appear to be entirely satisfied with the notions of his correspondent, as would appear from the following notice, though not given expressly in reference to CANDOUR. "The Editor of the Christian Advocate does not hold himself responsible for all the sentiments expressed by his correspondents." And certainly, the following extract from CANDOUR's letter is such as to deter any man of sense from holding himself responsible for its sentiments. "We have a rule given us in the Gospels," says CANDOUR, "by which the Protestant interpretation is made out to be infallibly true and correct. The rule is this, 'I will open my mouth in parables. All these things spoke Jesus unto the multitude in parables; and without a parable he spoke not unto them.' By this rule then we assist that our Saviour's discourse to the Jews was parabolical—figurative!" Oh! the Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible, and the Bible a riddle! No wonder, that there are as many different systems of belief founded on Bible reading, as there are Protestants in Christendom, since, according to the famous Protestant rule laid down by CANDOUR for its interpretation, the New Testament (and why not the Old Testament also) is a riddle, a parabolical, figurative book where nothing is to be understood according to the natural, literal signification of the words. No wonder that the inspiration of Scripture is denied by Atheists and others, when such a rule is laid down for its interpretation generally by a Christian. But let us see what CANDOUR means. Does he mean to say that all the discourses addressed by Christ to the Jews are to be understood in a figurative sense in all their parts, or only in some? And are we to infer that as he spoke to the Jews always in parables, he spoke to his own disciples always without a parable, and that he explained to them the meaning of the parables addressed to the multitude? If so, then the words of Christ at the Last Supper are to be understood literally, and the Protestant interpretation is destroyed by the Protestant rule. The words of Christ in St John, c. 6, are addressed to his disciples in particular as well as to the Jews in general, as is evident to any one who reads them, and they are merely the promise of what he bestowed at the Last Supper when he addressed the disciples alone. Is Christ's Sermon on the mount a figurative discourse, a parable? When our Saviour says; "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven," are we to look out for metaphors, symbols, signs and figures, to explain these words of the Son of God, according to the Protestant rule of interpretation, in a figurative, symbolical, metaphorical, parabolic sense, because they are addressed to the Jews? In the Gospel of St. Matthew, where it is said that Christ spoke in parables to the multitudes, and that without parables he did not speak to them, it is also related, though poor CANDOUR does not candidly notice it, that the disciples came to him saying, Expound to us the parable of the cockle of the field, and that the Redeemer explained it. In St. Mark, c. 4. v. 11, we read these words of the Saviour to his disciples: "To you it is given to know the mystery of the kingdom of God, but to them that are without, all things are done in parables." From these words it would appear, that the disciples, at least, were instructed in plain and perfectly intelligible language, without parables or enigmas; and, therefore, we should infer, that, at the Last Supper, an occasion so solemn, when there was question of the last Will and Testament of the Redeemer, plain language, devoid of the intricacy and obscurity of parables, was employed. There is no difficulty either in believing or understanding the Protestant doctrine of the Lord's Supper, if it were really proposed by Christ; and yet some of the disciples themselves said; (John 6, 61) it is a hard saying and who can hear it? and even after all the explanation which our Saviour gave of his meaning, they went back and walked no more with him. So far for the rule of interpretation.

The following are CANDOUR's reasons for thinking that our Saviour's explanation is incompatible with Catholic belief on our own principles. "Did the Redeemer," he asks, "in order to undeceive the Jews and his disciples, tell them that instead of giving them the flesh of his dead body to eat, as they grossly conceived, he intended to give them the flesh of his spiritualised and glorified body together with his soul and divinity? No such thing. And if he did not, how can this explanation be computible with Catholic belief?" To this the obvious answer is, that our Saviour did promise his vivified, glorified flesh, together with his soul and divinity, and so he was understood by St. Peter and the other Apostles, to whom he put the question, will you also go away? How indeed could he promise his vivified and glorified body, without promising his soul also and divinity, since on account of the hypostatic union between the Divine and human natures, they are inseparable? He promised his flesh repeatedly in these words, "the bread that I will give is my flesh for the life of the world." "For my flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed." But when the Jews murmured, and asked, How can this man give us his flesh to eat? understanding him to have promised dead flesh; and when many of his disciples having heard the promise, and understanding it in the same gross way, declared; this saying is hard and who can hear it? the Saviour reminded them of his future resurrection from the dead, when his body would be glorified and united to his soul and divinity. "Doth this scandalize you?" said the Redeemer. "If, then, you shall see the Son of Man ascend up where he was before? It is the spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing." The explanation of the Saviour is, therefore, perfectly satisfactory in Catholic belief; but no way compatible with the Protestant doctrine of the Lord's Supper. We have now to complain of want of candour in CANDOUR himself. Thus the correspondent of the Advocate reasons on our Lord's explanation. "Our Lord says, 'is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing. The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life.'" He every word of the passage makes against the Romish dogma. The spirit alone is given prominence to; the flesh is altogether excluded." Ah! this is lamentable disingenuity. The spirit alone is given prominence to. What a wonder it should be, that the spirit obtains prominence! Is it not so also Catholic principles? Who does not place the spirit before the flesh? Yet CANDOUR is not satisfied with the prominence which our Saviour gave to the spirit, he must contrive a little for it himself also. Our Lord said, "the spirit;"—CANDOUR says, "the spirit alone." The flesh, says CANDOUR, altogether excluded. Oh! how very uncandid is CANDOUR. The flesh is excluded, the sense in which the Jews understood I grant; that is, dead, inanimate flesh is excluded; but any one who reads can see, in moment, that flesh is not altogether excluded as CANDOUR falsely states. The flesh altogether excluded, according to CANDOUR: but our Saviour said in the preceding verse "The bread that I will give is my flesh for the life of the world: my flesh is meat indeed and my blood is drink indeed. Amen, amen. I say unto you, except you eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, you shall not have life in you." CANDOUR, therefore would make the Redeemer contradict himself, but all is consistent according to the faith of our holy Church; for while the Redeemer corrects the error of the Jews as carnal disciples, he does not deny what previously asserted. But very strange, after all, CANDOUR does not answer our plain simple question, except by mere shuffling and evasion. We asked—If the flesh profiteth nothing, what will mere wheaten bread profit unto life everlasting? To this, CANDOUR answers, that "that must be most profitable which Christ actually appoints, though in intrinsic quality it may be inferior to many other things of a kindred nature." But sure this is not an answer, but an evasion. Christ could have appointed dead flesh to be a symbol or figure of his own body, as easily as mere wheaten bread, and it would have been a more natural and striking figure, more calculated to excite faith; and then flesh would be as profitable, as Protestants can suppose bread to be from the appointment of Christ; so that the question, for ever and for ever, recurs, if the flesh profiteth nothing, what can mere bread profit? The Paschal Lamb was a figure and a very striking figure of the Lamb of God, and that, too, by God's own appointment; the Paschal Supper at which the flesh of the Paschal Lamb was eaten, was a type and figure of the Lord's Supper in the New Dispensation, and yet, when Christ is about to give the type and figure its fulfilment, by substituting the reality or thing prefigured, Protestants would make him substitute a figure for a figure, a less adapted and less striking figure, for another, more natural, and better adapted, and in long use by God's own appointment!!! If the flesh profiteth nothing what will mere wheaten bread profit? Protestants will never answer that question satisfactorily, on Christian principles. There is still another passage in CANDOUR's letter, which we wish to notice briefly: "We maintain," he says, "that mere bread and wine are, and must be superior, to either the Paschal Lamb or the manna, in as much as they symbolise the finished work of human redemption, in as much as they are partaken with that faith which did not accompany the eating of either the Paschal Lamb or the manna, under the old law." This we consider to be the best answer that could possibly be given by a Protestant to the question,—What advantage has the Lord's Supper, according to Protestant belief, above the Paschal Supper of the old law, or over the manna by which the Israelites were fed miraculously in the desert? But is it satisfactory? Does it account for the great difference which our Saviour points out between one and the other, when he says, 'Not as your fathers, who did eat manna and are dead. He that eateth this bread shall live for ever.'" The manna could be partaken with faith, as well as bread and wine, and no doubt, it was so partaken by many. The Paschal Lamb also was partaken with faith by all those who expected the redemption of Israel; and it is otherwise certain, that belief and faith in a Redeemer to come, were then as necessary to salvation, as the Christian's faith is at present. The same faith, therefore, virtually accompanied the eating of the Paschal Lamb and the manna, which Protestants now bring to the Lord's Supper, and hence St. John calls our Saviour, 'the Lamb which was slain from the beginning of the world.' The death of Christ remitted the sins of those who lived under the old law as well as of those who lived under the new, and why not the types of his death, therefore, in the Old Law be as powerful as the mere types and figures of the New Law, according to Protestant notions. But here again CANDOUR evades the question, for he makes the excellence of the Lord's Supper above the Paschal Supper, to consist in the faith of the receiver; and if the excellence of one or the other may preponderate in that way, the Lord's Supper will often happen to be less excellent than the Paschal Supper, or than the manna.

TRIBUTE TO CAPT. VOSS OF THE SERINGAPATAM.

Agreeably to the anticipations to which we gave expression in a recent number, we perceive, with pleasure, that a subscription has been opened for the purpose of presenting to Captain Voss, Commander of the Seringapatam, a suitable testimonial of the gratitude, which the Catholics of Bengal owe that gentleman, for his great kindness and attention to the Right Rev. Bishop Olliffe, and the Ecclesiastics and Religious Ladies of his Lordship's party, during the voyage.

AGRA MISSION.

Our friends in the North West Provinces will rejoice to learn that Bishop Borghi has been eminently successful in procuring a community of 16 Nuns and several Priests for the Agra Vicariate. We understand that on his Lordship's return to the Mission he intends to establish a second Convent on the Hills, where the climate is delightful.

THE POOR CATHOLICS AT GWALIOR.

The following extract of a letter gives a cheering account of the future prospects of the suffering Christians.—"On the 5th ult. the Gwalior Deputation started for the Dhoon, consisting of five persons, of whom Alex. D'Rozario is the head. He is a very intelligent man and has an excellent character. He has managed to pick up no less than six languages, Persian, Portuguese, Italian, French, English besides Hindustanee. He bears a note to you and, at Mr. T——'s request, I furnished him with a letter to the Lieut. Governor of Agra. One of the men is a poor European named Denman who has a fancy for Agriculture and is going to try his luck in the Colony: the subscription is increasing fast, and I hope by the end of the year enough will be realized to settle all who wish to go on a comfortable footing. Last Sunday I spent the morning with Father Felix and attended worship at his Chapel, where I saw nearly all the Christians, they are, generally speaking, fine-looking sturdy chaps, and all expressed themselves quite eager to be off to the Dhoon, where they promised to work hard and be "good boys."—I was much pleased with the respect manifested to the little Padre, several of them flocked round to kiss his hand as he came out of Church. You will be happy to learn that the Gwalior Government has at length promised to pension several of the widows and infirm Christians of both sexes, and sixty rupees per month to Father Felix, but it seems doubtful if he will retain this if he goes to the Dhoon, though he is apparently quite indifferent so long as it is good for his flock. The Gwalior subscription amounts to twelve hundred rupees which beats Meerut (alas! it does, it is double.) Mr. Felix will publish a general list soon. He distributed about two hundred and fifty rupees a month to the needy, but all must soon be reserved for the Dhoon Colony, our little "Arabia Felix."

CATHOLIC LIBERALITY.

The following is excerpted from a letter addressed to his Grace the Archbishop by a highly respectable Officer in one of the Regiments of the East India Company stationed in the Upper Provinces:—

"At the issue of next pay, Mrs.—— and I propose remitting your Lordship twenty rupees, as our joint communion offering, for your new Mission in Bengal. We desire also to become Subscribers to the Calcutta and Chandernagore Orphanages to the extent of ten rupees a month—five to each—and with the above twenty, I will send other sixty, which please to consider for the last six months of 1844, from 1st July to December. It is, I know, very little, but even this little I can only promise till the return of Dr. Borghi, when perhaps his new wants may oblige me to expend it nearer home, but it shall not be withdrawn lightly."

INTERESTING ITEMS.

From letters recently received from persons of distinction in England, the following interesting items of intelligence have been gleaned:

Miss Pigot, a celebrated English authoress, has become a Catholic.

Doctor Fergusson, who lately accompanied Bishop Bagge from Rome to Bath, was, with a relation of his, lately converted.

The Countess of Clare, her Niece, and the Misses Young, all of whom became Catholics by occasion of Mr. Sibthorp's Conversion, have joined together to defray the costs of erecting a church at Ryde in the Isle of Wight.

A relation of Mr. Talbot's, the nephew of Lord Talbot, writes to his Grace Dr. Carew, that her cousin, Mr. Talbot's Living in England was worth £500 per annum—that this was his only income—that he lived in the midst of a circle of relations to all of whom he always endeared himself by the most kind edifying and amiable deportment—that their esteem for him is so great that it is confidently hoped, that several of them will, after his example, embrace the Catholic Faith. Mr. Talbot has entered a Catholic College and is preparing for the Priesthood.

At Barnstaple, in England, an itinerant Mesmerizer has been exhibiting his artifices, and is hailed there as another Christ. As a new Catholic Chapel has been just founded at Barnstaple, we may hope that this impious superstition will soon be eradicated by the conversion of the deluded people to the true faith.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM THE REV. MR. BEUREL, MISSIONARY APOSTOLIC, TO THE REV. N. IN CALCUTTA.

Singapore, 5th July, 1844.

"The French embassy to China arrived here on the 2d instant. His Excellency, Monsieur le Baron de la Grénée, his Lady and children are in good health—he gives passage to 10 Missionaries: five, who belong to the Society of Jesus, have landed, and are now with me, and the five others, coming by the Steamer, the Archimede, are daily expected.—The last five belong to the Society "des Missions Etrangères,"—and among them are the Rev. Messrs. Charrier and Gally, who have been, as you know, released from the prisons of Cochinchina, last year, by the French man-of-war the Danaid. Monsieur le Baron de la Grénée is a truly religious man, and he gives an example, which is unfortunately seldom imitated by many of his countrymen."

DANIEL O'CONNELL.

The following letter is from a most pious and talented young Clergyman in Ireland, who studied under the Archbishop, whilst his Grace was Professor at Maynooth.

November, 1843.

MY DEAR LORD,

We all hailed with inexpressible delight your Grace's first pastoral address. In that hour of distress it inspired us with consolation and hope. For my part the reading of that emanation of Heavenly Charity, together with sundry recollections of past days, drew tears from my eyes; and dear as I am bound to hold your Lordship, I confess I feel my gratitude and love manifold increased. My Lord; our cause is a holy heaven-born cause; and I find that all that is good and great, not only in Ireland but throughout the world are with us. All the worthless are against us.

"I lately received a letter from Bishop Kenrick. He says "What shall I say of Repeal; my heart and soul are with O'Connell: I cannot express my indignation at the attempts lately made to excite rebellion in Ireland." In reply, I remarked to him that now, more than ever, we had but one heart and one soul. From the West I turn to the East, and I behold your Grace no less identified with our glory. What a cause! Emanating from principles of justice, equity, truth, from principles of faith; resting all our hopes upon Heaven, to which the prayers of our people are ascending without intermission; guided by a man so faithful and true, so wise, experienced, prudent, cautious, yet so enthusiastic, energetic and persevering; cheered on by all the good, opposed only by the worthless and bad; operating in its progress good effects without number; relying upon the virtues of the people, their temperance, union, peace, loyalty, disinterested love of country; and in all its ultimate results and details, tending to the good of men and the glory of God, I humbly trust, that so sacred a cause will, in due time, arrive at a holy and happy consummation. I assure your Lordship, that the effects produced upon our social system, so far from being disastrous, are most glorious to meditate upon; so much so, that I doubt much, if the present state of things with O'Connell at our head, is not preferable, to a domestic parliament without him. I humbly trust that Divine Providence is overruling all, and making all things ("Omnia") co-operate for the good of our faithful people; I see that every step taken by the enemy is for us. When they stop short, infatuated men, puzzled, afraid to go forward lest they should go wrong—afraid to do the right, their conduct is no less advantageous to the right cause. I see that the Devil has a direct interest in maintaining the union; accordingly he instigates his minions, and raises great storms. We have had some trying hours, and poor O'Connell has a great struggle, certamen forte dedit illi ut vinceret, et sciret quoniam horum omnium potentior est sapientia. In the darkest hours he shines forth like a beacon light: he cries out hope! hope! man's infirmities are God's opportunities. Indeed, my Lord, at this present crisis, our hopes are brightening into certainty. Thanks be to God!

"Hopes shall be crowned and attachment rewarded
"And Erin's gay jubilee shine out yet!"

After the bounty of Divine Providence, which of late years has been so plenteously poured out upon our island, my hopes are based upon the disinterested, generous, zealous correspondence of the poor people. Witness the Propagation of the Faith, the Temperance teetotal pledge, and at present the Missions! I could give your Grace no idea, God alone could, of the enthusiastic ardor and devotion, with which they flock at this call. They abandon their work, their families, forget all consideration of comfort and health, even the Repeal is lost sight of in a parish, whilst the missions continue. The magic word "Repeal" was not heard in the parish of Narraghmore during our late mission there, though no people can be more devoted to their country; and though the meeting of Balinglass was held close by at the commencement of the mission, and that of Mullahmast took place immediately after. My Lord, I never before saw so clearly "that the harvest is very great" and the labourers are very few. Rogate ergo Dominu messis ut mittat operarios in messem suam. I entertain in my heart, an humble but, I trust, well founded hope, to see this glorious harvest gathered in, to behold my beloved country once more what she ever was—a land of peace and order, ruled by a paternal government, regulated by just and wise laws, as much loved, respected and obeyed by our people as O'Connell now is; endowed with Catholic institutions, to protect the people, and to foster the poor, the children, and the infirm, in one word, to behold Ireland once again the insula Sanctorum et Doctorum reposita est hac spes mea in suum mea,

"You will pray for us, my Lord, we are grateful, and when we forget you may ourselves be forgotten.

"Pardon, my Lord, the boldness with which I have intruded on your Grace. But I have taken the liberty of a child with a kind father: I have poured out my whole heart before you. You are more than father, and ever shall, to,

"Your very unworthy ungrateful child, MICHAEL BURKE."

In connection with the above subject, we have pleasure in giving a prominent place to the subjoined letter from Thos. Bracken, Esq. the Secretary and Treasurer of the Bank of Bengal, addressed to Messrs. John Lackersteen and Brothers, Treasurers to the O'Connell Testimonial.

DEAR SIR,—I have the pleasure to enclose a Cheque for Rs. 100, which I shall be obliged by your receiving as my contribution towards payment of the fines and legal expenses arising out of the late State Trials in Ireland.

I am,

Yours faithfully,

T. BRACKEN.

September 7th, 1844.

A gentleman in the North West provinces writes "that the greater mockery of Government's treatment of O'Connell is, their making him enter into recognizances to keep the peace—a man who, they know, alone preserves the country from rising up to a man to resist oppression. Verily I fear England must be severely punished or natives will begin to doubt the judgment of the Almighty. I am an Englishman and love my country, but from my inmost soul I abhor her iniquities and tremble for the retribution which must come—and how appropriately—through the nation she has trampled on for these six hundred years."

Another gentleman, not a Catholic, says "I like Punch's idea that the Queen should visit Ireland and liberate O'Connell. It would have a good effect and render her very popular in that country."

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE,—INTALLY.

The annual Examination of the Pupils of St. John's College, Intally, took place on Friday, the 6th instant, in the presence of several of the respectable Catholics of Calcutta, who took a part in the proceedings and expressed themselves highly pleased with the exhibition. The Right Rev. Doctor Olliffe, Bishop of Melene, presided on the occasion, and conducted the Examinations with that ease and engaging affability for which his Lordship is so remarkable. The numerous party of Ecclesiastical Students just arrived with his Lordship from Europe were barely in time to be spectators this year, but their Examination, next year and intermediate labours in assisting in the Schools, will give considerable additional interest to the next anniversary.

The young gentlemen who distinguished themselves and obtained prizes in their respective classes were as follow:—

Master Louis Britoe,	} In Latin
„ Thos. D'Rozario
„ George Bails,
Master Louis Britoe,	} In English Grammar.
„ John Asphar,
„ Alfred Gomess,	} In English Composition.
Master Louis Britoe,
„ John Asphar,	} In the use of the Globes and Geography.
Master John Asphar.
„ Alfred Gomess,	} Elocution and Reading.
„ John Asphar,
„ George Bails,

Master Louis Britoe,	} In Arithmetic.
„ John Asphar,
„ Alfred Gomess,	} Profane History.
Master George Bails,
„ Louis Britoe,	} In Sacred History.
Master John Asphar,
„ Alfred Gomess,	} In Writing.
„ Thos D'Rozario,
Master George Bails,	} Catechism and Reading.
„ Louis Britoe,
„ Alfred Gomess,	} In Reading and Spelling.
Master George Stride,
„ Fred. Brown,
Master Fred. Brown,
„ Wm. Lackersteen
„ Alex. McGregor,

The course of Education in St. John's College, embraces Theology, Natural and Moral Philosophy, the Greek and Latin Classics, Italian, French, Music, Mathematics, Arithmetic &c., English Grammar, Geography, History, Use of the Globes and the Native Languages generally in use in Bengal. Studies will be resumed on the 8th October.

W. KENNEDY, Principal.

LETTER NO. VIII.

FROM A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA TO HIS PROTESTANT FRIENDS IN EUROPE.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—In my last letter I stated that I would endeavour in this one to test Protestantism, as a collective body, by the standard of Scripture; if, like an object viewed in a mirror, we can at once recognize your likeness there, then we must acknowledge your being, in reality and in truth, the Church of Christ, as defined in the book of life; I ask you then to open your Bible at the 1st Epistle of St. Paul to the Corinthians 12th Chapter, and to place the picture which I have copied of you—from your own drawings and sketchings, in the preceding letters, in juxtaposition with this Chapter, and after having thus concentrated the whole, look at every feature, examine each member, and scrupulously and searchingly compare the model here placed before us by St. Paul of the mystical body of Christ, his Church, and the cast which you have struck off, and then, at the end of the investigation, tell me, candidly and honestly, if you deem yourselves to be a perfect representation of the pattern here held up to our view. If, in the face of this, you allege Protestantism to be the Church of Christ, then you must be prepared to uphold that St. Paul gives us a false definition of that mystical body, Christ's Church on Earth, for I will demonstrate to you, indeed nothing is easier, that Protestantism is as different from this description and other texts relative to this, as day is from night;

you ought to stand or to fall by this Chapter alone; either you characterize collectively this "one body" of Christ, or you do not; either you exemplify every text in this Chapter, in spirit, principle, and practice, or you do not; if you do not, can you—will you allow yourselves to be deluded any longer by a phantom—by an ignis-fatuus which may attract you into interminable and inextricable quagmires? But, "to the law and to the testimony" is your boasting cry; well then, let me bring you to it. St. Paul says, "For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of the body, whereas they are many, yet are one body, so is Christ." "That there might be no schism in the body, but the members might be mutually careful one for another." He again tells the Ephesians, "for no man ever hated his own flesh, but nourisheth and cherisheth it, as also Christ doth his Church." This is plain and clear, that the body consists of different members, and that these collectively form one body. I think you will admit that for the well-being and existence of this body, there must be a union—a close connexion—a harmony—an agreement—a perfect accordance between all the members, mutually cherishing each other, until all the members thus constitute a real and complete incorporation, so that "the same spirit worketh" all simultaneously, this is the figure or symbol that St. Paul draws of the body of Christ, his Church, and a beautiful and a simple one it is; a child might understand this practical illustration, for he himself is a living figure of it. Now take and represent the body of Protestantism under this metaphor, and let me ask you, can you find this union, close connexion, harmony, agreement between all its members, so that "there might be no schism in the body, but the members might be mutually careful one for another?"—You cannot. I have fully and distinctly shown to you that your different sects stand practically and professedly inimical to one another—quite repugnant to the model which St. Paul gives us here of the Church of Christ. He further observes, "the eye cannot say to the hand, I need not thy help; nor again the head to the feet, I have no need of you." In order to analyze you under this simile, let us only suppose the Free Church of Scotland signifies "the eye," and the established Scottish Church "the hand," and will they not say to each other, "I need not thy help?" Only refer to my letters for proof—just look around you; and think you would not "the hand" pluck out "the eye," and would not the "eye" wither the other with a look; if practicable no doubt of it.—Say again the Church of England represents "the head" and the dissenters "the feet," and would they not say to each other "I have no need of you." Unquestionably they would? "The head" would frown destruction upon "the feet" and "the feet" would lay "the head" low, if possible; for if determined foes ever wished for each other's overthrow, so do they; and where is the love or sympathy between the other heterogeneous members of your body, Lutherans, Quakers, Baptists, Ranters, Methodists, Plymouth-Brethren, Anabaptists, Irvingites, Unitarians, Congregationalists, &c. &c. The deep vaults of heaven echo "where?" and which is re-echoed though the wide domain below. Will you tell me, "that all these things," all these sects, "one and the same spirit worketh," the spirit of Christ? Then the Apostle instructs us, "and if one member suffer any thing, all the members suffer with it; or if one member glory, all the members rejoice with it." What! if the Lutherans and Unitarians "suffer anything," the Calvinists and the Methodists "suffer" with them? If the Plymouth-Brethren and the Quakers, "glory," the Episcopalians and Baptists "rejoice" with them?! What perfect mockery—what bitter irony—what burning caustic, does not this text carry with it, when applied to Protestantism; it ought not only to cut you to the quick, but to the very soul; just reverse it, and you have the multitudinous and hostile sects of Protestantism exhibited to the life; behold how you verify it; again we are told, no man ever "hateth his own flesh, but nourisheth and cherisheth it, as also Christ doth his Church," the proposition is clear, that if Protestantism be the Church of Christ, then Christ doth hate his own flesh and body in you, that, like an insane person, he cuts up his own body to pieces member against member, until, in the end, it may be calculated he will commit spiritual suicide. Such would be the monstrous inference which would be necessarily linked to such an admission, as that Protestantism is this body of Christ. It is a blasphemy, my friends, you can only wash away from your souls by speedily leaving your contentious sects, and plunging as it were into the "well of living waters," entering the fold of the Catholic Church. Oh! my dear friends, in what mist of sophistry then must you not be entangled; in what "clouds tossed with whirlwinds" as St. Peter says, must you not be enveloped, so that the "light is darkened with the mist thereof," that you cannot see that in no Church on earth, in no community in the world is this Chapter found to be verified except in the Church of Rome alone, the picture is admirable, it is beautiful. It is now nearly two thousand years since St.

Paul sketched this heaven-drawn picture of the Church of Christ, drawing his colours, deriving his ideas from heaven itself, and it is to be seen in the Catholic Church as fresh and as vivid now as it was in the days of St. Peter and St. Paul, because a divine spirit breathed upon the whole, and said, "Lo I am with you to the end of time." As that varied coloured and ethereal arch, which spans the blue vault of heaven, has been wisely given to us as a sign that this habitable globe shall be no more deluged by water, so does this god-like unity, consolidated by a celestial cement, form an everlasting arch, and stand to us a divine emblem that the spiritual world shall be no more overflowed by the deluge of infidelity. It is indeed a glorious guarantee that the Catholic Church is, "the Pillar of Truth." I look upon it as it were the Archives of our faith, where all the records of the Church have been kept from the days of the Apostles to the present time, and as being too high, too lofty, and too distant for the wickedness of man ever to encompass its overthrow; one end of it rests upon Christ himself, and the other expands by the divine power as time advances, thus spanning within its orb age after age, until it will embrace within its sphere—within the fold of salvation, the last born of the human race,—such is the glorious result of divine prayer offered up upon the banks of "the brook Cedron." I shall now ask you to open your Bible at the 17th Chapter of St. John; who prays there so fervently for unity—Jesus Christ! "Holy Father, keep them in thy name, whom thou hast given me, that they may be; one that they all may be one, as thou, Father in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us." Twice does he thus invoke the "Holy Father," and twice does he assign his reason thus; "that the world may believe that thou hast sent me; that the world may know that thou hast sent me." He would have this visible union in the members of his Church, of his body, to typify the divine union which exists between the Father and himself, and to be taken by the disbelieving world as the ensign or standard of Christianity; if we come to consider that this was the last prayer of the Saviour of mankind, just before he was betrayed—just as he had, "finished the work which the Father gave him to do," and was about to seal it with his precious blood; if we come to view it at this stage, there is something peculiarly touching and affecting in the reflection—something solemnly and awfully impressive in the contemplation; it is manifest that the object prayed for was momentous and weighty, and we naturally look around us for its fruit. But, gracious heavens! are we to be told, and to believe, we see it in Protestantism?—we see it in Churchmen opposed to Churchmen?—Presbyterians to Presbyterians?—Methodists to Methodists?—Unitarians to Socinians—Shakers to Jumpers?—Ranters to Quakers, and denominations to denominations who hate, anathematize, denounce, and condemn each other, even to hell! Believe it? Why, my friends, if you do, you are not far from questioning the divinity of Christ; infidelity hovers near it. Think you, Christ says of them, "I also have sent them into the world—that they also may be one in us; that the love wherewith thou hast loved me, may be in them, and I in them." To say "that the love" here spoken of did exist among the early Reformers, as shown in my last two or three letters; between the Episcopalians and the Nonconformists of old—between Dissenters and Churchmen of the present day; would be believing facts, and blaspheming the Prince of Peace! Why, in a little work just put into my hands by a Protestant, and only published last year (1843) by a clergyman of the Church of Scotland, called "A dark night at hand," it is said in it, "but those Protestant Episcopal aggressions will remind Dissenters of the days of the Puritans and the persecuted Nonconformists. In Scotland we know the spirit of Prelacy better. The wrongs and persecutions which the Church and the people of Scotland endured in by gone days, were all inflicted by Protestants; the martyrs to Popery were few in Scotland; but 18,000 were slain, and multitudes more imprisoned and banished by persecuting Prelacy." Yet, you ask us to appeal to "the law and to the testimony" if you, deadly foes to each other, are not the Church of Christ? What infatuation! what insult to Christ! and how opposite to truth; seek then for the fruit of this divine prayer—for unity, and you will find it growing only upon the Catholic and Apostolical tree, view her oneness and mark how her members are "made perfect in one," in one faith and one worship. We may remark, again, in the 10th Chapter of St. John another beautiful symbol given of the unity of the members of the Church of Christ under the figure of a "one fold" and "one shepherd;" "and other sheep I have," says the Good Shepherd, "that are not of this fold; them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice, and there shall be one fold and one shepherd." What divine tenderness and pathos breathes in every word, "other sheep I have that are not of this fold," and what does he propose to do? "Them also I must bring," but upon what condition? "They shall hear my voice," and what then? Then, "there shall be one fold and one shepherd!" What harmony and union! what peace and calmness! what rest and repose! what security and safety!!! does not this pastoral emblem of "one fold" convey? The sheep resting within from the heat of day, and at night from prowling wolves, and "the Good Shepherd," at the door. Oh! how vividly does not the Saviour here portray the wandering sheep—the misguided souls; how exquisitely tender does he not appeal to the "other sheep that are not of this fold," to hear his voice, and how affectingly forcible does he not point out the necessity of their being brought in, and that "there shall be but one fold." But, will you, my friends, venture, dare to say that Protestantism is this one fold, and that Christ is its shepherd? Will you have him to declare of those discordant sects—of those who profess such contrary doctrines—who are filled with "enmities, contentions, wraths, and quarrels" against each other? "These, my sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me." Will you be so bold and so impious as to make this declaration? No, I know natural religion itself will not allow you to offer such violence to your conscience. How then must you not prevaricate to calm and lull your troubled souls; you see unity here clearly denoted under the figure of "one fold," and to impress it the stronger, Christ says, as a conclusion, "I and the Father are one," the fold is "one," the shepherd is "one," the sheep are "one," all—all are one, or, as Ezeachiell prophesies, "and my servant David shall be king over them, and they shall have one shepherd." How truly sublime and touching is the confidence of this "the Good Shepherd," Christ, in his sheep when he says of them, "but a stranger they follow not, but fly from him, because they know not the voice of strangers." What purity and chasteness of one faith, and one uniform doctrine does not this imply? Who cannot recognize in this the sheep of the Catholic Fold, for no good Catholic will go and hear or follow "the voice of strangers," strange teachers; but how is the case reversed in Protestantism: one Sunday the Protestant is a worshipper in the Episcopalian Church with "common prayer book" in hand; the next he goes to the Calvinistic Kirk, where he may hear Prelacy denounced and his prayer book condemned, and if found there, would be cast out at the door; the third Sunday may find him groaning hypocritically in the Methodist Meeting House; the fourth may see him listening to the Lutheran on the "real presence;" on the fifth he may hear the Baptist denouncing Infant Baptism, or on the sixth Sunday the Quaker rejecting it in toto, and thus he wanders on through the dark maze of Protestantism. Oh! beware, my friends, that Christ does not say to you as he said to the Jews—"If you were blind, you should not have sin, but now you say, we see; your sin remaineth," you see that Protestantism cannot be based upon the principles inculcated in scripture; "beware." He does not say of you, "but you do not believe, because you are not of my sheep"—you do not believe, because you see not the prayer of Christ for unity verified, or the definition of St. Paul represented in Protestantism; you exclaim with an impious and childish sneer, "Popery may boast of its unity." In vain then does the Apostle warn you, "that they who do such things, as enmities, contentions, wraths," &c. as you do, "shall not obtain the kingdom of heaven;" in vain does he intreat you to "be perfect, take exhortation, be of one mind, have peace." In vain does Christ himself announce to you, "that every kingdom divided against itself shall be made desolate; and every city or house divided against itself shall not stand." Alas! alas! I can only lament your fatuity.

Yours faithfully,
C. A. C.

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

TO THE MOST REV. DR. CAREW,
Archbishop of Edessa,
Vicar Apostolic of Bengal.

MY LORD ARCHBISHOP,—Permit me to convey through your Grace my mite to the Bengal Catholic Orphanages, which have (to the great joy and admiration of all Catholics who love their religion) grown up under your Grace's fostering care, and for which I beg herewith to enclose an order on Messrs. Mackenzie, Lyall and Co. for Co.'s Rs. 100.

I have the honor to be,

My Lord,

Your Grace's most humble and obedient servant,

Woteeharree, } EWEN McDONELL.
31st Aug. 1844. }

TRIBUTE TO CAPTAIN VOSS OF THE SERINGAPATAM.

His Grace the Archbishop,.....	10	0
Right Rev. Bishop Olliffe,....	10	0
Very Rev. Dr. Kennedy,.....	5	0
Captain Gordon,.....	15	0
Countess Lackersteen,.....	50	0
Mrs. W. R. Lackersteen,...	25	0
Miss Lackersteen,.....	25	0
Mrs. Gray,.....	25	0
Miss M. O. D'Rozario,.....	10	0
Mrs. C. M. Rostan,.....	10	0

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

Collections at the Catholic Cathedral, on the 8th inst.	83	3	6
Anonymous, through His Grace the Archbishop, 8th inst.	20	0	0
Ewen McDonell, Esq., through His Grace the Archbishop,	100	0	0
Captain and Mrs. Graham's subscription for the past six months,	60	0	0
THROUGH MR. N. O'BRIEN.
Thomas Brodrick,	5	0	0
S. R. Thomas,	5	0	0
F. Thompson,	1	0	0
Captain Pike,	5	0	0
Emma Hughes,	2	0	0
C. Buckland,	5	0	0
J. Coss,	5	0	0
E. Sillidly,	1	0	0
A Friend,	1	0	0
John Constable,	1	0	0

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

Subscription from the Dum Dum Sol- diers, through the Rev. Mr. Storck, ..	17	7	0
Subscription through the very Rev. Mr. Johnson, Rector of St. Xavier's Col- lege,	11	4	0

O'CONNELL TESTIMONIAL.

T. Bracken, Esq.	100	0	0
-----------------------	-----	---	---

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

Sergeant J. Connell, through His Grace the Archbishop,	50	0	0
Sub-Conductor P. Ryan, second sub. ..	100	0	0

COWCOLLY MISSION.

Capt. and Mrs. Graham's Donation, ...	20	0	0
---------------------------------------	----	---	---

SUBSCRIPTIONS IN AID OF THE SUFFERING CATHOLICS AT GWALIOR.

A Protestant,	2	0	0
A Ditto,	1	0	0

Selections.

ST. JOHN'S CATHEDRAL SERVICE.

To the Editor of the Bengal Hurkaru.

SIR,—I would wish to point out one or two innovations in the Protestant Cathedral Service, which appear to require alteration.

1st. "The time in which Psalms are chaunted," which approaches nearer to "Quick" than it should do on such occasions—at least, it did so this morning; and why the Psalms for the day are not chaunted, and only that which precedes, "O come let us Sing, &c." and that which follows, "Oh be joyful in the Lord," &c?

2d. Why does the Clergyman, on reading the Creed during the Communion Service, turn his face to the East and his back, consequently, to the congregation? This, surely, savours of Puseyism, and is not in accordance with the usual custom.

3d. Why does the same Clergyman, when preaching, continue to wear his hood, having divested himself of his surplice? This is another innovation, and an advance towards Pu-seyism, by no means agreeable to the usages of the Established Church of England discipline, and one the sooner laid aside the better; or we may, next of all, have the Candlesticks, &c., &c., until our Church is transformed to that of the Roman Catholics.

Yours faithfully,

B.

September 8, 1844.

REY We recommend this letter to the attention of the Archdeacon and the Bishop.—Ed.—Bengal Hurkaru.

SYDNEY.

We have a few Sydney papers, extending in date to the 26th of June; but they do not add much to our stock of intelligence. The news of the conviction of O'Connell, which had reached the Colony, had created a very considerable sensation among the Roman Catholic community, and a Public Meeting had been held, which had pronounced the severest condemnation on the whole proceedings. One journal—the Morning Chronicle—is very virulent on the subject; and has assailed Judge Burton, who, we observe, has reached Madras, for his Anti-Catholic prejudices. The editor is very indignant because the Judge talks about "toleration." The explosion is rather amusing than otherwise:—

"The judge evidently would, if he could, get back the one-seventh of the colony to his church; and then possibly, would TOLERATE Catholics! He would probably give them some of the crumbs which fell from the tables of the reverend gentlemen whom he would clothe in purple and fine linen, and feed sumptuously every day! —TOLERATION!—We fling back the word with the contempt it deserves! —TOLERATION!—it belongs to slaves to be tolerated—we will accept no toleration! We demand equality—the law gives it (it is dearly earned) and we will have it —TOLERATION! Your honor may take it in your bag to Madras! It may serve you in India, where we suppose you will shortly understand Buddhism, as well as you do Catholicism in Australia. You may bestow your toleration upon Hindoos!"

This, to say the least of it, is a little unreasonable, and cannot but provoke a smile. We dare say that the worthy judge did something more than smile—Bengal Hurkaru.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC MEETING.—Last night, pursuant to advertisement, a meeting of the Roman Catholics in and about Sydney took place in the City Theatre, for the purpose of expressing the feelings of that portion of the community with respect to the Irish state trials, particularly as to an alleged packing of the Jury which had tried Mr. O'Connell and the other traversers. Within ten minutes after the doors of the place of meeting had been opened, the pit, boxes, and stage boxes were crowded to excess, principally by the working classes, while the better dressed portion of those present were accommodated with the stage. At seven o'clock several cheers outside announced the arrival of the Mayor, who soon after took his seat being arrayed in his robes of office. He briefly commenced the proceedings by stating that he had convened the meeting merely in his official capacity, and wished it to be understood by all present that he did not identify himself to any greater extent with the proceedings which might be brought before them. The meeting was subsequently addressed by Messrs J. R. Brennan, Driscoll, Jenkins, Egan, Cortayne, H. C. Chambers, M. Encroe, Dr. Tierney, and several others whose names, from the noise which prevailed, were inaudible. The principal business of the meeting appeared to be the passing of a series of resolutions condemnatory of the conduct of the Irish law officers of the Crown in excluding sixty-three names from the list of special jurors for Dublin, thirty-five of them being Catholics and the others Protestants who were known advocates for the repeal of the Union between Great Britain and Ireland. Three petitions were also submitted to and adopted by the meeting, viz.: one to the Queen in Council, one to the House of Lords, and one to the House of Commons, all setting forth that the meeting considered the exclusion of their brother Catholics from the special jury list as an insult to them as a body. Towards the close of the proceedings a vote of thanks was unanimously adopted to those Aldermen and Protestant members of the City Council who had honoured the meeting by their presence. After a vote of thanks had been conveyed to the Mayor by Mr. Brennan for his conduct in the chair, the meeting gave a peal of cheers to him for his conduct, and quietly dispersed at nine o'clock. The house was crowded. —Sydney Morning Chronicle.

ENDOWMENT OF THE CATHOLIC CLERGY.

We have endeavoured in a former article to describe the general character of the debate which has occupied two nights of the past week in relation to the Irish Church. We have here a few words to say on a particular topic introduced into that debate—we mean, the endowment of the Catholic clergy in Ireland. Lord Eliot was the first to enter authoritatively on this question:—

“With regard to the proposition of a State provision for the Roman Catholic clergy, whatever might be the opinions as to that, it was not now the time to go into the subject. However he might think that this country, as a Protestant state, could not make an establishment for Roman Catholics an integral portion of the State, yet he was favourable to the endowment of the Roman Catholic clergy: but it was impossible to entertain that question now, as the Roman Catholics, and particularly the clergy, had absolutely stated that they were opposed to any such thing.” (Hear, hear.)

The exact meaning of the words printed in italics it would be difficult to guess; but in them the disposition of the Government is aptly enough hinted at.

Sir James Graham, likewise, gave his opinion “frankly” as follows:—“If he was asked as a matter of opinion, whether the articles of the Union, as now framed, would admit as the policy of the State, the making some endowments for the Catholic clergy, his interpretation of it was, that it was so framed as to admit of such a provision.”

The exact purport of Sir James Graham's statement it is not easy to understand; but the way in which it was understood by the House will be seen from the following paragraph from the speech of Lord John Russell:—

“From the statement made by the right honourable gentleman, I think it is intended that there should be endowments for the Roman Catholic clergy, but that no part of the property of the Protestant church should be taken for that purpose. The noble lord the Secretary for Ireland has likewise stated that he should have in principle no objection to give endowments to the Roman Catholics. Now, if ever that measure comes to be discussed as a substantive proposition, there are, as in everything no doubt, which can be stated on the subject, very serious objections to any endowment for the Roman Catholic church. Even supposing them to consent to it, out of the taxes paid by the people of England and Scotland, there are objections in the feelings of the people of this country to make any special Roman Catholic endowments. There are objections which will be felt very strongly to making the condition of Ireland so entirely different from that of England and Scotland. The Church of England depends on payment made by the land of England; the Church of Scotland also depends chiefly on payments by the land of Scotland; you will then propose a different system—that there shall be a large payment from the public funds of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, and that only the Protestant Church should depend on the land.” (Hear, hear.)

The interpretation thus put by Lord John Russell on Sir James Graham's declaration, was not denied. We take it for granted, then, that the first moment these worthies think they have a favourable opportunity, all the power and influence of the English Government, both at home and abroad, are to be used to force an endowment on the Catholic clergy of Ireland. This being so, we may gather from a passage in Sir Robert Peel's speech his notion of the connection which, under such an endowment, would exist between the Church and the State:—

“I think you cannot have an Established Church connected with the State without that Church submitting to stringent laws permitting the exercise of influence in its appointments. I THINK IT WOULD BE A GREAT EVIL TO ASSIGN EMOLUMENT TO A PARTICULAR FORM OF RELIGIOUS WORSHIP IF THE INFLUENCE OF THE CROWN OVER THE APPOINTMENT OF SPIRITUAL PROFESSORS WAS ENTIRELY DESTROYED. I should be sorry to see the election of bishops perfectly independent of the influence of the Crown. I should be sorry to see the Church exercising the powers it formerly possessed in convocation. I consider it of great importance that the spiritual authority of the Church should be restrained as it is now restrained, and made subordinate to Parliament. (Cheers, especially from some individual member.) I wish the hon. gentleman would be good enough to cheer exactly in the place which would enable me to judge whether he assents to or dissents from my proposition. (Hear, hear.) Then I am to presume that he is in favour of the powers of the Church in convocation. ("No, no"—laughter.) What I am contending for is, that the Church which has a right to certain emoluments ought to be subject to certain legislative regulations. I should object to spiritual authority exempt from all civil control. I should object to the removal of that species of influence now exercised by the Crown. (Cheers.) Instead of leaving the election of bishops, according to the technicalities of the law, to the chapters of cathedrals, I prefer the existence of the influence of the Crown. But the Roman Catholics tell us distinctly that they are not prepared to permit the exercise of any such control over their spiritual appointments: therefore, if there were no reason for a decided preference of the Protestant faith, let me say that in Ireland the terms offered by the two parties are not equal."

Observe, the Home Secretary tells us that endowments are to be forced on the Catholic clergy; the Prime Minister adds, that this shall not be done without giving the State a right to control the appointments of Church dignitaries. The deliberate and abominable intention, therefore, of the present Cabinet is to enslave the Church through the instrumentality of endowments. Of this we have no more doubt than we have of our own existence.

But, for the proof of this we do not depend merely upon newspaper reports of speeches, though these are significant enough. We will lay before our readers the outline of a case which has recently been adjudged by the Colonial Office, and which clearly explains the notions of the present Cabinet on the meaning of an endowment, and on the uses to which it may be turned. We may add, that the facts of this case are well known to several of our Irish, and, as we believe, to not a few of our English readers. If, therefore, we are wrong in the colouring we give this affair, it admits of easy correction.

A Catholic priest recently held during good pleasure a purely spiritual appointment, to which he was named directly by the Holy See, and for which he received from the Colonial Office a certain salary. This individual, we are sorry to say, was found after his appointment to be not very exemplary in his behaviour; and inasmuch as the Church of God has powers of discipline which the Establishment has not, the unfortunate man was induced to give the Holy See a written resignation of his function. His resignation was of course accepted, and in due time his successor was appointed. But, meanwhile, the former functionary returns to his cure, pretends to hold his original employment, and claims and receives the salary. The case is brought under the notice of Lord Stanley. It was proved to his Lordship that the Holy See had superseded the original holder of the office, and that a successor had been appointed. With that successor he had many personal interviews, and he professed to have no doubt that the person in question had been superseded by Rome, and that the appointment of the successor had been perfectly regular and orderly. "But," he said "this difficulty arises. The superseded priest is recognised at the Colonial Office as the person entitled to the salary, and I cannot deprive him of his salary except for some default such as the maxims of the Colonial Office allow me to recognise." "Well," it was answered, "we show your lordship cause. This priest was a mere nominee of the Pope, and agreeable to Canon Law his appointment has been revoked by the Holy See, as we have already proved." "No," said the Secretary, "I cannot recognise such a ground for depriving a civil officer of his salary. Moreover, I will not deprive him of his salary until I have heard what he has to say in his defence, through the governor of the colony in which he resides. But, as you say that he has actually signed a written resignation, I will make over the salary to his successor whenever that document is produced, after I have received and am satisfied with the governor's report." To this peremptory language, by which Lord Stanley erected himself into an umpire between Rome and its rebellious subject, there was no reply. The sic volo sic jubeo of a Colonial Secretary is omnipotent even to protect the worst of criminals. However, the gentlemen who were in communication with him offered to procure an attested copy of the resignation. No; even this would not suit his lordships; and ultimately, after months of schism, scandal, and the most shocking abominations resulting from the ungoverned (or rather ill-governed) state of the flock the spiritual rule over which was the subject of dispute, the Holy See had actually to send over to England the original letter of resignation before it could get civil leave (forsooth) to dismiss one of its own servants, and appoint a worthy in place of an unworthy shepherd over the flock. To the last Lord Stanley deliberately refused to concede anything to the legitimate exercise by Rome of its own canonical rights over its own officers. And to this day an immoral and scandalous priest would have continued to spread the contagion of his foul example unless he had happened to sign a voluntary abdication, or unless the Protestant Lord Stanley had become satisfied, through the report of a Protestant governor of a colony, that the Holy See had had good grounds for the exercise of its authority.

This, then, is what one of the least bigotted of the present Ministers means by endowments and influence. He means—joint authority exercised by Rome and Downing-street, over the Catholic priesthood, and the larger share of authority to be exercised by Downing-street.

So satisfied are we of the treacherous intentions of the Ministers on this subject; so certain are we that in any negotiations which may be entered into the British Government will get an undue advantage by some slippery trick, and by its superior acquaintance with the practical working of our system of administration—that though favourable in the abstract to the principle of an endowment, we declare to God that, under present circumstances, we would willingly die on the scaffold rather than such pernicious negotiations should be set on foot.—Tablet.

RAFFAELLE'S PAINTINGS.

'What works I have seen of Raffaele's!—what religion there is in his paintings!—go any distance out of your way to see pictures of that master—they breathe all they represent—there is an atmosphere of piety around them. His pencil was baptised in the fire of devotion, as that of no other mortal ever was?"

'Which do you think his best work?'

'The Madonna del Spasimo at Madrid. I have mentioned it in my 'Sketches—it produced a more striking effect upon me than any other picture I ever saw. One must become half-Catholic to enter fully into the glories of Italian art—religion with us is a cold, reluctant duty. We acknowledge God, but fear to love him. We are afraid of anything that fit our minds for devotion—we make religion a duty, not an affection—when the formality of worship is over, we have done. The true spirit, superstition, devotion, whatever you will, was in the heart of the Italian artist—it oozed out at the end of his pencil, bathing his work in the beauty of holiness.'—Recollections of the Author of "Vathek." By Cyrus Redding, Esq.

THE BIRMINGHAM PROTEST.

We have pleasure in calling attention to the interesting and important communication from our English correspondent, giving an account of the great meeting held at Birmingham on Monday, to sympathise with the people of Ireland. The ground taken at that meeting, in reference to the prosecution, trial, sentence and imprisonment of Mr O'Connell and his fellow-martyrs, is new; and in the eyes of Government will, doubtless, be considered as presumptuous in the extreme. The law lays it down, that the man who says or does anything which would have the effect of bringing the House of Commons into contempt, is guilty of sedition. How much more aggravated must the guilt of the people of Birmingham be, when they solemnly and deliberately protest, under the presidency of their Mayor, that not the House of Commons only, but the Government itself have, in present circumstances no more constitutional right to legislate for and govern them than the King of Saxony or the Emperor of all the Russias. Their words are:—

"Resolved—That we, the inhabitants of the borough of Birmingham, in town's meeting assembled, do hereby record our solemn protest against the prosecution, trial, sentence, and imprisonment of Daniel O'Connell and his co-defendants.

"First, Because the government by which the prosecution has been conducted was placed in power by the corrupt influence of the aristocracy, is maintained in office by a House of Commons in the choice of which the great majority of the community have no voice, governs by means of a standing army and the power of physical force, and does not express the judgment of the people of these realms."

This is plain speaking. There is no beating about the bush here, and yet the language is at once deliberate, dignified, and firm.

By a fiction in law, the Crown is presumed to be present as the prosecutor in all our criminal courts of justice, and hence the Queen alone can exercise the prerogative of mercy; but this fiction the Birmingham protest throws to the winds, and emphatically pleads with the Crown to do justice to Daniel O'Connell, and "all the other great interests which the prosecution involves."

The question now arises—how can the Crown give effect to the prayer of the Birmingham memorial? That question the Crown itself can best answer. In former times, when its prerogative was invaded, measures were soon devised for its protection. The people now complain that their rights and liberties have been invaded, and they go to the foot of the Throne and emphatically memorialise their beloved Sovereign to afford redress, and undo the wrong which the administration has done. Birmingham is not to be left alone in this patriotic movement, as will be seen from the reports we have given of meetings on the same subject in other places—Weekly Chronicle, June 22.

THE MONASTERY OF EINSIEDELN.

It was a "holy and a wholesome thought" which, in the days of ancient faith, prompted men of all conditions of life occasionally to forsake the occupations and pursuits of their temporal callings, to perform some devout pilgrimage to one or other of the many hallowed sites which religion had pointed out to the peculiar reverence of the world. Such peregrinations revived in human breasts the flame of piety, which, amidst the distracting cares of ordinary existence, had too often flickered and grown dim; and from them men returned with chastened and humble minds, less wedded to the things of earth, more intent on those of heaven!

In these our self-boastful times, the pious practices of our forefathers have fallen into disrepute and disuse, although, thanks to God, there are even now "faithful men left," who, in those parts of Europe unscathed by heresy, honour the memory, by following the example, of olden days, and still visit, in the character of religious pilgrims, time-honoured scenes of edification.

Perhaps of all the spots which, in our quarter of the world, attract, at the present day, the greatest concourse of devotional visitants, is the famous monastery of Einsiedeln. No particular beauty of situation, nor magnificence of architecture, have contributed to the celebrity of the abbey of Einsiedeln, consisting of a vast mass of building, erected in the beginning of the eighteenth century, and standing on a desolate tract of table land, 3,000 feet above the level of the sea. The village of Einsiedeln is reached by ascending Mount Etzel, along a road which is dotted with small chapels, at each of which the representation of some event in the passion of Christ, invites the passing pilgrim to halt and offer prayer. Aloof from its humble dwellings, stands the convent, on a stately site upon the hill side.

The origin of this monastic establishment, dates from the days of Charlemagne, when a holy anchorite named Meinrad, of the noble house of Hohenzollern, is recorded to have sought this remote solitude, and to have cherished with peculiar veneration a black image of the blessed Virgin, which had been given to him by St. Hildegard, abbess of Zurich. The good hermit was murdered in 861 by two robbers, and their guilt is traditionally alleged to have been brought to light by ravens, which had been reared by Meinrad, who unceasingly pursued his assassins. The reputation of sanctity attaching to the spot where he had resided, so greatly increased after his death, that his cell was restored, and a church built in the wilderness, by a community of Benedictine monks. During the nine centuries that have since elapsed, the monastery of Einsiedeln had progressively flourished. Immense domains became annexed to it, the Church treasury was enriched by the most gorgeous offerings, the most illustrious nobles became its abbots, and had acquired rights of jurisdiction which assimilated their dignity and power to those of sovereign princes.

The armies of the French revolution,—that universal scourge, which seems to have left unmolested no establishment in Europe, however consecrated by time, and utility, and general reverence!—stripped the abbey of its accumulated treasures, and are said to have carried away the original image of "Our Lady of the Hermits." At the present day, however, the monks of Einsiedeln are still the richest community in Switzerland, and another figure of the blessed Virgin perpetuates the memory of the former one. Protestants, of course, scoff at the simple-mindedness which extracts matter for devotional feeling from the contemplation of an old wooden image,—willfully confounding with worship of the figure itself, the veneration intended to be manifested for her of whom it is the fancied effigy. Such accusations of idolatrous practice, repeatedly brought against us by our adversaries, have been as constantly and as uselessly refuted; for prejudice is stronger than even the voice of truth. Suffice it to observe, with regard to the original or substituted black figure of our Lady of Einsiedeln, that, rude or fantastic as may be its aspect, if by gazing upon it the humble Tyrolese peasant finds his thoughts directed heavenwards, his feelings are as lofty, and as legitimate, and as well entitled to respect, as those of any prouder devotee, who should seek and find the same devotional inspiration before a Madonna of Raphael or Canova.

The tide of pilgrims now, as heretofore, unceasingly sets in the direction of the monastery of Einsiedeln, and the church of the convent is perpetually thronged with devotees from all parts of Central Europe. It is an edifice of no very great architectural pretension, though profusely adorned with paintings, marbles, and gilding. A few paces from the entrance, stands the shrine of our Lady of Einsiedeln. Within a chapel of black marble, and by the glare of an ever-burning lamp, the pilgrim gazes through an iron grating at the holy and venerated image of the Mother of our Redeemer, and pours forth his prayers to heaven through her gracious intercession. Votive pictures hang around, in number seemingly without limit, simple, touching memorials, as it appears to us, of warm and artless fervour.

The Benedictine community of Einsiedeln was, in 1835, seventy-seven in number, including professed monks, lay brothers, and novices. A library, containing 26,000 volumes, a museum, and extensive accommodation for a large monastic establishment, impress the visitor with exalted notions of its past and present celebrity. As many as 32,000 pilgrims have been known to repair to the shrine, within a fortnight; and, at stated seasons of the year, their influx is marked by the most pompous processions, and imposing religious solemnities.

Is not the spirit of pilgrimage an inherent peculiarity in human nature? Directed by Catholic devotion, it finds vent in such scenes as the church of Einsiedeln, to which the traditions of centuries impart a character of extraordinary sanctity. Divested, as in England, of all connexion with religion, it becomes closely identified with that morbid curiosity that impels thousands to visit any remote bye lane or lonely outhouse that happens to become the theatre of some murder of most unusual atrocity.—Catholic Magazine.

MISCELLANEA.

CORK, APRIL 15.—To the Editor of the TABLET.—Sir—In the memory of the oldest inhabitant, the Catholic Church of St Finhan, in this city, was never so thronged by such vast assemblages of souls as every evening during this Lent attended to hear the unbroken chain of our Church, the Very Rev. Archdeacon O'Keefe. Protestants, Presbyterians, Catholics—all, all pressed forward to hear the greatest reasoner our Church can boast of; and well he fulfilled his sacred duty in expounding the sacred word, and sending home to every breast its truth and irresistibility. In his arguments from Scripture, reason, and tradition, he need not fear a rival, from the soundness of his views and the integrity of his thinkings, all drawn from the Book of Eternal Life, which he rightly had by him in the pulpit, when lecturing to admiring thousands.—CATHOLICUS.

DEPARTURE OF RT. REV. DOCTOR WALSH.—On Sunday, March 3, at noon, this amiable and reverend prelate embarked in the Hibernia for Europe. He was followed by the tears and prayers of thousands, whose hope of a speedy reunion with their beloved pastor could scarcely soften the pang of affliction at his departure. On Friday his lordship celebrated the holy mysteries in the cathedral. It was known that this would be the last occasion for some months, upon which the people could corporeally unite with the bishop in that ardent prayer to heaven, which his word had so often taught and his example so strongly inculcated. The church was crowded in every part. A sense of deep and soul-felt devotion impressed itself upon the assembled thousands. Never was the fervour of the heart more manifested in the expression of the human countenance, than while the living mass breathed a prayer to the "Giver of every good gift" for a happy progress and blessed issue to his journey, who had so devotedly laboured in the cause of charity, and who now voluntarily undertook such a lengthened pilgrimage to restore its holy reign in Halifax.—Register.

THE
BENGAL
CATHOLIC HERALD

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

No. 12.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 21, 1844.

[Vol. VII.]

THE RIGHT REV. DR. OLLIFFE, BISHOP OF MILENE AND COADJUTOR VICAR APOSTOLIC OF BENGAL.

We have to apologise for not having published in our last, the Apostolic Brief by which the Right Rev. Dr. Olliffe is constituted Coadjutor Vicar Apostolic of Bengal with the right of succession.

On Sunday the eighth instant, a solemn Pontifical High Mass was sung by his Lordship in the Cathedral, assisted by the Rev. I. X. Mascarenhas as Deacon, and the Rev. Mr. Formosa as Sub-Deacon. Several of the interesting young ecclesiastics who accompanied his Lordship from Europe, performed the duties of Acolytes, Thurifer, &c. respectively, and a plenary Indulgence imparted by his Lordship by a special privilege from the Sovereign Pontiff to such as assisted at his Lordship's Mass, and complied with the other ordinary conditions for the gaining of an Indulgence, added a peculiar and affecting solemnity to the occasion. We observed our venerated Archbishop in the Sanctuary, during the entire solemnity, apparently in excellent health and spirits, and much consoled by the timely relief which our good God has provided for the pressing wants of religion in this extensive Vicariate, in the person of his amiable Coadjutor and the Missionaries who accompanied his Lordship from Europe to Calcutta.

About 150 persons approached the Holy Communion. After the Gospel had been chaunted, the following Apostolic Brief was read aloud from the pulpit, by the Rev. Mr. Mascarenhas.

GREGORY XVI. POPE.

To his beloved Son, Thomas Olliffe, an Irish Priest.

Beloved Son, Greeting and the Apostolical Benediction.

Our Venerable Brother, Patrick Joseph

Carew, Archbishop of Edessa, and Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, having had it communicated to us, that, in consequence of the peculiar circumstances, and wide extent of the Bengal Apostolic Vicariate, he would require to receive from us, the relief and assistance of a Coadjutor Bishop, with the right of future succession—We, by the advice of our venerable brethren, the Cardinals of the holy Roman Church, who superintend the affairs of the Propaganda Fide, have decided to appoint you to that Coadjutorship, of whose piety, learning, prudence and zeal in promoting the Catholic faith we have received the most favourable reports. Absolving you, therefore, by the tenor of these letters, and declaring you to be absolved from all excommunications, suspensions and interdicts, and all other ecclesiastical sentences, censures and penalties inflicted in any manner or for any reason whatsoever, (if per chance you have incurred any) and having by similar Apostolical letters, bearing this same date, appointed you Bishop of Milene, in partibus infidelium,—We, by our Apostolical authority, elect, constitute and appoint you by these presents, Coadjutor of the aforesaid Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, with the right of future succession; with this proviso, however, that while the abovementioned Patrick Joseph is alive, you are not to interfere in the regimen and administration of the said Vicariate, except so far as the same Patrick Joseph may be pleased to ordain, and that you are bound to execute and fulfil whatsoever orders he may give you in that administration. But if the same Patrick Joseph should depart this life, or perchance should already have departed (which God forbid), or should the aforesaid Vicariate be in any other manner deprived of him, We, by the authority and tenor above mentioned, create and appoint you (now for then) in his place, Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, with all and each of the faculties, which have been hitherto in any way granted and conferred by this Apostolic See on the aforesaid Patrick Joseph for the good of that Vicariate, always however subject to the authority of the same Congregation of Cardinals. We, therefore, in virtue of holy obedience, command all and each who are concerned and whom it may for the time being concern, to receive and admit you, according to the tenor of these presents to the office of Coadjutor, and at the proper time, to that of Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, and to the free exercise of that office. We command them to assist and obey you in all matters appertaining to that office, and to receive and execute your admonitions; otherwise, whatever sentence or penalty you may inflict on the refractory, shall be ratified by us, and by the authority of the Lord, we shall take care that it be inviolably observed, until condign satisfaction be rendered; notwithstanding any Apostolical constitutions, and decrees, and edicts to the contrary.

Given at St. Mary Major's, Rome, under the ring of the Fisherman, on the 26th day of August, MDCCCXLI. the thirteenth year of our Pontificate.

(Signed) ALOYSIUS,
Cardinal Lambruschini

(True Translation.)

✠ P. J. CAREW,
Archbishop of Edessa,
Vicar Apostolic of Bengal

✠

The Right Rev. Father in God, Thomas, by the Grace of God, and favor of the Apostolic See, Bishop of Milene, Coadjutor Vicar Apostolic of Bengal, by virtue of a special privilege from the Holy See, grants to all here present, who shall this day have received the Holy Eucharist, a plenary Indulgence in the usual form of the Church. Such persons are requested to supplicate the Almighty for the welfare of our most Holy Father Pope Gregory, 16th—for that of his Grace the Archbishop, V. A.—of his Lordship the Bishop of Milene, and of our Holy Father the Church.

DUM DUM.

Right Rev. Dr. Olliffe will celebrate Pontifical High Mass on next Sunday, the 1st instant, at Dum Dum. A collection will be made on the occasion in favor of the Orphanage.

The following beautiful verses on Miss Nano Nagle, whose edifying life we have laid before our readers, are from the pen of the lamented Gerald Griffin Esq., author of the "Collegians" and of the exquisite lines on "the Sister of Charity," which have already appeared in this Journal.

NANO NAGLE,

FOUNDRESS OF THE PRESENTATION AND URSULINE ORDERS OF NUNS IN IRELAND, WHICH ARE DEVOTED CHIEFLY TO THE EDUCATION OF THE POOR.

I.

'Twas the garden of Christendom, tended with care;
Ev'ry flow'et of Eden grew peacefully there;
When the fire of the spoiler on Lombardy blazed,
And the Moslem shout in the desert was raised,
And high o'er the wreck of a fear-stricken world,
The standard of hell to the winds was unfurled,
Faith, bleeding, retired to the land of the west,
And with Science, her handmaid, sought shelter and rest.

II.

With a warm burst of welcome that shelter was given;
Her breast open'd wide to the envoy of heaven;
In the screen of her bowers was the stranger conceal'd,
'Till her pantings were hushed and her bruises were heal'd.
From the hall of the Righ, to the shieling afar
All echoed her glory, all greeted her star,
In the depth of our glen, were her secrets adored
And our mountain shone out in the light of the Lord.

III.

Ye ivy-clad relics, resqunding no more,
With the swell of the anthem, from shore unt shore,
Ye crags of the ocean, ye caves, in whose gloom
The saint found a home, and the martyr a tomb
Ye arrows of vengeance forgot in the quiver,
Ye death-shouts of enmity silenced for ever,
Ye roods of the wilderness hoary with years,
Ye knew of her triumph—ye know of her tear

IV.

Ye speak of that time when the cells of the wet
Gave voice after voice to the choir of the blest,
When a breathing of pray'r in the desert was heard;
And the angel came down and the waters we stir'd;
When the church of the isles saw her glory arise,
Columba the dove-like and Carthage the wise;
And the school and the temple gave light to each shore,
From cliffed Iona to wooded Lismore.

V.

There's a mist on the eye—there's a wail on each ear—
Fly doves of the temple!—the falcon is near!
There's a change in the heavens—there's a ring of gloom,
And the mountains are black with the hur the tomb.

There's a ringing of steel, there's a voice in the bower;
 'Tis the death-shriek of Charity striving with Power;
 With finger inverted rude Ignorance smiled,
 And grim Passion exulted when mind was exiled.

VI.

Woe, woe for the ruin that broods o'er thy towers!
 Fair garden of Christendom where are thy flowers?
 Oh say, when that thunder-cloud burst on thy shore,
 Stood thy Faith as the Skellig when Ocean is hoar?
 Say, smiled she undaunted when Hope look'd aghast,
 And when Learning lay prostrate, stood Piety fast?
 Oh, answer ye mountains that witnessed the zeal,
 When the Faith of our sires dared the dungeon and steel!

VII.

Ev'n still, though the tempest is hushed on our plains,
 On the minds of our Country the havoc remains;
 Peace grieves o'er her temples on mountain and shore,
 Sad History's witnesses, vocal no more.
 Shall no Sabbath arise on our week-day of care?
 Is no waking reserved for our sleep of despair?
 Ha, see!—there's a shooting of light in the gloom,
 And the spirit of Nagle replies from the tomb.

VIII.

Hail, star of the lowly! Apostle of light;
 In the glow of whose fervour the cottage grew bright!
 Sweet violet of sanctity, lurking conceal'd,
 'Till the wind lifts the leaf and the bloom is reveal'd;
 By the light of that glory which burst on thy youth,
 In its day-dream of pleasure, and woke it to truth,
 By the tears thou hast shed, by the toils thou hast borne,
 Oh, say, shall our night know a breaking of morn?

IX.

"As the dawn on the lingering night of the north;
 To the hills of the west has the mandate gone forth;
 In the desolate aisles there's a murmur of praise,
 And the lost lamp of science rekindles its rays.
 The voice of lament in our island shall cease.
 And her cities rejoice in the sunlight of peace;
 From her sleep of enchantment young Erin shall rise,
 And again be the home of the holy and wise."

AGRA.—We understand that the Right Rev. Dr. Carli, Coadjutor Vicar Apostolic, Agra, left that place on the 27th ultimo, on a tour to Gwalior.

ST. XAVIER'S COLLEGE.—The Steamer Bentick which arrived last Thursday evening, has brought an accession to the College of St. Xavier in the person of the Rev. Mr. McCann, well known as one of the eminent Professors at Stonyhurst College.

THE REV. MR. RABASCALL.—This Rev. Gentleman has taken his departure on the Steamer Hindustan which left this port on the 18th instant. He goes, in obedience to the wishes of his Superior, to Aden, to take charge of an important post in that city. This worthy and truly amiable Missionary during the short period, about three years, he served in the Bengal Mission, has greatly endeared himself to the Catholic Community by his exemplary conduct, zeal and piety. Among the Catholics of Serampore, in which place the Rev. Mr. Rabascall's exertions for the good of religion shone most conspicuously, his departure is sincerely regretted, and we are sure that his recollection will be long cherished at Serampore.

The Rev. Mr. McGirr, one of the Clergy who accompanied Bishop Oliffe, has been appointed in the Rev. Mr. Rabascall's place at Serampore.

PROTESTANT MISSION—TAHITI.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

DEAR SIR,—Some days ago perusing one of the numbers of the Courier de l'Europe, a French newspaper printed in England, I read in it an article taken from the Constitutionnelle relating to TAHITI which, for the edification of the supporters of the Protestant Mission, I have the pleasure to send you.

The Protestant Missionaries reached Tahiti for the first time in the year 1799, but they were for some years without any influence. In 1809 they established a society for the support of the Mission, receiving from the members contributions of oil, pigs, potatoes, &c. In 1822 the Gospellers gathered from the Island of Tahiti 9226 bamboos of oil (each bamboo containing four pounds,) 28 pigs, 1333 pounds of arrow-root, 191 bales of cotton, &c.

Pomare, the second, in his old age divided his time in drinking and reading the scriptures. The Missionaries took advantage of it to frame a code of religious and civil laws, which were promulgated during the last year of their feeble King, and which have been in force from that time till the French took the islanders under their protection.

Perusing the following laws you will see that the Missionaries were right in their own way to raise their voice against what they called invasion.

"2d Article of the code of laws.

"Any person guilty of idolatry or returning to their former religion shall be condemned to death.

"A Pig found in the street, having no marks to show to whom they belong, a part shall become the property of the Missionaries.

"5. Persons accused of sedition or disturbing the public peace shall be judged by Missionaries only."

"12. Persons defaming the character of Missionaries or dissuading people to assist them with their persons or property shall be fined and a part of the money shall be given to the Missionaries."

"15. Persons hearing natives or foreigners speaking against the Missionaries and not giving notice to the public meeting, shall be sentenced to hard labour."

"16. Persons professing doctrines contrary to those taught by the Missionaries, shall be guilty of heresy and be judged by the Missionaries."

"17. Persons paying attention to the writings of a foreigner not belonging to the Missionary society, keeping such writings, or not bringing them to the Missionaries, the writings shall be burned and the person in whose possession they were found shall be punished by the Missionaries."

"18. No Merchandise can be taken on board of any vessel without obtaining the permission of the Judges and Missionaries."

"20. No persons to be received as Jurors or Judges, except those baptized and belonging to the Church; an appeal may be made from an inferior Judge to a superior one or to the Missionaries, but no appeal from their decision."

"Persons not contributing to the Missionary society cannot be trusted, and are not considered fit to hold any government situation."

"Persons denouncing sinners to the chief Missionary or public meetings shall be considered deserving to fill a higher situation in the Church or State."

Yours &c.

J. B.

CONVERSIONS.

To the Editor of the Catholic Herald.

DEAR SIR,—Two young Protestant Ladies were on Tuesday last received into the pale of the Roman Catholic Church by the Rev. Mr. E. Vassili, Vicar of Dhurrumtollah. I regret indeed that there were only a few persons to witness the devotion and very edifying piety wherewith the two young Ladies farewell to their former creed and the Holy Catholic faith and submitted their delicate neck to the heavy yoke of Christ. May God preserve from corruption their innocent hearts, and lastly bestow on them both an everlasting happiness!

September 1844.

ONALATI.

* By this Act it is evident that the Missionaries considered themselves the closest between the King and his subjects.

LETTER NO. XIX.

FROM A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA TO HIS PROTESTANT FRIENDS IN EUROPE.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—I shall in this letter bring to a conclusion my remarks upon Unity, and Protestant disunion, by a reference to the union in the Catholic Church. The words of the Psalmist here force themselves upon my attention relative to the point at issue, when he says, "Shall not Sion say, this man and that man is born in her and the Highest himself hath founded her. The Lord shall tell in his writings of peoples and of princes, of them that have been in her." Can it be that "the Highest himself hath founded" your collective sects? I cannot, and will not believe it, for I challenge you, Church of England, to show me where was "this man and that man," born in you, before the days of Cranmer, Ridley, Latimer, &c. I challenge you, Kirk of Scotland, to show me where was "this man and that man born in you," before the days of Calvin and Knox; I challenge you, Church of Germany, to show me where was "this man and that man born in you," before the days of Luther and Melancthon; yes, I challenge you all; show me Wesley—show me Roe—show me Servetus—show me Baptists—show me Plymouth Brethren—show me Heads of every Protestant sect, where was "this man and that man"—"these peoples—those princes, born in you," before you established your contradictory conventicles? I ask each and all of you in vain, to show them in yours.—You cannot; your books are blank; you begin your "writings" in the year of our Lord 1517, and downwards; each sect from its own epoch, enumerates, independently of the rest, its own Saints, and martyrs; the Saints of the one are not the Saints of the other. Oh! holy Catholic Church! I cannot but address thee in the language of the royal Prophet; "Glorious things are said of thee, O city of God," of thee O holy Catholic Church! in you alone is to be found "this man and that man born in her," in all ages—in "thy congregation, which thou hast possessed from the beginning."—From Timothy of Paul to Gregory XVI of the 19th century, what a glorious race of Doctors, holy Bishops, and great Popes, can she show in her "writings." Her Irenaeus, Tertullians, Cyprians, Basils, Chrysostoms, Gregories, Augustines, Kexiers, Salés, Rossettis, Penelons, &c. of every generation since "the Highest himself hath founded her." What hosts of "peoples," what armies of "Princes," what armies of martyrs, what multitudes of pure virgins, has she not produced, "let them all be founded and turned back that hate Sion."

Yes, my friends, I fearlessly ask thee to come forward and show to me the disunion and the division in the Catholic Church; your writers indeed have asserted that different Councils and different Popes have been opposed to each other; but we have over and over again pressed them to name the Councils which thus differed, and the points of faith upon which they split; in vain we did this, for we asked you for what did not exist, facts,—so their assertions go for what you may value them at; for believe me, you often purchase calumny and misrepresentation at a very high price; it was only the other day that a Protestant officer, and to whom I have already alluded, wrote to me a long controversial letter, and wherein he says that “Pope Pius IV. made eight new Articles of Faith.” But this gentleman, like thousands of you, and who declare the same, could not distinguish through the clouds of prejudice, between the difference of defining (as in the Council of Trent) and making Articles of faith: One of the “new Articles,” this gentleman mentions, is Purgatory; the ecclesiastical student may be inclined to laugh at being told that this article was made about the year 1544. Then you attempt to bring a charge against our religious orders; that they are, like yourselves, but sects and divided on points of faith; even this very officer says, “your Augustine Monks, Dominicans, &c. have each pretended to be more gifted than the others,” but most of you go much farther than this. It is difficult indeed to give you an idea what various feelings we experience when we first read of such charges as these; some feel contempt, some indignation, some pity, and some are moved to laughter, but at last all to sorrow, to see how hopeless almost is your case; when we behold you thus so easily blinded, and misguided, and held as it were in a vice, by the fangs of prejudice, bigotry, and intolerant rancour. In the name of God, my dear friends, satisfy your own senses and reason; visit our Religious Orders, give notice of your intent, or take them by surprise, watch their acts, study their doctrines, view their form of worship, hear their prayers, and what will you find in each and all?—Oh! glorious mark of the Church of Christ, Unity in doctrine and worship; holiness and sanctity! If you do not return a convert to Catholicism, you will at least go home convinced that the charge that our Orders are divided into sects like Protestantism, is the foulest malignity; such a charge sent might indeed make you more envious, and throw you into a fever of contemplation; yet, it may be remark-to all human comprehension there is no place where one might suppose sects and divisions were more likely to break out than in those religious and secluded societies; let Protestantism attempt it; and it will find the thing impracticable, because it will only have human agency to control and direct the wavering and innovating spirit of man; sects and divisions innumerable would appear amongst them, particularly if religion and the Bible were the subjects of meditation and study; the spirit of private interpretation and fanaticism would soon run rank and wild,—you dare not try the test! How is it then that the Catholic religious houses keep together year after year, generation after generation? How is this, when Catholics in other respects are nothing different in nature and constitution from Protestants? Truly it may well—if you study the matter—arouse your wonder, and if you were not to smother all feelings it would draw forth your admiration, for you see nothing like it in any other class of religionists; there are sects in Protestantism—sects in Mahomedanism—sects in Hinduism, sects in every sect, but none in Catholicism! So jealous is the Church of Rome of retaining Unity, so faithfully does she guard her sacred trust, that the moment any class of men are finally and incorrigibly guilty of schism then she separates them from her community, as a good and a careful shepherd would separate diseased sheep from the rest of his flock; yet, she increases in numbers, instead of decreasing, like a nursery of plants that has all stunted and decayed ones pulled out, and all weeds thrown over the wall, while those plants that remain augment in size and improve in quality, for as the prophet says, “instead of shrub shall come up the fir-tree, and instead of the nettle shall come up the myrtle-tree.” This wonderful fact, my friends, is worthy your deepest study; in vain will you endeavour to account for this mighty spiritual union, not only of Western Europe, but of all nations which heretics laboured at great expense of blood and treasure, and by the aid of arms and decrees of our prelates, and the aid of happy martyrs, and the aid of councils and meetings of bishops, and themselves in the discharges of their duty, and the study of the Bible, and the prohibitions which they issued, and the excommunications which they pronounced, and the wars which they waged, with respect to the unity of the Church.

It is the cause of peace and concord among all ages and peoples, and the cause of the triumph of truth over error, and the cause of the triumph of the Gospel over the world.

merciful dispensation of that ruling Being which guides the whirlwind and directs the storm of human passions, these are kept and held under restraint by the same mighty spirit which hushed the raging winds and calmed the turbulent sea, so does he guide and keep together the Catholic Church through the dark vista of ages; to her alone can be applied the prophecy of Isaiah. "Behold thou shalt call a nation, which thou knewest not, and the nations that knew not thee shall run to thee, because of thy Lord, thy God, and for the holy one of Israel for he hath glorified thee." I may in some respects not anaptly compare the Catholic Church to the constitution of a bee-hive; its members are most numerous, all work for the common weal, with one mind, and one spirit; each has its own work assigned to it, and the most complete unanimity exists among the whole, and the most beautiful arrangement may be observed in all the internal compartments; in fact the most admirable unity influences the whole body—those that are drones, and worthless are cast out of the community. You will find in this the sweetest and purest honey, virgin honey, and when winter comes on—when storms arise—when night falls, or an enemy appears, then you will find them take shelter under the same dome, or see them all assemble and unite as one to oppose the common foe; so is the Church under the high dome of Heaven, all united in perfect harmony and bond of peace, "all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication,"—let schism or heresy appear, and the "watchmen" upon her towers instantly give the alarm;—witness the late Jubilee for Spain. But, my friends, can you thus picture Protestantism, and concentrate a portion of its separate and hostile members as it were under one hive, one temple? Ah! my friends, it would pain you were I to contrast them to wasps, hornets, gnats, and vipers; but what under heaven will you dies were on such a comparison. The olive pale of the Roman Catholic Church by the Rev. Mr. E. Veralli, Vicar of Dhurru, dear Sir. I regret indeed that there were only a few persons to witness the devotion, and very edifying piety wherewith the two young Ladies bade farewell to their former creed, and embraced the Holy Catholic faith, and submitted their delicate neck to the heavy yoke of Christ. May God preserve from corruption their innocent hearts, and lastly bestow on them both an everlasting happiness!

September 1844.

ONALATI.

By this act it is evident that the Missionaries established themselves as Judges between the King and subjects.

round the Garden of Eden to guard it against pollution, so has he given and promised this glorious spirit would circumsolve round his Church and keep her as in "a garden enclosed—as a Fountain sealed up," against the intermixture of all impurities to "the end of time," or in the simple and touching words of the Psalmist, "Grace is poured abroad on thy lips, therefore hath God blessed thee (the Church) for ever." The royal Prophet himself asks you to "mark about Sion, and go round about her; tell the towers thereof; mark ye well her bulwarks; consider her palaces that ye may tell it to the generation following." So "mark ye well" that this unity, order and peace, that these "towers, bulwarks and palaces" are only to be found in the Catholic Church, and that she alone can "tell to the generation following" of the generations preceding as all "born in her." Mark ye well, that it was of her it was foretold, "Therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows." Yes, this "oil of gladness" is the sweet unction of unity, which Protestantism has not and Catholicism possesses. In conclusion, I invite you, my dear friends, in the inspired language of the Psalmist, to enter the fold of the Catholic Church, and there to "Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in Unity." !!

Your's faithfully,

C. A. C.

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

Collections at Chinsurah, from the Right Wing of H. M. 10th, through the Rev.

Mr. Boulogne, Rs. 28 0

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

Mr. J. Gorman, Dum Dum, through the Rev. Mr. Mascarenhas, Rs. 5 0

ST. THOMAS CHURCH.

Dr. Charlton, through His Grace the Archbishop, Rs. 100 0

Captain and Mrs. Mottet, through do. " 30 0

TRIBUTE TO CAPTAIN VOS S OF THE SERINGAPATAM.

Rev. R. Johnson, Rector of St. Xavier's

K. College, Rs. 10 0

every M. C. Ireland, 15 0

Miss Gurnin, 10 0

Miss Gurnin, 10 0

Miss Gurnin, 5 0

Miss Gurnin, 10 0

Miss Gurnin, 8 0

Miss Gurnin, 16 0

ROME.

CIRCULAR LETTER FROM HIS HOLINESS THE POPE—TO ALL PATRIARCHS, PRIMATES, ARCH-BISHOPS, AND BISHOPS.

Venerable Brethren, health and greeting Apostolical.—Amongst the many attempts which the enemies of Catholicism, under whatever denomination they may appear, are daily making in our age, to seduce the truly Faithful, and deprive them of the holy instruction of the faith (les saints enseignemens de la foi), the efforts of those Bible societies are conspicuous, which, originally established in England, and propagated throughout the universe, labour every where to disseminate the books of the Holy Scriptures, translated into the vulgar tongue; consign them to the private interpretation of each, alike amongst Christians and amongst infidels; continue what St. Jerome formerly complained of—pretending to popularise the holy pages, and render them intelligible, without the aid of any interpreter, to persons of every condition, to the most loquacious woman, to the light-headed old man (viellard delirant), to the wordy caviller (verbeux sophiste). I only underline the passages which I find printed in Italics, to all, in short, and even by an absurdity as great as unheard of, to the most hardened infidels.

You are but too well aware, my reverend brethren, to what the efforts of these societies tend. You know what is revealed in the Holy Scriptures, and what is the advice of St. Peter, the Prince of the Apostles—

After having quoted the Epistles of St. Paul—they contain, says he, many things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, unto their own destruction. Then you know what he adds:—Ye, therefore, beloved, seeing ye knew these things, beware lest ye also, being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness. 2d Peter, c. iii. v. 16, 17.

You see what was even in the earliest times of the Church the appropriate artifice of heretics; and how, discarding divine tradition and Catholic enlightenment, they already strove either to materially interpolate the sacred text or to corrupt its true interpretation. You are also aware with what caution and wisdom the words of the Lord ought to be translated into another tongue, and yet nothing is more common than to see these versions multiplied, to admit, either through impudence or malice, the grave errors of so many interpreters—errors which dissemble too frequently, by their multiplicity and variety, to the misery of souls. So far as these societies are concerned, it matters little whether those who read the holy books, translated into vulgar language, fall into this or that error. They only care audaciously to stimulate all to a private interpretation of the divine oracles, to inspire contempt for divine traditions, which the Catholic Church preserved upon the authority of the holy fathers—in a word, to cause them to reject even the authority of the Church herself. This is the reason why the Bible societies care not to calumniate her (the Church) and the august throne of St. Peter, as if she had wished for ages to deprive the faithful of the knowledge of the holy books, when the most forcible evidence will prove the immemorial and particular care which the Sovereign Pontiffs, even down to the most modern time, and in conjunction with their Catholic pastors, have taken to ground the people in the Word of God, whether written or delivered by tradition.

In the first place, it is known that, by the decrees of the Holy Council of Trent, Bishops are enjoined to see that the Holy Scriptures and Divine laws be more frequently taught in their dioceses. It is known that, even exceeding the prescriptions of the Council of Latran (1215,) the Council of Trent recommends that there should be in the several cathedral churches and collegiates of the town and cantons a stipend provided for a Doctor of Divinity, and that none should be appointed to that office but a man fully competent to teach and expound the Holy Scripture. It is known how frequently, in the provincial councils which followed this prebendary, founded upon the decree of the Council of Trent, was mentioned, and how often the instructions which the canon entrusted with this office should deliver to the clergy and people, were taken into consideration.

The same disposition (to instruct the people in the Word of God) was especially observable in the Council of Rome in the year 1725, to which our predecessor, Benedict XIII., of happy memory, summoned not only all the Prelates of the Romish Church, but even a great number of Archbishops, Bishops, and other Ordinaries immediately subject to the Holy See. The same desire animated the Roman Pontiff, of whom we have been speaking, in the various edicts which he issued and addressed to all the Bishops of Italy and the neighbouring islands. In short, you yourselves, my venerable brethren, who are in the habit of forwarding to the Holy See, at stated intervals, everything calculated to interest religion—you know, by the repeated answers which our Congregational Council has returned either to yourselves or your predecessors, how much the Holy Romish Church rejoices, in concert with the Bishops when they have in their dioceses theologians who acquit themselves with honour of their duty in expounding the Holy Books, and that she neglects no opportunity of encouraging and supporting them.

But, to return to Bibles translated into the vulgar tongue, it is long since pastors found themselves necessitated to turn their attention particularly to the versions current at secret conventicles, and which heretics laboured, at great expense, to disseminate.

Hence the warning and decrees of our predecessor Innocent III., of happy memory, on the subject of lay societies and meetings of women who had assembled themselves in the diocese of Metz for objects of piety and the study of the Holy Scriptures. Hence the prohibitions which subsequently appeared in France and Spain, during the sixteenth century, with respect to the vulgar Bible (relatiens des Bibles vulgaires). It became necessary afterwards to take more greater precautions, when the Protestant Reformers, Luther and Calvin, taking by a multiplicity and increasing variety of errors, to attack the immemorial doctrine of the Faith, omitted no thing in order to seduce the faithful by their false interpretations and translations into the vernacular tongues, which the then novel invention of printing contributed more rapidly to propagate and multiply. Whence it was generally laid down in the regulations dictated by the Fathers, adopted by the Council of Trent, and approved by our predecessor Pius VII., of happy memory, and which (regulations) are prefixed to the list of prohibited books, that the reading of the Holy Bible, translated into the vulgar tongue, should not be permitted except to those to whom it might be deemed necessary to confirm in the faith and piety. Subsequently, when heretics still persisted in their frauds, it became necessary for Benedict XIV. to superadd the injunction that no versions whatever should be suffered to be read but those which should be approved of by the Holy See, accompanied by notes derived from the writings of the Holy Fathers, or other learned and Catholic authors. Notwithstanding this, some new sectarians of the school of Jansenius, after the example of the Lutherans and Calvinists, feared not to blame these justifiable precautions of the Apostolical See, as if the reading of the holy books had been at all times, and for all the Faithful, useful, and so indispensable that no authority could assail it.

But we find this audacious assertion of the sect of Jansenius withered by the most rigorous censures in the solemn sentence which was pronounced against their doctrine, with the assent of the whole Catholic universe, by two Sovereign Pontiffs of modern times, Clement XI. in his unigenitus constitution of the year 1713, and Pius VI. in his constitution auctorem fidei, of the year 1794.

Consequently, even before the establishment of Bible societies was thought of, the decrees of the Church which we have quoted, were intended to guard the Faithful against the frauds of heretics who cloak themselves under the specious pretext that it is necessary to propagate and render common the study of the holy books. Since then our predecessor, Pius VII., of glorious memory, observing the machinations of these societies to increase under his Pontificate did not cease to oppose their efforts, at one time through the medium of the apostolical nuncios, at another by letters and decrees, emanating from the several congregations of Cardinals of the Holy Church, and at another by the two Pontifical letters addressed to the Bishop of Guessen and the Archbishop of Mohila. After him another of our holy predecessors, Leo XII., reproved the operations of the Bible societies, by his circulars addressed to all the Catholic pastors in the universe, under date May 6, 1824. Shortly afterwards, our immediate predecessor, Pius VIII., of happy memory, confirmed their condemnation by his circular letter of May 24, 1825. We, in short, who succeeded them, notwithstanding our great unworthiness, have not ceased to be solicitous on this subject, and have especially endeavored to bring to the recollection of the faithful the several rules which have been successively laid down with regard to the vulgar versions of the holy books.

We have good cause, however, to rejoice, venerable brethren, inasmuch as, supported by your piety, and confirmed by the letters of our several predecessors, which we have referred to, you have never neglected to caution the flock which has been intrusted to you against the insidious manœuvres of the Bible societies. This solicitude of the Bishops, seconding with so much zeal the solicitude of our Holy See, has been blessed by the Lord. Already several imprudent Catholics who had gone over to these societies, enlightened at last as to their objects, have separated themselves from them for ever, and the remainder of the Faithful, with very few exceptions, have escaped from the contagion by which they were threatened.

The partisans of the Bible societies little doubted in their pride but that they could, at least bring over the unfaithful to the profession of Christianity by means of the sacred books translated into the vernacular tongue; moreover they took care to disseminate them by innumerable copies, and to distribute them everywhere, even amongst those who wanted them not, at the hands of their Missionaries, or rather, their emissaries. But the men who strove to propagate the Christian faith independently of the rules established by Jesus Christ himself, have only succeeded in increasing the difficulties of the Catholic priest, who, clothed with the Mission of the Holy See, goes amongst the unfaithful, and spares no fatigue in order to conquer new children for the Church, either by preaching the divine word or by administering the sacraments—always prepared, at all events, to shed his blood for the salvation of souls and the testimony of the faith. Amongst the sectarians of whom we are speaking, deceived in their hopes, and in despair at the immense sums which the publication of their Bibles cost them, without producing any fruit, some have been found, who, giving another direction to their manœuvres, have betaken themselves to the corruption of minds, not only in Italy but even in our own capital. Indeed, many precise advices and documents teach us that a vast number of members of sects in New York, in America, at one of their meetings, held on the 4th of June, last year, have formed a new association, which will take the name of the Christian League (Federis Christianis), a league composed of individuals of every nation and which is to be further increased in number by other auxiliary societies, all having the same object—viz., to propagate amongst Italians, and especially Romans, the principles of Christian liberty, or, rather, an insense indifference to all religion. These indeed, confess that the Roman institutions, as well as Italian, had, in by gone times, so much influence that nothing great was done in the world, but had its origin in our august city. Not that they ascribe the fact to the Pontifical See, which was then founded by the disposition of God himself, but verily to some remains of the Roman power, subsequently usurped, as they say, by our predecessors who succeeded to that power.

This is why, determined to afford to all people the liberty of conscience, or, rather, it should be said liberty to err, from which, according to their theory, must flow as from an inexhaustible source, public prosperity and political liberty, they think they should before all things win over the inhabitants of Rome and Italy, in order to avail themselves afterwards of their example and aid in regard to other countries.

They hope to obtain this result easily by favour of the Italians scattered over the world. They flattered themselves that on returning in large numbers to their country, and bearing with them whether the exaltation of novelty, corruption of manners, or the excitement of want, they would hardly hesitate to affiliate themselves to the League, and at least second it through venality. This society strains every nerve to introduce amongst them by means of individuals collected from all parts, corrupt and vulgar Bibles, and to scatter them secretly amongst the Faithful. At the same time their intention is to disseminate worse books still, or tracts designed to withdraw from the minds of their readers all respect for the Church and the Holy See. These books and tracts have been composed in Italian, or translated into Italian from other languages, with the aid of Italians themselves; and amongst these books should be particularly cited "The History of the Reformation," by Merle d'Aubigny; and "Calendar of the Reformation in Italy" ("Fastes de la Reforme en Italie," by Jean Crie. As for the character of these works it is sufficient to know that, according to the records of the society of which we are speaking, the commission entrusted with the choice of books for publication cannot count upon more than one individual belonging to one and the same religious belief.

Scarcely were we made aware of these facts but we were profoundly grieved on reflecting upon the danger which threatened not only remote countries, but the very centre of unity itself; and we have been anxious to defend religion against the like manoeuvres. Although there be no reason to apprehend the destruction of St. Peter's See at any time, in which the Lord our God has placed the immovable foundation of his Church, yet we are bound to maintain its authority. The holy duties of our apostolic ministry remind us of the awful account which the Sovereign Prince of Shepherds will exact of us for the growing tares which an enemy's hand may have sown in the Lord's field during our sleep, and for the sheep which are entrusted to us, if any perish through our fault.

Wherefore, having consulted some of the Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church, after having duly examined with them everything, and listened to their advice, we have decided, venerable brothers, on addressing you this letter, by which we again condemn the Bible societies, reprobated long ago by our predecessors, and by virtue of the supreme authority of our apostleship, we reprove by name and condemn the aforesaid society called the Christian League formed last year at New York. It, together with every other society associated with it, to which may become so.

Let all know then the enormity of the sin against God and the Church which they are guilty of who dare to associate themselves with any of these societies, or assist them in any way. Moreover, we confirm and renew the decrees recited above, delivered in former times by Apostolic authority against the publication, distribution, reading, and possession of books of the Holy Scriptures translated into the vulgar tongue. With reference to the works of whatsoever writer, we call to mind the observance of the general rules and decrees of our predecessors, to be found prefixed to the index of prohibited books; and we invite the Faithful to be upon their guard, not only against the books named in the index, but also against those comprised in the general prescriptions.

As for yourselves, my venerable brethren, called as you are to divide our solicitude, we recommend you earnestly in the Lord to announce and proclaim, in convenient time and place, to the people confided to your care, these Apostolic orders, and to labour carefully to separate the faithful sheep from the contagion of the Christian League; from those who have become its auxiliaries, no less than those who belong to other Bible societies, and from all who have any communication with them. You are consequently enjoined to remove from the hands of the Faithful alike the Bibles in the vulgar tongue which may have been printed contrary to the decrees above-mentioned of the Sovereign Pontiffs, and every book proscribed and condemned, and to see that they learn, through your admonition and authority, what pasturages are salutary and what pernicious and mortal.

Be more careful every day to see, my venerable brothers, that the Divine Word be preached not only by yourselves, but also by the various other pastors and competent ecclesiastics in each diocese. Watch attentively over those who are appointed to expound the Holy Scriptures, to see that they acquit themselves faithfully, according to the capacity of their hearers, and that they dare not, under any pretext whatever, interpret or explain the holy pages contrary to the tradition of the Holy Fathers, and to the service of the Catholic Church.

Finally, as it is the part of a good Shepherd not only to protect and feed the sheep which follow him, but also, to seek and bring home to the fold those which wander from it, it becomes an undivided obligation on your part and on ours to use all our endeavours to the ends that whoever may have allowed himself to be seduced by sectarians and propagators of evil books, may admit, under the influence of Divine grace, the heinousness of his fault, and strive to expiate it by the atoning works of a salutary repentance.

We are bound not to exclude from our sacerdotal solicitude the seducers of our erring brethren, nor even the chief masters of impiety, whose salvation we should seek by every possible means, although their iniquity be far greater.

Moreover, venerable brothers, we recommend the utmost watchfulness over the insidious measures and attempts of the Christian League to those who, raised to the dignity of your ordinary, are called to the charge of your ordinary churches, or of the countries where frequent meetings and ports whence travellers depart. As these are the points on which the sectarians have fixed to commence the realization of their projects, it is highly necessary that the Bishops of these places should mutually assist each other, zealously and faithfully, in order, with the aid of God, to discover and prevent their machinations.

Let us not doubt but your exertions, added to our own, will be seconded by the civil authorities, and especially by the most influential Sovereigns of Italy, no less by reason of their favourable regard for the Catholic religion, than that they plainly perceive how much it concerns them to frustrate these sectarian combinations. Indeed, it is most evident from past experience, that there are no means more certain of rendering the people disobedient to their princes than rendering them indifferent to religion, under the mark of religious liberty. The members of the Christian League do not conceal this fact from themselves, although they declare that they are far from wishing to excite disorder; but they, notwithstanding, avow that, once liberty of interpretation obtained, and with it what they term liberty of conscience amongst Italians, these last will naturally soon acquire political liberty.

But, above all, venerable brothers, let us elevate our hands to heaven, and commit to God, with all humility and the fervour of which we are susceptible, our cause, the cause of the whole flock of Jesus Christ, and of his Church. Let us, at the same time, recur to the intercession of St. Peter, the Prince of the Apostles, as also to that of the other Saints, especially to the blessed Virgin Mary, to whom it has been given to destroy all the heresies of the universe.

We conclude with giving you with our whole heart, and as a pledge of our most ardent charity, the Apostolic blessing to you all, our venerable brethren, and to the Faithful, alike ecclesiastic and lay, committed to your jurisdiction.

Given at Rome, from the basilic of St. Peter, on the 8th of May, of the year 1844, and the fourteenth of our Pontificate.

(Signed) GREGORY XVI., S. P.

[Tablet.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 12.

(From the Times, June 13.)

CHURCH TEMPORALITIES—IRELAND.

Mr. SMITH then said, —Sir, I wish the right hon. baronet the First Lord of the Treasury had spoken at a later period of the debate, for in that case I should have had an opportunity of addressing the house at an earlier stage of the discussion, and I should then have avoided the charge of presumption, to which I am afraid, in rising to speak after him, I may probably be exposed. But the subject is one so intimately connected with the interests of my country [hear, hear,] and one in the discussion of which I have so often taken a part, that I trust the house will listen to me with some indulgence. [hear, hear.] I listened with great attention to the speech of the right hon. gentleman. I was particularly anxious to discover whether there was any coincidence of opinion between him and the noble lord the Secretary of State, and the right hon. baronet the Secretary of the Home Department on a subject in which both of them—I mean the noble Secretary for Ireland and the right hon. baronet at the head of the Home Department—take a deep interest. It must have struck every hon. member in this house, that the Secretary for Ireland, after opening the discussion, referred to that most important question, the endowment of the Catholic Church. He said, and he did not say it, of course, without having previously meditated on what he said, that he always had been and still continued to be favourable to the endowment of the Catholic clergy of Ireland. His opinion, considering his position, considering his relation to the Government and his relation to Ireland, must be of great moment; but when I find that after him the right hon. baronet the Secretary for the Home Department, in whose peculiar jurisdiction, we were told, Ireland was,—when I find him adopting the same course and saying that he had been in 1825 favourable to the proposition of the noble lord the member for North Lancashire, who proposed that 400,000*l.* should be paid to the Roman Catholic priests, I confess I was anxious to know what course the Prime Minister would take, and it is to me matter of much surprise that a question, which must have been a matter of deliberation in the Cabinet, was not adverted to by the right hon. baronet. But if you, the Secretary for Ireland—if you, who have Ireland under your control, and immediately within your department, are prepared to endow the Catholic Church, let me ask you what course you mean to take with respect to Maynooth? [“Hear, hear,” from the Opposition.] You who told us the church would not accept of an endowment, are you not anxious to offer us what we will not take, and do you not withhold from us what we are ready to accept? The endowment of the Catholic clergy may be liable to objection—the endowment of Maynooth is not liable to any—no new principle is involved—you feel the necessity for an increased endowment of the church, you know that there is not a man in this house who does not say—“Sweep it away altogether or make it altogether” [hear,] and yet you tender an endowment to the clergy, knowing they will not take it, and are silent on a subject where your silence is expressive indeed. [Hear.] You do not think the endowment of the Catholic clergy inconsistent with the principles of the British constitution; but, do you think that you will endow the Roman Catholic clergy out of the pockets of the English people? Do you ever think that they will consent to the existence of two State churches? Do you think the English people will consent to the endowment of the Catholic Church out of the Consolidated Fund, when there is a fund in Ireland applicable to the church of Ireland, and all the purposes connected with religion? The moment you endow the Catholic Church you incorporate it with the church. When you shall endow that church you must be prepared to make large deductions from the revenues of the Protestant church. Do you suppose that you will be able to lay a tax on Irish landlords? They will say, “Are we to support both churches?”—are we to pay a tax for the maintenance of an alien church? I think the right hon. baronet involves himself in an inextricable embarrassment by this endowment—this hypothetical endowment—of the Catholic clergy; for he must proportionally diminish the superfluous revenues of the established church. The right hon. baronet conceives it is contrary to the Act of Union to diminish the revenues of the establishment. If that be the case, how could the right hon. baronet consent to abolish church rates in Ireland? how could he consent to confiscate one-fourth of the tithes of Ireland? Was not that incompatible with your political consistency? Were not the right hon. baronet's opposite, the Secretary for the Home Department and the noble lord near him, parties to that bill for the confiscation of one-fourth of the tithes of Ireland? Every body knows that 25 per cent. was taken from the church and given to the landlords. What name shall we give it—what shall we call it?

Mr. SHAW.—Allowance. [Cheers from the Opposition benches.]

Mr. SHEIL.—I call it "confiscation." [Loud cheers.] He calls it "allowance." ["Hear hear," and a laugh.] But what will the parson, who loses 25 per cent. by it—what will he call it? [Hear, hear]

Mr. SHAW.—He doesn't lose it.

Mr. SHEIL.—If he had 100*l.* a year before the Tithe Act, and if he gets only 75*l.* now, he loses 25 per cent.

Mr. SHAW.—But that's not the case.

Mr. SHEIL.—I don't know if I'm right. I'm sure, and beg the hon. member's pardon if on such important points he has all the benefit of the information as well as of the interruption [a laugh]; but give it whatever name you choose to give it.

"By any other name 'twill smell"—

[here the hon. member sniffed the air amid much laughter]—'twill smell—what shall I say—oh, "twill smell as sweet" to the landlord, and as offensive to the parson. [Loud laughter and general cheering.] But to come back to the point. I say that the Act of Union has been not less violated by that law than it would be violated by the adoption of the proposition of my hon. friend. There may be a question of degree—there may be a question of gradation—but as to the principle, the principle of violation is the same. Now, here was only part of the speech of the Home Secretary which I heard with pain, and I must say that that pain was excited rather on his own account than on any other. The rest of his speech was moderate; but he did refer to one topic—a part of the vulgar "No Popery" cry of the day—all allusion to which he might have omitted judiciously. He said if church property was touched, the rights of lay proprietors would be set at naught. Is he not falling into the error with which he taunted my gallant friend the member for Marylebone? He condemned my gallant friend this evening for using threats—for exciting a false—I trust a false—impression respecting the apprehensions which the people of this country might fairly entertain. When my hon. friend alluded to certain causes for apprehension—when he spoke of the power of France—when he cautioned you to beware lest by your conduct towards Ireland you invited France to enter into engagements with that country—then the right hon. gentleman, resuming his old post of First Lord of the Admiralty, advanced to the table, took my hon. and gallant friend to task, and directly after fell himself into the error of using expressions calculated to excite a false alarm in Ireland—expressions which I ask him, would he not have done well to have avoided? [Hear, hear.] The right hon. gentleman must have known that his suggestions were of the most exciting nature—he must have known that it was on the very ground he referred to that the Catholic Emancipation Act was so long resisted—he must have known that with the agitation of that question was always connected that territorial fear; and he ought to have disdained to have applied such a threat—to have repeated the boast of Cromwell, that he "would mount guard upon the revenues of the establishment." [Loud cheers.] In the course of the right hon. gentleman's observations—he smiled, I remember, at the time, and his smile is always significant of much meaning. [Opposition cries of "Hear, hear,"]—in the course of his observations he referred to extracts used by the hon. member for Sheffield, and amongst others to his quotation from the Bibliothèque de Geneve. I will also refer to a passage in the work which the Home Secretary did not quote—it is highly encomiastic of a member of the Government the right hon. baronet at its head. I refer to the last lines of the pamphlet. The opinions we gain from it, I may remark, are not only valuable on account of the talent they display, but because they enable us to form an estimate of what is passing in the minds of others with regard to our own position. The writer says—"Sir Robert Peel will certainly attempt the work of regeneration in Ireland. His march will be measured and prudent—perhaps it will be exceedingly slow." [The right hon. gentleman pronounced the last words with ironical emphasis, and there was a shout of laughter from the Opposition benches.] "But he will be constant, and nothing will make him retreat. He is always moderate, whilst he is liberal to the liberal. I refer to Canada. That which he has done for that distant colony"—I invite (said Mr. Sheil)—I invite the attention of the noble lord the Secretary for the Colonies to this remark—"that which he has done for that distant colony he will do for Ireland." [Loud ironical cheers from the Opposition benches.] Why (inquired the right hon. gentleman) what have you done for "that distant colony"? I pass from one citation to another. I hold in my hand the Life of Lord Sydenham—a book of great interest and of conspicuous talent. I find in page 160 of that work an extract from a letter written by Lord Sydenham to his brother, in which he speaks of the clergy reserves in Canada. You know there are clergy reserves in Ireland. What does Lord Sydenham say of those in the more "distant colony"? "The clergy reserves," he says, "have been the great grievance—the root of all the trouble of the province—the cause of rebellion—the never-failing subject of agitation at elections—the source of strife and hatred." If the bill now speaks of the bill supported by the of Canterbury—supported by the Duke of Wellington—supported by Lord Stanley—supported by every one but the Bishop of Exeter (“Oh, oh”); in whose speech against it the terms “robbery,” “spoliation,” “perjury,” “plunder,” were interspersed with pious confusion and holy indignation [a laugh]—“if that bill were not passed,” wrote Lord Sydenham, “he predicted that every evil that could fall upon a country would fall upon the Canadas.” [Loud cheers.] Now, then, let us see if the case of these clergy reserves does not rest on the same ground as that of the established church in Ireland. In the Act of Union not a word is said of temporalities. You give an expression in that act a construction from which you adduce that temporalities were intended. Would not Mr. Pitt have inserted the word if he had intended these temporalities to be dealt with? You bring forward a Scotch act, and after carefully comparing it with the Act of Union you arrive at the conclusion that temporalities were meant. But take the case of the clergy reserves. There can be no doubt, the clergy reserves have always been distinctly referred to—there’s a distinct act of legislature applicable to this portion of property in Canada. For many years any change of the appropriation of that property was resisted. Under certain circumstances—imperative circumstances—an alteration was made. Where’s the distinction? Don’t let us have a distinction between “temporalities” and “reserves”—a sort of catching at syllables, but how is a distinction in principle. [Hear, hear.] I know that I have quoted too much already, but let me just refer to one other document. It is a letter from Lord Anglesey to Earl Grey, dated in 1833, when the noble lord opposite (Stanley) was Secretary for Ireland; and I think you will find in that letter a coincidence between the opinions of Lord Sydenham and the Marquis of Anglesey, which is very remarkable. “First and foremost,” says Lord Anglesey, “first and foremost in importance is the question of the reform of the Protestant Church of Ireland. This establishment, which at all times exceeded the religious wants of the Protestant population, is upheld only on the ground of consolidating the connexion between the two countries. But this is no longer performed. Instead of strengthening the connexion, it weakens it. [Loud cheers from the Opposition.] Any Government attempting to maintain that establishment must be brought into collision with the people; and it is impossible to see that the resistance to the pecuniary claims of the church is only symptomatic of a widespread feeling that its maintenance is no longer just to the country.” [Repeated cheers in the Opposition.] And can any man [said Mr. Shell]—can any man who gives due attention fail to come to the same conclusion? I side with the opinion expressed by Lord Anglesey—whose heart was true to Ireland—and I hope that my coincidence with his sentiment is not departing from any moral principle I ought to be bound. [Hear, hear.] We ask for no subversion of the Irish Church, we do not desire to subvert it, we only desire a reduction of its revenues. (“Oh, oh,” from the Ministerial benches.] I have never wished for anything more [Repeated cries of “Oh, oh”] and I am sure that on consideration those who cry “Oh, oh,” so loudly, will recollect that when I have expressed my feelings and opinions in this house I have done so in language constitutional, consistent with parliamentary rule, and in terms inoffensive to any man. [Cheers.] I repeat that I ask only for a fair reduction of the almost indefinite establishment of the Church. I feel the force of the argument against making any other demand. I know the Church is an established institution, and to sweep it away suddenly—to leave no trace of its having been—would, in my view, be as impolitic as I believe it would be impracticable. [Hear, hear.] But, at the same time, I seek—we all seek—to introduce such reforms into the Church as would make it what in fact it ought to be. What we complain of is this—that the establishment is above the wants of the people—that, in fact, for the most part, it perpetuates sinecurism. We have no objection that a Protestant clergyman, a gentleman of education, should be paid as a gentleman of education ought to be paid, provided he performs his duty; but, as the Church belongs to the State, we apply to the Church the principle we apply to the State, and we say that sinecures should be abolished [Loud cheers.] Take the case of the Bishops, I say the Bishops are too numerous. The number of Bishops in Ireland was reduced by the Church Temporalities Act. There are now ten, and I say it is a question if six ought not to be sufficient. [Hear, hear.] The next question is, are not these bishops too highly paid? In this country the Ecclesiastical Commissioners came to the decision that 5,000*l.* a year was sufficient for the payment of an ecclesiastical functionary. Now does not the pay in Ireland exceed this? The Lord Primate (the Archbishop of Armagh) returns his income at 17,000*l.* per annum. [“No, no.”] Yes, he does: he says his gross income is 17,000*l.*, and his net income 14,000*l.*, and by-the-by, your interruption leads me to observe that this distinction between “gross” and “net” income is a very nice distinction [a laugh]—a distinction which I believe is not made in calculating the produce of the estates of most territorial proprietors. But the Archbishop returns his gross income at 17,000*l.* His successor is to have 10,000*l.*; and surely there then can be no great impropriety, no breach of moral obligation, no infringement of my “oath,” with which you sometimes so elegantly taunt me, if I just hint that 10,000*l.* a year is too much. [Cheers and laughter.] Why, let me ask—why should the Lord Primate be paid more than the Lord Chancellor or the Lord Chief Justice, who has arduous sometimes, as well as pleasurable, duties to perform? [A significant laugh.] Then there’s the Bishop of Derry. Now, what are the facts relating to the Bishop of Derry? His income is 14,000*l.* a year. He is to give up 4,000*l.*, and his successor 6,000*l.* That successor will receive 8,000*l.* a year, more than the Chief Justice. Then, when we say that these bishoprics ought to be suppressed, but that you are giving the bishops too much, are we saying anything which you ought not to take into consideration?

Every English bishop receives from 4,500*l.* to 5,000*l.* Why is so poor a country as Ireland, with 8,000,000 Roman Catholics, and only 750,000 Protestants—why, should you give the bishops more than you give them in rich and Protestant England? [“Hear, hear,” and some interruption.] And when I press those things upon you you interrupt me. [Repeated cries of “Hear, hear.”] Why, am I wrong in saying that the bishops are paid a larger sum in Catholic Ireland than is considered sufficient in this great Protestant England? Is there any breach of “my oath” in saying that? [Hear, hear.] Really I would not wish to go into these details, but I feel myself excused by the importance of the question. [Hear, hear.] It was said by the hon. member for Dublin University that if the income of the clergy in Ireland was equally divided, they would have only 200*l.* a year a piece. What is the answer to that? We say the number of the clergy ought to be diminished [“Hear, hear,” and much cheering.] Where there are no congregations we say that benefices should be suppressed. You take all the clergy, and arrive at a certain quotient. Well! having diminished the number of the clergy we conceive we have given you a surplus applicable to such purposes as may be thought proper. [Hear.] At this late hour, Sir, I will not go into these general questions that have already been so much discussed [hear,] but there is one point which I cannot refrain from presenting to the attention of the house. Reference were made by the right hon. baronet the Secretary for the Home Department to what he would accomplish for the cause of education in Ireland in the present session. I think, Sir, that the subject of education ought to have been avoided by the right hon. baronet. What course has been taken with respect to education in Ireland, and what course in England? In England you declared the church national. Any fund reserved for the purposes of education is to be administered by the national church for national purposes, and you abandoned a Factory Bill, in other respects the most useful measure, because you found that through the medium of the church it was impossible to take the same course in England which you took in Ireland. [Hear.] But, despite the remonstrances of the clergy of the established church, despite the remonstrances of almost the entire body of the Protestants of Ireland, you have taken—and you claim merit for it [hear,]—and I am willing to award it to you [hear, hear,]—you have taken from the church that which you regarded in this country as its peculiar right and privilege, [Hear, hear.] You have stripped it of its prerogative, and declared it incompetent to administer the funds for education, and thereby, in my opinion, pronounced a stronger condemnation on it than any of us sitting here could have conceived. [Hear, hear.] It strikes me that a distinction has been taken by the Government themselves—that they have drawn a line of demarcation between the two establishments. In England the church is the church of the people—in England you hold that the church must be the trustee of the funds to be applied to the purposes of education—you have acknowledged that in your Factory Bill in the provisions relating to the schools—in that bill you provided that a schoolmaster shall not be allowed to exercise his functions with the sanction of the episcopal authority [hear hear]—and you did so declaring most distinctly that you considered the right of interposition, of protection, of superintendence on the part of the church was an incident of education. [Hear hear.] In Ireland you have done no such thing. [Hear, hear.] You have stripped the bishops of their power—the church of its prerogative [hear, hear]; and your bill goes so far as to pronounce that henceforward no favour shall be conferred on any clergyman who shall not give in his adhesion to that education bill. [Hear, hear.] It strikes me that there is a manifest distinction to be taken between the two establishments in that respect. [Hear.] Sir, I have but one observation more, and it is this:—The right hon. baronet was pleased to advert to the Registration Bill, I think the introduction of that subject into this debate was not so irrelevant as at first view it might be supposed to be. The Registration Bill is, I think, connected with the church, as I think every other measure introduced into Ireland is connected with it [hear.] And I regard that church as the source of every difficulty in Ireland. [Hear.] I think the right hon. gentleman and the rest of the Government had not delayed the measure for any censurable purpose. [Hear, hear.] When we were in power they pressed us again and again to bring in a registration bill. We were taunted again and again by the noble lord the member for North Lancashire with not having brought in that measure, and he then undertook the office of premature legislation. [“Hear, hear,” and a laugh.] When they came in we naturally asked them for a new registration bill. In the first year they were silent on the subject. In the second year the noble lord the member for Dorsetshire, as chairman of the Longford committee, brought up a report which said that the committee were unanimously of opinion that a registration bill would be of immediate necessity—for Ireland. [Hear, hear.] The year passed, and nothing was done. [Hear, hear.] At length the right hon. baronet announced that a bill would be brought in this session. A bill was accordingly brought in, but it was delayed week after week to such an extent, that whenever a question was put respecting it it provoked a burst of laughter, and the right hon. baronet could hardly give an answer to the question without conveying by his look and manner that there was some peculiar difficulty in his way. [Hear.] At length you have agreed to read it a second time, but it is postponed to the 1st of July, and it is manifest you cannot carry it through committee. [Hear, hear.] Do I blame you for this? No. Because, when you come to legislate for Ireland, you meet with difficulties at every step. On the one hand you may be most anxious to give to Ireland every consideration—on the other hand you are afraid of increasing that popular power by which the monopoly of the church may be injured. [Hear, hear.] You are afraid I will not say legitimately but you are most apprehensive, that by giving a larger confidence to the people, the consequences may be fatal to that institution you think you are bound to support. [Hear.] Thus at every step difficulties meet you rising from the established church. But I would entreat you to consider whether the present state and condition of Ireland, and any material diminution of the popular power, do not involve greater changes in the established church of Ireland. Two-thirds of the representatives of Ireland—mark it—have for years invoked you to make a change in the Irish establishment. You are resisting the voice of the majority of the Irish people—you are refusing to the voice of their representatives that which may render it pre-emptory in you to dispose of the Church reserves. [Hear.] As I commenced with Canada, so will I conclude with it. You found it necessary to act in conformity with the wishes of the people of that province, as expressed by their representatives, and as by adopting that principle you secured peace and tranquillity, so are you likely to secure the happiness and prosperity of Ireland by taking the same course with regard to her. But, if you do not, the time may come when, amidst public calamity, the right hon. baronet may take a retrospect of his public life, and lament when repentance will be valueless and contrition vain, that he ever lost this great occasion of winning for himself renown, and that the time and opportunity of rendering to this country an invaluable service was disastrously thrown away. [Loud cheers.]

MISCELLANEA.

DEPARTURE OF MISSIONARIES.—On Monday, the 17th instant, the Right Rev. Dr. Hynes, Bishop of British Guiana, embarked on board the Tweed steamer for Demerara, accompanied by the Rev. Messrs. Knaresborough, Kelly, and Costi. His lordship will be speedily followed by the Rev. Messrs. Balfé, Caldente, Villanueva, &c., and by two Religious ladies, to superintend the female schools, &c., in Georgetown. The Very Rev. J. Taylor, President of Carlow College, has accepted the office of Vicar-General of the Guiana Vicariate, and active steps are being taken to promote the advance of religion and sound education; and several distinguished prelates, both in England and Ireland, are co-operating most zealously to place this important diocese in a flourishing condition, both by present assistance and by provisionary regulations. Two Catholic gentlemen, Messrs. Reed and Lee, accompany the party, the former of whom is well known to many of our London readers; and though, neither of them are engaged in ecclesiastical pursuits, yet we always rejoice at the infusion of any useful members of our community into general society in the more important of our colonies.—Tablet.

AUSTRALIAN REMINISCENCES.—The Morning Chronicle of Sydney is engaged in the controversy with the Herald, which is continually impugning the truths of Catholicity, and insulting its professors. In the course of a reply to an article of mine the Chronicle says:—"What singular notions we Papists have undergone! and now under a baby Pope of eight years the English Parliament were under Mary, by an act of the same English Parliament, we were no idolators, but true believers—then again, by the same Parliament, under Elizabeth, idolators again?—now, by the Act of 1829 abolishing the test oaths, the Parliament says, we are once more not idolators! We burnt London in 1666! (see old inscription on Monument;) then in 1685 we did not burn it (inscription erased!)—in 1688 we burnt it once more (inscription re-inscribed;) in 1829 we did not burn it at all (inscription erased once more!) Whether again we shall burn the city is still hidden in the womb of futurity, and only time can reveal! There can be no doubt, if the Orange conspiracy against the young Victoria had succeeded, and King Ernest I. been on the throne, we should have burnt it once more, long ere now." And a little further touches on the Bible societies—"We remember a story told us by an old friend, a surgeon Milton, who happened to dine at the mess of the 18th. or Royal Irish, Regiment of Foot, in Galway, to which the London Hibernian (or some cognate) society had sent Bibles in the Irish character (one for each soldier.) They were piled in the corner of the mess-room, as there was no other convenient store: when Milton, astonished at the enormous heap of books, asked the colonel what they were. 'Irish Bibles!' 'Irish Bibles?' 'Yes,' said he, 'such a society,' naming it, 'knowing we were the Royal Irish, conceived, of course, that we could speak and read Irish, and have sent me these 750 Bibles for the Regiment; although there are not 200 men among them who speak Irish, nor one who can read it in any character, still less in the old Celtic, nor is there a man in the regiment who does not know and speak English. I wrote them, however, a letter of thanks, saying how much they had stopped swearing and drinking in the regiment, and stating the men's gratitude, &c.: I could not do less.' Such is a sample of the way in which the money of the old spinsters at Exeter Hall and elsewhere is managed.—Tablet.

THE PENTATEUCH.—It is stated in some of the letters from Rome that a student of the Propaganda has recently brought to Rome an original manuscript of the Pentateuch; which the professors are engaged in examining, found under the following singular circumstance:—The student, a native of Chaldea, passing through Jerusalem on his way to his native country, visited, amongst other places, the grotto called the Cave of Absalom. Whilst breaking off some stones from the sides of the cave with his stick, in order to examine them, the ground suddenly gave way under his feet, and he found himself at the entrance of a passage, the existence of which had not been before suspected. After having wandered some time in the dark, his foot struck against something which, on taking it up, he found to be a roll of parchment, with the Pentateuch inscribed. The English Consul offered him a large price for it, but the faithful student preferred sending it to the college where he had received his education.—Ibid.

THE

BENGAL

CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

No. 13.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1844.

[Vol. VII.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF GOA.

The last Overland Mail has brought to our venerable Archbishop the subjoined letter from H. E. the Cardinal Prefect, enclosing a copy of a Papal Epistolary Brief addressed to the Archbishop of Goa before his consecration.

To the Most Illustrious and Most Reverend Lord, Patrick Joseph Carew, Archbishop of Edessa and Vicar Apostolic of Bengal.

MY LORD.—Although the Papal Bulls, by which the Most Holy Father, in the Consistory held on the 19th June, 1843, confirmed the election of the Archbishop elect of Goa, have been drawn up in the same official style (Cancellaria style) in which in former times, it was the custom to have them expedited, nevertheless, His Holiness sufficiently declared his mind to the said Archbishop, in an Epistolary Brief, dated the 8th of July, and clearly explained the meaning of the words which refer to the Suffragan Bishops of the Archiepiscopal See (of whom there now exists only the Bishop of Macao) and also as far as relates to the privileges of the royal advowson, from which, when in the said Papal Bulls it is mentioned, that there has been no derogation made, that is to be understood of the royal nomination to the See of Goa. But regarding all those countries confided to the care of Vicars Apostolic, the Holy Father wished, that what has been decreed in the Brief dated the 24th of April, 1838, commencing with the words "Multa preclare," should be confirmed and ratified. He afterwards made some other decrees, from which it was evident, that nothing was derogated by the aforesaid Bulls. As nevertheless, on this occasion, there were not wanting (as is related) certain disturbers of the public peace, who dared, with more acrimony than ever, to resist the legitimate authority of the same Vicars Apostolic, the Sacred Congregation, in order not to leave the slightest room for doubt on the subject, with the approbation of the most Holy Father, determined that an authentic copy of the above-mentioned Epistolary Brief should be transmitted to each of the Bishops, one of which we enclose in this letter to your Grace. Being firmly persuaded, that this will contribute to give you fuller information, and will suffice to contain within the limits of their duty, the faithful committed to your care. We beseech the Almighty that He may long preserve and protect your Grace.

Your Grace's most obedient servant,

J. P. CARDINAL FRANSONI, Prefect.

Rome, Propaganda Fide, 21st May, 1844.

GREGORY XVI. POPE,

To His Venerable Brother, Joseph a Silca Torres, Archbishop elect of Goa, Greeting.

We suppose, venerable brother, that information has already reached you, concerning the Consistory which we held on the 13th day before the Kalends of this month, in which we assigned new pastors to many Churches, that were unprovided, commencing with the renowned Church of Goa in the East Indies, belonging to the Portuguese Government, the jurisdiction of which we have committed to your charge. You will receive forthwith our sealed Apostolic Letter, which we have ordered to be immediately issued concerning your promotion, and the ceremony of your Episcopal Consecration, as also about the sacred Pallium, which is to be delivered to you, as a Metropolitan Prelate.

We have given our deep attention to the state of that Church, and to the heavy calamities with which it was afflicted during the long period it was bereft of Pastors, and therefore, being desirous to remove every obstacle which could retard you, venerable brother, from entering on its administration, we sent another letter to you on the above mentioned day, sealed with the ring of the Fisherman, in which, by a special indulgence, we have permitted, that immediately on its receipt, you should have full authority freely to exercise the pastoral jurisdiction entrusted to you: and we have taken care, that that letter should be transmitted to you with all dispatch. We moreover write you this letter, in order to afford you a fresh proof of our especial favor, and of the firm hope we entertain through the Divine mercy, that you will constantly and actively watch over the safety of the flock confided to your care, and that, for no cause whatsoever, you will depart from that obedience which is due to the sacred canons, and to our Apostolic Decrees. Your devoted attachment to the Roman Church, which was evinced in your letter dated the third of the Ides of March, is fresh in our recollection, and it corresponds with the account given of you, by our beloved Son Francis Cappaccini, our Ambassador and Apostolic Legate at Lisbon, who expressly states amongst other matters the repeated declarations, by which you wished to assure us, that it was your firm and deliberate determination never to exercise any other authority but that given to you by us.

This refers to what we decided on in our Apostolic Letter, given under the ring of the Fisherman, and bearing date the 24th day of April 1838, commencing with the words "Multa præclare," and to the other decrees, that either have been or may be published regarding the administration of Catholic affairs in certain countries, where, on account of the changed state of the times, the Archbishop of Goa could not easily nor sufficiently provide for the safety of souls. We, in those Decrees, assuredly had no other object in view than the salvation and increase of the Fold of the Lord, and truly, woe unto us, if any portion of that fold, either there or elsewhere, were placed in difficulties, did we neglect to assist it with every possible spiritual aid. Therefore, whilst we sincerely and deservedly praise your devoted attachment to us, we cannot refrain from earnestly exhorting your fraternity in the Lord, on no account whatever, to allow yourself to swerve from the same mode of acting, and in other respect continually to demean yourself as a Pastor ought, who is only solicitous for the greater glory of God, and the spiritual advantage of his beloved flock, and who places all his hopes in the Lord the Prince of Pastors, who "carries all things in the word of his power," and who has promised to the holy labourers of his vineyard, that diligently persevere in his grace, an unfading crown of glory. We in the meantime (though unworthy) will not omit suppliantly to beseech him, that upon you, and the clergy and people over whom you preside, he may vouchsafe propitiously to multiply his gifts. Then, venerable brother, from the inmost affection of our heart We most lovingly bestow upon you and them, the Apostolic benediction, the pledge of our anxious wishes.

Given at St. Mary Major's, Rome, on the 8th day of July, in the year of our Lord 1843, and the 18th year of our Pontificate (Signed) GREGORY XVI. Pope.

(True Copy) ALOYSIUS, Cardinal,

MEBRUSCHI, Secretary of State & of Briefs.
Rome, May 20th, 1844.

The perusal of the latter document will at once remove any mis-understanding that might have existed on the subject of the Archbishop of Goa's appointment, and will clearly show, that his jurisdiction no wise extends to Apostolic Vicariates in British India, and that consequently his only Suffragan is the Bishop of Macao, an inference clearly expressed in the Cardinal Prefect's letter.

CATHOLIC SCHOOLS IN CALCUTTA AND ITS VICINITY.

Our fellow Catholics will peruse with pleasure the notices contained in this day's Herald of the several schools which have been prepared by our venerable Archbishop, in order to afford to the Faithful in every part of Calcutta and its vicinity, an opportunity of procuring either a gratuitous education, if the children be poor, or, if they enjoy a moderate competency, an education suited to their circumstances, on terms, which every one must admit to be very reasonable. We need hardly remind our readers, that great expense has been incurred, in fitting up in their present respectable condition, the several Free and Pay Schools now so happily established. The Catholics of Bengal are, of themselves, without being incited by us, sufficiently discerning and generous, to appreciate the educational and religious advantages thus secured to the community. We, however, deem it our duty, to call earnestly now on every good Catholic to exert his influence in his vicinity and with his friends, to induce the poor of our communion to send their children regularly to school and not let them be deprived of the great blessing which Divine Providence has placed within their reach. It would be a shame and a reproach, if, after this, the little ones of Christ, for the sake of a miserable mess of pottage, were allowed by their Guardians to barter their Holy Faith, by attending the lessons of wolves in sheep's clothing, of ignorant intolerant bigots, who agree together only in their hatred of the Catholic Church.

CONVERSINOS.

During the preceding week seventy-seven children were baptized by Rev. Mr. D'Mello, in the new mission lately established at Cowcolly and several adults instructed in the Christian doctrine, in order to prepare them for the sacrament of regeneration.

During the same period, the widow lady of a Captain in the H. C. Military Service, after due preparation, was baptised conditionally and received into the Catholic communion by the very Rev. Doctor Kennedy, of St. John's College.

A Protestant Family of Calcutta have intimated their desire to the Archbishop to be instructed in the Catholic doctrine and admitted to conditional baptism.

Rev. Mr. Freyriaon, of this vicariate, states that in a recent visit to a remote part of his Mission, he baptised five children of Christian parents, and three Mahommedan women. The same zealous priest administered the Holy Communion to two Christians in the district referred to, and he adds that he happily arrived just in time to dispense the last sacraments to a dying Christian.

Two promising native youths are under the care of the Very Rev. Dr. Kennedy in order to be prepared for baptism.

At Secunderabad 17 natives were recently baptised, and three others are under instruction, preparatory to their receiving baptism from the Rev. Mr. Murphy.

VICARS OF THE CHURCH OF N. S. D'ROZARIO OF CALCUTTA.

The following memorandum, kindly furnished to us by a gentleman, shows the names of the priests who held the office of Vicar in the Cathedral Church of N. S. D'Rosario prior to the election of our venerated Archbishop to the office.

- 1776—Rev. Fre Verissimo de Madre de Deos
- 1783— „ Fre Francisco de Santa Maria.
- 1789— „ Fre Joze Guilherme.
- 1792 to 1793, Fre Joze de Graça.
- 1796 to 1797, Fre Joaquim de Santa Ritta
- 1798— „ Fre Christovao de Assumpcao.
- 1799— Fre Joze de Graça.
- 1802, 1803 Fre Manoel de Cenaculo.
- 1804 to 1806 Fre Manoel de Rozario.
- 1807— „ Fre Luis da Conceicao
- 1810 to 1813 Fre Francisco das Prazeras.
- 1813 to 1819 Rev. Fre Luis de Santa Ritta.
- 1819 to 1829 Rev. Fre Manoel de Santa Theresa.
- 1829 to 1841 Rev. Fre Antonio de Santa Maria, and died at Calcutta, as Vicar.

DEPARTURE OF THE REV. B. RABASCALL FROM SERAMPORE TO TAKE CHARGE OF THE MISSION AT ADEN.

It is with no ordinary feelings of delight that we insert in our journal, the following Address, which the Catholics of Serampore presented the Rev. B. Rabascall on the day of his departure from amongst them. We regret that we can give only a brief outline of the very becoming reply of that gentleman. In consequence of the near approach of his departure at the time the Address was presented to him, and his great press of business, he was unable to send us his reply in full. On the 15th instant, the Catholics of Serampore assembled immediately after Mass in the drawing-room of the Rev. B. Rabascall to pay him their last tribute of respect, and after having, with his usual courtsey, seated his friends, Mr. D'Cruz, read the following address:—

TO THE REV. FATHER B. RABASCALL,
Vicar of the Church at Serampore.

REVEREND SIR,—We, the undersigned Catholics, who form the principal section of the Congregation of the Church at Serampore, having learnt, with deep regret, your approaching departure from among us to join your own Mission at Aden, in Arabia, cannot rest satisfied merely with expressing the sorrow, which this sudden and unexpected arrangement has naturally created among us. To your zeal and perseverance, Reverend Sir, the Catholics of this small settlement are indebted for the establishment of a School for the education of children of both sexes, and for those improvements in the cause of religion and education, of which the fruits are already beginning to appear. During your sojourn of two years and a half amongst us, your attention was wholly directed to bringing back to the paths of religion and virtue, such as had heretofore taken an opposite course. In this truly missionary duty, you have succeeded beyond expectation; for, proficient as you are in so many languages, a knowledge of the English and Bengalee were soon acquired by you to accomplish this desirable object; and, we sincerely trust, that the seeds sown by you, may germinate under your successor.

Fully sensible of these and other acts of benevolence which we have individually and collectively experienced at your hands, we respectfully beg, that you will accept our humble but grateful thanks for the same; and with these a silver Chalice which is now being made by Messrs. Hamilton & Co. as a tribute of respect and esteem from your flock, whose fervent prayer is, that success may crown your pious labor, wherever the duties of your holy vocation may call you.

We remain, with the utmost respect,
Reverend Sir,

Your humble devoted Servants,

JOHN D'CRUZ.	C. BIRD.
N. J. GANTZER.	S. GOMES.
D. A. GANTZER.	M. D'ALMEIDA.
G. SURITA.	A. ALPHONSO.
F. E. SURITA.	A. PINHAROO.
T. P. PINTO.	H. MEASURES.
E. CREIGHTON.	H. AHRENTZ.
A. E. ALPHONSO.	C. BAPTIST.
C. ASHE.	D. O'BRIEN.

Serampore, 14th September, 1844.

After the address had been read, the Rev. B. Rabascall said, "Beloved Brethren in Jesus Christ, I accept of the very handsome present which you have made me; I accept of it as a lasting testimony of your gratitude to me for my humble services amongst you. I shall use it daily at the adorable sacrifice of the Mass; it shall remind me to supplicate the throne of mercy in behalf of the good and pious Catholics of Serampore, who have ever sought so earnestly to benefit by the instructions, which I have made it my constant study to impart. Thank God, it is true, that there have been schools established in Serampore for the education of your children, one for the female portion of them, under the immediate care of the ladies of Loretto House, Serampore, whose constant study it has been to instruct your children in the principles of religion, and impress on their tender minds the seeds of all virtues, thereby promoting the honor and glory of God and adding new wreaths to the crowns which are to be the reward of their labors hereafter. May God in his mercy spare these pious ladies to you and to your children, is my humble but fervent prayer. The male portion of them has been under my own immediate care, and, as far as lay in me, I have endeavoured to instil into their minds the duty which they owe to their Maker and the respect which they should ever entertain towards their parents.

● "I am sorry to be obliged to depart from amongst you. It is not my own will I am doing but the will of the Holy See, in obedience to whose call I am obliged to transfer my ministry, from Serampore to the poor Mission at Aden. I say I am sorry to depart from amongst you, who have ever manifested so friendly a feeling towards me, I sincerely regret (and nothing but obedience could have done it,) to be separated from our highly venerated Archbishop, in whom I have always found a father and a friend, who, by his ennobling and rare qualities, has caused the Holy See to repose in him on every occasion, such unbounded confidence. Beloved Brethren I should not be sorry to depart from amongst you, I should rather rejoice at it, as I feel I would be only an obstacle to your having, in the person of my amiable and talented successor, the Rev. Mr. McGirr, one better qualified in every way to administer to your wants and those of your children. With this conviction on my mind I cheerfully make the sacrifice, with the pleasing hope, that the Rev. Mr. McGirr will, with your kind co-operation, realize your and my expectations.

"Once more, Beloved Brethren, accept my humble thanks for your very valuable present. That God in his goodness may bestow upon you and your families all the blessings, spiritual and temporal, you stand in need of, is and shall be my constant prayer.

B. RABASCALL.

His beloved flock with tears, one by one approached and kissed the hand of their fond Pastor.

DUM-DUM.

We beg to call the attention of our readers to the very large collection made among the Catholic Soldiers of Dum-Dum, during the Pontifical Mass celebrated there on last Sunday by the Right Rev. Dr. Olliffe. Those good Catholics deserve the warmest thanks of the friends of the Orphanage for this act of liberality, which is very great, if we consider that only one day's notice had been given them.

BOW-BAZAR CHAPEL.

Mr. Fernandez has presented a very handsome painting in oil for the above mentioned Church. The subject is the Saviour crowned with thorns. The coloring is beautiful and the execution altogether most creditable to Mr. Fernandez, as a Painter. We trust that besides the gratitude and prayers due to every Benefactor to religion, Mr. Fernandez will moreover receive in return the patronage and encouragement to which his distinguished proficiency in his profession so well entitles him.

GWALIOR SUFFERERS.

Our readers will be glad to learn that the subscriptions in behalf of the poor suffering Christians of Gwalior, amounted up to last month to four thousand Rupees, and that the deputation, mentioned by us had arrived at the Dhoon. "They consisted," says a Correspondent, "of five persons, an Englishman, a Portuguese, and three natives, all stout and intelligent men, who expressed great eagerness to work hard to insure success to the colony, and gratitude for the kind sympathy and assistance shown them in their distress. A sixth person accompanied the party for private service in the family of an Officer at Meerut. This man is of a good family at Gwalior and his friends exerted every influence to prevent his becoming a Christian. They promised him land and money, but he replied that he did not covet either; his brother threatened his life, but he disregarded it, and at length the Mama Sahib was appealed to, who tried every means to induce him to abandon his intention and at last wearied out with his firmness, threatened to blow him away from the Gun.* "You may do so" he replied, "but if you spare me, I shall become a Christian." Such generous conduct rivals the Confessors of old or those of China and Japan of the present day."

LETTER OF A TRAVELLER.

The following letter from Pavia, date 11th July, 1844, contains information of very interesting nature to our readers.

"I am writing this to you from a Tow called Pavia, about twenty miles from Milan. It is impossible for you to conceive, (for me to describe, three or four extraordinary sights that I have seen in both the towns. I will however attempt a descri-

* He was a Gunner in the Artillery of the Gwalior Service.

tion while the wonders are fresh in my mind.

"The celebrated Cathedral of Milan is a miracle of art; and perhaps the only perfect specimen of gothic grandeur and beauty. The first view of it struck me with awe, which gradually gave way to unmixed admiration! What a stupendous building, all of solid marble, from the basement to the top of the highest pinnacle. The statues, basso relievos, tracery and fret-work which adorn every part of the outside of this magnificent Cathedral must be seen to be merely comprehended. The imagination can scarcely conceive any thing so minute, delicate, finished and rich on so large a scale. Innumerable statues of Saints and Martyrs are placed in niches and on the tops of the pinnacles; other compartments are enriched with exquisite basso relievos, representing the principal events recorded in the old and new Testament, then the beautiful arabesques and baskets of fruit and flowers that ornament the cornice and sides of every door and window; then the small minute fret-work of the innumerable pinnacles and the semi-circular or curved border which runs along the ranges of these pinnacles all along the slope of the roof, produce, at a certain point of view, a scene of magic, a fairy fabric which literally beggars description. Fond as you are of building and clever as you fancy yourself in the practical part of architectural science, believe me, no stretch of imagination, no sketch of pen or pencil, can give you the vastness, richness, profusion, design, skill, taste and workmanship of the Milan Cathedral.

"Having glutted your eyes with all this combination of varied excellencies lavished on the outside of this extraordinary Temple, enter within. What admirable proportions—what harmonious designs! A solemn religious light pervades the whole, coming from the richly stained glasses which adorn the large pointed gothic windows. The high Altar stands before you, on every side are other Altars dedicated to particular Saints; all these are rich in marbles. Then the paintings of the stained glasses are admirable as works of art! What a glorious, what a happy invention which doubly enlightens us! The great massive pillars that support the pointed arched roof, have each, at a certain height, a sort of a gallery round it; within this gallery are statues and ornaments of elaborate workmanship. Then all along the aisles (double range, two on each side of the nave, divided by columns) are large statues of Saints and Apostles; one of these in particular is remarkable, the statue of St. Bartholomew, who was flayed alive; the sculptor has shown his skill by imitating exactly the appearance of the body stripped of its skin which is hanging whole and entire from the shoulder of the martyr. The statue is horribly true. There is an underground Chapel with an Altar dedicated to St. Charles Borromeo, of extraordinary richness, in pure silver and precious marbles. In the Sacristy are the treasures of this Church, or rather the remains of the riches robbed by the French, who have left sad memorials of their cupidity, wantonness and barbarity throughout Italy. From the Milan Cathedral they took away ornaments of the value of millions of francs. What are left, however, serve to give an idea of the splendor that is past away, viz. 1st, A small gold ornament studded with precious stones and of exquisite workmanship, by the celebrated Benvenuto Cellini. 2nd, A pretty large sized gold Crucifix. 3rd, Several busts of martyrs and Apostles, life size, of solid silver. 4th, Three large circular basins and a jug to match, of solid silver and of exquisite embossed work. 5th, Several rich Anti-pendiums and vestments of extraordinarily finished and elaborate workmanship; one Anti-pendium, in particular, displayed needle-work to perfection with gold thread.

"Last evening I witnessed a wonderful specimen of mechanical skill. Passing by, we saw a large placard announcing the exhibition of the wonderful Duck. We entered a building and paying our entrance fee, viz. five annas and four pie each, were ushered into an anti-chamber, where we were startled by the sight of two women dancing before a man dressed as a Turk, on approaching nearer, we discovered that these were figures of wax, life size and perfectly imitated. We got into the grand saloon where a number of Tableaux greeted the eye. We walked up and down till the hour of exhibition, when the Exhibitor came forward to explain and work the different groups. I will give you several of them.

"1st Group.—Judith with a drawn sword—Holofernes asleep—an old woman standing behind Judith with a bag or sack in her hand.

"Mechanical action of the 1st Group.—Judith shakes her head and raises her sword by a motion of her arm; old woman shakes her head and opens the bag.

"2nd Group.—Beheading of John the Baptist.

"Mechanical action.—The executioner holding the head, of which the lips move; the trunk on the ground is seen to display the muscular action of the chest; Herodias beholding the scene with a stern air; one of her female attendants shakes her head as if in sorrow; the Jailor, with the keys in his hand, opens and shuts the fingers of that hand with a convulsive movement.

"3rd Group.—Temple of the Sun, either Peruvian or Egyptian.

"The Sun of burnished metallic plate resembling gold, with ornaments in the centre resembling silver; these turn round rapidly, and by their gyrations display beautiful spiral objects which please and dazzle the eye. Two princesses or royal personages kneel in adoration with offerings of fruit and flowers.

"4th Group.—Men and women in the attitude of dancing; one of these, a lady of the ancienne regime, was brought forward by the exhibitor (of course, "working-by clock-work mechanism;") she bows her head, then, supported round the waist by the keeper, she turns round with surprising activity to a waltz tune played by a Pianist; she waltzes admirably; then stops, turns her head towards her partner, whispers to him and moves her arms; then waltzes again; then stops before one of the spectators, shaking her head at him; all this was done to the life with admirable exactness.

"5th Group.—An Elephant with the great Mogul riding in state, about two feet high; a crowd of followers in procession, done with exquisite skill, in miniature figures, all of fine steel, plated and gilt. The Elephant moves his ears and tail, and shakes and twirls his proboscis; several rich glittering objects whirl round with rapidity; serpents twist in an admirable manner. The whole object is rich, dazzling and admirably managed.

Now comes the cream of the performance, the wonder of wonders:—I that have seen it, can scarcely believe my senses; I had read of it many, many years ago and little thought then that I would see the exhibition. If you refer to my copy of Beckford's History of Inventions, a work in four volumes, bound in green cloth, you will find this extraordinary mechanism fully and I believe minutely described.

"6th Object.—The Exhibitor uncovers a pedestal; you see standing on it a Duck of the ordinary size, a Duck of the natural plumage, its head down as if asleep; suddenly he awakes, moves his head, turns his neck, raises his wings and flaps them; a plated vessel of some small black grain with water (the quantity of a small tumbler) is held before him; he dips his bill into it, makes the sound that real ducks make in eating food with water; he lifts up his head, shakes his wings again, returns to his food with avidity; goes on devouring rapidly; you clearly see the quantity of grain as well as water disappearing, and evidently down the throat of the duck, for the keeper lifts up the salver or rather oblong cup and carries it round to the company, that they may note the gradual diminishing of the food; the animal now pauses; cries out distinctly and clearly, quack, quack, quack; then lifts up his tail and—drops something behind! Would you believe it, the process of digestion has gone on and the animal has actually evacuated, the discharged stuff having a soft white appearance. Having been prepared for it, I watched this process and actually saw the stuff passing as it were from the duck and dropping down on a small plate (purposely placed there) in the most natural way imaginable. The duck, being thus relieved, apparently gets lively, and returns to his food with avidity; he goes on devouring; takes in the whole of the quantity of food; looks dull and sleepy, shakes his wings, rolls his eyes, turns his neck, cries quack, quack, rather huskily, drops his head and is fast asleep!

"In Pavia (20 miles from Milan) I saw one of the most extraordinarily rich buildings, viz. the Certosa and Church. Certosa means a Monastery of Trappists or Silent Monks. What a splendid Church! Rich beyond description in rare and precious marbles, altars, carved work, statues, paintings, Tabernacle, Sanctuary, Sacristy—one of the few great Churches which really combine elegance with simplicity, and grandeur with unity of design. The sanctuary is literally sparkling—not with gold, silver or ormolu, but with marble of the choicest kinds. The Tabernacle—oh what a Tabernacle! worthy (if aught earthly can be worthy) of the sacred Host which it enshrines—is a dome surmounting an elegant classic temple and ornamented with basso relievos of exquisite workmanship; but no description, however minute and wordy, can give you an exact idea of the design, proportion and skill of this and all other works connected with this extraordinary building. Besides the great altar, there are ten or twelve side altars, each of course dedicated to a particular saint. These chapels are small and divided off from the main building by an iron railing of most beautiful design, part of which is exquisitely gilt. Let me give you a slight sketch of one of these chapels, and when I tell you that the rest are correspondingly elegant but of varied design, it will give you some idea of the magnificence of the whole building. Take the chapel dedicated to St. Peter. The altar is made of most precious marbles—the columns which support the pediment are of African granite, polished and glittering as a mirror; the altarpiece is an oil painting of masterly execution, rich in coloring, harmonious in the grouping and faultless in the design; the subject is taken from a passage in St. Peter's life; the front of the altar is a piece of Florentine mosaic in marbles of the rarest kind—lapis lazuli, malachite, yellow and verd antique, Cararra and Siena, &c. displaying birds, flowers and arabesques of exquisite workmanship. On the two sides of the altar are basso relievos in medallion, embracing two of the most stirring portions of St. Peter's life. The roof, which is vaulted, and the sides of the chapel are painted in frescos displaying variously, the repentance, the receiving of the keys, the miracles and the martyrdom of this great saint.

"I am now travelling so rapidly, that before I can finish a descriptive letter to you, new scenes and countries are before me. At this moment, I am in Milan which I left eight days, rather ten days, ago. Within this brief period, how many things we have seen! The celebrated Lago Maggiore or great Lake, with the Isola Borromeo; the colossal statue in bronze of the great St. Charles Borromeo in Arona, of which the head is sixteen feet in circumference and the nose alone is as big as the whole head of a large man;—the ancient cities of Novarra and Vercelli—and lastly the delightful city of Turin where we were (Dr. ——— and I) most hospitably entertained by the good Oblate which sent Bishop Cereti and his brethren to Ava and Madras. We spent four agreeably fatiguing days in Turin, where we enjoyed the following good things.

"1stly, The Armoury—A splendid large Hall tastefully arranged with arms and warlike weapons of every description, ancient and modern—particularly the arms of the days of chivalry.

"2ndly, The Royal Palace—Of the most gorgeous gilding, rich yet tasty, glittering but not gaudy. The King's and the Queen's apartments respectively. Hall of audience with the thrones, dining room, ball room, reception room, dressing room, bed room, private sitting room, guard room, antichambers for the maids of honor and the pages, chapel oratories,—I have seen the royal palaces in Naples, the Ducal palaces of Florence and Lucca, the grand Doge's palace in Venice, the princely Palace of Genoa, the vice regal Palace of Milan, but this royal residence in Turin is, I believe, in its tout ensemble and harmonious keeping, richer than them all:—Such gilding and burnishing, such silk, satin and damask hangings, such large and brilliant mirrors, such gorgeous furniture, such boarded floor of choice inlaid work, such lofty doors of exquisite workmanship—all this I find it impossible to describe. These are all to be seen in the greatest profusion imaginable.

"3rdly, The Royal Gallery of Paintings: most skilfully arranged, both as to the distribution of light and the different schools, besides other minor arrangements which gratify and instruct the spectator: such as having separate rooms for landscapes, fruits and flowers, portraits, &c. One department struck me with surprise, viz., the paintings on porcelain, that is, the colors baked with the material such as you see on vases and rich table services, but what matchless, what wonderful execution—there were about a dozen pictures in the room, all copies of the great masters, viz., Raffaello, Titian, Rubens, Carlo Dolce, Cigoli—most of these precious originals I had seen in Rome and Florence, and I have no hesitation in declaring that these copies were faithful to the minutest shade in coloring and design; they are really gems of their kind, and worthy of any gallery! A Frenchman whose portrait, also done in porcelain, is among the collection—is the author or manufacturer of these extraordinary works.

"4thly, The Museum—which contains, among other objects, the largest and most complete collection of Egyptian antiquities in mummies, statues, sarcophagi, manuscripts on the celebrated Papyrus, jewels and domestic utensils—is a large building, formerly the Jesuit's College for the nobility. In the department of Natural History, it is far surpassed by the Museum of Pisa which in this regard is a jewel of a Museum. The various objects are not only well preserved but skilfully grouped. Take one or two illustrations; 1st, A wild Tuscan Boar is wounded by a spear, the point of which has penetrated through the hard skin and bristle of the animal and the handle of it broken off evidently by the violence of the shock. A large dog has caught the boar by the haunch and another dog is prostrate on the ground thrown on his back with his belly ripped open and the entrails protruding out; a puddle of clotted blood is on the ground.

"Illustration 2nd.—A pair of small birds have built a nest between the branches of a tree, a small quadruped (a miniature Fox) has attacked the nest and destroyed one or two of the eggs, of which the broken shell is on the ground; the mother bird, evidently in defending her nest, has fallen a victim to the fury of the little beast, who has got his paw on the dead bird and is grinning horribly, showing his white pearly teeth; the other bird has sought refuge on the topmost branch of the tree.

"Illustration 3rd.—A large rattle-snake, coiled up on the ground, with its head stretched out and mouth open, is gazing fixedly on a little bird which seated, or rather perched, on a tree, bending forward with extended wings, is apparently fascinated; the partner of this doomed little creature, is perched on a higher branch looking uneasily at the scene. What do you think of this tasty method of arranging objects to illustrate Natural History? I think our friend ——— would do well to follow the example, and improve his collection of stuffed animals by grouping them dramatically.

Turin is a lovely city and delightfully situated, being bounded by the range of the Alps on one side and the range of the Appenines on the other. The streets run at right angles, all straight as possible and lined on both sides with immense houses built uniformly as regards height, facade and external decorations. These houses have all arcades or covered walks paved evenly with large flags; these are freely used by the public who are thus sheltered from the sun and rain and the danger and confusion of carriages and other wheeled conveyances. One street in particular runs the whole length of the city; standing in the centre of this street you see a magnificent perspective terminating on one side by the naked brown, rugged peaks of the Alps, the loftiest of which are covered with snow (middle of summer); on the other side the vista is crowned with the little Appenines clothed in verdure, and crowned with villas, the famous river Po, running at the foot; can any situation be more charming for a City?"

Theatre Street, 16th September.

Mr. H. Moore presents his compliments to Messrs. Lackersteen and Company. He has the pleasure to send a cheque for 100 Rs. as a contribution towards payment of the fine and legal expenses incidental to the late State Trials in Ireland.

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

Catholic Soldiers of Dum-Dum.	Rs 100 0
Through Mr. N. O'BRIEN.
J. Reid,	Rs. 5 0
J. Marjoram,	" 4 0
C. S. Hardinge,	" 7 0
B. W.,	" 7 0
T. H. B.,	" 4 0
J. H. Wilmott,	" 2 0
A. Julian,	" 1 0
W. Cheyne,	" 10 0
A Friend,	" 2
H. Marshall,	" 5 0

J. L.,	Rs. 1 0
P. J. Ray,	" 1 0
A Friend,	" 2 0
C. Anquittill,	" 7 0
R. H. Tanner,	" 4 0
James Carney,	" 10 0
R. D. G. Currie,	" 1 0
J. Harris,	" 1 0

O'CONNELL TESTIMONIAL.

H. Moore, Esq.	Rs. 100 0
THROUGH A FRIEND.
J. M.,	Rs. 16 0
A Friend of O'Connell's,	" 10 0
Mrs. N. O'Brien,	" 10 0
A. Girrard,	" 10 0
J. Sherlock,	" 5 0

TRIBUTE TO CAPTAIN VOSS OF THE SERINGAPATAM.

Mrs. J. L.,	Rs. 3 0
" T. S. B.,	" 2 0
" M.,	" 1 0
J. Michie,	" 16 0
J. Fegredo,	" 2 0
H. M. Smith,	" 5 0
Mrs. W. W. Glass,	" 10 0
" F. Rodrigues,	" 8 0
Miss H.,	" 2 0

ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

Captain FitzSimon, 29th Regt. through
His Grace the Archbishop, Rs. 50

FESTIVALS.

Tuesday, 1, Oct. S. Remigius B. C. sem. Vesp fol. com. prec.
Wednesday, 2,—SS. Guard. Angels d. maj. Vesp, of present com. fol.
Thursday, 3,—S. Thomas Heref. B. C. d. (E. S.) Vesp. from chap. com. prec.
Friday, 4,—S. Francis of Ass. C. d. Vesp. of pres. com. fol. and SS. MM.
Saturday, 5,—Vot. off. Immac. Conc. sem. com. SS. Plac. &c. Vesp. fol. com. Sunday.
Sunday, 6,—19th aft. Pent. 2nd Oct. Feast of the Rosary, d. maj. com. Sunday. In Vesp. com. fol. and Sunday, and SS.
Monday, 7,—S. Bruno C. d. (yesterd.) com. S. Mark, and SS. Sergius, &c. Vesp. from chap. com. prec.
Tuesday, 8,—S. Bridget W. d. (Col. at Mass Deus omni. fid. past &c. fam. tuum Thomam, quem &c. Eccl. Milenensis &c.) In Vesp. com. fol.
Wednesday, 9,—SS. Dionys. and Comp. M. M. sem. Vesp. from chap. com. prec.
Thursday, 10,—S. Francis Borgia C. sem. Vesp. fol. com. prec.
Friday, 11,—S. Canicus Ab. d. (I. S.) Vesp. from chap. com. prec.
Saturday, 12,—S. Wilfrid B. C. d. (E. S.) Vesp. from chap. com. prec. and Sunday.
Sunday, 13,—20th aft. Pent. 3d. Oct. Ded. of the Irish Churches d. com. Sunday, Vesp. from chap. com. prec. and Sunday.
Monday, 14,—S. Callistus P. M. d. Vesp. from chap. com. prec.
Tuesday, 15,—S. Teresa V. d. Vesp. from chap. com. prec.

SEAL'S COLLEGE AND THE JESUITS.

We understand that Baboo Mutty Lall Seal, the founder of the Institution aforesaid, has dissolved the connection of the Jesuits with his College. Great provocations had, we hear, been given to the Baboo in various ways, and after long forbearance he felt himself bound in duty to take this step. The following notice was hung up in the College on Friday: "NOTICE.—The connection of St. Xavier's with Seal's College has been dissolved, and this Institution is from this day placed under the superintendence of the Rev. K. M. Banerjee.—Calcutta, Sept. 20, 1844."—Bengal Hurkaru, Sept. 23rd.

We have endeavoured to make room, this morning, for several letters, some of which are sufficiently important to claim attention at any time. One of these is from the Rev. Mr. JOHNSON, the Superior of St. Xavier's College, who has very properly come forward to give, in his own person, an explanation of the causes of the rupture between the Jesuits and Baboo Mutty Lall Seal, in the matter of the Seal's College. We think the Reverend Gentleman's version of the affair is highly satisfactory; and it appears to us that the Baboo has acted with some precipitancy, and not a little injustice to the Reverend Gentlemen, who undertook the superintendence of the Seal College, and who, we have no doubt, have discharged, under many disadvantages, their duty most conscientiously. From all we have heard on the subject we infer that the worthies of St. Xavier's consider that they have rather gained a loss than otherwise; they seem to have had but a thankless office and to have suffered not a little during their incumbency. As to the College, it has passed into good hands; and we have no doubt, it will thrive under Krishna Mohun Banerjee—but we must not do an injustice to those, who nursed the infancy of the institution.—Ibid, Sept. 24th.

To the Editor of the Bengal Hurkaru.

SIR,—In your paper of to-day I find a notice, that the connection between Seal's College and the Jesuits has been dissolved by Baboo Mutty Lall Seal. As the attention of the Public has been called to this fact, and an assertion made that "great provocations" have been given to the Baboo in various ways, I have thought it right to publish the only correspondence that has passed between Baboo Mutty Lall Seal and myself on the subject of this dissolution. On the 17th current, I received the following letter from the Baboo's agent, Kissen Mohun Mullick:

TO THE SUPERIOR OF ST. XAVIER'S COLLEGE.

REV. SIR,—I am instructed by Baboo Mutty Lall Seal to signify to you his serious disapprobation of the conduct of the European Teachers of Seal's College, who acted yesterday in a manner which at once approaches to a breach of Hindooism, which they were from the commencement repeatedly cautioned not to interfere with. This has given cause to the parents of the Boys to cast insinuations which reflect seriously on his character and standing in Society. Under these circumstances, he himself imperatively called upon* to take the matter into his serious consideration so that such improprieties may cease at once; as he is tacitly pledged to the parents of the Boys to prevent all encroachments upon their religion.

* Sic in orig.—PRINTER.

I am, at the same time, desired to observe that the frequent occurrence of such annoyances leads the Baboo to think that they are intended for the attainment of some particular object unknown to him, and the Baboo will be glad to learn if he is right in this conjecture, so that he may have recourse to prompt measures for remedying the evil.

I have the honor to be, Revd. Sir,
Your obedient Servant,
KISSAN MOHUN MULLICK,
Sercy. Seal's College.

September 17, 1844.

On the 18th, I wrote to Baboo Mullick, begging of him to state clearly what were the charges made against the masters. On the 19th, I received the following answer:—

TO REV. MR. R. JOHNSON,
Superior of St. Xavier's College.

REV. SIR,—I am directed to inform you that the Baboo cannot help considering your letter received yesterday as an error of the subject on which I addressed you on the 17th instant. A matter which had become notorious among the parents and guardians of the boys and in the neighbourhood of the College must have been well known to the teachers themselves, and the Baboo little expected that an attempt should thus be made to hush up the question. You must all be aware that the reception of European visitors was religiously considered indecent among the Hindus, and that you were pledged not to enforce or encourage any practices among the boys calculated rudely to assail the prejudices of their parents and relations. And yet, with the full knowledge of all this the teachers themselves became parties to an indecent display on the part of the boys of eating and sporting with things the very touch of which was forbidden to them by their social institutions.

Under these circumstances, and in consideration of the many previous instances in which similar infringements had been committed by the teachers, and against which they had been repeatedly cautioned, the Baboo cannot but foresee the most disastrous consequences to the institution if he continues any longer silently to connive at such irregularities, and as he cannot any longer repose confidence in teachers who attempt evasions on points so seriously affecting the stability of the Seminary, I am directed to acquaint you that the connection of St. Xavier's with Seal's College is dissolved from this day.

I remain, Revd. Sir, your most obedient servt.,
KISSAN MOHUN MULLICK,
Sercy. Seal's College.

Calcutta, September 19, 1844.

On the 20th, I wrote to Baboo Mutty Lall Seal, requesting an interview, promising to bring the masters themselves with me, in order that we might learn from him what he had to complain of, and that he might hear what answers they had to give. On the 21st, I received the following note:—

Mutty Lall Seal begs to say, in reply to the note of Mr. Johnson of yesterday, that this being the Express day, he cannot make it convenient to see him, but will let Mr. J. know when it may be so.

September 21, 1844.

Now, Mr. Editor, I will lay before you a statement of the conduct of the masters on the day referred to in Kissen Mohun Mullick's letter, and leave you and the Public to infer what "great provocation" the Jesuits could possibly have given. Rev. Mr. Rabascall, being about to sail on the Hindustan, had promised a farewell visit to our masters of Seal's College. A tiffin was provided for him in their private room. After tiffin, when the coolie was carrying down the remnants, some of the scholars of the 1st class took, without the knowledge of the masters, some bread from his basket.

It appears from the account given by the scholars, that they amused themselves, some by throwing bread at each other, others by eating it, others again by forcing portions of it into the mouths of their companions—and all this, while the masters were remaining in the tiffin room. At the beginning of the afternoon schools, complaints were made by one of the scholars of the 1st class to his master, that another was annoying him by trying to put bread into his mouth: the boy complained of was called to order, and the bread which he had was instantly taken out of the room. The master of the second class saw some of the scholars playing with bread; he took it from them, and threw it away.

This is, I assure you, Sir, all, as far as I can learn—and my information, I have reason to believe, is complete—that happened out of the usual routine, on the 16th of Sept.; other provocations are insinuated in the notice published this morning with reference to this subject; but they have never been mentioned to me. The letter of Kisson Mohun Mullick of the 17th complains only of the conduct of the masters on the 16th, and of “similar annoyances.”

I am &c.,
R. JOHNSON.

St. Xavier's College, } [Ibid. 24th Sept.
September 22, 1844. }

To the Editor of the Bengal Harkara.

SIR,—Having had (with the exception of a short interval, of late) some connection with Seal's College from its very foundation and being now sole Superintendent, I cannot help offering a remark or two on Mr. Johnson's letter of the 23d instant, and on your own observations thereon. You say, the Jesuits discharged their duties most conscientiously. I do not deny this. There are various sorts of consciences in the world; and I do not pretend to define what is, or what is not, conformable to the conscience of gentlemen belonging to the order of the Madura Brahmins. But, Sir, while I do not deny your assertion, that the Jesuits acted most conscientiously, I hope you will allow that the founder of the Institution, too, did no less so in dissolving his connection with them. Upon Mr. Johnson's own showing, there was a most indecent display (and, to Hindu feelings a most abhorrent one) among the boys in the room the very next to that where their masters were tiffin; and as this was not the first occurrence of the kind, it fully justifies the step which the Babu has taken. There could not have been much watchfulness on the part of the teachers, when such scenes could repeatedly take place in spite of frequent warnings.

Besides, Sir, many provocations had been given to the Babu, and great forbearance exercised by him—who, instead of acting precipitately, has, perhaps, been too dilatory. Yes, Sir; such provocations were given as might have tired the patience of Job himself. I shall not, however, say any thing in detail, unless called upon. Mr. Johnson, I can verily believe, was not aware of every thing that transpired. His ignorance of the facts cannot, however, alter the nature of the case. Almost every boy in the College, and every inmate of the Institution, and the whole circle of the Babu's own friends and dependants had been disgusted. Complaints without number had been made to him by the parents and guardians of the children. His patient forbearance, in hopes of seeing an improved line of conduct on the part of the teachers had well nigh thrown him into disrepute among his own countrymen. The nickname of Vyas-Kasi had already been allotted to his Institution. The number of boys had fallen off from very near 300 to below 130, of whom scarcely a hundred attended daily. No, Sir; he did not act precipitately. A month or two more would have, perhaps, entirely desolated his College. He was bound in duty—he was called upon by justice—he was importuned by the students themselves and their parents, to break off his connection with the Jesuits,—who, whatever their motives, proved entirely incompetent for the task they had undertaken.

Yours, &c.

K. M. BANERJEA.

Seal's College, September 24, 1844

P. S.—In justice to Mr. Johnson, I must testify that, during his own personal connection with the institution, for the first two months after its foundation, very little dissatisfaction existed among the boys. His name is still held in respect among them.

We willingly insert the letter of the Rev. Krisna Mohun Banerjea, which will be found in another part of our paper; but we cannot help feeling some regret that it is not more explanatory on the subject of the provocations given by the Jesuit Ministers. No one will accuse us of an undue leaning towards that fraternity; but we must say, that no sufficient grounds have as yet been exhibited for the very unceremonious treatment which they appear to have received at the hands of the worthy founder of Seal's College. We think it is but fair to the Jesuits themselves—to Babu Mutty Loll—and to the community at large; that the nature of the “provocations,” now somewhat mysteriously hinted at, should be clearly revealed to the public. We cannot admit that the mere circumstance of the Reverend Gentlemen eating their tiffin beneath the roof of the building dedicated to the tuition of Hindoo youths, can be considered a very serious provocation. Several Hindoo Gentlemen, and among them Mutty Loll Seal himself—have entertained the abominable ones of Christianity in their own houses and liberally dispensed the savory things in which Christians indulge; and we cannot help thinking it extremely unfair to look upon such a renovation of exhausted nature, as it is stated the Jesuit schoolmasters were wont to practice, in the light of a scandal to Hindooism. We write necessarily, more or less in the dark. Mr. Johnson says that he knows no provocation beyond the eating of a tiffin; but our worthy friend Krishna Mohun Banerjea hints at “provocations,” which we think must have extended some way beyond the lunch; and, as we have said before, it is extremely desirable, that the ministers of St. Xavier's should be allowed the opportunity of rebutting whatever accusations can be brought against them. The Secretary of Seal's College seems to have practically declined to state explicitly the charges against the Jesuits; and now the present Superintendent of the College seems equally disinclined to be explanatory. This, we say, is not fair. Every accused party ought to know specifically the charges, which have been brought against him—but the charges brought against the Jesuits have not been specifically set forth; and they declare, that up to this time they are ignorant of any offence committed by them beyond that of eating tiffin. We think that under any view of the case, the mystery ought to be cleared up.—Ibid. 25th Sept.

An explanation of the cause of the expulsion of the Jesuits from Seal's College is given in the papers of this morning, by the Rev. Mr. Johnson, the Rector of the Jesuit's College. According to his statement, a farewell tiffin was given to the Rev. Mr. Rabascall, who has been sent to establish a Catholic Ministry at Aden; and some of the Native boys seized a loaf, which the servants were carrying away from the collation, and partook of part of it themselves, and thrust several pieces down the throats of some other boys. It seems very strange and altogether unaccountable that the Seal Baboo should visit so accidental an offence with such tokens of his displeasure, and at once forget the long debt of gratitude due to the Reverend Jesuits for their disinterested attention to the College from its very foundation. And it seems still more unaccountable, that the Rev. Kirshna Mohun Banerjee, should indirectly but unequivocally lend himself to this unreasonable humour of the Babu's, by stepping in to take charge of the College. Cannot the friends of Mootee Babu,—and a rich man has many friends—exonerate his character from the odium which Mr. Johnson's letter leaves on it?—Friend of India, September 26th.

MILITARY AT DIVINE SERVICE.

"Kinsale, Friars-street, June 14th, 1844.

"Rev. J. F. M'Namara presents his respectful compliments to Major Raines, and begs to be informed whether, as mentioned to him, an order has been, within a few days, communicated to the Roman Catholic soldiers in the Kinsale Barracks, 'not to appear in Catholic Chapels at any time unless when marched thereto.'

"Mr. M'Namara, in troubling Major Raines on the subject, is only acting under a sense of duty, as Parish Priest of Kinsale, in thus endeavouring to ascertain any infringement on the usual religious rights and privileges of the Catholic soldiers of this district.

"To Major Raines, commanding the Depot
"of the 95th, at Kinsale Barracks.

"Barracks, Saturday, June 15.

"Major Raines presents his compliments to the Rev. Mr. M'Namara, and in acknowledging the receipt of his letter of yesterday, begs to say that he cannot consider any irresponsible person authorized to question whatever orders he may think it necessary to issue to the Depot under his command; and he, therefore, declines entering on the subject referred to; at the same time Major Raines begs to assure Mr. M'Namara that he is not actuated by any uncourteous feeling towards him in thus declining to comply with his request.

"To Rev. J. M'Namara, Friar's street.

"Cork, 19th June, 1844.

"Sir—I am directed by Major Gen. Turner to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday's date, and to inform you that there must have been some misapprehension on the part of Major Raines as to the orders in this country, with respect to soldiers being marched to Church or Chapel on a Sunday. The soldiers are, of course, to be marched regularly to their respective places of worship on that day, but it was never intended that individual soldiers, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, should be prevented from attending divine service at other times, if they think proper, when not on duty, and the Major-General has accordingly now instructed Major Raines to that effect.

"I have the honour to be, Sir, your most obedient servant,

"C. YORK, Colonel and A. Q. M. G.

"To the Rev. Justin M'Namara, P. P. 'Kinsale.' [Limerick Chronicle, June 29.]

CONVERTS AND APOSTATES.

It is recorded in Boswell's Life of Johnson, that the great scholar and lexicographer once observed:—

"A man who is converted from Protestantism to Popery may be sincere, he parts with nothing; he is only superadding to what he already had. But a convert from Popery to Protestantism gives up so much of what he has held as sacred as anything that he retains; there is so much laceration of mind in such a conversion, that it can hardly be sincere and lasting."

The expression of such a sentiment, from the mouth of so sincere and distinguished a member of the English Church establishment as the learned doctor, strongly marks the difference that exists between the respective renunciation of his religion by a Catholic and a Protestant. In the one case, there is a "laceration of mind;" we cannot improve on the "curious felicity" of that term; in the other, there is always an arduous assumption of grave and onerous duties, and, generally, a sacrifice of very substantial worldly interests. To speak in a merely temporal point of view, there is a premium on apostacy; but conversion is at a discount. A Catholic clergyman that has the misfortune to fall from his high ministry, releases himself at once from all the restraints of celibacy, from the diurnal obligation of passing a couple of hours over his breviary, from the stern rule of his order, which forbids his participation in so many pleasures legitimately accessible to others, from fasting, from abstinence, and from that constant self-watchfulness, obligatory on one whose province it is to celebrate, day by day, the holy mysteries of faith. Now, a Protestant clergyman embracing the creed and ministry of Rome, ipso facto subscribes his adhesion to all the restrictions which the other had shaken off; how obvious, then, the inference, that the change which has been operated in his mind, is less obnoxious to the suspicion of insincerity than that which, in the case of the Catholic priest, had been to him so fraught with relaxation of duty! Not only does the change from the old to the new religion bring with it, to the individual that adopts that unhappy step, a prodigious diminution of conscientious obligations, but, for nearly three centuries, the laws of the land, and the prejudices of the many, alike favoured such an abandonment of principle as the most effectual method of promoting his temporal interests. The rigours of the penal laws are, in these days, forgotten; but, when we reflect that, for a long period of time, the priest who said mass was likely to be hanged, after having his bowels torn from him and burnt before him; that the layman who harboured him incurred the penalties of premunire; and that, after the excessive severity of such inhuman enactments had fallen into disuse, the Catholic, however noble, however rich, still continued to linger in a state of serf-like and most degrading bondage, it is more surprising, considering the weakness of our nature, and the power of our adversaries, that we should have survived as a body at all, than that many of our branches should have been lopped off. Volumes might be compiled, and have been so, illustrative of the penal and disabling predicament in which, until a period almost within the memory of man, the Catholics, as such, found themselves placed. The possessor of a landed estate might be ousted by his heir at law, upon the latter's conforming to the religion as by law established: the Catholic rider of a fine horse, was compelled to take five pounds for him, from any Protestant that offered to become a purchaser at the price! and, in every action and relation of life, the individual that courageously clung to the faith of his forefathers, found himself ignominiously fettered and held to scorn. The fact that, under the influence of such a barbarous code, vast numbers of Catholics did secede from the true fold, is a circumstance very degrading to human nature, but only too consistent with its well-known weaknesses. Judas bartered the privileges of an apostle for thirty pieces of silver; and many a renegade has exchanged the true faith, to hold his fleeting possessions on earth in safety. In one of the High Church journals of the day, we not long ago observed an ostentatious record of distinguished Irish families which, in the course of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, have abandoned Catholicity and embraced Protestantism. The result is complacently ascribed to the godly labours of the Anglican missionary clergy. Despicable fallacy! We would stake our lives that such an anomaly as a bonâ fide conscientious renunciation of the old religion for the new, never once took place in Ireland. The apostacies, so pompously recorded, would be all traceable to the "mammon of unrighteousness," to the trepidation of individuals for the security of their estates, to their desire of rising to a level in the social scale with their fellow-beings, to the gratification of personal ambition, against which, until the year 1829, so many avenues were closed, and to the willingness to be emancipated from religious restraints.

The glittering bait of a seat in parliament, has allured many an Irish peer and opulent commoner from his hereditary creed; and, influenced by his example, or swayed by his commands, the junior members of his house have participated in their feudal chiefs' apostacy. Whole families have thus become lost to Catholicity, because a weak man, of dubious moral principles, may have preferred to the grave convictions of his better judgment, the fleeting pleasures of gratified vanity. Such an instance coupled, however, with some redeeming features, just now presents itself to our minds. It was the case of the Lord Dunsaney, whether the late, or the last but one, we do not at this time remember, who, having in early life, from motives of worldly expediency, conformed to the Protestant religion, brought up his whole family in it; but, after half a century's abjuration of the Catholic faith, embraced it again as an octogenarian, and died in the most edifying sentiments of contrition for the great fault of his youth. Instances are on record, illustrative of the reckless inconsistency which sometimes marks the Irish character, of Catholic gentlemen, who had some temporal point to gain thereby, hastening from Ireland to London for the purpose of abjuring their faith, and immediately on their return home, recanting such abjuration. The motives that have respectively led men to become converts or apostates, have been at all times very distinctly marked. If, however, we confine our observations to the changes of religion which may have taken place in men of our own time and country, and within the last very few years, and attentively consider the position of the individuals, and the motives which must have led to the line of conduct they have pursued, we must arrive at the conclusion that, in a temporal point of view, there was on the one side nothing to gain, and much to sacrifice, on the other much to gain, and nothing to sacrifice.

Among those who, deservingly the errors of Protestantism, have had the courage to forsake them, we number men distinguished for the most exalted talents,—men who, to attain the official university situations which had been conferred upon them, must have qualified for such appointments by long years of study. We reckon clergymen of high birth and acknowledged abilities, who, for the sheer love of truth, have abandoned the brilliant prospects that courted their continuance within the pale of the Anglican establishment, and have sacrificed the lucrative temporalities of rich livings, and all the comforts and privileges of valuable college fellowships, to become hard-working, ill-paid, and comparatively humble ministers of our missionary Church. We have seen young men of birth and fortune run counter to all the ordinary inducements which their families and worldly interests might oppose to their adoption of a faith still under the practical ban of the state; the very latest instance of such generous self-devotion, being one in which bright prospects of parliamentary distinction are probably sacrificed at the shrine of conscientious duty.

Look at the other side of the picture, and candidly contrast with the converts, the apostates of the day. Of these, there are now no laymen among the higher orders, because the days are passed when any great practical temporal advantage accrued to the lay perpetrator of such a "laceration of mind;" but, as the validity of our holy orders is recognized by the Protestant Church, and that prospects of very positive advantage open to the Catholic priest who chooses to desert his post, there are occasionally sad and offensive instances of such conduct, clearly traceable to considerations of worldly interest, and never to sincere convictions. The very man who, with the pen or the tongue, would be ready enough to challenge such a proposition, must inwardly acknowledge its accuracy. What are the most recent cases of clerical apostacies, trumpeted forth, too, by the High Church press, as triumphs of their party, but instances wherein the gratification of human passions has been the main spring of such derelictions? The Maltese priest, of whose conversion (!) the newspapers have furnished flaming accounts, had a mind to marry; of course, then, it became matter of great expediency for him to withdraw from a Church of which the discipline forbade such an indulgence. The hand of a rich bride was alike the "primum mobile" of the religious (!) change of sentiment which gave rise, some months ago, to the scandalous ceremony of a Catholic clergyman's abjuration of his faith in Chichester cathedral; and the case of another unhappy sacerdotal renegade, in the midland counties of England, is, we are now credibly informed, a perfectly analogous one. We envy not the feelings of such men. The best hope that can be breathed on their behalf is, that at some future day they may be found expiating, within the walls of a monastery, their fatal deviation from the right path. The cell of the monk or the maniac, is, indeed, not the infrequent alternative that marks the latter career of the apostate priest. We know that amongst the austere penitents of La Trappe, an order especially adapted to become the refuge of enormous sinners, such reclaimed recreants are commonly to be found; and we have in our mind's eye the notable instance of an Irish Catholic apostate priest, who, accepting a curacy in Cornwall from the Bishop of Exeter, was shortly afterwards consigned to a lunatic asylum. Remorse, if it find not solace in stern repentance, lead, directly to insanity! Even in this world, visible judgments sometimes follow in the wake of religious apostacy. We could name a family, which, at a comparatively recent period, was numbered amongst those that adhered to the ancient faith, its defection from which has been followed by the premature extinction of all its principal members! There is, to our mind, no degree of guilt more fraught with peril and degradation, than that of deliberate apostacy. Charity permits, and, indeed, enjoins us to hope that, under the plea of invincible ignorance, the sincere belief of many in the errors wherein they had been educated, will be accepted by an all-merciful God in the room of a knowledge of His saving faith: but what shall be thought of, what can be hoped for, those miserable creatures of base self-interest, who, having known and walked in the ways of truth, wilfully forsake them? The lot of such persons in this world is unenviable enough; of the responsibility that awaits them in the other, one shudders to think.

To one memorable recent case of conversion and relapse, we are disposed to accord the credit of more sincerity than its prima facie statement might have seemed to warrant a belief in. The vacillations of a mind, powerful in so many respects, yet weak in others, may yet, by the mercy of God, find an ultimate haven of refuge in a return to the bosom of the only Church. Thus only will the able and amiable, but now doubly erring person to whom we advert, recover that peace of mind of which he admits the present loss. For his sake, may Heaven speed his restoration to our community!

An anecdote of the manner in which the champions of Protestantism sometimes assail the faith of those whom they would proselytize, may not inappropriately conclude this article.

The Countess of * * *, the wife of one of the great Orange lords of the north of Ireland had adopted the following expedient for enticing the poor to a breach of their religious duties. Every Friday an abundant meat dinner was provided, of which it was well understood that all the indigent residents on the estate were entitled to partake. It was, of course, hoped that hunger might act as a premium upon the breach of the Catholic rule, which enjoins abstinence from meat on the Friday. The priest, was, however, on this occasion, a little deeper than the lady. It is well known that abstinence is only a part of Church discipline, which may, on occasion, be relaxed. Learning, then, the ingenious device which had been adopted to induce his parishioners to capitulate with their consciences, he adopted the counter expedient of granting them a dispensation to eat flesh meat on a Friday, for so long a time as the gratuitous dinner given on that day should continue. The "fraus piæ" was not discovered for many weeks; nor was it till after vast numbers of Catholic paupers had sinlessly and abundantly partaken of Protestant beef, that the "ruse" was discovered, and a speedy extinguisher placed on the hospitalities.—Catholic Magazine.

CURIOSITIES OF THE CHURCH ESTABLISHMENT IN GREAT BRITAIN.*

Income of the Clergy.—The cost of the Established Churches of England and Ireland is, according to Mr. Coventry's Treatise on the Revenue of the Law Established Church, £8,850,000 a year; and their followers number 6,400,000 persons. The Dissenters in England and Ireland number 17,600,000 people, who pay their religious instructors £1,024,000 per annum. The whole Christian world (England, Scotland, and Ireland excepted,) which contains 188,728,000 people, pay to their clergy altogether but £8,852,000 a year; so that the clergy of all descriptions in Great Britain and Ireland, with a population of about 25,000,000 are actually paid more than that of the whole Christian world besides, by the sum of £1,980,000 per annum! The revenues of the English bishops are variously stated, but the following list will be found pretty accurate, though we are aware it has been denied, with, however, very little truth; for when we recollect that many of these cormorant dignitaries have died worth (in real and personal property) from a quarter to three quarters of a million, the statement cannot be far beyond the mark.

* From a pamphlet published by a Protestant operative of Bath, England.

	Living.
Archbishop of Canterbury,	£41,100	176
Archbishop of York,	26,000	80
Bishop of Durham,	61,000	80
Bishop of London,	30,000	95
Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry and Dean of Durham,	12,600	48
Bishop of St. Asaph,	2,000	90
Bishop of Bath and Wells,	7,330	27
Bishop of Chester,	4,700	30
Bishop of Chichester, also rector of St. Giles,	6,770	36
Bishop of Ely,	21,340	180
Bishop of Lincoln and Dean of St. Paul's,	15,530	36
Bishop of Norwich,	8,370	40
Bishop of Oxford,	3,500	11
Canon of Wells and prebendary of Durham, together,	5,400	16
Bishop of Salisbury and Chancellor of Order of the Garter!	14,420	40
Bishop of Carlisle,	5,300	34
Bishop of Worcester and rector of Hartlebury,	9,600	26
Bishop of Winchester,	28,730	70
Bishop of Hereford,	7,680	35
Bishop of Exeter,	6,500	48
Bishop of St. David's, prebend of Durham,	6,260	100
Bishop of Bangor,	1,310	80
Bishop of Bristol, rector of Berwick, master of Trinity college, Cambridge,	4,470	14
Bishop of Rochester,	5,400	21
Bishop of Peterborough,	4,140	13
Bishop of Gloucester,	3,200	25
Bishop of Landaff (the poorest see in the hierarchy),	1,540	16
Bishop of Sodor and Man (no return of the revenue.)

In addition to the above, there are sixty-two archdeaconries, the values of which vary in amount, but average £800 a year each. And in addition to these enormous incomes, £100,000 have been annually voted by Parliament towards the support of the poor clergy of this rich church. Many of the deaneries, as those of Westminster, Windsor, St. Paul's, Salisbury, Lincoln, Exeter, and Wells, produce incomes varying from £1,500 to £12,000 a year.

The population of Ireland is 9,879,715, of whom 7,965,396 are Roman Catholics, and 1,916,317 belong to different Protestant sects. There are of the Established Church, 4 archbishops, 18 bishops, 300 dignitaries, and about 1,200 parochial incumbents. The incomes of the bishops vary from 3,300 to 12,500 pounds per annum.

Disposal of ecclesiastical property.—Some time back, twenty-nine livings were announced for sale in a London paper, all in one advertisement; some of them very unique, as the following:

FOR SALE, THE NEXT PRESENTATION TO A RECTORY. The dwelling very superior; the glebe excellent; the duty very light; situate in a good fishing county—two packs of hounds in the neighbourhood! Age of the present incumbent

The sinecure livings in Ireland are numerous, and are frequently offered for sale. The following was inserted some time since in a London paper:

"SINECURE LIVING IN IRELAND FOR SALE. Value £450 a year. There is no church—no duty—and the visitations need not be attended. Inquire of —, No. —, Red Lion square."

The manuscript sermons of deceased clergymen, as it appears from the subjoined advertisement, are disposed of in the same way:

"HOLY ORDERS.—Any gentleman at present in or about taking holy orders, may purchase from the author's widow a lot of original sermons, of a chaste, classic style, on subjects both doctrinal and practical, and such as are enjoined by the forms of our church, and of strictly orthodox sentiments, fit either for a town or country audience, having received the approbation of both. Apply personally or by letter, post-paid, to Mrs. Howell, Berner's street, Oxford street."—The Times.

Protestantism and Romanism contrasted.—In the French Chamber of Deputies, sitting Feb. 15th, 1832, the vote of 1,365,000 francs to the archbishops and bishops of France, was reduced to 830,000 f.: thus saving 490,000 f. The archbishop of Paris now receives 25,000 f. instead of 50,000 f. or £1,041 sterling, or 3,000 dollars. Thirteen archbishops receive each, 15,000 f., or nearly 3,000 dollars. Sixty-six bishops receive each 10,000 f., or nearly 2,000 dollars. Thus the archbishop of Paris, thirteen other archbishops and sixty-six bishops in France receive in all £36,552, or less than the one archbishop of Canterbury in England.—Religious Cabinet.

The bulls for the translation of the Right Rev. Dr. Browne from the Sec of Galway to Elphin, have been received. In a few days he will proceed to his new diocese, much to the regret of all classes in Galway, by whom he was justly admired for his piety and patriotism.—Tuam Herald.

His Grace the most Rev. Dr. M'Hale, Archbishop of Tuam, has been pleased to appoint the Rev. Patrick Harley, parish priest of Arran.—Ibid.

TRINITY COLLEGE.—ADMISSION OF CATHOLICS TO SCHOLARSHIPS.—Our readers will see with interest that the mandamus to the visitors of Trinity College to entertain the appeal of Mr. Heron has been field good. Mr. Heron is a Catholic student of the University, whose marks on his examination for scholarship entitled him to that distinction, but who has been rejected on account of his religious belief. Such has long been the practice in Trinity College; often questioned, but until now as often submitted to. Mr. Heron believes that the exclusion is not founded in legal right, and is determined to try the question. Should he establish the admissibility of Catholics to scholarships he will have rendered the country an important service; should he fail, he will still have called public attention to a crying grievance, and will have helped to prepare the public mind for demanding legislation on the subject.—Freeman.

THE
BENGAL
CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

No. 14.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1844,

[VOL. VII.]

THE PRINCIPLES OF THE CALCUTTA CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

We have repeatedly endeavoured to bring the Calcutta Christian Advocate to a sense of true Christian duty, and in our strictures have made use of language both of mildness and severity, in order that, if kindness fail, a little chastisement may do him good. But we are sorry to observe that our endeavours have proved of no avail,—not even the least glimpse of the blush of shame has this Christian Editor yet exhibited to give us some hope of his reformation. We are therefore forced to attribute his conduct to a callousness, to an idiosyncrasy that is devoid of every Christian principle to guide him on to truth. We are particularly sorry for his readers, that the Christian Advocate is allowed week after week to disseminate calumnies and scandals, to exhibit envy and malice, and to utter things that he knows to be untrue,—we say we are sorry for his readers, because if he be not aware from "blindness of heart" of the mischief his conduct tends to, yet the evil example he sets his adherents and friends is likely to demoralize the entire sects of the Independents, Baptists and other Sectarians in this city, to make them eventually repudiate the first principles of Christianity,—Charity and Truth. We have already said enough of the Advocate, and had thought it best to allow the man to rave and chafe away at his discretion at the rapid progress of Catholicism both here and in every other part of the universe,—his malice, envy and hatred being of no avail when truth is opposed to his passions,—but we have in this instance been obliged again to notice the paper in order to refer our readers to the following article which we have taken from the Calcutta Star of Monday last, pointing out the spirit and feeling with which the Christian Advocate has spoken of the circumstance of the dissolution of connection between Seal's College and the Jesuit Fathers.

Our contemporary of the Star says that "the bad spirit of the professors of different faiths forms one of the great impediments to the cause of education." We are inclined to support this statement, but with some limit. It has never been known, at least it has never come to our knowledge, that the professors of the Catholic faith have either directly or indirectly shown the rancour, hatred and malice towards the institutions established by the various branches of Protestantism, which the latter have shown towards the Catholic institutions. Refer we only to this country; when and how have the Catholics abused and calumniated the innumerable schools and colleges established and supported by Protestants? On the other hand, at every step the Catholics have taken for the amelioration and enlightenment of the destitute and the ignorant, have calumnies upon calumnies, and abuses which carry with them their own falsehoods, been propagated by Protestants to injure the institutions: and in such work, the Calcutta Christian Advocate has been the most prominent, the most furious of the furies—the fire-brand of the band,—and yet a Christian advocate foresooth—alas! for Christianity with such an advocate!!!

"It was with extreme regret we heard of the differences between Baboo Mooty Lall Seal and the Jesuits under whose direction his college was placed. It is even with greater regret we have read an article on the subject in the Calcutta Christian Advocate. We have here another lamentable instance of the truth of what we have frequently written, that religious differences, and the bad spirit of the professors of different faiths, form one of the great impediments to the cause of education. In the very heading of this unhappy article we have evidence of its character—"STRANGE BUT NOT SURPRISING—DISSOLUTION OF PARTNERSHIP BETWEEN HINDUISM AND POPERY!!"—and throughout there is not a syllable that does not treat the misunderstanding between the friends of learning as a subject for triumph, because they neither of them entertain the same religious opinions as the writer.

The Jesuits are plainly charged with having placed themselves in connection with the Bahoo under false pretences, and the following is the language in which a professing Christian minister writes :—

“From these and other statements which have reached us, it appears that the Jesuits undertook the management of the College on the understanding that the religious prejudices of the pupils were to be left untouched and that neither Popery nor Christianity were to be taught in the Institution. If such were the terms, and we gather from these and other statements that so it was, we can only say that Mutty Lall Seal could not have been in the exercise of his usual judgment when he engaged Jesuits on such terms. The very object of their existence is to advance the interests of their order and could Mutty Lall Seal or any one imagine that they would devote time, talent, and life to such an object as Seal's College, without indulging the hope that they would succeed either in getting to the weather side of the Bahoo, or influencing the pupils by their general deportment and system of tuition. For once the wily Jesuit has been defeated—the Bengali Rothschild has been more than a match for the disciples of Loyola. He would have made a bright member of the order but by this rash act he has escaped the probability of canonization. He might have been a Popish saint, but he has forfeited all hope, and for the present we can see no prospect of miracles being wrought in Calcutta at the shrine of Bahoo Mutty Lall Seal.

“We have often heard it stated that the Jews, notorious for their shrewdness and cunning in other parts of the world, are by no means a match for the Bengalis, and this may account for the comparatively few resident Jews in this great emporium of commerce in the east. But we were not prepared to find a Bengali merchant more than a match in diplomacy and tact in collegiate matters for a finished and accomplished company of Jesuits. We begin to suspect that others of mankind as well as ourselves will discover that the secret of the past success of the Jesuits in Christian communities has consisted as much, if not more, in their priestly attire, sagacious looks, apparent sanctity, and the historic dread appended to the name, as to the assumed mysterious superiority in the arts of teaching and governing which have been possessed by a few of the order, but wielded even by that few neither for the welfare of men nor the ultimate success of their own order.”

The whole of the above is obviously an attack on the obnoxious Order; there is not a syllable of regret that dissensions should have taken place, which, if not felt, in an honest belief that it was good for religion, we have no right to look for; though as little ought we to find a quarrel taken advantage of for a display of envy, hatred, malice, and all uncharitableness.

The Christian Advocate understands that “the Jesuits do not regret the severance of the connection,” and he notices this to add that “the matter has now rather a spice of the fox and the grapes.”

Neither is this the language that should be found in such columns.

We shall make one other quotation :—

“One thing, however, in the midst of all, must be gratifying to the friends of Christian education in Calcutta—the first attempt of the Jesuits in the education of the native youth has failed. The number of pupils, says the Christian Herald, fell off from 300 to 130, and of these not more than 100 were in daily attendance. We were not prepared for this after the laudations bestowed on the educational system of the Jesuits at the commencement of their career at Seal's College, by those whose knowledge of history should at least have taught them that it was a system from which those elements of education which make man a thinking being are comparatively excluded, and all that is calculated to make him merely showy and exhibitory are prominently brought out.”

We are not prepared to write of the above with patience. The words which the writer himself marks with italics again confirms the melancholy truth, that among those very men who ought to be the warmest friends of education we find its bitterest opponents, and that, if the uninstructed will not learn from their books and read, and believe with them, they had far rather they learned not at all. Can we wonder at the slow progress of education when conversion by tyranny is the principle, which leaves conversion, too, an unsubstantial bubble, an empty shell.

Of the fruits of the Jesuits' system of education the Advocate writes with singular imprudence, but we are not desirous to retaliate the “showy and exhibitory.” We have a strong idea that were these teachers to challenge competition, they would remain unanswered.”

THE ANNUAL EXHIBITION AT ST. XAVIER'S COLLEGE.

We regret exceedingly that we are unable to lay before our readers an account of the annual exhibition and distribution of Prizes at St. Xavier's College, held on Tuesday last. Other avocations not permitting us to witness the interesting scene beyond a very short time at the commencement, we trusted to the kindness of another to furnish us with particulars, but have been disappointed. We, however, saw enough to convince us that the College is gaining much popularity not only among Catholics but with almost all classes of religionists. His Grace the most Rev. Dr. Carey was present and a number of Ladies and Gentlemen, many of whom were not of our creed. We understand that the Exhibition gave very general satisfaction and reflected much credit both on the Students and the Professors of the College.

The following hand-bill which was distributed to the Visitors, will show the different branches of study pursued at the College and the Candidates for Prizes :—

A. M. D. G.

ANNUAL EXHIBITION AND DISTRIBUTION OF PRIZES.

St. XAVIER'S COLLEGE, OCTOBER 1, 1844.

Concerto.....(The Allegro)Nicolai.

Prologue Lewis Fleury.

COMPETITION FOR THE FIRST PRIZE.

CANDIDATES.—Dionysius Pereira, Alexander Abreu.

MATTER OF EXAMINATION.

The Theory of Logic and of Rhetoric.

CICERO.—Pro Lege Manilia, Pro Marcello.

HORACE.—Odes, Book III. VIRGIL.—Æneid, Book VI.

DEMOSTHENES.—The first Philippic, The first Olynthiac. HOMER.—Iliad, Book VI. MILTON.—Paradise Lost, Book I. II.

Translation of Lorient's Histoire Moderne, pages c.

Specimens of Latin and English Composition.

COMPETITION FOR THE SECOND PRIZE.

SOLE CANDIDATE.—Henry Rodrigues, .
MATTER OF EXAMINATION.

CICERO.—Catiline III. SALLUST.—Jugurtha.

XENOPHON.—Anabasis, Book I. II.
Translation of Lorient's Histoire Romaine, pages cxx.

History of Rome to the death of Augustus.
Specimens of Latin and English Composition.

COMPETITION FOR THE THIRD PRIZE.

CANDIDATES.—Richard Twidale, Francis Roy, Charles Castello, Lewis Fleury, Edward George.

MATTER OF EXAMINATION.

CICERO.—Catiline I. CÆSAR.—De Bello Gallico, Book IV. V.

Greek Grammar.—Etymology.

Translation of Lorient's Histoire Ancienne, pages lxx.

History of Greece to the death of Alexander.
Summary of the History of the Egyptians, Assyrians, Medes and Persians.

Geography.—Europe, Asia.

Specimens of Latin and English Composition.

PRIZES AWARDED FOR EXCELLENCE IN COMPOSITION.

FIRST CLASS.—Dionysius Pereira.

SECOND CLASS.—Edmund Latour.

THIRD CLASS.—Francis Roy.

FOURTH CLASS.—Candido Ozorio.

FIFTH CLASS.—Richard Texeira.

SIXTH CLASS.—George Calogreedy.

PRIZES AWARDED FOR PROFICIENCY DISPLAYED AT THE QUARTERLY EXAMINATIONS.

FIRST CLASS.

Dionysius Pereira.

Alexander Abreu.

SECOND CLASS.

Henry Rodrigues.

William Hogan.

THIRD CLASS.

Richard Twidale.

Francis Roy.

Charles Castello.

Lewis Fleury.

Edward George.

Alexander Stephens.

FOURTH CLASS.

Charles Fox.

Candido Ozorio.

Francis DeCanal.

Thomas DeSouza.

FIFTH CLASS.

Richard Texeira.

Muddungopaul

Dutt.

John Pereira.

SIXTH CLASS.

Richard Carbery.

Charles Carbery.

Concerto.....(The Rondo).....Nicolai.

MATHEMATICS.

CANDIDATES FOR THE FIRST PRIZE, Alexander Abreu, Richard Twidale.

MATTER OF EXAMINATION.

Geometry.—Plane Trigonometry.

CANDIDATES FOR THE SECOND PRIZE, Francis Roy, Doorga Churn Bose.

MATTER OF EXAMINATION.

Algebra.—Simple and Quadratic Equations.

PRIZE FOR PERSIAN.—SOLE CANDIDATE,..... Richard Twidale.

PRIZE FOR BENGALIE.—SOLE CANDIDATE,..... Henry Rodrigues.

DRAMATIC PERFORMANCE FROM SHAKSPEARE'S HENRY IV.

HENRY IV..... James Cantopher.

NORTHUMBERLAND,..... William Hogan.

HOTSPUR,..... Doorga Churn Bose.

WORCESTER,..... Thomas DeSouza.

BLUNT,..... George DePenning.

Hallelujah Chorus.....Beethoven.

Schools will re-open on Monday, the 4th of November.

L. D. S.

LETTER NO. XX.

FROM A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA TO HIS PROTESTANT FRIENDS IN EUROPE.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—Having endeavoured in my late letters to exhibit to you the opposite effects generated in Protestantism and Catholicism, I shall now strive to point out their respective causes, for there is a union and an affinity between effects and causes which are necessarily inseparable, and in perfect accordance with each other. As the cause is, so will be the effect; as the nature of the tree, so must be its fruit. Protestantism has its principle, so has Catholicism, as they are different in quality, so they are in result. It is of vital moment for us, then, to investigate how we arrive at such opposite issues; how Protestantism propagates division and strife, and how the other keeps together in unity and in the bond of peace; how one becomes to teach contradictory doctrines, and how the other remains in one uniform faith. Such cannot be the result of chance, but must be the consequence of some established law, and of co-operating causes, for if you had to erect an edifice, and saw it presently, as you went on with it, begin to crack and to rend asunder, or parts of it to stand awry, and observed another structure building by a neighbour remain firm, solid, and upright, would you not inquire and exert yourself to ascertain what might be the reason of such contrary effects? Would you not quickly suspect your own was made up of bad materials, or that the architect was unskilful, the plan imperfect, or the foundation itself unsound?—that something in fact was radically wrong, whereas the uniformity and stability of that of your neighbour might satisfy you, that it had all the requisites which your own wanted? You might feel mortified and grieved at your failure, but you would not surely be so superlatively foolish as to go on with your tottering building, while your whole fortune might depend upon your success. No, reason and common sense would dictate to you to survey your neighbour's house, and to follow his example, and begin anew. So it is, my friends, with our spiritual fabrics; we each of us, Protestants and Catholics, adopt distinct plans, use different materials, and build, I may say, upon different foundations. This is our respective "Rules of Faith," this is the direct though not the fundamental cause which produces the effects illustrated in my former letters. It is useless, my friends, to mince the subject, and to cover over our sentiments under the cloak of that culpable liberality, which is the very contradistinction of charity; such is but a sinful weakness. I ask you, why do you follow the Protestant rule of faith? and you answer me, because you believe it was the rule established by Jesus Christ, and if you put a similar question to me, as to the Catholic rule, I will give you a similar reply, because I believe it was the rule established by Jesus Christ. It is however morally impossible, contrary to the attribute of God, that both our rules are of Him; the inference therefore is manifest, that the one only can be of God, and that the other—fearful to think, but all the suasive and glossy sophistry and laudation of man cannot conceal it—is the suggestion of the Devil. This is plain truth, for we are told, "wherefore by their fruits you shall know them," or, as the Rev. Dr. Duff of Calcutta says in his printed Sermon (see my No. 13.) of the principle which now actuates the free and Established Churches of Scotland, we may apply to our rules of faith. "The cause of Christ and the cause of Satan. There is the cause of truth, and the cause of error; the cause of sin and the cause of righteousness; the cause of Christ and the cause of Satan: the cause of Christ, is the cause of truth; the cause of Satan is the cause of error; the cause of sin, the cause of fallen angels, and of ~~fallen~~ men." So literally we may express ourselves of our rules of faith. "The cause of Christ and the cause of Satan." May God help me to show you cause and reason, how and why Protestantism is divided, as you yourselves acknowledge it to be, into numberless sects, teaching opposite doctrines, and how and why on the other hand, Catholicism is united in one body and influenced by one belief. It is truly an awful and important question,—a problem worthy our deepest study, for our rules of faith may be called the highways or paths by which we travel towards eternity; but which is the right one, is the momentous question? As a preliminary step, I shall here give the prominent features of our respective rules of faith. Some of your writers thus define yours. "What do the Roman Catholics assert with respect to the Church? That we are to judge of doctrines by the authority and decision of the Church. What does our Church affirm in opposition to this assertion? That we are first to examine the doctrine, and according to that to judge of the purity of the Church."* Again, "does it seem to have been the intention of Almighty God that there should be an infallible Judge," among men? No, for if an infallible judge had been intended, it would certainly have been declared in Scripture, but there on the contrary, we are commanded to examine and judge for ourselves."† "An infallible Judge in matters of faith not necessary; in matters of property indeed some decision right or wrong must be made, society could not subsist without it, but what need of an infallible decision in matters of faith? Why is it not sufficient that every man determine for himself as well as he can in this world, and that God the infallible Judge will determine with equity concerning us all in the next."‡ "I protest against the Church of Rome, because she teaches her members ought not to exercise their own judgment in matters of religion, but to receive their doctrine from her and her tradition, while as a Protestant I believe, from these very Scriptures, that every follower of Jesus Christ is called upon to exercise his own judgment in matters of religion, and to examine diligently whether what he depends on for the salvation of his soul is built upon the word of God, called the Bible, which we Protestants think ought to be in every person's hand, and consider to be the only sure rule and practice."§ This may suffice here to show us the pith and spirit of our rules of faith. What Protestant or Catholic does not know that the great principle of the reformation is private interpretation of Scripture, by

* Questions and Answers on the 39 Articles.

† Protestant Catechism for promoting English Protestant Schools in Ireland.

‡ Archbishop Shee's five Sermons against Popery.
§ No. LXX. Church of England Tract Society. 1830.

each one exercising his own private judgment as to the religion in the Bible, and which you are told "ought to be in every person's hand." It is in fact simply this, that it is the bounden duty of every individual who hopes for salvation, and as the Tract says, "to examine diligently whether what he depends on for the salvation of his soul is built upon the word of God, called the Bible, and according to that (examination) to judge of the purity of the Church;" and if he in his judgment deems her, or the sect he may belong to, impure, he is justified by this rule to leave her, and join some other Church or sect which he may consider more perfect, or in fact in founding a Church for himself; this is in truth, the sine qua non of Protestantism. Thus Luther acted when, as he tells you, he "stood alone against all Christendom," and thus did every succeeding Reformer act, in establishing a separate conventicle for himself and followers, until you come down to the latest denominations, I find in the English Calendar of sects, Darbyites and Walkerites, and this is the rule you affirm which was established by Jesus Christ for the enlightenment and salvation of mankind. The Catholic rule again is materially different from this; he first believes, as you do indeed, that the Scripture is the inspired word of God, but that the Church is the divinely constituted Interpreter of its doctrines, whether of the written word, the Bible, or the unwritten word, Tradition. Thus Scripture and Tradition taken together are the joint rule of Faith of the Catholic, explained and expounded to him by the Church. He may use his own judgment in matters of religion, but when he comes to doubt and to differ in opinion in points of faith and doctrine from the established belief of the universal Church then he must yield his own private judgment and interpretation to the decision of that Church founded by Christ, and believe as she believes, or he is no Catholic, and this is the rule which he asserts was established by Jesus Christ for the enlightenment and salvation of mankind. The foregoing, then, are the outlines of our separate rules of Faith. It is true, you have consistently to Protestantism your "variations" in rule as in doctrine, such as "private inspiration," and to which I may hereafter refer, but even this disunion is only one of the fruits of the grand basis of your principle, private interpretation of scripture. We stand then upon the very opposite points of a line or highway, and as I may say back to back, pursuing a different course. I think, my friends, that you will readily admit that it would be highly preposterous in a person or a body of men to profess a certain defined rule or mode of life and proceeding, and hear them declare it was the best and the only safe and right way, in fact, that it was certain destruction to adopt a different plan, and yet that you saw them pursue the very mode which they condemned; you would say, that they were either hypocrites, knaves, fools, or madmen; we must not be guilty of such absurdity; we must adhere strictly and scrupulously to our opposite rules of Faith, without deviating or trespassing upon each others ground, until we have fully tested and proved the want of soundness and wisdom of the one or the other, for were we thus to exchange theories—adopt each others ways, we would be something like a party of travellers bound for a distant and strange city, and to which there was only but one safe road, but who on their journey came unexpectedly to a point where two roads branched off in different directions, but only one of which led to the city; words run high and the party separate, each taking a different road, but presently they exchange sides or one party return and follow the track of those whom they had but shortly before renounced, thus unequivocally acknowledging that they either acted from a spirit of contention, and in opposition to their own conviction, or that they presently found the road which they took impassable and impracticable, and therefore believed themselves entirely in error. I will then, my dear friends in order to test your rule, strictly confine you to it, and I will permit you to bind us equally close to ours.

Yours faithfully,

C. A. C.

OBITUARY.

We are sorry to have to record the lamented death of the Rev. John Breen, who departed this life at Kamptee, towards the close of last month, in the most edifying dispositions, as we learn from the communication of one of his late beloved flock. This amiable and zealous ecclesiastic accompanied the Right Rev. Dr. Fennelly from Ireland to Madras in 1842, and was employed with no less zeal than success in the labours of the Mission from that period till it pleased God to call him to himself, to bestow upon him the reward of his fidelity.

When we consider how much the cause of Temperance and Morality is indebted to the Rev. Mr. Breen's pastoral exertions, at Kamptee especially, we are forced to rejoice for him, while we sincerely sympathise with his late disconsolate flock, for the irreparable loss they have sustained in his death. "Being made perfect in a short time, he filled up many years." May he rest in peace.

BENGAL CATHOLIC ORPHANAGE.

Anonymous, through His Grace the Archbishop, Rs. 25 0

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.

Collections, through the Rev. R. Johnson, Rs 14 0
Ditto, through Sergt. Haslam of Dum-
Dum, 14 13
T. A. Savedra, through the Rev. E.
Veralli, 3 0

O'CONNELL TESTIMONIAL.

Anonymous, ... 5 0 0

CHANDERNAGORE ORPHANAGE.

THROUGH MR. N. O'BRIEN.

J. J. McCann, Rs. 15
Captain Gurham, 5
C. H. Nicholson, 4
John Michael, 2
J. Coleman, 2
G. Purss,
J. Forlong,

BOW, BAZAR SCHOOL.

J. J. McCann, through Mr. N.
O'Brien, Rs. 10 0 0

FESTIVALS.

Wednesday, 16, Oct. S. Gallus Ab. d. (I. S.) In Vesp. com. fol.
Thursday, 17,—S. Hedwidges W. sem. Vesp. of
fol. no com.
Friday, 18,—S. Luke Evang. d. 2. cl. In Vesp.
com. fol.
Saturday, 19,—S. Peter of Alcant. C. d. Vesp.
of fol. com. prec. and Sunday.
Sunday, 20,—21st aft. Pent. 4th Oct. Purity of the B. V. d. maj. com. Sunday. In Vesp. com.
fol. and Sunday, and S. Hil.
Monday, 21,—SS. Ursula and Comp. M. M. d.
(E. S.) com. S. Hil. Vesp. from chap. com.
prec.
Tuesday, 22,—S. Donatus B. C. d. (I. S.) Vesp. of fol. com. prec.
Wednesday, 23,—Most Holy Redeemer d. maj.
In Vesp. com. fol.
Thursday, 24,—S. Raphael Arch. d. maj. In Vesp. com. fol. and SS. Chrys. &c.
Friday, 25,—S. John of Bev. B. C. d. (E. S.)
com. SS. Chrys. &c. Vesp. from chap. com.
prec. and S. Evar.
Saturday, 26,—S. Paulinus B. C. d. (E. S. 10 inst.) com. Vig. and S. Evar. Vesp. of fol. com.
prec. and Sunday.
Sunday, 27,—22d aft. Pent. 5th Oct. Patronage of the B. V. d. maj. com. Sunday. Vesp. of fol. com. prec. and Sunday.
Monday, 28,—SS. Simon and Judas Ap. d. 2. cl.
In Vesp. com. fol.
Tuesday, 29,—S. Bede C. d. (E. S.) Vesp. from chap. com. prec.
Wednesday, 30,—S. Edward K. C. d. (E. S. 13 inst.) Vesp. from chap. com. prec.
Thursday, 31,—Fast day.—S. Colman B. C. d.
(I. S. 29 inst.) com. Vig. Vesp. of fol. no com.

Selections.

CHRISTENING.—A correspondent of the Times, addressing Charles James, Bishop of London, says:—"My Lord,—I have just read in the Times newspaper an account of a baptism said to be performed at Stafford House by the Archbishop of York. Your lordship, in your primary charge in the year 1830, most urgently admonished your clergy not to perform this Holy Sacrament in private houses, and it is now understood in most of the London parishes that such a custom is improper, and has been refused on many occasions to the poor and middle classes on your lordship's express direction. These public expressions of your lordship have been repeatedly urged in private, and your opinion is well known throughout the diocese as being most decided according to the Book of Common Prayer, that such baptisms are illegal, uncanonical, and improper. Yet notwithstanding all this, notwithstanding both public and private admonitions to your clergy, what do we find in the Times newspaper of yesterday (Monday) to have taken place at Stafford House? Everything cast aside, all order violated, all belonging to our Book of Common Prayer rudely trampled upon, to make way—as the newspaper says—for the interesting occasion of the christening of the infant son of the Duke of Sutherland, and by whom? By the Archbishop of York, aided and assisted by Sir Henry Dukinfield, vicar of St. Martin's, the parish in which the child was born. Can we wonder at dissent in the Church—murmuring among the poor—schism among all classes? Can we wonder that the holy sacrament of Baptism is thought little of—church authority despised—bishops' charges esteemed as so much waste paper—the whole body of the clergy looked upon with suspicion as the clergy of the rich and not of the poor? Can we wonder at the insinuations of the various classes of the Dissenters that our clergy will do anything to gain a fee; when here by your lordship's charge, for the poor man, in his poor cottage, and by his homely table, such a violation of Church order would not have been permitted; but at the same time, for a Duke and Duchess, and for Stafford House, and for the Archbishop of York, these things are passed by, and your lordship's known wishes and the commands of the Prayer Book openly and notoriously violated, to the scandal of the Church, and offence of all good churchmen."—Tablet.

PRAYERS FOR O'CONNELL.—A prayer was offered at each of the chapels of the arch diocese of Cashel by the directions of the Archbishop, for the safe delivery of the Liberator from his captivity. The prayer set forth in the Roman Missals, seems particularly to apply to the case of our beloved leader at this crisis.—Tablet.

By the last packet, just arrived, I am glad to find that the Right Rev. Dr. Griffith and his clergy are in excellent health and spirits. The exemplary prelate is delighted with the young men who lately arrived at the Cape from Ireland. He is proceeding with his new church with all the zeal of which he is capable, confident of generous and general support.—Dublin Correspondent.

PROTESTANT EVIDENCES OF CATHOLICITY.

Das Resultat meiner Wanderungen durch das Gebiet der Protestantischen Literatur: oder, die Nothwendigkeit der Rückkehr zur Katholischen Kirche, ausschliesslich durch die eignen Eindrücke Protestantischer Theologen und Philosophen, dargethan. Von Dr. Julius V. Höninghaus.—The Result of my Wanderings through the territory of Protestant Literature; or, the necessity of return to the Catholic Church demonstrated, exclusively from the confessions of Protestant theologians and philosophers. By DR. JULIUS V. HÖNINGHAUS. Asschaffenburg: 1837.

The very copious title of Dr. Höninghaus' work half relieves us from the necessity of explaining its object or its plan. It undertakes, as the words imply, to demonstrate, from the confessions of the interested party, on the one hand, the insufficiency of Protestant principles to discover or maintain the truth; and, on the other, the clearness and consistency of the faith professed by the Catholic Church,—the scriptural and traditional evidence of all her doctrines,—the wisdom and holiness of her institutions,—the peace and security which her principles of unity produce, and the necessity of returning to that unity, whose violation, in the sixteenth century, shook the entire fabric of Christianity, and, in later times, has well nigh uprooted its lowest foundations. With the exception of a brief analysis prefixed to each chapter, the work is altogether composed of testimonies from the most eminent philosophers, historians, and divines, in the several schools of Protestantism, selected with so much judgment, and arranged with such consummate skill, that, did not the reference at the end of the passage constantly occur to deceive the reader, it would be impossible to suppose that it was not an original and continuous work.

But its best merit is its unquestionable sincerity. Dr. Höninghaus' Wanderings is no fictitious narrative; he is not a casual traveller, describing, as he passes by, the character and appearance of a foreign country. Protestantism was his native land. He has explored every province and every district within its jurisdiction; he is perfectly familiar with them all. Nor is the arrangement of his tour the result of fancy: it is the order of his own clear and systematic inquiry; the journal of his own anxious wanderings in search of truth, through the extensive domain of Protestant literature. When we add that his book is but the index of his own practical convictions,—that he has himself found a rest from his wanderings in the bosom of the ancient mother, and offers the result of his own labors as a guide to the steps of those who are engaged in the same inquiry,—we shall have said enough to secure for it the liveliest interest in the minds of all: of the Catholic, as a tribute to the evidence of that faith which it is his glory and his happiness to profess; of the sincere but wavering inquirer, as affording additional light in the path towards that peace which Dr. Höninghaus has so happily found.

The work is divided into eleven chapters. The first four—and in these the references to modern authorities are most numerous and most copious —display the endless dissensions of Protestantism, and the fearful results in morality and religion to which they have led; tracing all to the fundamental doctrine of private judgment, and wringing from those who had been its staunchest advocates the acknowledgment of its insufficiency and danger. In the fifth and sixth the author cites an immense number of authorities in favor of the leading doctrines of Catholicity. The seventh, which is one of the longest, contains a Protestant history of the Reformation, developing the motives which influenced the leading directors of its machinery,—the means employed in its propagation,—the inducements, political and personal, by which converts were won to its standard, and the rapine, violence, and blood which marked its course throughout Europe. The eighth contains a detailed account of the variations of Protestantism, with the unchristian contests and savage persecutions by which, in defiance of every principle of the creed, each successive change was accompanied. The ninth chapter exhibits, in contrast with the Catholic Church, the evil results, civil, political, and religious, of the Reformation; and the work is wound up in a powerful concluding chapter, displaying the beauty and consistency of that religion which our church professes now, as of old; and earnestly exhorting the children of men to leave their broken cisterns, which can hold no water, and drink from that eternal fountain which springeth to eternal life.

And when we remember that, among eighteen hundred and eighty-seven authorities which Dr. Höninghaus has brought together, not a single one is Catholic, we cannot help admiring the boldness which suggested the undertaking, and the perseverance which overcame the difficulties it presented. It is hard to look for justice at the hands of an enemy: for the Catholic it is peculiarly disheartening. Proverbial as is the bitterness of literary warfare, it is charity itself when contrasted with that bigotry which has distinguished religious controversy; and this has ever been bitterest of all when directed against the Catholic religion. "In scarcely a single instance," says the Rev. Mr. Nightingale,* author of the Religions of all Nations, "has a case concerning them been fairly stated, or the channels of history not been grossly, not to say wickedly, corrupted." And Dr. Whitaker, in his vindication of Mary, acknowledges,—"Forgery, I blush for the honor of Protestantism while I write, seems to have been peculiar to the reformed." I look in vain for one of these accursed outrages of imposition among the disciples of popery."

Many of the authorities cited by Dr. Höninghaus, especially on the doctrines of tradition, purgatory, confession, and the real presence, are already sufficiently familiar. We shall dwell rather upon those of more recent date, as illustrating more particularly the present state of Protestantism, and displaying the practical operation of its principles, their influence upon the interests of society, and on the progress or maintenance of Christian truth.

From the commencement, in the sixteenth century, of what has been well called the great

"course of experimental theology," the first principles of faith have been becoming every day more and more unsettled. In its earlier days, while its working was principally negative, the directors, engrossed by the easy labor of pulling down, had no time to speculate or to quarrel as to the style of building up. But this concert was of short duration. The men who had the hardihood to disregard an authority which all before them had deemed infallible, had but little reason to expect that their own opinions should be treated with more consideration. Nor were opportunities long wanting for the exercise of this true Protestant liberty, which was the ground of their secession from the ancient church, and which they proclaimed to all the children of the new gospel. It was easy enough, for example, to disclaim the Catholic doctrine of the Eucharist; but the difficulty was to agree on something definite, which might be substituted in its stead. The rebellion of Carlstadt upon this point was the signal for a general revolt. Like the luckless idiot who, for his amusement, drew back the bolts of the flood-gate, Luther and his associates forgot to calculate—or discovered when calculation was too late—that the tide of independence, to which their own daring had given motion, might overwhelm themselves in its tumultuous course. The example of this early revolt was not forgotten. The sacramentarian heresy was but the prelude to other and more fatal secessions: the tide of innovation, once set in motion, rolled on, till not a vestige of the original system was left, except the ground on which it had stood—disregard of all authority. Freedom of interpretation once conceded, it was vain to put limits to its exercise: the same right which was proclaimed by Luther or Melancthon, could not with constancy be denied to Servetus or Socinus; and history proves, with fearful evidence, that, however strenuously, though inconsistently, the exercise of this right has been resisted, it has been and ever will be impossible for its advocates to check the onward course of licentious innovation. The Socinians extended, and consistently extended, the application of Luther's own principle when he discarded all mystery from his interpretation of the Bible. The deist, emboldened by the success of his predecessors, rejected the authority of the Bible altogether; and by his undistinguishing hatred of all that is venerable in religion, opened the way for the finishing blasphemy of the atheist, who blushed not to avow that unholy principle which impiety, even before the days of the apostles, had adopted for her motto, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we shall die!" "Assuredly," says Henke,* himself a Protestant, "assuredly there was much meaning in that saying of Fenelon's, 'Either a Catholic, or a Deist.'"

We shall begin with the opening of the first chapter: it is a picture of the present state of Protestantism.

"The Protestant religion," says Professor de Wette, "the union of its several churches having been shaken, and indeed entirely dissolved, by the multiplicity of confessions and sects which were formed during and after the Reformation, does not, like the Catholic Church, present an appearance of external unity, but a motley variety of forms.* And we freely acknowledge that, as in outward appearance, our church is split into numberless divisions and subdivisions, so also in her religious principles and opinions she is internally divided and disunited.† The Lutheran society resembles, in its separate churches and spiritual power, a worm cut up into the most minute portions, each one of which continues to move as long as it retains power; but at last, by degrees, loses at once the life and the power of motion which it retained.‡ Were Luther to rise again from the grave, he could not possibly recognize as his own, or as members of the society which he founded, those teachers who, in our church, would fain now-a-days be considered as his successors. He founded his church in Saxony. We come together to thank God for its foundation; but, alas! it is no more!"§—Pp. 1.—3.

"The dissolution of the Protestant Church is inevitable: her frame is so thoroughly rotten, that no farther patching will avail.¶ The bond of faith and liberty, which the reformers sought to establish, has become loose; and in latter times stone has been withdrawn after stone from the building of the church, which is founded on the spirit of Christian freedom.¶¶ The whole structure of evangelical religion is shattered, and few look with sympathy on its tottering or its fall." —Pp. 44, 45.

"Within the compass of a square mile you may hear four, five, six different gospels. The people, believe me, mark it well; they speak most contemptuously of their teachers, whom they hold either for blockheads or knaves, in teaching these opposite doctrines; because, in their simplicity, they believe that truth is but one, and cannot conceive how each of these gentlemen can have a separate one of his own.†† Growing immorality, a consequence of contempt for religion, in many places concurs also as a cause to its deeper downfall.‡‡ The multitude cut the knot which galls them, march boldly forward, and fling themselves into the arms of atheism in thought and deed.§§ Oh, Protestantism! has it then, at last, come to this with thee, that thy disciples protest against all religion? Facts, which are before the eyes of the whole world, declare aloud that this signification of thy name is no idle play upon words; though I know that the confession will excite a flame of indignation against myself."||| —P. 40.—Baltimore Religious Cabinet.

(To be continued.)

* Der Protestant, 1828, B. ii. Heft. 3.

† Die Christliche Kirche in der Idee, 1835, B. i. Heft. 2, s. 55.

‡ Froeseisen, Installation Discourse at Strasburg, 1743.

§ Reinhard, ueber die Kirchen-verheerung, 1800.

¶ Boll, Verfall und Wiederherstellung der Religiosität.

¶¶ Ullman, Theologischen Studien und Kritiken, 1832, Heft. 2. s. 270.

 Woltmann, Histor. Darstellungen, B. i. Theil i. Vorrede, s. 13.

†† Fischer, Einleitung in die Dogmat. der Evan. Kirche, s. 210.

‡‡ Darmstadt Allgem. Kirchen-Zeitung, 1825, No. 13.

§§ Brandes Ueber den Zeitgeist, 1810.

||| Dr. Jenisch, ueber Gottesverehrung und Kirch. I. Reformen, 1803.

* Allgemeine Geschichte der Christlich kirche, B. iv. 185.

THE PROTESTANT'S RULE OF BELIEF.

There is nothing in the leading rule of the Protestant's belief, that can impart that certitude, which the character of divine faith requires; nor yet inspire that wise conviction which is so important to Christian happiness. On the contrary, there is nothing in the rule but what, if well analysed, and consistently applied, must create incertitude and doubt; and what, therefore, must eventually tend to generate incredulity or indifference. These propositions, awful as they are, I conceive, as manifestly true in theory, as they are incontestably confirmed by experience.

For the mind to possess that certitude, that unhesitating certitude, which is the essential property of divine faith, or even enjoy that calm conviction, which is the best ingredient of Christian happiness; it cannot but seem necessary, that both its certitude and its conviction should be founded upon some firm and solid basis; upon principles so fixed, definite, and clear, as neither to admit the misgivings of doubt, nor the fluctuations of instability. In fact, nothing should be so solid, nothing is so solid, as the foundations of divine faith: nothing should be so secure and satisfactory, as the grounds or motives upon which the confidences of Christian happiness repose. Without these requisites, the mind, whose very nature is weakness and instability, must necessarily be unsettled and perplexed.

And what then is the real and acknowledged foundation, both of the Protestant's faith and of his convictions? I am speaking of the consistent Protestant. The Protestant who forms his belief consistently, and according to his own rule of faith, is a man who, denying and rejecting the right of any external authority to decide or controul his religious opinions, judges for himself, and forms his own system of belief, according to the dictates of his own reason, and the suggestions of his own conscience. This alone is consistent Protestantism, insomuch that whatever Protestant has not formed his belief in this manner, is a direct violator of the first law of the reformation.

In order, then, to perform the arduous task, the first expedient to which he has recourse, and in fact, the only one, to which he should have recourse—is to study and consult his Bible. Accordingly he does this. He reads, studies, and pores over the sacred volume—the book, alas, which, perhaps, beyond any other, is the most difficult to understand. However, he reads and consults this. But then, here is the awful circumstance. His own weak and private reason is its only authorised interpreter: so that what forms his belief, are the notions or opinions, which his own judgment affixes to it. Wherefore, supposing any set of religious opinions, formed in this manner—although formed with the utmost care and piety,—can the person who has formed them thus, be really in his own heart, assured that they are certainly DIVINE; the dictates of the Holy Ghost, and the solid basis of eternal security? Fanaticism, surely, or the boldest presumption, could alone confide in so palpable a delusion. The peculiarity alone of a set of opinions, or of a code of belief formed in this manner; and differing as it must, from every other, cannot but destroy,—to the good sense at least, of every other prudent man—the assurance that it is divine. In fact, any set of religious opinions, that are formed and founded upon the judgment alone, of any private individual, must, of course, be just alike uncertain, and alike unsteady, as is the judgment of the individual who presumes to decide. They can be no other than conjectures, or bare probabilities at least. And probabilities are not faith. And yet, such as the above, is alone consistent Protestantism.

It is a fortunate thing for religion, as well as for society, that there are few CONSISTENT Protestants; few, who, following their own leading rule, compose by it their own separate creeds. For if such were the case, there would necessarily be just as many creeds, as individuals. The ordinary and general principle, therefore, of the belief of the great body of the Protestant public, for example, in relation to the Established Church—is habit, and the presumed authority of this Church. "Perhaps," says Mr. Secretary Knox, "ninety-nine out of a hundred, have, from" mere habit, belonged to the Church of England. This conjecture of the learned writer may possibly be exaggerated. But to believe, even upon the presumed or assumed authority of any Protestant Church—this, besides being a violation of the first law of the Reformation, is, at the same time, a platform far too slender to form the basis of any belief that can be properly deemed divine. The reason is, and it is the acknowledgment of all the Protestant Churches—that all churches, like all individuals, are liable to error; and that their doctrines consequently may be erroneous and false. "Articles of Churches," says Bishop Watson, "are not of divine authority. Have done with them. This may be true. This may be false."

However, so it is—nothing is so inconsistent as the Protestant Churches, once powerfully established. For although all these profess to admit the rejection of authority, or of all control, on the subject of belief, as inconsistent with the liberty and the privileges, both of the Gospel and of reason—yet they, all of them, claim a measure of authority which is not, in fact, inferior to that of infallibility. Thus, for example, the Church of England commands, and compels, its members to believe its doctrines, under the pain of excommunication. It even obliges its ministers to swear that they revere, and accept them, as the dictates of the Holy Ghost. Surely if this is not inconsistency, and something worse, it is difficult to say what it is.

But in order to show still farther how little the authority of any particular Protestant church, however powerful and respectable it may be, is entitled to be prudently regarded and revered as divine, let the reader only make the following simple observation. Let him take any single Protestant church he pleases—let him take, for instance, the established church of this country, a church, which is, no doubt, distinguished for the talents, and the virtues of multitudes of its members. Let him take this church. Behold, he sees at once that its authority is denied, and itself rejected, as not being the true church of Christ, by all the other Protestant churches and religions of the universe. Its authority is denied and its pretensions and creed are rejected by Churches, perhaps equal to itself, in point of extent, and of the numbers of their members; for example, the whole Lutheran and Calvinistic communions. They are rejected, too, by men who, in regard of learning, talents, and their exalted characters, are alike, and equally famed, as are the members of the established church. Wherefore, considering these circumstances, and comparing authority with authority, and claims with claims, the inference in the ordinary course of reasoning is, that the pretensions of the Church of England to any divine authority are groundless and unfounded. It is certainly so, if the concurrent and united judgment of a larger, and this equally enlightened body of men be preferable to that of a smaller.

The foregoing consideration will appear still more forcible, if to it be added, also, the reflection on the state of the Established Church itself. As described by some of its own members, "it is shivered to pieces by wedges made out of its own body." It is divided, indeed, into schools or sects, maintaining the most opposite and conflicting doctrines. "We have," says Mr. Nightingale, "in the body of our clergy, Arminian, Calvinian, Unitarian, Pelagian, Arian, Socinian, Sabellian, Trinitarian, and I know not how many other sort of clergymen." "Attend," says Secretary Knox, "to the controversy at this day, within the Church of England, about the meaning of the 39 articles, and the obligation incurred by subscription. See, how some make absolutely nothing of this, or of them, turning the articles into a dead letter, and assent and consent into a farce."

The public curiosity is just now excited by the formation of a new school or sect, which is rising up in one of the Universities, and which is composed of some of its most learned, pious, and distinguished members. What, however, may be the real tenets, or the ulterior designs of these respectable personages, this is a secret, which time must reveal. At present, they appear to be neither one thing nor the other. Via Medians, wanderers between two very widely separated paths—too enlightened to approve of their own church—too deeply prejudiced to make choice of ours. To ours, indeed, their leading and favourite principles would conduct them, had they but the courage to follow them up consistently. Whence, also, they are called by their own Protestant opponents, "the Revivalists of Popery." But, ah! so, I fear much, it will be: arrived on the banks of the Rubicon, they will shrink back, and turn away. However, I will say: "Tales cum sint Utinam nostri essent."

Concerning the private opinions, entertained by multitudes of the most learned portions of the Established Church, I say nothing. These, of course, must be various and discordant, wherever men reason and judge for themselves. If indeed, the accusation which is very frequently urged against them, be well founded, Socinianism is their favourite system. Hence, therefore, all the above circumstances, seeing the state of the Established Church, that it is thus divided within itself; rejected by all the other churches and sects of the reformation, as well as by the immense body of the Catholic church; considering these, and many such like circumstances, I cannot well conceive how any prudent man can, upon the sanctions of its authority, either adore its articles as divine, or revere the establishment itself, as the institution of the eternal wisdom. Here, again, just as in the case of judging by the rule of Protestantism, the proud-est man must doubt.

If the evils resulting from the principles of Protestantism, were confined but to certain doubts, concerning certain articles of faith, or if they were limited only to an inconsiderable portion of society, the misfortune, although great, would still be, comparatively speaking, of inferior moment. But, unhappily, both for the order of religion and of society, the great evils which result from those principles, are these, that, besides producing doubts and various forms of religious error, they produce, moreover, wherever they are boldly and consistently applied, either the rejection of all religion, or a total indifference to its doctrines. Such, certainly, is the fact, whilst, at the same time, the multitudes who do apply them thus, are countless and innumerable—crowding all the paths of society, and consisting, for the most part, of men, who, if not learned, are well educated. And then, what is still most awful. It is by those principles alone, that they either defend, or pretend to prove, their respective codes of irreligion.

In fact, if once you emancipate the human mind from all restraint,—if you proclaim, as the first law of Protestantism does, that every individual is the judge and arbiter of his own belief, why, with this prerogative, this "Glorious Liberty of the Reformation," you may account at once, considering all the various forms of the human character—the force of men's passions, prejudices, and self-love; the differences of their capacity, dispositions, &c.—you may, considering these circumstances, account not only for every absurdity of error, but for every doctrine of irreligion, and for a total indifference to all religion. So obviously, in fact, are all these evils the natural, and even necessary, result of the aforesaid principles, that they were early foreseen and foretold, by the very men who had introduced them. In their confidential letters to one another, it may be seen that the first Reformers were frequently wont to own and lament them. Thus Melancthon, for example, in an epistle to one of his friends says to him: "It is much to be feared, that the time will soon come when men will consider religion as a matter of no moment; or else, they will look upon all difference of religion, as mere trifles, and verbal things." In another epistle he exclaims, "What a tragedy have we prepared for posterity!" To foresee in deed, and to foretell all this, considering the above principles, required neither any great foresight, nor any prophetic spirit.—Sydney Morning Chronicle.

THE SACRO MONTE DI VARALLO.

A truly remarkable spot, very little known to ordinary travellers; yet, for natural beauty of situation, it may compete with many a more celebrated site, and for the accessory attraction held forth to curiosity and devotion, the sanctuary of the Sacro Monte may challenge comparison with the most noted scenes of religious pilgrimage in the world.

The Val Sesia is an exquisitely picturesque valley, within easy distance from the shores of the Lago Maggiore. The little town of Varallo stands within its romantic defiles, and, seen from a lofty bridge, crossing the rocky mountain stream of the Sesia, presents to the eye just such a landscape as limners and poets love. The "Sacro Monte" rises immediately behind it, and is ascended by a paved path, winding round the side of the hill, offering at every turn prospects of the most enchanting variety. This curious mount has fifty oratories upon it, besides the principal church, fountains, and other religious adornments. Each oratory has an architectural facade, and is occasionally decorated with a dome and portico, beneath which the spectator gazes through apertures resembling the peep-holes of a cosmorama, and beholds within them sculptured and habited figures as large as life, so grouped as to represent all the leading events in the history of our Saviour. The eye is at once fascinated and absorbed by the immense diversity of subjects all bearing upon the one great theme of human redemption, and thus to see

"The life as lively mock'd, as ever Still sleep mock'd death:"

produces upon the imagination a dreamy and most bewildering effect. A perfectly labyrinthine arrangement prevails among the truly curious oratories of the Sacro Monte, impressing the stranger with a notion that they occupy a considerable expanse of ground, whereas they are, in fact, crowded within narrow compass. The models are painted, and many of them clothed in real draperies, and adorned with human hair: so artistically, however, is every subject grouped, that no incongruity of costume or appearance is observable. Fresco paintings, many of them by eminent Italian masters, blending with the subjects of the sculptured figures, greatly assist and heighten the effect of the various representations. All of these are extremely ingenious, some of them marvellously fine. In the group representing the Fall of Man, Adam and Eve are beheld surrounded by animals of every kind, from an elephant to a mouse. The representation of the Massacre of the Holy Innocents contains sixty figures, and the subject of the Transfiguration is represented upon an immense scale. The figure of the demoniac boy is in the foreground. On the summit of a large artificial mountain are the three disciples, gazing in holy transport on their beatified Master, who, with Moses and Elias, are seen soaring above them, while the host of heaven are delineated within the vaulted dome, the height of which, in reality a hundred and sixty feet, by the magical arrangement of light and shade, appears far greater. The "raising of Lazarus from the dead," is another subject which deeply absorbs contemplation, and each stage in the progress of our Saviour's passion, is delineated with a fidelity and truth that rivet attention and devotional sympathy. The representation of "Christ lying in the Sepulcher," is imposing in the highest degree. The spectator passes from daylight into a gloomy vault, and is at first unable clearly to distinguish any object. As, however, his vision becomes accustomed to the darkened medium, there breaks on his sight the lifeless body of Christ, in all the stillness and majesty of sepulchral repose. It is a scene of holy delusion that might convert at once a sinner into a saint!

The church of Sacro Monte is a handsome edifice, and the resident clergy have adjoining habitations of surpassingly beautiful situation. The place was originally founded in 1486, by Bernardino Caimo, a noble Milanese, who established there four chapels, which the piety and munificence of princes and rich devotees successively increased to their present number. The great St. Carlo Borromeo twice visited the Monte Sacro di Varallo, and the pallet bedstead on which he died, is there preserved as a relic. Other objects of devotion are exhibited to the many pilgrims that resort to the holy mount of Varallo, such as an exact model of the Scala Santa at Rome, with relics and memorials of saints. It is a spot which, of course, offers many a salient point to the sneers of infidelity, and the sarcasms of heresy; but to the Catholic, who knows how to appreciate the spirit of piety which lends a charm and a grace to such graven commemorations of the mighty events of old, a visit to the Sacro Monte di Varallo, will be fraught with interest and edification.—Cath. Mag.

IMMORALITY MORE TOLERATED THAN DISSENT.

Recent discussions in the House of Lords have furnished striking illustrations of one of the incidental evils arising from the secularization of religion by endowments, and of the intolerable and uncharitable spirit with which our High-Church men still regard dissent. The Bishop of Exeter is pushing forward a bill, the praiseworthy object of which is to put a check to the shocking increase of female prostitution in the metropolis and other large towns. It has already been twice before the House, and has met with no direct opposition; but the consideration of one of its provisions interfering with the rights of property, has afforded an opportunity to the Earl of Fitzhardinge to bring a very grave and, it would appear, well-founded charge against the Dean and Chapter of Westminster. These reverend gentlemen are owners of extensive property in the city of Westminster, a considerable portion of which has long been used for the most infamous purposes. After making every allowance for error and exaggeration, and giving due weight to the statements that have been put forward in defence of the Dean and Chapter, there seems to be no doubt that this pious brotherhood have long participated largely in the profits of prostitution, and that, even now, their incomes are, to some extent, drawn from the same impure source. It is true, that since public attention has been directed to the point, they have taken some steps to relieve themselves of the odium so justly directed against them. They have pulled down a few houses, the leases of which have fallen in; they have bought up, or attempted to buy up, such of the leases as they could get on reasonable terms; and altogether they show a disposition to live in a decent manner, provided they can do so without any very great pecuniary sacrifice. But all this is no excuse for the past. They have partaken largely of the unclean thing, and there is too much reason to believe that they are yielding now rather to the force of opinion pressing against them, than to any well-matured sense of propriety.

The Bishop of Gloucester, as in duty bound, has been the great champion of the Dean and Chapter; and it would appear from the following statement in the Gloucester Chronicle, that he has more to answer for than the Westminster infamy:—

“A very large portion of the Leatherbottle Lane property, we believe, belongs to the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester, and is leased by them under circumstances which form a sad parallel to the disgusting Almonry of Westminster. We believe that at least nine of the houses in Leatherbottle Lane, which belong to the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester, are occupied as brothels of the lowest stamp; while the whole locality is one in which every semblance of decency and morality is set at open defiance. We do not say that all this is known to the clerical proprietors; but here, as at Westminster, the situation of the property is within two minutes' walk of the cathedral and of the residences of the dignitaries of that church.”

These things are bad enough in themselves, but their iniquity is aggravated by a circumstance mentioned by the Bishop of Gloucester himself, and intended obviously to help the defence of the Dean and Chapter, by impugning the motives of their assailants. “Why (said the Bishop), why all these attacks on a body who, from all he had heard, were at least entitled to decent respect. (Hear, hear.) He would explain the reason:—A year or two ago, it was found and complained of that a house which they had leased for forty years had been converted into a dissenting meeting house, and when the lease came to be renewed, the Dean and Chapter inserted a covenant in the lease that the premises should not be so appropriated in future—hinc illæ lachrymæ.”

Yes, hinc illæ lachrymæ—and why not? Would there be any harm in good men feeling indignant—aye, even shedding tears of bitter disappointment—to find that a body of clergymen who could tolerate for years whole streets of stews on their property, would not permit a single dissenting place of worship to exist a day after they had the power to suppress it? The Dean and Chapter of Westminster are more afraid of one nonconforming preacher than of a hundred vile procuresses; a house set apart for the worship of God, in a way different from that practised under their own auspices, gives a greater shock to their pious feelings than the existence of a den of vice and infamy at every second door. We have often heard that high churchmen regarded dissent as one of the greatest crimes a man can commit; but we have never seen the startling doctrine so boldly avowed, and acted on, as it has been in this case.

The false and scandalous position in which the very reverend the Dean and Chapter of Westminster have been placed by the possession of property that had been turned to such abominable uses, ought to be a warning to Christians of all sects to eschew the fatal error of building up endowments. There is even risk, as we have seen, lately, in anything like over-anxiety to accumulate the means of defraying current expenses. Had the Free Kirk acted less on the principle boldly avowed by one who joined them and then left them—“Moderator, I would take money from any quarter”—they would have been saved the disgrace of participating in the profits of slavery, and would not have had occasion to feel so much mortified by the practical rebuke conveyed in O'Connell's indignant repudiation of the repeal rent sent from the southern States of America.—Edinburgh Weekly Chronicle, June 29.

THE MAY MEETINGS.

The selection of the month of May for holding these festivals is not grounded on any religious feeling of preference for May before any other month of the year; but simply because it being the season when all the world repairs to London to see and to be seen, the chances of filling Exeter Hall, and getting some persons of supposed influence to countenance the schemes, by appearing on the platform, are much greater than at any other period. And it must be admitted, notwithstanding the sameness of the exhibitions year after year, that the concoctors of them are eminently successful, not only in the numbers who annually assemble, but in what is of more importance to them at last, viz. the vast sums of money which have been collected during the year, amounting, we believe, altogether to little short of three-fourths of a million of pounds sterling. The following is a list of such of the societies as have come under our notice, with the sum collected by each during the past year, as stated in the reports read at the meetings.

	s.	d.
1. British and Foreign Bible Society	98,359	2 4
2. Tractarian Bible Society	2,423	14 11
3. Naval and Military Bible Society	2,998	10 7
4. Church Missionary Society	104,323	15 10
5. London Missionary Society	81,812	0 0
6. Wesleyan Missionary Society	110,620	0 3
7. Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge	94,563	0 0
8. Colonial Church Society	3,077	5 5
9. London City Mission	8,781	16 1½
10. London Hibernian Society	33,402	0 0
11. London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews	25,325	8 0
12. Home and Colonial Infant School Society	500	0 0
13. Pastoral Aid Society	21,828	5 6
14. Irish Society	4,107	0 0
15. Sunday School Union	15,319	5 10
16. British and Foreign School Society	10,081	1 0
17. Operative Jewish Converts Institution	912	1 5
18. British and Foreign Sailors Society	1,971	4 0
19. Religious Tract Society	51,989	6 8

20. Prayer Book and Homily Society	£	s.	d.
21. Protestant Association	1,750	6	6
22. Reformation Society	2,188	0	0
23. Foreign Aid Society	1,084	0	0
24. Home Missionary Society	2,005	0	0
	7,337	11	5
	<hr/>
	£86,759	15	9½

Here, then, we have twenty-four societies in the metropolis alone, all in active operation, averaging the enormous annual income of £28,615 each, and the objects of which Societies, however varied in name, character, or action, are more or less directed against the integrity and the very existence of the Catholic faith. The circulation of bibles, tracts and other publications by those societies, is on a scale commensurate with their means. The British and Foreign Bible Society boast of having circulated nearly sixteen millions of copies of the English Protestant version of the Scriptures, and of having aided in the circulation besides, in various languages and in different parts of the world, ten millions of copies, making together no less than twenty-six millions; an enormous number certainly. But when it is considered that this circulation embraces a period of forty-four years, and that with all its vast pecuniary means, the Bible Society has not yet been able to produce a copy for each inhabitant of the three kingdoms, its supporters may begin to doubt how far the Society is likely to answer the object of its institution. The sheer absurdity of the position that the bible is the only rule of faith is here strikingly exemplified.

The Religious Tract Society has circulated since it was established the enormous quantity of FOUR HUNDRED MILLIONS of tracts, in ninety-four languages, and has issued from its repository during the past year no less than 15,637,676. And the Society for promoting Christian Knowledge has published during the year 3,775,376 copies of various works. Other societies have been equally active in the publishing department; and we think that we do not overrate the number when we say that there are issued from the London press annually not less than thirty millions of copies of anti-Catholic publications, exclusive of newspapers; and it is scarcely necessary to observe, that the latter are almost all bitter opponents of the Catholic faith. As far as the stability of that faith is concerned, we can laugh to scorn the efforts of ten thousand such societies, backed by all the wealth of England, to shake it; but though the Church is built upon a rock, and we have the promise of her divine Founder that HE will abide with her for ever, it by no means follows, when the truth of God is assailed or misrepresented, that we of the household of faith, and particularly those to whom the guardianship of the faith has been committed, are to do nothing in its vindication. On the contrary, we conceive that it is the duty of every Catholic, not only to be ready at all times to give a reason for the hope that is in him, but to do everything in his power to disabuse the prejudices of our separated brethren against our holy faith, and to enlighten them in its principles and practices. And how is this to be done? Situated as we are, with a clergy scarcely sufficient for our own wants, we must of necessity have recourse to the press, and by means of that powerful engine, bring to the doors of our erring, but well meaning countrymen, a knowledge of those saving truths, which it has ever been the object of heresy and schism to obscure and pervert. This has already, in some measure, been done by the Catholic Institute; and the success which has attended the dissemination of its publications has, we are well and truly assured, been considerable. Indeed, we are informed by good authority, that the foundation of several new and nascent missions is to be ascribed almost solely to the diffusion of those publications; and when so much has been accomplished with the limited means placed at the disposal of the Institute, what splendid results to religion would ensue, were its annual income raised only to a fifth part of the average yearly receipts of the societies we have enumerated.—Catholic Magazine.

THE PUSEYITES, ANGLICANS, &c.

PUSEYISM IN SCOTLAND.—We have heard that the vestry of a certain chapel complained to the Bishop about crosses put up in it on Easter day, and other innovations on the part of their Catholic minister. We have heard that unseemly disturbances have occurred "before a whole congregation," when the orthodox and Catholic offerory supplanted the schismatical collection at the door! But we must have done. It is conceivable that some men be so determined not to be convinced, as not yet to believe that there is Puseyism deluding the minds, and tampering with the consciences, of poor men in the Old Town of Edinburgh. We, on the other hand, are persuaded that it is vigorously at work. It is playing its vocation, till the time shall come when it can appear in its proper colours, and speak its native language. In other words, Puseyism is on its way to Popery—Prelacy is on its way to Rome; and what is now a mere surpliced missionary, may, before our children, die effloresce into a cowed monk.—Witness.

TREMORS.—It will be scarcely possible, we apprehend, for our bishops much longer to preserve silence in the matter of the direct and positive Romanism which is now taught by some persons officiating in churches belonging to the Establishment, and holding fellowships in our Universities. The explicitness with which these parties now avow their sentiments can hardly be exceeded; and if the question were to remain long in its present position it would next be asked, why, if he chose to officiate there, Dr. Wiseman himself should not be licensed by the Bishop of London to preach in St. James' Church or in St. Paul's Cathedral? Some of our readers, perhaps, may be startled at this idea; but, we beg to ask them, where is the difference between a course of lectures being preached by Dr. Wiseman, and a course of lectures, copied from Dr. Wiseman, being preached by Mr. Oakley?—Herald.

ANGLICAN RAPACITY.—On the 22d June, the coat of the Catholic priest of Morpeth, in Northumberland (the Rev. G. A. Lowe,) was publicly sold by auction at the Market Cross, for 25s., the amount of church rates due by him, with costs on their recovery. The Protestant rector of Morpeth, in whose name this violence was committed, is the son of Earl Grey, the brother of Lord Howick, whose living is upwards of 1,600*l.* in value, although two-thirds of his parishioners are the flocks of other shepherds. He it is who takes the coat off the back of the Catholic priest, whose annual income is under 100*l.* and who out of that mite spends much upon God's poor.—Tablet.

SHOCKING PROFANITY.—The proceedings of the Home Missionary Society in this city, on the 8th inst., as reported in The Tribune, contain the following:—"Rev. Dr. Stone, Professor of Lane Seminary, appealed in a most pointed manner in behalf of the interests of the West, as set forth in the following resolution: Resolved—That the Valley of the Mississippi is a part of the territory between the river and the ends of the earth (Ps. lxxii., 8; Zach. ix., 10:) which belongs to Jesus Christ by express grant from Almighty God; and that Jesus Christ must have it: Which was adopted nem. con."!!! If fanaticism has ever gone to a greater extreme of profanity than this, we have not known of it. Yet, in an assembly, most respectable in its numbers and comprising all élite of our Protestant brethren, lay and clerical, such an expression of frightfully profane familiarity with the most awful names, was "adopted nem. con."!!! Whither are we tending?—New York Freeman's Journal.

CONVERSIONS.

M. Hurter, formerly President of the Protestant Consistory of Schaffhausen, and the author of the "Life of Innocent III." has embraced Catholicism. His abjuration took place on the 16th June in the chapel of Cardinal Orsini, at Rome. M. Hurter intends shortly to publish an account of the circumstances that led to his conversion.—Times.

Mr. Legh, a gentleman of fortune in Herefordshire, has joined the Church of Rome, and removed his son from one of our leading public schools to Oscott.—Standard.

MISCELLANEA.

THE PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH.—The receipts by the Central Committee in Dublin, from the various branches of the Association for the Propagation of the Faith throughout the country, for the month ending July 1, 1844, were 442*l.* During the summer season, and until the end of harvest, all local collections are necessarily diminished; but, all things considered, this noble society—one month with the other—proudly maintains its bold and majestic stand.—Tablet.

The Feast of St. Peter and St. Paul, on Saturday last, was observed with great solemnity. High Mass, Sermons, and Benediction of the Most Holy Sacrament, in the churches, at the usual hours. In the churches of St. Peter, Rathmines, and of St. Peter, Phibsborough, Circular-road, the festival was kept with peculiar devotion, and the panegyric of the first visible head of the Church was set forth with eloquence and power.—Ibid.

A Demonstration Mass was celebrated on the highest hill of Connemara last Sunday, for Mr. O'Connell, and which was attended by thousands of Repealers.—Cork Examiner.

The Roman Catholics of Galway have ordered a peal of bells for the chapel of St. Patrick, in that town.—Ibid.

Sir Richard De Bourgho has given the Roman Catholics of Castle Connell a spacious site, near the Old Castle, for a new chapel.—Ibid.

On Wednesday, the Right Rev. Dr. Crotty, R.C. Bishop of Cloyne and Ross, held a visitation; and administered Confirmation at the chapel of Milford, under charge of the Rev. Robert O'Reardon, P.P.—Ibid.

There is very little doubt that a decree will shortly be published of a highly favourable nature to the Spanish clergy. No sales of Church property have taken place for some time. The Pope is about to despatch a special Nuncio to the Queen of Spain.—Morning Post.

The Constitutionnel announces, that the Pantheon will be restored to Catholic worship on the occasion of the anniversary of the revolution of 1830; that a solemn service will be celebrated in it on the 29th of July next, for the repose of the souls of the combatants who fell in the three days; and that the edifice will be afterwards open for religious worship on Sundays.

PRAYER FOR THE NOVICE.

From the Catholic Magazine.

SWEET Ladye, she hath given
Herself this day to thee;
Oh! lead her safe to heaven,
We pray of thee, Marie.

May the roses on her brow,
Be far less white to see,
Than the soul she gives thee now,
We pray of thee, Marie.

May the veil she weareth blest
Have less of modestie,
Than the feelings in her breast,
We pray of thee, Marie.

May her garment, coarse and rude,
Show less humilitie,
Than her spirit hath endured,
We pray of thee, Marie.

May her girdle, which doth tell
Sweet Jesu's charitie,
With His love her bosom swell,
We pray of thee, Marie.

May it make her love to bear
With Him to Calvarie,
The rood of His passion dear,
We pray of thee, Marie.

For this is her humble prayer
With thee, most deare ladye,
In His love and woes to share;
Grant it, we pray, Marie.

THE
BENGAL
CATHOLIC HERALD.

"One body and one spirit—one Lord, one faith, one baptism."

No. 15.]

CALCUTTA: SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1844.

[Vol. VII.]

SPIRITUAL WANTS OF THE CATHOLICS WHO ARE DISPERSED IN SMALL NUMBERS THROUGHOUT SEVERAL PARTS OF BENGAL.

We some time ago adverted to the necessity that exists of providing for the spiritual wants of Catholic Families, who are dispersed throughout Bengal, in several cases, not considerable enough in numbers to form a congregation, where a Priest should permanently reside, but, at the same time, of sufficient importance to render it necessary, that some provision should be made with as little delay as possible to supply them, at least occasionally, with the consolations of religion. The subjoined letter furnishes one instance of the great good, which would result from such an arrangement. The humble, in a worldly point of view, but truly virtuous writer, resides, together with his wife and five children, at Cherra-poonjee. For the several years of their residence there, they never had even once the comfort of seeing a Catholic Priest. The children remained unbaptized and the poor mother was deprived of the consolation of that holy rite, which, in the Catholic Church, is sought after with such edifying solicitude, by the mother, whose marriage God has blessed with fecundity. The poverty of this good couple prevented them from coming with their family to Calcutta to receive the sacred ordinances of the Church. To remedy this misfortune, as far as circumstances allowed, our Venerable Archbishop instructed the Rev. Mr. Freycenon to proceed to Sylhet, and at the same time directed Sergeant Walsh to send there his wife and family, in order to profit of the Rev. gentleman's ministry. By means of this arrangement, the poor family in question have happily received the holy rites of religion, and the twenty or thirty Catholic families residing in the vicinity of Sylhet have also participated in the same blessing. No charity could be more pleasing to God, than the establishment of a fund sufficient to defray the very moderate travelling expenses of one or two good Priests, who might devote themselves constantly to the holy labor of seeking after the scattered sheep of the house of Israel, in the several remote districts of this extensive province. We recommend earnestly this subject to the consideration of the more wealthy members of our community. They, as well as our poorer brethren, will be greatly edified by the perusal of the subjoined letter.

TO THE MOST REV. DR. CAREW, ARCHBISHOP OF EDESSA AND VICAR APOSTOLIC OF BENGAL.

MOST VENERABLE LORD,—I beg to return your Lordship, with all the sincerity of heart, my best thanks, for so kindly ordering the Rev. Mr. T. L. A. Freycenon to set out from Bandoorah, thirty miles from Dacca, and proceed to Sylhet for the purpose of christening my children and churching my wife, which the Rev. Father did (at Sylhet, on the 19th September, 1844,) perform with the greatest humility and kindness, besitting himself to be, as he is, one of God's divines.

Myself, wife and family most earnestly join in prayer for the welfare and happiness of your Lordship, hoping that you may live long in Bengal, to govern and guide your flock.

I again beg to offer your Lordship, and the Rev. Gentleman (who came all the way to Sylhet, and who no doubt has had a great deal of trouble, without the least remuneration from me,) my warmest thanks, for this truly Christian act which is so much appreciated by me and family.

I remain,
Most Venerable Lord,

With great respects,
Your Lordship's obedient Servant,
WILLIAM WALSH,
Actg. Quarter Master. Sergt.,
Sylhet Light Infantry Battalion.

Cheera-poonjee,
29th Sept. 1844.

REV. MR. HAVERS, S. J.

We regret to state that the Rev. Mr. Havers, one of the Professors of St. Xavier's College, has been compelled to retire from the Bengal Mission, in consequence of continued ill-health. He has taken his passage on board the British Empire. He lately resided in the salubrious town of Chandernagore by the advice of his medical attendant, but as he found no permanent benefit by the change, he was recommended to try the air of his native country. Father Havers' stay in this city has been very short, a little better than twelve months, but his close application to the cause of education and religion has sapped his constitution. He was much esteemed and beloved by those who had the pleasure of knowing him, and we trust that he will regain his health ere he reaches England.

REV. MR. RABASCALL.

We are happy to announce the safe arrival of the Hindoostan Steamer at Madras on Sunday, the 22nd ultimo. The Rev. Mr. Rabascall, who is a passenger on board of her, will have joined his Mission at Aden early this month. The Steamer after having received an accession of passengers at Madras proceeded on her voyage at half-past five p. m. of the 23rd ultimo.

MOULMAIN

We understand that a Convent at Moulmain is nearly on the point of completion, and are glad to learn that the Nuns for the above Convent are daily expected. The Establishment is to have a set of School rooms attached to the buildings. We hope that some of our friends at Moulmain will not forget to give us the particulars of the arrival of the Nuns and of the arrangements that may be adopted.

GENERAL COURT.

As General Court is well known to most of our readers as one of the late Generals in Runjeet Sing's Army, and who, after having amassed a large fortune, retired to his native land in the early part of this year, we doubt not that any news about him and his family will be perused with pleasure by his numerous friends and associates in India, we therefore subjoin the following interesting ceremony of the Baptism of his wife and children at Marseilles taken from L'Ami de la Religion.

MARSEILLES.—INTERESTING CEREMONY.—A religious ceremony of the deepest interest took place in the chapel of the Episcopal Palace in Marseilles, on the 20th June. An Indian princess, named Fezli Azemdjon, the wife of General Court, who was the friend and companion-in-arms of the valiant General Allard, received the sacrament of Baptism from the hands of his lordship, the bishop, after which her marriage with the general was consecrated according to the rites of the Catholic Church. The Godfather and Godmother of Madame Court were Lieutenant-General Count and the Countess d'Hautpoul. After the marriage, his lordship the bishop successively baptized the two daughters, and the son of the newly-married pair. Madame Marie Bannow Paudéi was named godmother of the last. During the solemnity, the bishop, Monseigneur de Mazenod, addressing General Court, whose brilliant services in India he alluded to, thanked him, in the name of the Church, for the new victory which he had won for the Christian faith and the faith of France. The prelate congratulated the soldier on this new victory free from tears and blood, and which, as he said, is inscribed in the book of heaven. These words, issuing from his heart, produced a lively sensation among the bystanders, and excited the most lively emotions in the young neophyte. Madame Court, who had arrived in Marseilles before her husband, had, from the first moment of her arrival, manifested the intention of embracing the Catholic faith. Her zeal and her docility in receiving the necessary instruction have been a source of sweet consolation to the Abbé Martel, the curé of Petites Crottes, in whose parish the General resides. General Court, a native of Grasse, in the department of Var, after long years of glorious military labours, has been forced to quit Lahore, an unfortunate country laid waste by recent revolutions. Having married according to the laws of that country, his first thought after touching the soil of France was to invoke a Catholic consecration on his union. The ceremony whereof we have spoken has worthily crowned the wishes of the pair.

ST. JOHN'S CATHOLIC FREE SCHOOLS,

Circular Road, near Boitaconnah.

We beg to remind our Catholic Brethren who reside in the vicinity of the above-mentioned Schools, that these Institutions have been just opened and are ready for the reception of Male and Female Pupils. No expense has been spared to render the School rooms in every respect well adapted for the purpose for which they are designed.

LETTER NO. XXI.

FROM A CATHOLIC OFFICER IN INDIA TO HIS PROTESTANT FRIENDS IN EUROPE.

MY DEAR FRIENDS,—There is no question but that our belief in Infallibility and your denying it are the main-spring of our rules of Faith; if I believe (as I do) in the infallibility of the Church; that is, that she cannot fall into error, I will of course readily receive from her mouth whatever she teaches me as the word of God; I will believe what books of Scripture are canonical and were written by inspiration, and what books are apocryphal upon her declaration; I will believe upon her affirmation that the translations are true to the original languages in which the Gospels were first written; I will, in fact, believe every point of faith and doctrine she propounds to me, because I believe her to be infallible; this is the Catholic belief and principle. But again if I believe this Church (as you do) and all denominations are fallible, that is, can and may fall into error, then I stand upon different ground. I see, I have a fearful stake at risk, my eternal salvation; for we are told, "if the blind lead the blind, both fall into the pit." And I am assured by my professed religious guides that they themselves individually and collectively are fallible, and may possibly be in error, this of course must naturally raise doubt, uncertainty, and apprehension in my mind as soon as I reach the years of reason and reflection; am I implicitly to believe them after such a profession? It would be folly, it might prove fatal. The part before me therefore is most arduous and most vital; a book called the Bible, is placed in my hands, and is said to have been written by the inspiration of God—how am I to know that? Am I to believe it upon the authority of the religious body in which I happen to have been brought up? If I do, I adopt the Catholic rule. Books again are pointed out to me, some said to be canonical, and some apocryphal; am I to believe them to be so on the words of my ministers? If I do, I adopt the Catholic rule. I am then told that these books are true and faithful translations of the originals. If I believe this upon the same authority, I adopt the Catholic rule. I also have such and such doctrines propounded to me, but am I to believe them as true upon such a testimony? If I do, I adopt the very rule which I condemn, the Catholic one; without having his belief in infallibility; I must go in such a case upon chance—upon no positive certainty; what then, must I do? Why, I must, by my own individual examination, by my own research and labour, by the exercise of my own judgment endeavour to ascertain all the above points, and I am even told by my fallible guides that it is my bounden and indispensable duty to make this investigation, that I am commanded by Scripture itself to do so, otherwise it is said, and with truth, that I derive my faith upon no better authority than the Mahomedan does his, for I have not the strong grounds of the Catholic to support me, or base my belief upon. It is true, that, even after using my best endeavours, I am still working upon uncertainty, for I cannot claim for myself what I will not allow others to have, Infallibility; so I may after all be wandering about in the mazes of error. Such is the real principle and situation of a real Protestant—of a true son of the Reformation—every man and every woman born has to do this according to the Protestant rule of faith. Now, my dear friends, let us, like rational beings, view the matter in all its bearings; try our rule by every test; let us first weigh them by the scale of reason, that is, by applying their distinct tendencies and aim, to the condition and capabilities of mankind; demonstrate their practicability or impracticability; their reasonableness or absurdity, and finally compare their aptness and spirit to the ways and to the ordinances of Providence, and to the precepts of Scripture. Whichever rule is most compatible with the first, and most in unison with the latter, that indisputably must be the rule designed by Jesus Christ for our guidance; the analysis of all this may take me a series of letters, so I crave your patience, my friends, to its conclusion. I shall first refer to your rule, and say, if you can with perfect propriety and case subject it to the capacities and circumstances of the young, of those who are unable to read, of the savage, of the poor and daily labourer, of the unlearned, of the dull of comprehension, and adapt it, in fact, to all the other untoward incidents of life, then you may say it comes within the scope of reason and the condition of mankind, and that, consequently, it is not unworthy the all merciful wisdom of a Divine Providence, but if not, the contrary ought to be its condemnation. We read that God "would have all men to be saved," but this salvation can only be obtained by man fulfilling certain conditions, for our redemption itself rests upon this tenor. Commands have been given to us to be kept, and ordinances to be adhered to, therefore Jesus Christ came to lay down a way or a rule for our direction; this way or rule you may readily conclude must be clear and simple, easy of access, secure, unerring and unchangeable, or alas! for the salvation of mankind, for Christ expressly says, that only "he that doth the will of my Father, who is in heaven, he shall enter into the kingdom of heaven." But how can we act up to his "will" unless we know it, and how can we know it unless there is a certain and a sure guide that cannot lead us astray. And this way or rule, the Prophet Isaiah describes in these beautiful and simple words, "And a path and a way shall be there, and it shall be called the holy way; the unclean shall not pass over it, and this shall be unto you a straight way, so that fools shall not err therein." Let us see, my friends, if your rule is this "holy way," this "straight way" so that even the simple and foolish cannot err therein. It may more clearly elucidate the matter if we take each particular case apart, and prove thereby the wisdom or the folly of either your rule or that of ours; say, we take the first on the list, the young—Children. But as I cannot well bring this case to a termination in this letter, I will carry it on to the next number.

Your's faithfully,
C. A. C.

Selections.

* SEAL'S COLLEGE.

We cheerfully publish a letter from the Rector of St. Xavier's College. We have never published in this journal any statement which we did not suppose to be true, and to the best of our knowledge have never left a wrong statement uncorrected, when we have been favoured with the means of correcting it. In reference to the present subject, we had stated that Seal's College was under the exclusive management of the Jesuits. The Rector, in his letter, states that this was not the case, and explains the mode in which they appear to have been fettered.—Friend of India, Sept. 10th.

To the Editor of the Friend of India.

Sir,—An article appeared in your paper of last Thursday, the object of which was to impress the public with the conviction, that the expulsion, as it is there termed, of the Jesuits from Seal's College, is to be attributed to inefficiency on their part to carry out the object of the institution.

In advertent to the article in question, it is not my intention to controvert any of the opinions put forth in it. I have avoided and I still purpose to avoid all controversy on the subject of Seal's College, from the persuasion that in existing circumstances it would be productive of more evil than good. Baboo Motee Loll Seal himself has declared what were the motives which induced him to adopt the course he has adopted. Surely it is but reasonable to presume that the Baboo knows his own mind better than any one else.

My object in addressing you is to notice an erroneous statement, which I am fully disposed to believe was unintentionally inserted in the above-mentioned article. It is there made to appear that the College was exclusively under the direction of the Jesuits. The following facts will show that such was not the case. 1. The admission of scholars into the Establishment was subject to the sole control of Baboo Motee Loll Seal himself. 2. In despite of repeated representations made to the Baboo, Mr. Banerjee was allowed to take no inconsiderable part in the management of the School. 3. The Teachers had not sufficient authority to insure the necessary supply of Books for the use of the students. 4. The Editor of a newspaper is of course free to give his own opinions, but if maintaining them, he incautiously advance anything which is not in perfect accordance with truth, the least he can do, particularly where the reputation of others is in question, is to correct his mistake, and disabuse the public of an error, which might prejudice their judgments and lead them to pronounce censure where it is not merited.—I am

Mr. Editor, &c. &c. H. McCANN,

Rector of St. Xavier's College.

October 8, 1844.

GWALIOR CHRISTIANS.—In continuation of our notice of the interesting experiment about to be made in the Dhoon in the establishment of a Christian colony there, we have much pleasure in stating that the arrangements made by Mr. Vansittart and Captain Kirke, are in so forward a state that there appears no necessity for the appointment of such a committee as had been suggested by Captain Eyre in his interesting memorandum, published in the Gazette of the 14th. The following extract from a letter from Captain Kirke to his fellow labourer will show what has been hitherto done, and how desirable it is that the exertions of that gentleman and of Captain Eyre should be fully seconded by a benevolent public:—

• "The Deputation left this on their return to Gwalior three days back. The Magistrate shewed them two pieces of ground about five miles from Deyrah, most of which is under cultivation and all of it can be irrigated with ease. They might make a beautiful place of it, and I am in hopes that we shall be able to purchase it for them for less than two thousand rupees. There are two thousand five hundred beguhs, and the Government rent only three annas per begah. The soil is splendid, and capable of producing any thing.

"I have the pleasure to enclose a sketch of that portion of the Dhoon where the land lies, and have coloured the two villages green to give you an idea of the locality. The one near Deyrah, called "Hurbus wallah," is a fine healthy part of the country, and well cultivated. The other belongs to Captain Turner, and is not so healthy, being lower and nearer the Sevalik range of hills. Still it is not an unhealthy place, and as most of the ground is under cultivation, it will be the Christians' own fault if they cannot keep it so. Should Father Felix accompany them, I feel every confidence in the success of the colony proving all we wish."

We are preparing a copy of the sketch alluded to by Captain Kirke and shall, if possible circulate it with the Gazette; if we cannot do this we will have a copy sent to the fund for locating the colony. We have been requested at the same time by Captain Eyre to acknowledge the receipt of Rs. 32 from Capt. Carter of the Gwalior Contingent.—Delhi Gazette, Sept. 28.

THE DOMINICANS.—On the Saturday before Pentecost the election of a General of the Dominican order took place in Rome. The Most Rev. P. M. Vincent Ajello was elected to the high and important office.—Tablet.

A letter from Rome, of the 20th ult., describes a State visit of His Holiness to the King of Sardinia at the Villa di Malta.—Ibid.

CARLOW.—RECEPTION OF A NUN.—This interesting and impressive ceremony took place at the Convent of our Lady of Mercy, Carlow, on Saturday, the Festival of St. Peter and St. Paul, when Miss Butler, eldest daughter of James Butler, of Kilmocar, Esq., received the white veil. On the same occasion, Miss Cullen, county Carlow, made the solemn bonds of profession, and received the black veil. The Right Rev. Dr. Haly officiated, assisted by a considerable number of his clergy, and the sermon was preached by Dr. Russell, of Maynooth, who described in eloquent and affecting terms the varied duties of the Sisters of Mercy, comprehending the entire range of the spiritual and corporal works of mercy. After the ceremony the bishops, clergymen, and a numerous and fashionable company, partook of a splendid déjeûné in the school-room of the Convent.—Kilkenny Journal.

MISSIONARY COLLEGE, ALL-HALLOWES, DRUMCONDRA, DUBLIN.—On Tuesday last six ecclesiastical students of this college received minor orders from the Most Rev. Dr. Murray. His grace also officiated on the three succeeding days at the college, and conferred the order of subdiaconship, diaconship and priesthood on three of the students, together with three others from the college of Maynooth. The young men ordained for the missionary college are to proceed to their respective missions in Scotland in the course of a few days. The ensuing academical course of studies in this great establishment will commence on the first day of September next. Any candidates desirous of entering the college at that time should make immediate application to its president, the Rev. Mr. Hand.—Ibid.

PHILADELPHIA.—ORDINATIONS.—On Saturday in Ember Week, the sacred order of Diaconship was conferred by the bishop in the cathedral on Rev. William Harnett, O. S. A., and Rev. James Forbes. On Trinity Sunday, Rev. James Forbes, Rev. Hugh Lane, and Rev. Hugh Brady, received the sacred order of Priesthood in the cathedral. Very Rev. John Timon, visitor of the congregation of the mission, preached on the occasion, and officiated as archdeacon.—Catholic Herald, June 6th.

BARNSELY.—Accustomed as I am to hear Mass in various towns throughout the year, it was pleasing to witness an interesting ceremony in the little town of Barnsley, Yorkshire, on Sunday, within the octave of Saints Peter and Paul. When I entered the chapel about forty girls, dressed in white, were arranged at the right of the chapel, and about the same number of boys on the left; the sermon was addressed to them on the sacred duty of making their first communion. After the priest's communion I was much struck with the solemn ceremony of renewing their baptismal vows, after which they communicated. On going from the chapel I was informed that twelve were converts, who had made their profession according to the ritual.—Ibid.

THE REPEAL MARTYRS.—FORM OF PRAYER.—We have the high privilege to be able to submit the form of prayer agreed on by the assembled hierarchy to be used upon the 28th inst., throughout the Catholic Church of Ireland.—

"PRAYER.—O Almighty and eternal God! King of Kings, and supreme Lord of all earthly powers, be graciously pleased to look down with compassion upon the people of this country, and mercifully put an end to their sufferings. Give them patience to endure their unexampled privations, and fill their rulers with the spirit of truth, humanity, and justice. Unite all classes in a persevering love of country, cordial allegiance to our beloved Sovereign, and charity towards each other. Direct our legislators to enact laws founded upon thy holy commandments, and make Ireland prosperous and happy: and as thy servant, Daniel O'Connell, who has laboured with so much zeal and perseverance to promote these sacred objects, is now detained in captivity, give him grace to bear his trials with resignation, and in thy mercy vouchsafe to restore him to liberty, for the guidance and protection of thy people, through our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen."—Freeman.

FARRINGTON WARD, (Union Arms, Union-Court, Holborn.)—Mr. Moses Marks (of the Nation Israel) in the chair. So numerous, on this occasion, were gentlemen of the Jewish faith and Englishmen of all creeds, that the Irish retired to make way for them. Mr. James Ryan observed that the now exalted position of Irishmen was due to their moral, legal, and loyal perseverance in the cause of liberty. George Powell, Esq., felt proud to see such a demonstration by the gentlemen of Farrington Ward. He was an English Protestant, and when he looked round and saw the Jew, the Methodist, and Dissenter, with their heart and their purse supporting the cause of Ireland, he was proud of the land of his birth. Their representatives had emancipated the black slave, but overlooked the white, who had fought and bled for the honours they enjoy—why was this? They did not know the grievances, under which Ireland laboured, until the Government incarcerated gentlemen for no other cause than their love of country. Irishmen could no longer be deceived with regard to English sympathy, and should Government proceed with their threat of putting down meetings such as these in public places, he would clear his warehouse every Saturday night, that Irishmen might have the use of it on Sunday. Several gentlemen of the Jewish nation addressed the meeting, as did Messrs. Lee, Reading, Corcoran, Nolan, and after three hearty cheers for O'Connell and Repeal the meeting separated, sixty-five members having been enrolled.—Tablet.

GENOA.

Eight missionaries of the Capuchin Order, under the direction of their superior, John Baptiste de Caserte, took their departure from the port of Genoa on the 21st ult., on their way to Brazil, for the missions destined for the savages, who still inhabit many districts of the vast empire. In a space of less than twelve months eighteen of those zealous missionaries have gone to convey the light of faith and the blessings of Christian civilization among the unhappy barbarians, and they will shortly be joined by others of their brethren from their house which was founded in Rome by the celebrated Father Eugene de Rumilly, who died in 1841.—Tablet.

BRISTOL.—ST. MARY'S ON THE QUAY.—On Sunday, June 30, the Sacrament of Confirmation was administered by the Right Rev. Dr. Bagge to upwards of 320 persons, many of whom were converts. The Church was crowded almost to suffocation, such a ceremony being of rare occurrence in this city. High Mass was celebrated by the Rev. P. O'Farrell, assisted as Deacon and Sub-Deacon by the Rev. Messrs. Rooker and Cullinan. The Bishop sat in his episcopal chair during Mass, attended on either side by the Rev. Messrs. Prendergast and Parfitt; the Right Rev. Dr. Brindle and the Rev. Mr. M'Donnald were also in attendance. Mr. Bonomi acted as Master of the Ceremonies on the occasion. At the conclusion of the Mass, the Right Rev. Prelate, robed in his cope with the mitre on his head and crozier in his hand, addressed his flock in a very impressive manner, and appeared to attract the attention and affections of all present; after which he proceeded to administer the Sacrament, which was a most edifying sight. The Church being a very handsome and capacious building, and every thing having been conducted with the utmost order and regularity of conduct, added not a little to the general effect. At the conclusion of the ceremony, his lordship again addressed those confirmed on the nature of the Sacrament they had received. The choir, a very efficient one, sang Haydn's Third Mass with great effect. In the evening, after the Vespers had been sung, the Bishop gave Solemn Benediction. On Sunday, July the 7th instant, his Majesty the King of Saxony and suit attended High Mass at this Church.—Tablet.

CHESTER.—His Majesty the King of Saxony attended Divine service last Sunday, in the Catholic chapel of this city.—Ibid.

HEREFORD.—On Sunday, the 7th instant, the Sacrament of Confirmation was administered by the Right Rev. the Vicar-Apostolic of the Western District at Hereford, to forty-seven members of the congregation of that mission. Two years only had elapsed since the preceding administration of this Sacrament. It will, therefore, be most gratifying to the Catholic body to learn that thirty-seven of that number were adult converts. We are informed that this consoling increase of our holy religion has been subsequent to the establishment, by the zealous missioner of Hereford, under the approbation and recommendation of the Vicar-Apostolic, of a branch of the Confraternity of the Immaculate Heart of Mary—a confraternity which is the most diffused in numbers of any recognised by the Church, and always found to draw down upon the congregation among which it is received, the greatest spiritual blessings. A large proportion of the Catholics of Hereford are enrolled therein, and thier edifying lives, their frequent approach to the Holy Sacraments, and the efficacy of their prayers for their erring brethren, are striking evidences of the advantages to be derived from its mission. The Sacrament of confirmation was also administered by the Right Rev. Vicar-Apostolic at Weobly, co. Hereford, on Sunday, 14th, to nine persons.—Ibid.

HEREFORDSHIRE.—To the Editor of the Tan-Sir.—I observe that you have followed the newspapers in describing the recent convert, Mr. Legh, as "of Herefordshire." I heartily wish this were the fact, but am sorry to be obliged to confess it is not so. Mr. Legh does not reside in Herefordshire: he is, however, married to one of the daughters of an honourable baronet, residing and possessing large estates in this county, which he represented for many years in Parliament—and hence, perhaps, the mistake. Your obedient servant, C. E. Hereford, July 16, 1844.—Ibid.

CONVERSION OF HURTER.—Our readers have been already made aware of the conversion to the Catholic faith of the celebrated German historian, Hurter. The following details of this event, which we take from La Gazette du Midi, will not prove unacceptable:—"Mr. Hurter paid a visit to Father Ventura. These two upright and candid characters speedily understood one another. Their conversation was a lengthened one, and turned rather on scientific than on religious subjects. They were on the point of separating, when Father Ventura, catching his interlocutor by both hands, said to him with that charity and persuasive affection always alive in the heart of the priest—"Well, let's see, when do you intend to obey the voice of God?" "Some day or other," said the Protestant doctor; "but it is a matter of much importance, and needs reflection." "Aye, some day or other, say you; but who hath counted our days? God hath long waited for you, and who knows whether He will not weary of waiting?" At these words Hurter warmly pressed Father Ventura in his arms, and left him. On the following day he arose more calm than usual, and every one remarked in his appearance a serenity that had formerly been habitual to his fine, mild German face, but which he seemed to have lost during his sojourn in Rome. Early in the morning he hastened to a Swiss priest, a friend of his, who is chaplain at the Pontifical Palace, and said to him, I am determined; do me the pleasure of going to the Holy Father; ask his orders for my abjuration, and that it may take place as soon as possible. The Pope fixed on the second next day, and named Cardinal Orsini as the person to receive the abjuration."—Cork Examiner.

The feast of SS. Peter and Paul was celebrated in the Holy City with the accustomed pomp. The Holy Father assisted not only at the Vespers in the Vatican Basilica, but also at the solemn Mass sung by Cardinal Ostini, Suburban Bishop of Albano. The concourse of the Faithful, both Romans and foreigners, assembled to visit the tomb and venerate the sacred relics of those two illustrious champions of the faith, was this year very considerable. The apostolic chamber received, according to custom, at the foot of the great staircase of the Vatican, the tributes paid to the Roman Church, and the Pope protested, in the accustomed form, against the tributary princes or individuals who had not fulfilled their obligations to the Holy See. On the eve of the solemnity, the magnificent illumination of the Cupola and of the Piazza of St. Peter's took place. On the evening of the feast, a brilliant girandola was given at the Castle of St. Angelo; and on the following morning the Holy Father left the Vatican to take up his residence, until October, at the palace of the Quirinal.—Ami de la Religion.

PROTESTANT EVIDENCES OF CATHOLICITY.

(Continued from page 190.)

Nor is this disunion confined to doctrines of lesser importance. If the reader turn to pages 16—24, he will find some of the most celebrated names of modern Protestantism ranged upon opposite sides of the questions of original sin, baptism, the resurrection, the trinity, the eternity of hell, and, indeed, every doctrine in natural and revealed religion. The natural and almost necessary consequence is indifference for all religion.

"The contests of the theological parties, for the most part, become known to the untheological public, and are openly discussed among the people.* From the disunion of the pastors there arises, in the heads and hearts of the people, nothing but confusion. They hear, they read; but no longer do they know where they are, whom they should believe, whom they are to follow.† Many who, until now, believed that they might rest upon the teaching of their pastor with as much security as on the voice of the angel at the gate of heaven, now begin to waver. Advancing a little farther, they begin to see more clearly, and fall into doubts, of whose existence they had never dreamed: they have not inquired sufficiently to find their way out, and fall at last either into indifferentism or despair."‡

"The antichristian spirit speaks aloud. We hold the Bible for our rule of faith: but I dare not say how it is interpreted. Even our universities go so far, that I fear they are preparing their own downfall; for, when the salt loses its savor, it shall be cast out and trodden under foot.§ The Devil possesses more faith than many of our teachers, and Mahomet was far better.|| It is awful, but yet true, that, among the Turks, no one with impunity dares blaspheme openly Christ, Abraham, Moses, and the prophets, as so many, among us evangelical Christians, do by word and by writing.¶ The number of those who explain away, as natural facts, the miracles of the New Testament, is legion; and their followers are as the stars of the firmament."

"Many of our sermons, even those of the superintendents, general superintendents, court preachers, and chief chaplains, might, without the slightest impropriety, be delivered in a Jewish synagogue, or a Turkish mosque; it would only be necessary to substitute, instead of the words 'Christianity,' 'Christ,' which are introduced occasionally for the form's sake, those which the speaker really intends, 'the doctrines and precepts of reason,' 'the philosophers,' as, for example, Socrates, Mendelsohn, Mahomet, &c.†† If a man now-a-days preach the pure and unadulterated word of God, and preach it with effect,—confounding the unbeliever, startling the self-secure, exciting the indifferent, strengthening and confirming the friends of Christ,—the cry immediately is raised, this man is preaching Popery."—pp. 30, 33, 38.

This is not mere declamation. Every day, every new controversy in Protestant Germany, places the unhappy truth in a clearer light. Every day draws numbers from the standard of what is called—and the name is an alarming index of the state of religion—the supernaturalist party, and adds to the ranks of Rationalism. Clergy and laity alike fall away; and, although we may make a large allowance for exaggeration, still it is melancholy to find it asserted, in a leading journal,‡ that the Rationalists are ninety-nine of every hundred of the Protestant population. What a striking illustration of the plain, common sense observation which Dr. H. cites from Cobbett's History of the Reformation!†

"Two true religions, two true creeds differing from each other, present us with an impossibility; what, then, are we to think of twenty or forty creeds, each differing from the rest? What is the natural effect of men seeing constantly before their eyes a score or two of sects, all calling themselves Christians, all tolerated by the law, and each openly declaring that all the rest are false? The natural, the necessary effect is, that many men will believe that none of them have the truth on their sides; and, of course, that the thing is false altogether, and invented solely for the benefit of those who dispute about it.

"Whether the Catholic be the true religion, or not, we have not now to inquire; but, while its long continuance, and in so many nations too, was a strong presumptive proof of its good moral effects upon the people, the disagreement among the Protestants was, and is, a presumptive proof, not less strong, of its truth. If there be forty persons who and whose fathers, up to this day, have entertained a certain belief; and if thirty-nine of these say, at last, that this belief is erroneous, we may naturally enough suppose, or at least we may think it possible, that the truth, so long hidden, is, though late, come to light. But if the thirty-nine begin—aye, and instantly begin—to entertain, instead of the one old belief, thirty-nine new beliefs, each differing from all the other thirty-eight, must we not, in common justice, decide that the old belief must have been the true one? What! shall we hear these thirty-nine protesters against the ancient faith, each protesting against all the other thirty-eight, and yet believe that their joint protest was just? Thirty-eight of them must now be in error; this must be: and are we still to believe in the correctness of their former decision, and that, too, relating to the same identical matter? Thus the argument would stand, on the supposition that thirty-nine parts out of forty of all Christendom had protested

* Heydenreich, Prediger-arbeiten, s. 262.

† Ludke, Abschaffung der Geistlichkeitstandes.

‡ Hammerschmidt, All. Kirch. Zeit. s. 1353.

§ Müller, in Archenholz Minerva, 1809, Juli, 867.

¶ Ewald Aahang zu der Schrift; Die Religion der Bibel, 1814.

 De Marees, Vertheidigung des Glaubens.

†† Über Bibel und Liturgische Bücher, 1798.

‡ Homiletisch. Liturg. Correspondenz-blatt, 1830, No. 16.

* Hom. Lit. Correspondenz-blatt. 1830, No. 30.

† Darmstadt Allgem. Kirch. Zeit. No. 200.

‡ Sect. 203—205.

but there were not, and there are not even unto this day, two parts out of fifty. So that here we have thirty-nine persons breaking off from about two thousand, protesting against the faith which the whole of their fathers had held; we have each of these thirty-nine protesting that all the other thirty-eight have protested upon false grounds; and yet we are to believe that their joint protest against the faith of the two thousand, who are backed by all antiquity, was wise and just! Is this the way in which we decide in other cases?"—pp. 601—3.

We have been tempted away from our subject by the clear and solid reasoning of this admirable extract; and it is not without reluctance we return to that portion of it which we are now considering. Who can reflect with indifference on the state of morals and religion where private opinion is so licentious, and public preaching so uncontrolled, that a preacher, from the pulpit of one of the first cities of Germany, may dare to talk lightly of the sanctity of the marriage tie, and palliate its violation?—where he may claim the privilege of interpreting thus our Redeemer's sentence on the adulteress; and where, above all, it is openly acknowledged that there is no principle in Protestantism to check this license of interpretation?*

Fearful, however, as are these abuses,—disheartening as is the prospect where the first principles of faith are so utterly corrupted,—still the advocate of the Protestant doctrines is forced to look them steadily in the face, and acknowledge that they are the necessary consequence of that inalienable right on which his own belief is grounded. The experience of a few years brought this clearly before the eyes of the fathers of the Reformation. As they had defied the authority of the church, they discovered that their own was disregarded in turn: the truths of religion slipped, one by one, insensibly from their grasp; and, in bitterness of heart, they acknowledged that their power was unequal to the task of appeasing the spirit which they had themselves evoked.

"Verily, I must acknowledge," writes Luther, "much trouble cometh of my teaching! Yea, I cannot deny that the matter often maketh me sorrowful, when my conscience specially chideth me, in that I have torn asunder the former state of the church, which was tranquil and peaceful under the papacy, and excited much trouble, discord, and faction by my teaching.† If the world endureth much longer, we shall be forced, by reason of the contrary interpretations of the Bible which now prevail, to adopt again, and take refuge in the decrees of the councils, if we have a mind to maintain unity of faith.‡

"It is of no little moment that the dissensions which have arisen among us should remain unsuspected by posterity. For it is truly ridiculous that, after opposing ourselves to the entire world, we should, at the very commencement, differ among ourselves.§ The whole Elbe could not supply water enough to bewail the dissensions of the Reformation. They doubt with regard to the most momentous doctrines. The evil is incurable.*

"Our people are 'driven about by every wind of doctrine.' We may, perhaps, still know what they believe in religion to-day, but we are not sure that to-morrow they will believe the same. In what single point are those who have declared war against the Pope, agreed among themselves? If we take the trouble to examine the articles, from the first to the last, we shall find that there is not one which is not admitted by some as an article of faith, and by the others rejected as ungodly."†—p. 441.

Have these predictions been falsified by the event? Has any subsequent modification of the principles of this unstable creed checked that wild and licentious career of dogmatism, the thought of which imbibited the last days of the stern and reckless reformer? Has any balm been found for that malady which Melancthon declared incurable? Have those disgraceful dissensions, which Calvin would conceal from posterity, been suspended or accommodated in latter times? Let the history of the Reformation in England, Scotland, the Low Countries, France, Switzerland, above all, Germany, reply. Do not the same causes subsist to the present day? Are not their effects as appalling, aye, infinitely more appalling than they were even in those days when the evil was pronounced incurable! Alas! disunion and strife seem to be of the very nature and essence of Protestantism!

"Discord and schism among the Protestants were inevitable. We can fancy to ourselves two periods in the formation of their religious opinions: the first, their common struggle with Catholicity, the protest and separation of all these new religious parties from the Catholic Church; the second, their own internal process of re-construction. In the first all was pulling down; in the second, building up: the first was revolution—the second, constitution or organization. But it also followed that, in the one case, there was unity of purpose and community of exertion, and, therefore, union: in the other, diversity of purpose, and, therefore, discord and separation. . . . As soon as they seriously set about re-constructing the sole true edifice of Christian faith,—as the architects were not of one mind, and were self-opinioned and obstinate enough to wish each for his own plans, models, and designs, in the erection and ornamenting of the edifice, although often they did not understand each other's language,—confusion and strife at once became unavoidable: oftentimes, before any considerable part of the work was done, they

108. We regret to add that, probably from the absence of the author during the printing of the present edition, the references are not unfrequently defective, and some times incorrect. He mentions this circumstance in the preface to the second edition, with a promise that, by occasional notices in the "Universal Kirchen-Zeitung," a periodical which has been established at Frankfurt-on-the-Maine, the defect shall, as far as possible, be supplied. Some of the references we have been obliged to give on the authority of the work itself.

* Melancth. Ep. l. iv. 100.

† Andreas Dudith, Schreiben an Beza.

Leitung in die Dogmatik der Ev. Prot.

Kl.

p. tom. ii. p. 281, 387.

ii. cont. Zeinglium.

Ep. ad Melan. p. 143. In the edition to which we have referred (Geneva, 1576) it occurs in p.

separated, each building a hut for himself, or taking up some temporary lodging, till he ultimately returned to the original dwelling. The expositions of Scripture, and the conclusions from it, which one party adopted, were rejected by another; and that notwithstanding the claims of human authority, which they determined not to allow. But meanwhile, although authority was driven out at one door, it was let in at another, although in a new and more friendly shape. Before, it had dictated as an arbitrary and infallible law-giver; now it spoke merely as an unerring interpreter of the law; instead of the dogma, prescribed without proof or warrant of Scripture, proven and Scriptural tenets were now proposed: but unfortunately, many now considered the proofs as worthless and of as little power as, before, all had deemed the authority of the church from which they had seceded."*—Pp. 52, 53.

Nor is it possible to find, in the organization of Protestantism, any remedy for this evil. The opinion of Melancthon, in the sixteenth century, is that of every reflecting Protestant to the present day.

"How insecure the Bible is, as a foundation for a system of religion, may be learned from the fact that all the advocates of the Bible have formed their peculiar and contradictory creeds from the same volume, and anathematized and persecuted each other on the same plea.† Can any man deny that there are but few passages in the New Testament from which all readers deduce the same meaning? Now which of these is the right? Which should be adopted? Who is to decide? who can decide?‡ According to genuine Protestant principles, it is impossible that the internal dissensions of the church can be cured. Except superficially: they cannot be stopped by the power of the church, but must bleed on internally.§ Is it not true that the Holy Scripture is the only rule of the Christian's faith, and that there is no infallible interpreter upon earth? In these two points all Protestants are agreed. Now, if they be sincere,—if they mean in their hearts what, in their sermons, confessions of faith, and controversies against the Catholics, they have declared a thousand times,—surely it is an inevitable consequence that they must acknowledge in every Christian a right to interpret the Bible for himself; and that those doctrines alone are articles of faith for each individual which he reads in the Bible, no matter whether others can find them there or not."||—Pp. 55, 56.

"Our church is founded on liberty of faith: she tolerates difference of opinion, and, of course, tolerates error, and must tolerate it.¶ If we dispassionately consider the whole organization of the Protestant Church, there cannot be a doubt that thorough consistency is wanting.* The firm consistency and consecutiveness of the Catholic constitution are wanting to the Evangelical Church; it wants that mutual connection of the members, and subjection to one head as the centre of unity."†

Unhappily, too, this disposition to dogmatize is not confined to the mere interpretation of Scripture. It extends even to the authority itself, and canvasses the authenticity of every single book; and, indeed, of every single passage in the Bible. The opinions of Luther with regard to the Epistle of the Hebrews and the Apocalypse of St. John, his utter and contemptuous rejection of St. James' recht ströherner Epistel, and, above all, the principle which he applied as a test of their authenticity, have not been lost on his successors in innovation. It is with extreme pain we transfer to our own pages a few specimens of the impious and blasphemous spirit in which the work of Biblical criticism is now pursued; a labor, be it remembered, which the consistent Protestant is bound to undertake as the first step in the formation of his religious opinions, whatever may be its dangers, and however inevitable the abuses to which it leads. The first of the following extracts is from the preface of a Bible published in 1819 by the Strasbourg Bible Society!

"The book of Ruth is a beautiful family picture: Luther did not consider the book of Esther as of much value for Christian readers. The book of Judith is a beautiful pious romance, but pure poetry. But in the book of Tobias there are superstitious accounts of good and bad Angels; and of the means by which we may counteract the influence of evil spirits. Some of the psalms bear the impress of the imperfect morality of an early age.‡ The book of the prophet Jonas is a fable, exquisitely wrought for that period; for the purpose of reprobating the hatred of the Jews for the Gentiles, and representing it in its true light, as unjust and foolish.§ This tale is a story which has much of the romantic in its character; the object of which, considered in a moral point of view, is to display, in its full inconsistency and nakedness, the deep-rooted prejudice that God was the God of the Israelites alone.|| The prophecy of Jonas is a symbolical poem, whose object is to show that disobedience to God and idolatry draw down the vengeance of heaven; but that obedience, repentance, and piety to God avert it from men."¶

"Schulze and Schulthess attach very little credit to the Gospel of St. Matthew."

"The Gospel of St. John is unquestionably the production of a disciple of the Alexandrian school."††

* Henke, Allgem. Geschichte, der Ch. Kirche, Th. iii. s. 376—8.

† Jenaischer Allgem. Literatur-Zeitung, No. 48, 1821.

‡ Lessing, Beiträge zur Gesch. der Literat. B. vi. s. 58.

§ Schleiermacher, Reformations-alman. 1819.

|| Corne, Auslegung zu Locke's "Reasonableness of Christianity." 1715.

¶ Schulz, Nassauer, Prediger-Arbeiten, Heft. 1, s. 91. 1830.

* Ullmann, Theolog. Studien und Kritiken, Heft 2, s. 301. 1833.

† Fessler, Gesch. der Ungern, Th. 7. s. 677.

‡ Dr. Isaac Hapfner, Strasbourg, 1819.

§ Michaelis Übersetzung des A. Testaments.

|| Augusti, Grundriss einer Hist. Kirt. Einleitung in's A. Test.

¶ Staudlin, Neue Beiträge zur Erläuterung der bibl. Propheten.

 Bretschneider Handb. der Dogm. B. ii. s. 778. Note

†† Staudlin's Religion's Geschichte, Th. iii.

"Professor Ewald has demonstrated a new Comment in Apocal. exegeticum et criticum, Leipzig, 1828, by the most triumphant evidence, that the Gospel, Epistles, and Apocalypse of John cannot possibly be the work of the same author.* With regard to the Apocalypse, the majority of Protestant critics dispute its authority."†

"Schleiermacher has attacked the first Epistle to Timothy; Eichhorn, both the first and the second; as also the Epistle to Titus, in his Einleitung in's N. Test. B. iii. s. 315."

"Many, after Eichhorn, deny that the prophets enjoyed any supernatural revelation, and say that they were clever and experienced men, more likely, from their abilities, to foresee future events; and, from the purity of their manners, used as instruments of Providence to check a guilty age."‡

"IT IS PROBABLE THAT THE WRITINGS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT DO NOT CONTAIN THE PURE DOCTRINES OF JESUS."§—Pages 164—9.

